THE LIFE OF SWIFT.

THE life, writings, and character of SWIFT, have successively employed the researches, exercised the strictures, and exhausted the praises of Mrs. Pilkington, the Earl of Orrery, Deane Swift, Esq. Dr. Delany, Dr. Hawkefworth, Dr. Johnson, and George-Monk Berkeley, Esq. Their several publications, which place his character in very different, and often opposite points of light, have occasioned great diversity in the judgments formed of them by the world, according to the different degrees of prejudice or candour in their several readers. On an attentive perusal, it will be found, that the narrations of Lord Orrery, Dr. Hawkefworth, Dr. Johnson, and Mr. Sheridan, entitle them to the exclusive appellation of his biographers. Dr. Delany, Mr. Swift, Mr. Berkeley, and Mrs. Pilkington, come under a different description. The three former must be considered as his apologists, and the latter as a retailer of entertaining anecdotes. These are the several sources from which the facts stated in the present account are chiefly derived. Some particulars of his early life are taken from the Anecdotes of the Family of Swift, a fragment, written by himself, which now exists in his own hand-writing, in the University Library of Dublin.

Jonathan Swift was, according to the account written by himself, the son of Mr. Jonathan Swift, an attorney, and was born in Hoey's-Court, in the parish of St. Werburgh, Dublin, on the 30th of November, 1667. He was descended from a younger branch of an ancient family of that name in Yorkshire. His grandfather, the Rev. Thomas Swift, was Vicar of Goodrich in Herefordshire, and married Elizabeth Dryden, aunt of the great poet, by whom he had ten sons and three or four daughters. He died in 1658; and, of his sons, six survived him, Godwin, Thomas, Dryden, William, Jonathan, and Adam.

Thomas was bred at Oxford, and took orders: he married the eldest daughter of Davenant, and left an only son, Thomas, who died rector of Puttenham in Surrey, May 1752, in the 87th year of his age. Godwin studied the law, in the Inner-Temple, and was called to the bar before the Restoration. He had four wives, one of whom was a relation to the old Marchioness of Ormond; and, upon that account, the old Duke of Ormond made him his Attorney-General, in the palatinate of Tipperary. He left several children, who obtained estates. William, Dryden, Jonathan, and Adam, were attorneys, who all lived and died in Ireland; but none of them left male issue except Jonathan, the father of Swift.

Jonathan, at the age of twenty-three, married Abigail Erick, descended from an ancient family of that name in Leicestershire, but with little or no fortune. He died young, in about two years after his marriage, seven weeks before the birth of his only son; and, as he was but just beginning the world, left his widow and an infant daughter to the care of his brother Godwin.

When Swift was a year old, his nurse, who was a native of Whitehaven, finding it necessary to visit a sick relation, and being extremely fond of the infant, stole him on shipboard, unknown to his mother and uncle, and carried him with her to Whitehaven, where he continued for almost three years; for, when the matter was discovered, his mother sent orders not to hazard a second voyage till he should be better able to bear it. The nurse was so careful of him, that, before he returned, he had learned to spell, and, before he was five years old, he could read any chapter in the Bible.

His mother, about two years after his father's death, quitted the family of his uncle Godwin, and retired to Leicester, where she was chiefly supported by presents and contributions from her relations.

The infancy of Swift passed without any marks of distinction. At the age of six he was sent to the School of Kilkenny, and, at fourteen, admitted into the University of Dublin. The expence of his education was defrayed by his uncle Godwin, who, having a numerous offspring, by four wives, was under the necessity of reducing his allowance as low as possible.

His other relations seemed at that time to think that their assistance was not necessary, so that he was obliged to make the best shift he could with the small pittance afforded by his uncle; who was supposed by him, as well as by the rest of the world, to be in circumstances that might have afforded a much more liberal allowance, without prejudice to his own family.

This supposition made so deep an impression on him, that he never afterwards could think with patience of his uncle Godwin, nor could heartily forgive the neglect shown him during that time by his other relations.

During his residence at College, he lived with great regularity and due observance of the statutes; but he was so discouraged and sunk in his spirits, by the ill treatment of his relations, that he could not bear to give the necessary application to the more dry parts of the academic studies, for which he had indeed naturally no great relish; and passed his time chiefly in reading books of history and poetry, which were better suited to his taste, and more calculated to relieve the troubles of his mind. In consequence of this, when the time came for his taking the degree of Bachelor of Arts, he was stopped, as he himself expresses it, "for dulness and insufficiency," and at last hardly admitted, in a manner little to his credit, as it was inserted in the College register that he obtained it speciali gratia, by special favour; where it still remains upon record.

He remained in the College near three years after this disgrace, not through choice, but necessity, little known or regarded. By scholars he was esteemed a blockhead; and, as the lowness of his circumstances would not permit him to keep company of an equal rank, upon an equal footing, he scorned to associate with those of a lower class, or to be obliged to those of a higher.

Shame, however, had its proper effect in producing reformation; for he resolved, from that time, to study eight hours a-day, and he continued his industry for seven years, with what improvement is generally known.

At this time the force of his genius broke out, in the first rude draught of the Tale of a Tub, written by him at the age of nineteen, though communicated to nobody but his chamber-fellow Mr. Waryng, the brother of the lady who received his juvenile addresses, and with whom he corresponded with all the romantic ardour attending a first passion, under the whimsical name of Varina.

Soon after, his uncle Godwin was seized with a lethargy, and the broken state of his affairs was made public. He now lost even the poor support that he had before; but his uncle William supplied the place of Godwin to him, though not in a more liberal way, which could not be expected from his circumstances, yet with so much better a grace as engaged his gratitude afterwards.

His cousin Willoughby Swift, eldest son of his uncle Godwin, hearing of his father's unhappy circumstances, and reflecting that Swift's destitute situation demanded immediate relief, sent him a present of a larger sum than ever he had been master of before.

This was the first time that his disposition was tried with regard to the management of money; and he said, that the reflection of his constant sufferings through the want of it, made him nurse it so well, that he was never afterwards without some in his purse.

In 1688, when he was about one-and-twenty, he went to consult his mother, who lived at Leicester, about the future course of his life; and, by her direction, solicited the advice and patronage of Sir William Temple, who had married one of her relations, and whose father, Sir John Temple, Master of the Rolls in Ireland, had lived in great familiarity of friendship with his uncle Godwin, by whom he had been till that time maintained.

Sir William Temple, who then resided at Shene, received him cheerfully into his house, and treated him with that hospitable kindness to which family connections and his unfortunate situation gave him a double claim. On a nearer acquaintance, his kindness to him was increased from motives of personal regard, and he took upon him the direction and superintendence of his studies, in which he found his progress was far from being so great as might have been expected from his course of education and time of life.

During his residence at Shene, he became known to King William, who sometimes visited Sir William Temple when he was disabled by the gout; and, being attended by Swift in the garden, showed him how to cut asparagus in the Dutch way. King William expressed his kindness to Swift by offering to make him a Captain of Horse; but Swift appears to have fixed his mind very early on an ecclesiastical life; and, it is therefore probable, that, upon declining this offer, he obtained a promise of preferment in the church, for, in a letter to his uncle William, dated 1692, he says, "I am not to take orders till the King gives me a Prebend."

When Sir William Temple removed to Moor-Park, after the settlement of the government, he took Swift with him, and detained him two years, as his friend and domestic companion.

Being much oppressed by an illness which he contracted in Ireland by a surfeit of fruit, that brought on a coldness of stomach and giddiness, with deafness, he was advised to try his native air, and went to Ireland; but, finding himself growing worse there, he soon returned to

THE LIFE OF SWIFT.

Moor-Park, where he continued his studies, upon the abatement of his illness, which, with irregular intermissions, pursued him through life, and at last sent him to the grave deprived of reason.

He thought exercise of great necessity, and used to run up and down a hill, about half a mile from the house, every two hours, and the distance backwards and forwards, in about six minutes.

He now stood high in Sir William Temple's esteem, though he had written nothing that could give him a very high idea of his genius, except the Tale of a Tub, which he revised and corrected about this time, and probably showed to his patron.

He tried his strength only in Pindaric Odes to the King, to Sir William Temple, and to the "Athenian Society," in which, though there appeared some vigour of mind, and efforts of an uncommon genius, yet it was apparent that it was vigour improperly exerted, and the efforts of a genius misapplied. The sentiments were strained and crowded, and the numbers irregular and harsh.

When Sir William Temple was consulted by the Earl of Portland about the expedience of complying with a bill then depending for making parliaments triennial, he sent Swift to Kensington with the whole account in writing, to convince the King and the Earl that the proposal involved nothing dangerous to royal power. But the predetermination of the king made his arguments, and his art of displaying them, totally ineffectual; and the measure was rejected.

The consequence of this wrong step in his Majesty, he observes, was very unhappy; for although it be held a part of the King's prerogative to refuse passing a bill, yet the learned in the law think otherwise, from that expression used at the coronation, wherein the Prince obligeth himself to consent to all laws, quas vulgus elegerit.

In this situation Swift continued, still applying close to his studies, till 1692, when he went to Oxford to take his degree of Master of Arts. In the testimonial which he produced from the University of Dublin, the words of disgrace were omitted, probably by the influence of his uncle William. He was admitted ad eundem, June 14. and took his Master's degree July 5th 1692; with such reception and regard as fully contented him.

From Oxford he returned to Moor-Park, where he remained two years longer, in expectation of getting some preferment through Sir William Temple's interest with the King, which he had promised to exert in his favour; and, in this time, he assisted him in the revival and correction of his writings, and added the digressions to the Tale of a Tub.

At length, quite wearied out with fruitless expectation, he determined to leave Sir William Temple, and to take his chance in the world. When this resolution was made known to Sir William, he received it with ardent marks of displeasure; but, that he might seem to fulfil his promise, he offered him an employment then vacant, in the office of the rolls in Ireland, of about 100 l. a-year. Swift, with great readiness and spirit, replied, "that since he had now an opportunity of living without being driven into the church for a maintenance, he was resolved to go to Ireland to take holy orders;" and so he went away in discontent.

While he lived at Moor-Park, he used to pay his mother at Leicester an yearly visit. He travelled on foot, unless the violence of the weather drove him into a waggon; he dined at obscure ale-houses, among pedlars and ostlers; and at night, he would go to a penny lodging, where he procured clean sheets for sixpence. This practice some have ascribed to avarice, and others, perhaps with more probability, to his desire of surveying human life through all its varieties.

He went over to Ireland, and was ordained in September 1694. He had at first no higher views in the church than the Chaplainship to the Factory at Lisbon; but being recommended to Lord Capel, then Lord Deputy of Ireland, he obtained the Prebend of Kilroot, in the diocese of Connor, of about 100 l. a-year.

Soon after, upon receiving a letter from Sir William Temple, with an invitation to Moor-Park, he resigned his living to a poor curate who had only 40 l. a-year, for the maintenance of a very numerous family of children, and returned to England.

The circumstances attending this act of benevolence are well described by Mr. Sheridan; and the following reflection on the "exquisite pleasure" which it afforded the heart of Swift, is singularly happy, both for the thought and the expression: "Nor is this to be wondered at, since it was the first opportunity he ever had of letting loose that spirit of generosity and benevolence, whose greatness and vigour, when pent up in his own breast by poverty and dependence, served only as an evil spirit to torment him."

The editor of the late edition of the "Tatler," has ascribed his leaving Kilroot to no less a crime than an attempt to commit a rape. This ridiculous charge is refuted by Mr. Berkeley, with a mixture of contempt and indignation which it well deserves. It has also been contradicted in the "Gentleman's Magazine," by the person on whose authority it was rested; and is too palpably absurd to be credited, even by those who may meet with the accusation without seeing the defence.

He arrived at Moor-Park, in 1695, with fourscore pounds in his pocket, after somewhat more than a year's absence. The infirmities of Sir William Temple made him more necessary than ever; and having, perhaps, equally repented their separation, they lived on together with mutual satisfaction. In the four years that passed between his return and Sir William Temple's death, he was fully and usefully employed. He took upon himself the office of Preceptor to his niece, teaching her English, and directing her in a proper course of reading. At the same time, Miss Johnson, daughter of his steward, afterwards so well known by the name of Stella, partook of the benefit of the same instruction. She was at that time about fourteen years of age, beautiful in her person, and possessed of such fine talents as made Swift take great delight in cultivating and improving her mind. At this time too he wrote the Battle of the Books, in honour of his great and learned friend.

In 1699, Sir William Temple died, and left a legacy, with his manuscripts, to Swift; for whom he had obtained from King William a promise of the first prebend that should be vacant at Westminster or Canterbury.

Upon the death of his patron, he removed to London, and soon after dedicated to the King the posthumous works with which he was intrusted; but neither the dedication, nor a memorial which he thought proper to present, revived in King William the remembrance of his promise. He attended the court a while, but soon found his solicitations hopeless. He exonerated the King so far as to say often that he believed the memorial was never received.

He therefore readily accepted of an offer made to him by the Earl of Berkeley to accompany him into Ireland as his Chaplain and Private Secretary; but after having done the business of secretary till their arrival at Dublin, he then found that one Bush had persuaded his Lordship that a Clergyman was not a proper secretary, and had obtained the office for himself.

He revenged himself by a severe copy of verses against the governor and his new made secretary, which were everywhere handed about, to their no small mortification.

Lord Berkeley had soon after the disposal of the Deanery of Derry, and Swift expected to obtain it; but by the secretary's being secured by a bribe of 1000 l. it was bestowed on another; and Swift was dismissed with the Rectory of Agher, and the Vicarages of Laracor and Rathbeggan, in the diocese of Meath, which, together, did not equal half the value of the deanery.

He continued still in his office of Chaplain to Lord Berkeley, from the respect which he had for his Lady, whose virtues he has celebrated in the introduction to the Project for the Advancement of Religion.

About this time, his true humorous vein in poetry began to display itself in several little pieces, written for the entertainment of Lord Berkeley's family, particularly that incomparable piece of low humour, called The humble Petition of Mrs. Frances Harris, &c.

When Lord Berkeley quitted the government of Ireland, Swift went to reside on his living at Laracor, where he read prayers on Wednesdays and Fridays, and performed all the offices of his profession with great decency and exactness.

Soon after his settlement at Laracor, he invited to Ireland his lovely pupil Miss Johnson, to whom Sir William Temple, in consideration of her father's faithful services, had left 1000 l. With her came a lady of the name of Dingley, who was related to the Temple family, and whose whole fortune was an annuity of 27 l. With these ladies he passed his hours of relaxation, and to them he opened his bosom; but they never resided in the same house. They lived at the parsonage when he was away, and when he returned, removed to a lodging, or to the house of Dr. Raymond, a neighbouring clergyman, at Trim.

Miss Johnson was then eighteen, and, by his own account, had the most and finest accomplishments of any person he had ever known of either sex. Yet he studiously avoided the appearance of any tender attachment to her, and never saw or conversed with her but in the presence of some third person.

Whatever inclination he might formerly have had to matrimony, it was now much changed. A few years absence, and some newly discovered faults, made him wish to put an end to a correspondence in the style of courtship, which had been carried on for some time with Miss Waryng. The circumstances of that affair are laid open in an unlover-like and dictatorial epistle to Miss Waryng, dated May 4. 1700, the design of which seems evidently to have been to break off the match, but in such a way as that the refusal might come from the lady. The subsequent fortunes of Miss Waryng are not known; but it is probable Swift's connection with her might occasion the mysterious conduct he observed towards Miss Johnson.

Ambition, not love, was his predominant passion. Urged by this restless spirit, he every year paid a visit to England, in hopes of finding some favourable opportunity of distinguishing himself, and pushing his fortune in the world.

His first political tract, intituled A Discourse of the Contests and Dissentions in Athens and Rome, was published in 1701, at the time when the nation was in a ferment on account of the impeachment of the Earls of Portland and Orford, Lord Somers and Lord Halifax, by the House of Commons. He concealed his name; nor was he, though he sided with the Whigs, at that time connected with any of the leaders of that party. His motives were wholly of a public nature, and such as became his truly disinterested and patriotic spirit. This was the only piece he ever explicitly avowed as his own production. With respect to all his other publications, to which he did not affix his name, he left the world to make its own conjectures with regard to the author. He maintained a kind of dignified reserve, and seemed always to court that equivocal shade which "half showed," and "half veiled" his intentions and pursuits.

The same year, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity.

In 1704, he published, The Tale of a Tub, which he had kept by him eight years. Mr. Sheridan considers it as a work truly friendly to the interests of religion, by weakening of the powers of popery and fanaticism; but, it is certain, that most of the serious part of the clergy and the laity, even among the high-church-men, blushed for the author, and thought religion the last thing he troubled himself about. It has been ascribed by Mr. Cooksey, in his "Life of Lord Somers," to that nobleman; but he himself did not deny that he was the author, when Archbishop Sharp and the Dukes of Somerset, by showing it to the Queen, debarred him from a bishopric.

After the publication of this work, his acquaintance was much sought after by all persons of taste and genius. There was, particularly, a very close connection between him and Addison, which ended in a sincere and lasting friendship; and he lived in the greatest intimacy with Congreve, Arbuthnot, Prior, Pope, Gay, Parnell, Garth, Berkeley, and others of inferior note.

In 1708, he published The Sentiments of a Church-of-England Man, the ridicule of astrology, under the name of Bickerstaff, the Argument against abolishing Christianity, and the defence of the Sacramental Test.

In these publications Swift does not rise superior to the prejudices which agitated the contending parties of those days. His principles of toleration may be clearly perceived to have been inimical to a general liberty of conscience. He speaks the language of those days, when bigotry, under the specious names of zeal and orthodoxy, shook the very pillars of the Reformation; and, while it pretended to secure the church from danger, was undermining the best interests of truth, religion, and liberty.

The attention paid to the paper published under the name of Bickerstaff, induced Steele, when he projected the "Tatler," to assume an appellation which had already gained possession of the reader's notice.

In 1709, he published a Project for the advancement of Religion, addressed to Lady Berkeley, by whose kindness it is not unlikely that he was advanced to his benefices, but chiefly calculated for the Queen's perusal, being covertly aimed at the destruction of the Whigs or Low-church-party.

After the publication of this piece, Swift went to Ireland, where he passed much of his time with Addison, then Secretary to the Earl of Wharton, Lord Lieutenant of that kingdom.

Upon the change of affairs at court the following year, when the Tory ministry was appointed, Swift was employed by the bishops of Ireland to solicit the Queen for a remission of the first-fruits and twentieth-parts to the Irish clergy.

He arrived in London, with his credentials, in September 1710, and waited upon Harley, to whom he was mentioned as a man neglected and oppressed by the last ministry, because he had refused to co-operate with some of their schemes.

Harley was glad of an auxiliary so well qualified for his service, and readily admitted him to familiarity and his entire confidence.

He was admitted to those meetings in which the first hints and original plan of action are supposed to have been formed; and was one of the sixteen ministers, or agents of the ministry, who met weekly at each other's houses, and were united by the name of "Brother."

He continued, however, to converse indiscriminately with all the wits, and was yet a friend to Steele, and contributed to the "Tatler," which began in April, 1709.

At this time, and during his connection with the Tory ministry, he kept a regular journal of all the most remarkable events, as well as little anecdotes, which he transmitted every fortnight to Stella, the name by which he called Miss Johnson, for private perusal, and that of Mrs. Dingley. This journal was luckily preserved, and some time since given to the world.

He was now immersing into political controversy. The writers on both sides had before this taken the field. On the Whig side were Addison, Burnet, Steele, Congreve, Rowe, and many others of less note. On the Tory side, the chief writers were Bolingbroke, Atterbury, Prior, Freind and King. They had published twelve numbers of a weekly paper, called The Examiner, when Swift declared himself. The whole conduct of the paper was, from that time, put into his hands. He entered the field alone; he scorned assistance; and despised numbers. His first paper was published November 2. 1710, No. 13. of The Examiner; and he continued them without interruption till June 7. 1711, when he dropped it, closing it with No. 44, and then leaving it to be carried on by Mrs. Manley, and other hands.

In 1711, he published a Letter to the October Club, "a set of above a hundred parliament-men of the country, who drank October beer at home, and met every evening at a tavern near the parliament to consult on affairs, and drive things to extremes against the Whigs; to call the old ministry to account, and get off five or six heads." Swift seems to have concurred in opinion with the violent members of his own party; but it was not in his power to quicken the tardiness of Harley, whom he stimulated as much as he could, but with little effect. His Letter, however, put an end to the cabals of the October Club.

The next year, he published a proposal for correcting, improving, and ascertaining the English Tongue, in a letter to Harley; "written," says Dr. Johnson, "without much knowledge of the general nature of language, and without any accurate inquiry into the history of other tongues. The certainty and stability which, contrary to all experience, he thinks attainable, he proposes to secure by instituting an academy, the decrees of which every man would have been willing, and many would have been proud to disobey; and which, being renewed by successive elections, would in a short time have differed from itself."

The same year, he published his celebrated political tract, called The Conduct of the Allies. The purpose was to persuade the nation to a peace; and never had any publication more success. It is said that eleven thousand were sold in less than a month. To its propagation certainly no agency of power or influence was wanting. It furnished arguments for conversation, speeches for debate, and materials for parliamentary resolutions.

It was followed by his Barrier Treaty, which carries on the design of the Conduct of the Allies, and his Remarks on the Bishop of Sarum's Introduction to the third Volume of his History of the Reformation, in which he treats Burnet like a political antagonist, whom he is glad of an opportunity to insult.

The ministry were not unmindful of his merits, and had recommended him to the Queen to fill a vacant bishopric; but the recommendation was opposed by Archbishop Sharp, who used this remarkable expression, "that her Majesty should be sure that the man whom she was going to make a bishop was a Christian." The Duchess of Somerset also showed the Queen that excessive bitter copy of verses which Swift had written against her, called The Windsor Prophecy. As a mark of her displeasure, the Queen passed Swift by, and bestowed the bishopric on another.

As soon as it was known that he was in disgrace with the Queen, his court friends either deserted him or looked coldly on him. Speeches were made against him in both Houses of Parliament. The Scottish Peers went in a body to the Queen to complain of the author of a pamphlet, called the Public Spirit of the Whigs, written in answer to Steele's "Crisis," in which were many passages injurious to the honour of their nation.

His friend Harley, however, and the rest of the ministry, exerted their influence so strongly in his behalf, that he soon appeared again at court, in higher favour than ever.

In April 1713, he was appointed Dean of St. Patrick's in Dublin, the best preferment the ministry would venture to give him. "That ministry," says Dr. Johnson, "was, in a great degree, supported by the clergy, who were not yet reconciled to the author of the Tale of a Tub, and would not, without much discontent and indignation, have borne to see him installed in an English cathedral."

In June following, he went to take possession of his deanery; but was not suffered to stay in Ireland more than a fortnight before he was recalled to England, that he might reconcile Harley and Bolingbroke, who began to look on one another with malevolence, which every day increased.

Upon his arrival, he contrived an interview at Lord Masham's, from which they both departed discontented; he procured a second, which only convinced him that the breach was irreconcilable. He told them his opinion, that all was lost, and that he was determined to have no further concern with public affairs.

By the dissension of his great friends, his importance was now at an end; and seeing his services at last useless, he returned in June 1714, to a friend's house at Letcomb in Berkshire, where he wrote that spirited pamphlet, called Free Thoughts on the present State of Affairs; but the death of the Queen, soon after it went to press, put a stop to the publication.

This event broke down at once the whole system of Tory politics, put an end to all Swift's noble designs for the public good, and cut off all his own future prospects.

There is an admirable picture given of him upon this occasion, by a few strokes of the masterly pen of Arbuthnot: "I have seen a letter," he writes Pope, "from Dean Swift; he keeps up his noble spirit; and though, like a man knocked down, you may behold him still with a stern countenance, and aiming a blow at his adversaries."

The brightest and most important part of his life passed during the four last years of Queen Anne, when his faculties were in full vigour, and occasions for displaying them arose adequate to their greatness.

It is recorded to his honour, and to animate others by his example, that, during his connection with those who were in the highest rank, and who in every rank would have been great, he would never suffer himself to be treated but as an equal, and repulsed every attempt to hold him in dependence, or keep him at distance, with the utmost resentment and indignation.

It happened upon some occasion that Harley sent him a bank bill of 50 l. by his private secretary, Mr. Lewis, which he instantly returned with a letter of expostulation and complaint; but he accepted afterwards a draught of 1000 l. upon the Exchequer, which was intercepted by the Queen's death.

When he was desired by Harley to introduce Parnell to his acquaintance, he refused, upon this principle, that a man of genius was a character superior to a lord in a high station. He therefore obliged him to walk with his treasurer's staff from room to room, inquiring which was Parnell, in order to introduce himself, and beg the honour of his acquaintance.

As to his political principles, if his own account of them is to be believed, he was always against a popish successor to the crown, whatever title he might have by proximity of blood; nor did he regard the right line upon any other account than as it was established by law, and had much weight in the opinions of the people. He was of opinion, that when the grievances suffered under a present government became greater than those which might probably be expected from changing it by violence, a revolution was justifiable; and this he believed to have been the case in that which was brought about by the Prince of Orange. He had a mortal antipathy to standing armies in times of peace; and was of opinion, that our liberty could never be secured upon a firm foundation, till the ancient law should be revived, by which our parliaments were made annual. He abominated the political scheme of setting up a monied interest in opposition to the landed, and was an enemy to a temporary suspension of the Habeas Corpus act. In these opinions, and in his general scheme of politics, Harley was known to concur; but Bolingbroke sought to gratify his ambition by secretly promoting the restoration of the exiled family.

The period of his political importance is distinguished by the commencement of his passion for Miss Esther Vanhomrigh, celebrated by the name of Vanessa, whose history is too well known to be minutely repeated.

The date of it may be traced to March 1712, when a remarkable change took place in his manner of writing to Miss Johnson.

Miss Vanhomrigh was a young woman fond of literature, whom he took pleasure in directing and instructing; till, from being proud of his praise, she grew fond of his person, and ventured to make him a proposal of marriage.

He now, for the first time, felt what the passion of love was, with all its attendant symptoms, which he had before only known from description, and which he was now enabled to describe himself in the strongest colours. In this situation, soon after his return from his installation, in 1713, he wrote that beautiful poem, called Cadenus and Vanessa, in which he is characterised, under the name of Cadenus by the transposition of the letters in the word Decanus, the Dean. His first design seems to have been to break off the connection in the politest manner possible. To soften the harshness of a refusal of her hand, the greatest of mortifications to a woman, young, beautiful, and possessed of a good fortune; he painted all her perfections, both of body and mind, in such glowing colours, as must at least have highly gratified her vanity, and shown that he was far from being insensible to her charms, though prudence forbade his yielding to his inclinations. If it be said that he should have checked a passion which he never meant to gratify, recourse must be had to that extenuation which he so much despised, "men are but men." Perhaps, however, he did not know his own mind; and, as he represents himself, was undetermined.

A poem written in such exquisite taste, of which she was the subject, and where she saw herself dressed out in the most flattering colours, was not likely to administer to her cure; on the contrary, it only served to add fresh fuel to the flame.

Meantime, the unfortunate Stella languished in absence and neglect. The journal was not renewed; while a continual intercourse was kept up between Vanessa and him. She was the first person he wrote to on his retirement to Letcumb, before the Queen's death, and the last in his departure from that place to Ireland; whether she soon followed.

He arrived in a much more gloomy state of mind than before. In the triumph of the Whigs, he met with every mortification that a spirit like his could possibly be exposed to. The people of Ireland were irritated against him beyond measure, and every indignity was offered him as he walked the streets of Dublin. Nor was he only insulted by the rabble; but persons of distinguished rank forgot the decorum of common civility, to give him a personal affront. While his pride was hurt by such indignities, his more tender feelings were often wounded by base ingratitude.

In such a situation, he found it in vain to struggle against the tide that opposed him. He silently yielded, and retired from the world to discharge his duties as a clergyman, and attend to the care of his deanery.

He filled his hours with some historical attempts relating to the Change of the Ministry, and the Conduct of the Ministry. He likewise finished a History of the Four last Years of Queen Anne, which he began in her lifetime, and laboured with great attention, but never published. It was afterwards published by Dr. Lucas; but failed to satisfy the curiosity which it excited.

He was now to contrive how he might be best accommodated in a country where he considered himself in a state of exile. He opened his house by a public table two days a-week, and found his entertainments gradually frequented by visitants of learning among the men, and of elegance among the women. Miss Johnson had left the country, and lived in lodgings not far from the deanery. On his public days she regulated the table; but appeared at it as a mere guest, like other ladies.

On other days, he often dined at a stated price, with Mr. Worral, a clergyman of his cathedral, whose house was recommended by the peculiar neatness and pleasantry of his wife. To this frugal mode of living, he was first disposed by care to pay some debts which he had contracted; and he continued it for the purpose of accumulating money.

In 1716, he was privately married to Miss Johnson, by Dr. Ashe, bishop of Clogher, to whom he had been a pupil in the College, and who was the common friend to both, in settling the conditions of this extraordinary union. The marriage made no change in their mode of life; they lived in separate houses as before; nor did she ever lodge in the deanery but when Swift was seized with a fit of giddiness.

During almost six years after his return to Ireland, he kept his resolution of not meddling at all with public affairs. In 1720, when the ferment seemed to have subsided, he published his first political pamphlet relative to Ireland, intituled, A Proposal for the universal Use of Irish Manufactures. The effect of this tract is well known. It roused the indignation of the ministry: a prosecution against the printer was commenced, though it came to nothing in the end. Swift again withdrew into retirement; and "there," as Mr. Sheridan expresses it, by repeating his former allusion, "his patriotic spirit, thus confined, proved only as an evil one to torment him."

His patriotism burst forth with a vehemence still more powerful and effective, in 1724, to obstruct the currency of Wood's halfpence, in the assumed character of a Drapier.

His zeal was recompensed with success; and he was, in consequence of it, acclaimed the great patriot of Ireland.

After his marriage to Miss Johnson, he continued his secret intercourse and correspondence with Miss Vanhomrigh; and even indulged her hopes, by the most explicit confession of his passion for her. After such a confession, she concluded, that some reports which had reached her of his being married to Miss Johnson was the real obstacle to their union. To put an end to all further suspense, she sent a short note to Miss Johnson, requesting to know whether she was married to Swift or not. Miss Johnson answered her in the affirmative, and then enclosed the note she had received from her to Swift, and immediately went into the country, without seeing him.

Her abrupt departure showed him what passed in her mind. In the first transports of his passion, he immediately rode to Celbridge, Miss Vanhomrigh's country seat. He entered the apartment where the unhappy lady was, and flung a paper on the table, mute, but with a countenance that spoke the highest resentment, and immediately returned to his horse. She found it contained nothing but her note to Miss Johnson. Despair at once seized her, as if she had seen her death warrant; and such indeed it proved to be. The violent agitation of her mind threw her into a fever, which, in a short time, put a period to her existence. Before her death, which happened in 1723, she had cancelled a will made in favour of Swift, and bequeathed her whole fortune to her relation Serjeant Marshall, and the famous Dr. Berkeley, with a strong injunction, that, immediately after her decease, they should publish all the letters which passed between Swift and her, together with the poem of Cadenus and Vanessa. The poem was published, but the letters, at the desire of Dr. Sheridan, were suppressed.

Swift made a tour to the south of Ireland for about two months at this time, to dissipate his thoughts, and give place to obloquy; during which Miss Johnson remained in the country; nor did she quit it for some months after his return. However, upon her return to Dublin, a reconciliation soon took place. He welcomed her to town with a beautiful poem, called Stella at Wood-Park, which concludes with a high compliment to Stella:

For though my raillery were true,
A cottage is Wood-Park with you.

Early in 1726, he revisited England, after an absence of twelve years; and collected three volumes of Miscellanies, in conjunction with Pope, who prefixed the preface, and had the whole profit, which was very considerable.

The same year, he published Gulliver's Travels, a production that was received with such avidity, that the price of the first edition was raised before the second could be made. It was read by the high and the low, the learned and illiterate. Criticism was for a while lost in wonder; no rules of judgment were applied to a book written in open defiance of truth and regularity. But when distinctions came to be made, the part which gave least pleasure was that which describes the Flying Island, and that which gave most disgust must be the history of the Houyhnmns. The charge of misanthropy is founded on his supposed satire on human nature, in the picture he has drawn of the Yahoos. The ground of this censure is examined very minutely by Mr. Sheridan, and his defence is conducted with great judgment and ingenuity. This part of his writings reflects neither honour nor reproach on his moral character.

While Swift was passing his time with his friends Pope and Bolingbroke, and the old fraternity, he received accounts that Miss Johnson was dangerously ill. This call of calamity hastened him to Ireland, where he had the satisfaction to find her restored to an imperfect and tottering health.

Next year, he returned to England; and, when the news of the King's death arrived, he attended at court, and kissed the hands of the new King and Queen three days after their accession.

By the Queen, when she was Princess, he had been treated with some distinction, and was well received by her on her exaltation; but whether she gave hopes which she never took care to satisfy, or he formed expectations which she never meant, the event was, that he always afterwards thought on her with resentment, and particularly charged her with breaking her promise of some medals which she engaged to send him.

He had likewise gained the kindness of Mrs. Howard, the Queen's favourite, with whom he kept up a correspondence; and was favourably noticed, at that time, by Walpole; to whom, it is said, he offered the service of his pen, which was rejected. The story originated with Chesterfield, or rather it can be traced no farther, and seems without sufficient foundation.

His last short visit to his friends revived the desire which he had of settling in England; and this, he hoped, might be accomplished, by an exchange of his preferments for something like an equivalent in England; but he soon found that all expectations of an exchange were at an end.

It was generally supposed, on the accession of the late King, that the Tories would be no longer proscribed as formerly; more flattering prospects were opened to him than any he could have in view during the late reign. "We have now done with repining," he writes his friend Dr. Sheridan, "if we be used well and not baited as formerly; we all agree in it; and if things do not mend, it is not our faults; we have made our offers; if otherwise, we are as we were."

But he was soon obliged to alter his measures; for, being seized with a fit of giddiness, and at the same time; receiving alarming accounts from Ireland, that Miss Johnson had relapsed, with little hopes of her recovery, he took leave of the Queen, in a polite letter to Mrs. Howard, and set out for that kingdom on the first abatement of his illness.

On his arrival in Dublin, he found Miss Johnson in the last stage of a decay. He had the misery of attending her in that state, and of daily seeing the gradual advances of death during four or five months. As she found her dissolution approach, a few days before it happened, in the presence of Dr. Sheridan, she adjured Swift by their friendship, to let her have the satisfaction of dying at least, though she had not lived his acknowledged wife. He made no reply, but, turning on his heel, walked silently out of the room, nor ever saw her afterwards during the few days she lived. His behaviour threw Miss Johnson into unspeakable agonies, and, for a time, she sunk under the weight of so cruel a disappointment. But soon after, roused by indignation, she inveighed against his cruelty in the bitterest terms; and, sending for a lawyer, made her will, bequeathing her fortune, in her own name, to charitable uses. This scene seems to bear more hard on his humanity than any other part of his conduct in life. She died, January 28. 1728, in the 44th year of her age.

How much he wished her life his papers show; nor can it be doubted that he dreaded the death of her whom he loved most, aggravated by the consciousness that himself had hastened it.

Swift's unjustifiable treatment of Miss Johnson and Miss Vanhomrigh have been attributed, by Dr. Delany and Mr. Berkeley, "to that love of singularity which, in a greater or less degree, is inseparable from genius." This may be reasonably doubted. His connection with Miss Waryng was probably the immediate cause of his mysterious conduct towards Miss Johnson; and Miss Vanhomrigh, for a time, had power to captivate him, and make Miss Johnson experience that mortification which she herself had occasioned to Miss Waryng. His conduct towards Miss Johnson and Miss Vanhomrigh is examined very minutely by Mr. Sheridan; and though not positively justified, yet so anxious is he to place it in the most favourable point of view, that he appears more like a vindicator than an apologist. But the partialities of friendship cannot overcome the power of truth; and it would be more for the credit of Swift, if that part of his conduct which respected Miss Vanhomrigh, not as aggravated by his enemies, but as related by Mr. Sheridan himself, were consigned to oblivion. It will not admit of a defence: it scarcely merits an apology.

After the death of Miss Johnson, his benevolence was contracted, and his severity exasperated; he drove his acquaintance from his table, and wondered why he was deserted. In this forlorn state, his spirit was too great to give way to despondence, and, deprived as he was of all his domestic comforts, he turned his views wholly to the good and happiness of others. He wrote, from time to time, such directions, admonitions, or censures, as the exigency of affairs, in his opinion, made proper; and nothing fell from his pen in vain. By the acknowledged superiority of his talents, his inflexible integrity, and his unwearied endeavours in serving the public, he obtained such an ascendancy over his countrymen, as perhaps no private citizen obtained in any age or country. He was known over the whole kingdom by the title of the Dean, given to him by way of pre-eminence, as it were by common consent; and when the Dean was mentioned, it always carried with it the idea of the first and greatest man in the kingdom.

In a variety of publications, he laid open the chief sources of the miseries of the poor infatuated people of Ireland; at the same time, pointing out the means by which they might be alleviated. While he pleaded their cause with others, he constantly disposed of the third part of his own revenue in charities to the poor, and liberalities to the distressed. Soon after he was out of debt, he lent out the first 500 l. which he could call his own, in small sums of 5 l. and 10 l. to diligent and necessitous tradesmen, to be repaid weekly, at 2 s. or 4 s. without interest. This charity was attended with the greatest benefit to numbers of the lowest class of tradesmen.

During this period, his faculties do not seem to have been at all impaired by the near approaches of old age. One of his last pieces, Verses on the Death of Dr. Swift, is perhaps one of the best of his compositions in that way: nor are two of his other productions, written about the same time, intitled An Epistle to a Lady, and A Rhapsody on Poetry, inferior to any of his former pieces.

The two last were written chiefly with a view to gratify his resentment against Walpole, to whom he attributed the ill offices done him by the Queen, who promised him some medals, which she never sent, and affected to believe him to be the author of three forged letters, written in a very unbecoming style, to recommend a subscription to Mrs. Barber's poems. Walpole was exasperated to the highest degree, and threatened a prosecution; but dropped the design.

His severe reflection on Counsellor Bettefworth, in a short poem on the Words, Brother Protestants and Fellow Christians, in 1733, is generally known. The provocation given by Swift was certainly very great, but not so great as the lawyer's indiscretion in his manner of resenting it.

After all, Bettefworth's great fault, and what rendered him particularly obnoxious to Swift, was, his being a zealous Whig, and an active man among the leaders of that party, at a time when party animosities ran high in Ireland, and indeed in both kingdoms.

He wrote, from time to time, various trifles in verse or prose, and passed much of his time with Dr. Sheridan, who greatly contributed to his amusement, by little sprightly pieces of the inferior kind of poetry which he was always writing; and yet more to his employment, by hints and materials which he was every moment throwing out.

As his years increased, his fits of giddiness and deafness grew more frequent, and his deafness made conversation difficult; they grew likewise more severe, till, in 1736, as he was writing a poem, called The Legion Club, he was seized with a fit so painful, and so long continued, that he never after thought it proper to attempt any work of thought or labour.

He, however, permitted one book to be published, which had been the production of former years, Polite Conversation, which appeared in 1738. The Directions for Servants was printed soon after his death. These two performances show a mind incessantly attentive; and, when it was not employed upon great things, busy with minute occurrences.

His mental powers at length declined, and his irascible passions, which at all times he had found difficult to be kept within due bounds, now raged without controul, and made him a torment to himself, and to all who were about him.

Conscious of his situation, he was little desirous of seeing any of his old friends and companions, and they were as little solicitous to visit him in that deplorable state. He could now no longer amuse himself with writing, and a resolution he had formed of never wearing spectacles, to which he obstinately adhered, prevented him from reading. Without employment, without amusement of any kind, his ideas wore gradually away, and left his mind vacant to the vexations of the hour.

In 1741, he became more violent, and it was found necessary that legal guardians should be appointed of his person and fortune. He now lost distinction. His madness was compounded of rage and fatuity. The last face he knew was that of Mrs. Whiteway, a relation, that lived with him since the death of Miss Johnson; and her he ceased to know in a little time. His meat was brought him cut into mouthfuls; but he would never touch it while the servant staid; and at last, after it had stood perhaps an hour, would eat it walking; for he continued his old habit, and was on his feet ten hours a-day.

In 1742, he had an inflammation in his left eye, which swelled it to the size of an egg, with boils in other parts; he was kept long waking with the pain, and was not easily restrained by five attendants from tearing out his eye.

The tumour at last subsided, and a short interval of reason ensuing, in which he knew his physician and family, gave hopes of his recovery; but he sunk into lethargic stupidity, motionless, heedless, and speechless; the effect, as it was suspected, of water in the brain.

He afterwards spoke now and then to Mrs. Ridgeway the house-keeper, or gave some intimation of a meaning, but at last sunk into a perfect silence, which continued till the 19th of October, 1745, when he expired without a struggle, in the 78th year of his age.

He was buried in the great aisle of St. Patrick's Cathedral, under a stone of black marble, on which was engraved the following epitaph, written by himself:

Hic depositum est corpus
JONATHAN SWIFT, S. T. P.
Hujus Ecclesię Cathedralis

Decani:

Ulterius cor conlacerare nequit.

Abi, viator,

Et imitare, si poteris

Strenuum pro virili libertatis vindicem.

Obiit Anno (1745)

Ætatis Anno (78).

By his will, which is dated May 3. 1740, just before he ceased to be a reasonable being, he left about 1200 l. in specific legacies, and the rest of his fortune, which amounted to about 11,000 l. to erect and endow an hospital for idiots and lunatics. His sister, Mrs. Fenton, had disoblged him by an imprudent marriage.

His works have been printed often, and in various forms; first by Pope, in 1726, in some volumes of Miscellanies; next by George Faulkener, 1765; afterwards by Dr. Hawkesworth, in 8 vols. 4to. 1775.; three additional volumes 4to. by Deane Swift, Esq.; and three more by Mr. Nichols. These have been reprinted in 25 vols. large 8vo, and in 27 vols. small 8vo. with the life of Swift by Mr. Sheridan, in 1784. A volume of Miscellaneous Pieces, in Prose and Verse, not inserted in Mr. Sheridan's edition, was printed in 1789, and may be considered either as an 18th volume of Mr. Sheridan's edition, or as a 26th of that of Dr. Hawkesworth and Mr. Nichols.

On the character and writings of Swift, it is the less necessary for the present writer to enlarge, as they have been so accurately illustrated by Lord Orrery, Dr. Johnson, and Mr. Sheridan.

"His capacity and strength of mind," says Lord Orrery, "were undoubtedly equal to any task whatever. His pride, his spirit, or his ambition, call it by what name you please, was boundless; but his views were checked in his younger years, and the anxiety of that disappointment had a visible effect upon all his actions. He was sour and severe, but not absolutely ill-natured. He was sociable only to particular friends, and to them only at particular hours. He knew politeness more than he practised it. He was a mixture of avarice and generosity; the former was frequently prevalent, the latter seldom appeared unless excited by compassion. He was open to adulation, and could not, or would not distinguish between flattery and just applause. His abilities rendered him superior to envy. He was undisguised, and perfectly sincere. I am induced to think that he entered into orders more from some private and fixed resolution than absolute choice. Be that as it may, he performed the duties of the church with great punctuality, and a decent degree of devotion. He read prayers rather in a strong nervous voice than in a graceful manner; and although he has been often accused of irreligion, nothing of that kind appeared in his conversation and behaviour. His cast of mind induced him to think and speak more of politics than religion. His perpetual views were directed towards power, and his chief aim was to be removed into England; but when he found himself entirely disappointed, he turned his thoughts to opposition, and became the patron of Ireland.

"From the gifts of nature, he had great powers, and from the imperfection of humanity, he had many failings. I always considered him as an abstract and brief chronicle of the times, no man being better acquainted with human nature, both in the highest and lowest scenes. His friends and correspondents were the greatest and most eminent men of the age; and the sages of antiquity were often the companions of his closet; and although he avoided an ostentation of learning, and generally chose to draw his materials from his own store, yet his knowledge of the ancient authors evidently appears from the strength of his sentiments, and the classic correctness of his style.

“ His attendance upon the public service of the church was regular and uninterrupted; and, indeed, regularity was peculiar to him in all his actions, even in the greatest trifles. His hours of walking and reading never varied: his motions were guided by his watch, which was so constantly held in his hand, or placed before him upon his table, that he seldom deviated many minutes in the daily revolution of his exercises and employments.

“ The Dean kept company with many of the fair sex, but they were rather his amusement than his admiration; he trifled away many hours in their conversation, he filled many pages in their praise, and, by the powers of his head, he gained the character of a lover, without the least assistance from his heart. To this particular kind of pride, supported by the heat of his genius, and joined by the excessive coldness of his nature, Vanessa owed the ruin of her reputation; and from the same cause, Stella remained an unacknowledged wife. If you review his several poems to Stella, you will find them fuller of affection than desire, and more expressive of friendship than love.

“ Upon a general view of his poetry, we shall find him, as in his other performances, an uncommon, surprising, heteroclite genius, luxurious in his fancy, lively in his ideas, humorous in his description, and bitter, exceedingly bitter, in his satire. The restlessness of his imagination, and the disappointment of his ambition, have both contributed to hinder him from undertaking any poetical work of length or importance. His wit was sufficient to every labour; no flight could have wearied the strength of his powers; perhaps if the extensive views of his nature had been fully satisfied, his airy motions had been more regular and less sudden; but he now appears like an eagle that is sometimes chained, and at that particular time, for want of nobler and more proper food, diverts his confinement, and appeases his hunger, by destroying the gnats, butterflies, and other wretched insects that unluckily happen to buzz or flutter within her reach.

“ The subjects of his poems are often nauseous, and the performances beautifully disagreeable. The Ladies Dressing-room has been universally condemned, as deficient in point of delicacy, even to the highest degree. The two poems, entitled The Life and genuine Character of Dr. Swift, and Verses on the Death of Dr. Swift, &c. are poems of great wit and humour. In the last, he has summoned the whole powers of satire and poetry; it is a parting blow, the legacy of anger and disappointment. One of his strictest rules in poetry was to avoid triplets. He had the nicest ear, and is remarkably chaste and delicate in his rhymes: a bad rhyme appeared to him one of the capital sins in poetry.”

Mr. Sheridan produces some striking instances of Swift's tenderness of heart, his great humanity, and his universal benevolence, and closes his account of him with laying open one leading part of his character, “ which,” says he, “ may serve as a clue to the whole.”

“ He was perhaps the most disinterested man that ever lived. No selfish motive ever influenced any part of his conduct. He loved virtue for its own sake, and was content it should be its own reward. The means to arrive at rank, fortune, and fame, the three great objects of pursuit in other men, though thrown in his way, he utterly despised, satisfied with having deserved them. The same principle operated equally on the author as on the man, as he never put his name to his works, nor had any solicitude about them after they had once made their appearance in the world. The last act of his life showed how far he made this a rule of conduct, in his choice of the charity to which he bequeathed his fortune, leaving it for the support of idiots and lunatics, beings that could never know their benefactor.

“ Upon the whole, when we consider his character as a man perfectly free from vice, with few frailties, and such exalted virtues, and as an author possessed of such uncommon talents, such an inexhaustible fund of wit, joined to so clear and solid an understanding; when we behold these two characters united in one and the same person, perhaps it will not be thought too bold an assertion to say, that his parallel is not to be found either in the history of ancient or modern times.”

At the end of his “ Introduction,” these blazing encomiums are collected into one strong point :

"It is of moment to the general cause of religion and morality, that the greatest genius of the age was a man of the truest piety and most exalted virtue."

The character of Swift as given by Dr. Johnson, is less favourable; and though it may be allowed to be, in some instances, uncandid and unjust, it will by no means warrant the severe and rancorous recrimination of Mr. Sheridan.

"When Swift is considered as an author, it is just to estimate his powers by their effects. In the reign of Queen Anne, he turned the stream of popularity against the Whigs, and must be confessed to have dictated for a time the political opinions of the English nation. In the succeeding reign, he delivered Ireland from plunder and oppression; and showed that wit, confederated with truth, had such force as authority was unable to resist. He said truly of himself, that Ireland "was his debtor." It was from the time when he first began to patronize the Irish, that they may date their riches and prosperity. He taught them first to know their own interest, their weight, and their strength, and gave them spirit to assert that equality with their fellow-subjects to which they have ever since been making vigorous advances, and to claim those rights which they have at last established. Nor can they be charged with ingratitude to their benefactor; for they revered him as a guardian, and obeyed him as a dictator.

"In his works, he has given very different specimens, both of sentiments and expression. His Tale of a Tub has little resemblance to his other pieces. It exhibits a vehemence and rapidity of mind, a copiousness of images, and vivacity of diction, such as he afterwards never possessed, or never exerted. It is of a mode so distinct and peculiar, that it must be considered by itself; What is true of that, is not true of any thing else which he has written.

"In his other works, is found an equable tenour of easy language, which rather trickles than flows. His delight was in simplicity. That he has in his works no metaphor, as has been said, is not true; but his few metaphors seem to be received rather by necessity than choice. He studied purity; and though perhaps all his strictures are not exact, yet it is not often that solecisms can be found; and whoever depends on his authority may generally conclude himself safe. His sentences are never too much dilated or contracted; and it will not be easy to find any embarrassment in the complication of his clauses, any inconsequence in his connections, or abruptness in his transitions.

His style was well suited to his thoughts, which are never subtilized by nice disquisitions, decorated by sparkling conceits, elevated by ambitious sentences, or variegated by far-fought learning. He pays no court to the passions; he excites neither surprise nor admiration; he always understands himself, and his readers always understand him. The peruser of Swift wants little previous knowledge; it will be sufficient that he is acquainted with common words and common things; he is neither required to mount elevations, nor to explore profundities; his passage is always on a level, along solid ground, without asperities, without obstruction.

"This easy and safe conveyance of meaning it was Swift's desire to attain, and for having obtained it he deserves praise, though perhaps not the highest praise. For purposes merely didactic, when something is to be told that was not known before, it is the best mode, but against that inattention by which known truths are suffered to lie neglected, it makes no provision; it instructs, but does not persuade.

"By his political education, he was associated with the Whigs; but he deserted them when they deserted their principles, yet without running into the contrary extreme; he continued throughout his life to retain the disposition which he assigns to the Church-of-England Man, of thinking commonly with the Whigs of the state, and with the Tories of the church.

"He was a churchman rationally zealous; he desired the prosperity, and maintained the honour of the clergy; of the dissenters he did not wish to infringe the toleration, but he opposed their encroachments.

"To his duty as Dean he was very attentive. He managed the revenues of his church with exact economy; and it is said by Delany, that more money was, under his direction, laid out in repairs than had ever been in the same time since its first erection. Of his choir he was eminently careful; and, though he neither loved nor understood music, took care that all the singers were well qualified, admitting none without the testimony of skilful judges.

"In his church he restored the practice of weekly communion, and distributed the sacramental elements in the most solemn and devout manner with his own hand. He came to church every morning, preached commonly in his turn, and attended the evening anthem, that it might not be negligently performed.

“He entered upon the clerical state with hope to excel in preaching; but complained, that, from the time of his political controversies, “he could only preach pamphlets.” This censure of himself, if judgment may be made from those sermons which have been printed, was unreasonably severe.

“The suspicions of his irreligion proceeded in a great measure from his dread of hypocrisy; instead of wishing to seem better, he delighted in seeming worse than he was. He went in London to early prayers, lest he should be seen at church; he read prayers to his servants every morning, with such dexterous secrecy, that Dr. Delany was six months in his house before he knew it. He was not only careful to hide the good which he did, but willingly incurred the suspicion of evil which he did not. He forgot what himself had formerly asserted, that hypocrisy is less mischievous than open impiety. Dr. Delany, with all his zeal for his honour, has justly condemned this part of his character.

“The person of Swift had not many recommendations. He had a kind of muddy complexion, which, though he washed himself with oriental scrupulosity, did not look clear. He had a countenance sour and severe, which he seldom softened by any appearance of gaiety. He stubbornly resisted any tendency to laughter.

“To his domestics he was naturally rough; and a man of a rigorous temper, with that vigilance of minute attention which his works discover, must have been a master that few could bear. That he was disposed to do his servants good, on important occasions, is no great mitigation: benefaction can be but rare, and tyrannic peevishness is perpetual. He did not spare the servants of others. Once, when he dined alone with the Earl of Orrery, he said, of one that waited in the room, “That man has, since we sat to the table, committed fifteen faults.” What the faults were, Lord Orrery, from whom I heard the story, had not been attentive enough to discover. My number may perhaps not be exact.

“In his economy, he practised a peculiar and offensive parsimony, without disguise or apology. The practice of saving being once necessary, became habitual, and grew first ridiculous, and at last detestable. But his avarice, though it might exclude pleasure, was never suffered to encroach upon his virtue. He was frugal by inclination, but liberal by principle; and if the purpose to which he destined his little accumulations be remembered, with his distribution of occasional charity, it will perhaps appear that he only liked one mode of expence better than another, and saved merely that he might have something to give. He did not grow rich by injuring his successors, but left both Laracor and the Deanery more valuable than he found them.—With all this talk of his covetousness and generosity, it should be remembered that he was never rich. The revenue of his deanery was not much more than 700 l. a-year.

“His beneficence was not graced with tenderness or civility; he relieved without pity, and assisted without kindness; so that those who were fed by him could hardly love him.

“He made a rule to himself to give but one piece at a time, and therefore always stored his pocket with coins of different value.

“Whatever he did, he seemed willing to do in a manner peculiar to himself, without sufficiently considering that singularity, as it implies a contempt of the general practice, is a kind of defiance which justly provokes the hostility of ridicule; he therefore who indulges peculiar habits is worse than others, if he be not better.

“In the intercourse of familiar life, he indulged his disposition to petulance and sarcasm, and thought himself injured if the licentiousness of his raillery, the freedom of his censures, or the petulance of his frolics, was resented or repressed. He predominated over his companions with very high ascendancy, and probably would bear none over whom he could not predominate. To give him advice was, in the style of his friend Delany, “to venture to speak to him.” This customary superiority soon grew too delicate for truth; and Swift, with all his penetration, allowed himself to be delighted with low flattery.

“On all common occasions, he habitually affects a style of arrogance, and dictates rather than persuades. This authoritative and magisterial language he expected to be received as his peculiar mode of jocularly: but he apparently flattered his own arrogance by an assumed imperiousness, in which he was ironical only to be resentful, and to the submissive sufficiently serious.

" He told stories with great felicity, and delighted in doing what he knew himself to do well; he was therefore captivated by the respectful silence of a steady listener, and told the same tales too often.

" He did not, however, claim the right of talking alone; for it was his rule, when he had spoken a minute, to give room by a pause for any other speaker. Of time, on all occasions, he was an exact computer, and knew the minutes required to every common operation.

" It may be justly supposed, that there was in his conversation, what appears so frequently in his letters, an affectation of familiarity with the great, an ambition of momentary equality sought and enjoyed by the neglect of those ceremonies which custom has established as the barriers between one order of society and another. This transgression of regularity was, by himself and his admirers, termed greatness of soul. But a great mind disdains to hold any thing by courtesy, and therefore never usurps what a lawful claimant may take away. He then encroaches on another's dignity, puts himself in his power; he is either repelled with helpless indignity, or endured by clemency and condescension.

" Of Swift's general habits of thinking, if his letters can be supposed to afford any evidence, he was not a man to be either loved or envied. He seems to have wasted life in discontent, by the rage of neglected pride, and the languishment of unsatisfied desire. He is querulous and fastidious, arrogant and malignant; he scarcely speaks of himself but with indignant lamentations, or of others but with insolent superiority when he is gay, and with angry contempt when he is gloomy. From the letters that pass between him and Pope, it might be inferred that they, with Arbuthnot and Gay, had engrossed all the understanding and virtue of mankind; that their merits filled the world; or that there was no hopes of more. They show the age involved in darkness, and shade the picture with sullen emulation.

" When the Queen's death drove him into Ireland, he might be allowed to regret for a time the interception of his views, the extinction of his hopes, and his ejection from gay scenes, important employment, and splendid friendships; but when time had enabled reason to prevail over vexation, the complaints, which at first were natural, became ridiculous because they were useless. But querulousness was now grown habitual, and he cried out when he probably had ceased to feel. His reiterated wailings persuaded Bolingbroke that he was really willing to quit his deanery for an English parish; and Bolingbroke procured an exchange, which was rejected; and Swift still retained the pleasure of complaining.

" The greatest difficulty that occurs, in analysing his character, is to discover by what depravity of intellect he took delight in revolving ideas, from which almost every other mind shrinks with disgust. The ideas of pleasure, even when criminal, may solicit the imagination; but what has disease, deformity, and filth, upon which the thoughts can be allured to dwell? Delany is willing to think that Swift's mind was not much tainted with this gross corruption before his long visit to Pope. He does not consider how he degrades his hero, by making him at fifty-nine the pupil of turpitude, and liable to the malignant influence of an ascendant mind. But the truth is, that Gulliver had described his Yahoos before the visit; and he that had formed those images had nothing filthy to learn.

" In the poetical works of Dr. Swift there is not much upon which the critic can exercise his powers. They are often humorous, almost always light, and have the qualities which recommend such compositions, easiness and gaiety. They are, for the most part, what their author intended. The diction is correct, the numbers are smooth, and the rhymes exact. There seldom occurs a hard-laboured expression, or a redundant epithet; all his verses exemplify his own definition of a good style, they consist of "proper words in proper places."

" To divide this collection into classes, and show how some pieces are gross, and some are trifling, would be to tell the reader what he knows already, and to find faults of which the author could not be ignorant, who certainly wrote not often to his judgment, but his humour.

" It was said, in a preface to one of the Irish editions, that Swift had never been known to take a single thought from any writer, ancient or modern. This is not literally true; but perhaps no writer can easily be found that has borrowed so little, or that in all his excellencies and all his defects has so well maintained his claim to be considered as original."

O D E

TO THE

HONOURABLE SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE.

Written at Moor-Park, June 1689.

VIRTUE, the greatest of all monarchies !
 Till, its first emperor rebellious man
 Depos'd from off his seat,
 It fell, and broke with its own weight
 Into small states and principalities,
 By many a petty lord possess'd,
 But ne'er since seated in one single breast !
 'Tis you who must this land subdue;
 The mighty conquest's left for you,
 The conquest and discovery too ;
 Search out this Utopian ground,
 Virtue's Terra Incognita,
 Where none ever led the way,
 Nor ever since but in descriptions found,
 Like the philosopher's stone,
 With rules to search it, yet obtain'd by none.

We have too long been led astray ;
 Too long have our misguided souls been taught
 With rules from musty morals brought,
 'Tis you must put us in the way ;
 Let us (for shame !) no more be fed
 With antique relics of the dead,
 The gleanings of philosophy,
 Philosophy, the lumber of the schools,
 The roguery of alchemy ;
 And we, the bubbled fools,
 Spend all our present life in hopes of golden rules.

But what does our proud ignorance learning call ?
 We oddly Plato's paradox make good,
 Our knowledge is but mere remembrance all ;
 Remembrance is our treasure and our food ;
 Nature's fair table-book our tender souls,
 We scrawl all o'er with old and empty rules,
 Stale memorandums of the schools :
 For learning's mighty treasures look
 In that deep grave a book ;
 Think that she there does all her treasures hide,
 And that her troubled ghost still haunts there since she dy'd.

Confine her walks to colleges and schools ;
 Her priests, her train, and followers show
 As if they all were spectres too !
 They purchase knowledge at th' expence
 Of common breeding, common sense,
 And grow at once scholars and fools ;
 Affect ill-manner'd pedantry,
 Rudeness, ill-nature, incivility,

VOL. IX.

And, sick with dregs of knowledge grown,
 Which greedily they swallow down,
 Still cast it up, and nauseate company.

Curst be the wretch ! nay, doubly curst !
 (If it may lawful be
 To curse our greatest enemy)
 Who learnt himself that heresy first
 (Which since has seiz'd on all the rest)
 That knowledge forfeits all humanity ;
 Taught us, like Spaniards, to be proud and poor,
 And fling our scraps before our door !
 Thrice happy you have 'scap'd this general pest ;
 Those mighty epithets, learn'd, good, and great,
 Which we ne'er join'd before, but in romances
 We find in you at last united grown. [meet ;
 You cannot be compar'd to one :
 I must, like him that painted Venus' face,
 Borrow from every one a grace ;
 Virgil and Epicurus will not do,
 Their courting a retreat like you ;
 Unless I put in Cæsar's learning too :
 Your happy frame at once controls
 This great triumvirate of souls.

Let not old Rome boast Fabius' fate ;
 He sav'd his country by delays,
 But you by peace.
 You bought it at a cheaper rate ;
 Nor has it left the usual bloody scar,
 To show it cost its price in war ;
 War ! that mad game the world so loves to play,
 And for it does so dearly pay ;
 For, though with loss or victory a while
 Fortune the gamesters does beguile,
 Yet at the last the box sweeps all away.

Only the laurel got by peace
 No thunder e'er can blast :
 Th' artillery of the skies
 Shoots to the earth, and dies ;
 Nor ever green and flourishing 't will last,
 Nor dipt in blood, nor widow's tears, nor orphan's cries.
 About the head crown'd with these bays,
 Like lambent fire the lightning plays ;
 Nor, its triumphal cavalcade to grace,
 Makes up its solemn train with death ;
 It melts the sword of war, yet keeps it in the sheath.

The wily shifts of state, those juggler's tricks,
 Which we call deep designs and politics
 (As in a theatre the ignorant fry,
 Because the cords escape their eye,
 Wonder to see the motions fly) ;

A

Methinks, when you expose the scene,
 Down the ill-organ'd engines fall;
 Off fly the vizards, and discover all:
 How plain I see through the deceit!
 How shallow, and how gross the cheat!
 Look where the pully's tied above!
 Great God! (said I) what have I seen!
 On what poor engines move
 The thoughts of monarchs, and designs of states!
 What petty motives rule their fates!
 How the mouse makes the mighty mountain shake!
 The mighty mountain labours with its birth,
 Away the frighten'd peasants fly,
 Scar'd at th' unheard-of prodigy,
 Expect some great gigantic son of earth;
 Lo! it appears!
 See how they tremble! how they quake!
 Out starts the little beast, and mocks their idle
 fears.

Then tell, dear favourite muse!
 What serpent's that which still resorts,
 Still lurks in palaces and courts?
 Take thy unwonted flight,
 And on the terrace light.
 See where she lies!
 See how she rears her head,
 And rolls about her dreadful eyes,
 To drive all virtue out, or look it dead!
 'Twas sure this basilisk sent Temple thence,
 And though as some ('tis said) for their defence
 Have worn a casement o'er their skin,
 So he wore his within,
 Made up of virtue and transparent innocence;
 And though he oft renew'd the fight,
 And almost got priority of fight,
 He ne'er could overcome her quite
 (In pieces cut, the viper still did re-unite),
 Till, at last, tir'd with loss of time and ease,
 Resolv'd to give himself, as well as country, peace.
 Sing belov'd muse! the pleasures of retreat,
 And in some untouched virgin strain
 Show the delights thy sister nature yields;
 Sing of thy vales, sing of thy woods, sing of thy fields;
 Go publish o'er the plain
 How mighty a profelyte you gain!
 How noble a reprisal on the great!
 How is the muse luxuriant grown!
 Whene'er she takes this flight,
 She soars clear out of sight.
 These are the paradises of her own:
 (The Pegasus, like an unruly horse,
 Though ne'er so gently led
 To the lov'd pasture where he us'd to feed,
 Runs violently o'er his usual course.)
 Wake from thy wanton dreams,
 Come from thy dear-lov'd streams,
 The crooked paths of wandering Thames!
 Fain the fair nymph would stay,
 Oft she looks back in vain,
 Oft 'gainst her fountain does complain,
 And softly steals in many windings down,
 As loath to see the hated court and town,
 And murmurs as she glides away.
 In this new happy scene
 Are nobler subjects for your learned pen;
 Here we expect from you
 More than your predecessor Adam knew;

Whatever moves our wonder, or our sport,
 Whatever serves for innocent emblems of the court;
 How that which we a kernel see (Whose well-compacted forms escape the light, Unpierc'd by the blunt rays of sight)
 Shall ere long grow into a tree;
 Whence takes it its increase, and whence its birth,
 Or from the sun, or from the air, or from the earth,
 Where all the fruitful atoms lie;
 How some go downward to the root,
 Some more ambitiously upwards fly,
 And form the leaves, the branches and the fruit.
 You strove to cultivate a barren court in vain,
 Your garden's better worth your noble pain,
 Here mankind fell, and hence must rise again.
 Shall I believe a spirit so divine
 Was cast in the same mould with mine?
 Why then does nature so unjustly share
 Among her elder sons the whole estate,
 And all her jewels and her plate?
 Poor we! cadets of heaven not worth her care,
 Take up at best with lumber and the leavings of a fair:
 Some she binds 'prentice to the spade,
 Some to the drudgery of a trade,
 Some she does to Egyptian bondage draw,
 Bids us make bricks, yet sends us to look out for
 Some she condemns for life to try [straw:
 To dig the leaden mines of deep philosophy:
 Me she has to the muse's galleys tied,
 In vain I strive to cross this spacious main,
 In vain I tug and pull the oar,
 And, when I almost reach the shore,
 Straight the muse turns the helm, and I launch
 out again:
 And yet, to feed my pride,
 Whene'er I mourn, stops my complaining breath,
 With promise of a mad reversion after death.
 Then, Sir, accept this worthless verse,
 The tribute of an humble muse,
 'Tis all the portion of my niggard stars;
 Nature the hidden spark did at my birth infuse,
 And kindled first with indolence and ease;
 And, since too oft' debauch'd by praise,
 'Tis now grown an incurable disease:
 In vain to quench this foolish fire I try
 In wisdom and philosophy;
 In vain all wholesome herbs I sow,
 Where nought but weeds will grow.
 What'er I plant (like corn on barren earth)
 By an equivocal birth
 Seeds and runs up to poetry.

ODE TO KING WILLIAM,

On his Success in Ireland.

To purchase kingdoms, and to buy renown;
 Are arts peculiar to dissembling France;
 You, mighty monarch, nobler actions crown,
 And solid virtue does your name advance.
 Your matchless courage with your prudence joins,
 The glorious structure of your fame to raise;
 With its own light your dazzling glory shines,
 And into adoration turns our praise.
 Had you by dull succession gain'd your crown
 (Cowards are monarchs by that title made),
 Part of your merit chance would call her own,
 And half your virtues had been lost in shade.

But now your worth its just reward shall have :
 What trophies and what triumphs are your due ;
 Who could so well a dying nation save,
 At once deserve a crown, and gain it too !

You saw how near we were to ruin brought,
 You saw th' impetuous torrent rolling on ;
 And timely on the coming danger thought,
 Which we could neither obviate nor shun.

Britannia stripp'd from her sole guard the laws,
 Ready to fall Rome's bloody sacrifice ;
 You straight stepp'd in, and from the monster's jaws
 Did bravely snatch the lovely helpless prize.

Nor this is all ; as glorious is the care
 To preserve conquests, as at first to gain :
 In this your virtue claims a double share,
 Which, what it bravely won, does all maintain.

Your arm has now your rightful title show'd,
 An arm on which all Europe's hopes depend,
 To which they look as to some guardian god,
 That must their doubtful liberty defend.

Amaz'd, thy action at the Boyne we see !
 When Schomberg started at the vast design :
 The boundless glory all redounds to thee, [thine.
 Th' impulse, the fight, th' event, were wholly

The brave attempt does all our foes disarm ;
 You need but now give orders and command,
 Your name shall the remaining work perform,
 And spare the labour of your conquering hand.

France does in vain her feeble arts apply,
 To interrupt the fortune of your course :
 Your influence does the vain attacks defy
 Of secret malice, or of open force.

Boldly we hence the brave commencement date
 Of glorious deeds, that must all tongues employ :
 William's the pledge and earnest given by fate
 Of England's glory, and her lasting joy.

ODE TO THE ATHENIAN SOCIETY.

Moor-Park, Feb. 14. 1691.

As when the deluge first began to fall
 That mighty ebb never to flow again
 (When this huge body's moisture was so great,
 It quite o'ercame the vital heat) ;
 That mountain which was highest, first of all
 Appear'd above the universal main,
 To bless the primitive sailor's weary fight !
 And 'twas perhaps Parnassus, if in height
 It be as great as 'tis in fame,
 And high to heaven as is its name :
 So after th' inundation of a war,
 When learning's little household did embark
 With her world's fruitful system in her sacred ark,
 At the first ebb of noise and fears,
 Philosophy's exalted head appears ;
 And the dove-muse will now no longer stay,
 But plumes her silver wings and flies away ;
 And now a laurel wreath she brings from far,
 To crown the happy conqueror,
 To show the flood begins to cease,
 And brings the dear reward of victory and peace.
 The eager muse took wing upon the waves' decline,
 When war her cloudy aspect just withdrew,

When the bright sun of peace began to shine,
 And for a while in heavenly contemplation sat
 On the high top of peaceful Ararat ;
 And pluck'd a laurel branch (for laurel was the first that grew,
 The first of plants after the thunder, storm, and rain) ;
 And thence, with joyful nimble wing,
 Flew dutifully back again,
 And made an humble chaplet for the king *.
 And the dove-muse is fled once more
 (Glad of the victory, yet frighten'd at the war) ;
 And now discovers from afar
 A peaceful and a flourishing shore :
 No sooner did she land
 On the delightful strand,
 Than straight she sees the country all around,
 Where fatal Neptune rul'd erewhile,
 Scatter'd with flowery vales, with fruitful gardens
 And many a pleasant wood ! [crown'd,
 As if the universal Nile
 Had rather water'd it than drown'd :
 It seems some floating piece of paradise,
 Preserv'd by wonder from the flood,
 Long wandering through the deep, as we are told
 Fam'd Delos did of old,
 And the transported muse imagin'd it
 To be a fitter birth-place for the god of wit,
 Or the much talk'd oracular grove ;
 When with amazing joy she hears
 An unknown music all around
 Charming her greedy ears
 With many a heavenly song
 Of nature and of art, of deep philosophy and love,
 Whilst angels tune the voice, and God inspires the tongue.

In vain she catches at the empty sound,
 In vain pursues the music with her longing eye,
 And courts the wanton echoes as they fly.

Pardon, ye great unknown, and far-exalted men,
 The wild excursions of a youthful pen ;
 Forgive a young, and (almost) virgin-muse,
 Whom blind and eager curiosity
 (Yet curiosity, they say,
 Is in her sex a crime needs no excuse)

Has forc'd to grope her uncouth way
 After a mighty light that leads her wandering eye.
 No wonder then she quits the narrow path of sense
 For a dear ramble through impertinence ;
 Impertinence ! the scurvy of mankind.
 And all we fools, who are the greater part of it,
 Though we be of two different factions still,
 Both the good natur'd and the ill,
 Yet wheresoe'er you look, you'll always find
 We join, like flies and wasps, in buzzing about wit.
 In me, who am of the first sect of these,
 All merit, that transcends the humble rules
 Of my own dazzled scanty sense,
 Begets a kinder folly and impertinence
 Of admiration and of praise.
 And our good brethren of the surly sect
 Must e'en all herd us with their kindred fools :
 For though, possess'd of present vogue, they've Railing a rule of wit, and obloquy a trade ; [made
 Yet the same want of brains produces each effect.
 And you, whom Pluto's helm does wisely shroud
 From us the blind and thoughtless crowd,
 Like the fam'd hero in his mother's cloud,

* The ode I writ to the King in Ireland.

THE WORKS OF SWIFT.

Who both our follies and impertinences see,
Do laugh perhaps at theirs, and pity mine and me.

But censure's to be understood
Th' authentic mark of the elect,
The public stamp heav'n sets on all that's great and good,

Our shallow search and judgment to direct.
The war methinks has made
Our wit and learning narrow as our trade;
Instead of boldly sailing far, to buy
A stock of wisdom and philosophy,
We fondly stay at home, in fear
Of every censuring privateer;
Forcing a wretched trade by beating down the sale,
And selling basely by retail.

The wits, I mean the atheists of the age,
Who fain would rule the pulpit as they do the Wondrous refiners of philosophy, [stage;
Of morals and divinity,
By the new modish system of reducing all to sense,
Against all logic and concluding laws,
Do own th' effects of Providence,
And yet deny the cause.

This hopeful sect, now it begins to see
How little, very little, do prevail
Their first and chiefest force
To censure, to cry down, and rail,
Not knowing what, or where, or who you be,
Will quickly take another course:
And, by their never-failing ways
Of solving all appearances they please,
We soon shall see them to their ancient methods fall,
And straight deny you to be men, or any thing at all.

I laugh at the grave answer they will make,
Which they have always ready, general, and cheap:
'Tis but to say, that what we daily meet,
And by a fond mistake
Perhaps imagine to be wondrous wit,
And think, alas! to be by mortals writ,
Is but a crowd of atoms jostling in a heap,
Which from eternal seeds begun,
Jostling some thousand years till ripen'd by the sun;
They're now, just now, as naturally born,
As from the womb of earth a field of corn.

But as for poor contented me,
Who must my weakness and my ignorance confess,
That I believe in much I ne'er can hope to see;
Methinks I'm satisfy'd to guess
That this new, noble, and delightful scene
Is wonderfully mov'd by some exalted men,
Who have well studied in the world's disease
(That epidemic error and depravity,
Or in our judgment or our eye),
That what surprises us can only please.
We often search contentedly the whole world round,
To make some great discovery;
And scorn it when 'tis found.
Just so the mighty Nile has suffer'd in its fame,
Because 'tis said (and perhaps only said)
We've found a little inconsiderable head,
That feeds the huge unequal stream.
Consider human folly, and you'll quickly own,
That all the praises it can give,
By which some fondly boast they shall for ever live,
Won't pay th' impertinence of being known:
Else why should the fam'd Lydian king

(Whom all the charms of an usurped wife and state,
With all that power unfelt courts mankind to be great,

Did with new unexperienc'd glories wait)
Still wear, still doat, on his invisible ring?

Were I to form a regular thought of fame,
Which is perhaps as hard t' imagine right
As to paint echo to the sight;
I would not draw th' idea from an empty name;
Because alas! when we all die,
Careless and ignorant posterity,
Although they praise the learning and the wit,
And though the title seems to show
The name and man by whom the book was writ,
Yet how shall they be brought to know,
Whether that very name was he, or you, or I?
Less should I daub it o'er with transitory praise,
And water-colours of these days:

These days! where e'en th' extravagance of poetry
Is at a loss for figures to express
Men's folly, whimsies and inconstancy,
And by a faint description makes them less.

Then tell us what is fame, where shall we search
Look where exalted virtue and religion sit [for it?
Enthron'd with heavenly wit!

Look where you see
The greatest scorn of learned vanity!
And then how much a nothing is mankind!
Whose reason is weigh'd down by popular air,
Who, by that, vainly talks of baffling death;
And hopes to lengthen life by a transfusion of breath,

Which yet whoe'er examines right will find
To be an art as vain as bottling up of wind!
And when you find out these, believe true fame
is there,

Far above all reward, yet to which all is due;
And this, ye great unknown? is only known in you.

The juggling sea-god, when by chance trepan'd
By some instructed querist sleeping on the sand,
Impatient of all answers, strait became
A stealing brook, and strove to creep away
Into his native sea,
Vext at their follies, murmur'd in his stream;
But, disappointed of his fond desire,
Would vanish in a pyramid of fire.
This surly slippery god, when he design'd
To furnish his escapes,
Ne'er borrow'd more variety of shapes
Than you to please and satisfy mankind,
And seem (almost) transform'd to water, flame,
and air,

So well you answer all phenomena there:
Though madmen and the wits, philosophers and fools,
With all that factious or enthusiastic dotards dream,
And all the incoherent jargon of the schools;
Though all the fumes of fear, hope, love, and shame, [doubt;

Contrive to shock your minds with many a senseless
Doubts where the Delphic god would grope in ignorance and night,

The god of learning and of light
Would want a god himself to help him out.

Philosophy, as it before us lies,
Seems to have borrow'd some ungrateful taste

Of doubts, impertinence, and niceties,
 From every age through which it pass'd,
 But always with a stronger relish of the last.
 This beauteous queen, by Heaven design'd
 To be the great original
 For man to dress and polish his uncourtly mind,
 In what mock habits have they put her since the fall! [ages,
 More oft' in fools' and madmen's hands than
 She seems a medley of all ages,
 With a huge fardingale to swell her fustian stuff,
 A new commode, a top-knot, and a ruff,
 Her face patch'd o'er with modern pedantry,
 With a long sweeping train
 Of comments and disputes, ridiculous and vain,
 All of old cut with a new dye:
 How soon have you restor'd her charms,
 And rid her of her lumber and her books,
 Drest her again genteel and neat,
 And rather tight than great!
 How fond we are to court her to our arms!
 How much of heaven is in her naked looks!
 Thus the deluding Muse oft' blinds me to her ways,
 And ev'n my very thoughts transfers
 And changes all to beauty, and the praise
 Of that proud tyrant sex of hers.
 The rebel Muse, alas! take part
 But with my own rebellious heart,
 And you with fatal and immortal wit conspire
 To fan th' unhappy fire.
 Cruel unknown! what is it you intend?
 Ah! could you, could you hope a poet for your friend!
 Rather forgive what my first transport said:
 May all the blood, which shall by woman's scorn
 be shed,
 Lie upon you and on your children's head!
 For you (ah! did I think I e'er should live to see
 The fatal time when that could be!)
 Have ev'n increas'd their pride and cruelty,
 Woman seems now above all vanity grown,
 Still boasting of her great unknown
 Platonic champions, gain'd without one female
 Or the vast charges of a smile; [wile,
 Which 'tis a shame to see how much of late
 You've taught the covetous wretches to o'er-rate,
 And which they've now the consciences to weigh
 In the same balance with our tears,
 And with such scanty wages pay
 The bondage and the slavery of years.
 Let the vain sex dream on; the empire comes from
 And, had they common generosity, [us,
 They would not use us thus.
 Well—though you've rais'd her to this high
 Ourselves are rais'd as well as she; [degree,
 And, spite of all that they or you can do,
 'Tis pride and happiness enough to me
 Still to be of the same exalted sex with you.
 Alas, how fleeting and how vain
 Is ev'n the nobler man, our learning and our wit!
 I sigh whene'er I think of it:
 As at the closing of an unhappy scene
 Of some great king and conqueror's death,
 When the sad melancholy muse
 Stays but to catch his utmost breath.
 I grieve, this nobler work most happily begun,

So quickly and so wonderfully carry'd on,
 May fall at last to interest, folly, and abuse.
 There is a noon-tide in our lives,
 Which still the sooner it arrives,
 Although we boast our winter-sun looks bright,
 And foolishly are glad to see it at its height,
 Yet so much sooner comes the long and gloomy
 night.
 No conquest ever yet begun,
 And by one mighty hero carried to its height,
 E'er flourish'd under a successor or a son;
 It lost some mighty pieces through all hands it pass'd,
 And vanish'd to an empty title in the last.
 For, when the animating mind is fled
 (Which nature never can retain,
 Nor e'er call back again),
 The body, though gigantic, lies all cold and dead,
 And thus undoubtedly 'twill fare
 With what unhappy men shall dare
 To be successors to their great unknown,
 On Learning's high established throne.
 Censure, and pedantry, and pride,
 Numberless nations, stretching far and wide,
 Shall (I foresee it) soon with Gothic swarms come
 From ignorance's universal north. [forth
 And with blind rage break all this peaceful government:
 Yet shall these traces of your wit remain,
 Like a just map, to tell the vast extent
 Of conquest in your short and happy reign;
 And to all future mankind show
 How strange a paradox is true,
 That men who liv'd and dy'd without a name
 Are the chief heroes in the sacred list of fame.

WRITTEN IN

A LADY'S IVORY TABLE-BOOK, 1699.

PERUSE my leaves through every part,
 And think thou seest my owner's heart,
 Scrawl'd o'er with trifles thus, and quite
 As hard, as senseless, and as light;
 Expos'd to every coxcomb's eyes,
 But hid with caution from the wife.
 Here you may read, "Dear charming faint!"
 Beneath, "A new receipt for paint;"
 Here, in beau-spelling, "Tru tel deth;"
 There, in her own, "For an el breth;"
 Here, "Lovely nymph, pronounce my doom!"
 There, "A safe way to use perfume:"
 Here, a page fill'd with billets-doux;
 On t'other side, "Laid out for shoes"—
 "Madam, I die without your grace"—
 "Item, for half a yard of lace."
 Who that had wit would place it here,
 For every peeping fop to jeer;
 In power of spittle and a clout,
 Whene'er he please, to blot it out;
 And then, to heighten the disgrace,
 Clap his own nonsense in the place?
 Whoe'er expects to hold his part
 In such a book, and such a heart,
 If he be wealthy, and a fool,
 Is in all points the fittest tool;
 Of whom it may be justly said,
 He's a gold pencil tipp'd with lead.

MRS. HARRIS'S PETITION, 1699.

To their Excellencies the Lords Justices of Ireland *, the humble petition of Frances Harris, Who must starve, and die a maid, if it miscarries;

Humbly sheweth,

That I went to warm myself in Lady Betty's † chamber, because I was cold ;
And I had in a purse seven pounds, four shillings, and sixpence, besides farthings, in money and gold ;

So, because I had been buying things for my Lady last night,

I was resolv'd to tell my money, to see if it was right.

Now, you must know, because my trunk has a very bad lock,

Therefore all the money I have, which, God knows, is a very small stock,

I keep in my pocket, ty'd about my middle, next to my smock.

So when I went to put up my purse, as God would have it, my smock was unript,

And, instead of putting it into my pocket, down it flipt ;

Then the bell rung, and I went down to put my Lady to bed ;

And, God knows, I thought my money was as safe as my maidenhead.

So, when I came up again, I found my pocket feel very light :

But when I search'd, and miss'd my purse, Lord ! I thought I should have sunk outright.

Lord ! Madam, says Mary, how d' ye do ? Indeed, says I, never worse :

But pray, Mary, can you tell what I have done with my purse ?

Lord help me ! said Mary, I never stirr'd out of this place ;

Nay, said I, I had it in Lady Betty's chamber, that's a plain case.

So Mary got me to bed, and cover'd me up warm : However, she stole away my garters, that I might do myself no harm.

So I tumbled and toss'd all night, as you may very well think, [wink.

But hardly ever set my eyes together, or slept at So I was adream'd, methought that we went and search'd the folks round,

And in a corner of Mrs. Dukes's ‡ box, ty'd in a rag, the money was found.

So next morning we told Whittle §, and he fell a-swearing ;

Then my dame Wadgar || came ; and she, you know, is thick of hearing.

Dame, said I, as loud as I could bawl, do you know what a loss I have had ?

Nay, said she, my Lord Colway's ¶ folks are all very sad ; [out fail.

For my Lord Dromedary  comes a Tuesday with-Pugh ! said I, but that's not the business that I ail.

Says Cary *, says he, I have been a servant this five and twenty years come spring,
And in all the places I liv'd I never heard of such a thing.

Yes, says the steward, †, I remember, when I was at my Lady Shrewsbury's,

Such a thing as this happen'd just about the time of gooseberries.

So I went to the party suspected, and I found her full of grief,

(Now, you must know, of all things in the world, I hate a thief.) [about :

However, I am resolv'd to bring the discourse slyly Mrs. Dukes, said I, here's an ugly accident has happen'd out ; [louse ‡ :

'Tis not that I value the money three skips of a But the thing I stand upon is the credit of the house.

'Tis true, seven pounds, four shillings, and sixpence, makes a great hole in my wages :

Besides, as they say, service is no inheritance in these ages.

Now, Mrs. Dukes, you know, and every body understands,

That though 'tis hard to judge, yet money can't go without hands.

The devil take me ! said she (blessing herself) if ever I saw't !

So she roar'd like a bedlam, as though I had call'd her all to naught.

So you know, what could I say to her any more ? I e'en left her, and came away as wise as I was before.

Well ; but then they would had me gone to the cunning man ! [here anon.

No, said I, 'tis the same thing, the chaplain will be So the chaplain § came in. Now the servants say he is my sweetheart,

Because he's always in my chamber, and I always take his part.

So as the devil would have it, before I was aware, out I blunder'd,

Parson, said I, can you cast a nativity, when a body's plunder'd !

(Now, you must know, he hates to be call'd parson like the devil !)

Truly, says he, Mrs. Nab, it might become you to be more civil ;

If your money begone, as a learned divine says, d'ye see, [from me ;

You are no text for my handling ; so take that I was never taken for a conjurer before, I'd have you to know.

A BALLAD

ON THE GAME OF TRAFFIC,

Written at the Castle of Dublin, 1699.

My Lord †, to find out who must deal,
 Deliver cards about,
 But the first knave does seldom fail
 To find the Doctor out.

But then his Honour cry'd, Gadzooks!
 And seem'd to knit his brow :
 For on a knave he never looks,
 But h' thinks upon Jack How ‡.

My Lady, though she is no player,
 Some bungling partner takes,
 And, wedg'd in corner of a chair,
 Takes snuff, and holds the stakes.

Dame Floyd looks out in grave suspense
 For pair-royals and sequents ;
 But wisely cautious of her pence,
 The castle seldom frequents.

Quoth Herries, fairly putting cases,
 I'd won it on my word,
 If I had but a pair of aces,
 And could pick up a third.

But Weston has a new-cast gown
 On Sundays to be fine in,
 And, if she can but win a crown,
 'Twill just new-dye the lining,

" With these is Parson Swift,
 " Not knowing how to spend his time,
 " Does make a wretched shift,
 " To deafen them with puns and rhyme."

A BALLAD,

To the tune of the Cut-Purse §.

ONCE on a time, as old stories rehearse,
 A friar would needs show his talent in Latin ;

* A cant word of Lord and Lady B. to Mrs. Harris.† The Earl of Berkeley. ‡ Paymaster of the army.§ Lady Betty Berkeley, finding the preceding verses in the author's room unfinished, wrote under them the concluding stanza, which gave occasion to this ballad, written by the author in a counterfeit hand, as if a third person had done it.

But was sorely put to't in the midst of a verse,
 Because he could find no word to come pat in :
 Then all in the place
 He left a void space,

And so went to bed in a desperate case ; [dle !
 Then behold the next morning a wonderful rid-
 He found it was strangely fill'd up in the middle.
 Cho. Let censuring critics then think what they list
on't ; [sistant ?
Who would not write verses with such an as-

This put me, the friar, into an amazement :
 For he wisely consider'd it must be a sprite ;
 That he came through the key-hole, or in at the casement ; [and write :
 And it needs must be one that could both read
 Yet he did not know
 If it were friend or foe,
 Or whether it came from above or below :
 However, 'twas civil in angel or elf,
 For he ever could have fill'd it so well of himself.
 Cho. Let censuring, &c.

Even so Master Doctor had puzzled his brains
 In making a ballad, but was at a stand : [pains ;
 He had mix'd little wit with a great deal of
 When he found a new help from invisible hand.
 Then, good Doctor Swift,
 Pay thanks for the gift ; [list :
 For you freely must own, you were at a dead
 And, though some malicious young spirit did do't,
 You may know by the hand it had no cloven foot.
 Cho. Let censuring, &c.

THE DISCOVERY.

WHEN wise Lord Berkeley first came here*,
 Statesmen and mob expected wonders,
 Nor thought to find so great a peer
 Ere a week past committing blunders.

Till, on a day cut out by fate,
 When folks came thick to make their court,
 Out slipt a mystery of state,
 To give the town and country sport.

Now enters † Bush with new state airs,
 His Lordship's premier minister ;
 And who in all profound affairs
 Is held as needful as his ‡ clyster.

With head reclining on his shoulder,
 He deals and hears mysterious chat,
 While every ignorant beholder
 Asks of his neighbour, Who is that ?

With this he put up to my Lord,
 The courtiers kept their distance due,
 He twitch'd his sleeve, and stole a word ;
 Then to a corner both withdrew.

Imagine now, my Lord and Bush
 Whispering in unto most profound,
 Like good king § Phyz, and good king Ush,
 While all the rest stood gaping round.

* To Ireland, as one of the Lords Justices.† Bush, by some underhand insinuation, obtained thepost of secretary, which had been promised to Swift.‡ Always taken before my Lord went to council.§ See "The Rehearsal."

THE WORKS OF SWIFT.

At length a spark not too well bred,
Of forward face and ear acute,
Advanc'd on tipto, lean'd his head,
To over-hear the grand dispute:

To learn what northern kings design,
Or from Whitehall some new express,
Papiſts diſarm'd, or fall of coin:
For ſure (thought he) it can't be leſs.

My Lord, ſaid Buſh, a friend and I,
Diſguiſ'd in two old thread-bare coats,
Ere morning dawn, ſtole out to ſpy
How markets went for hay and oats.

With that he draws two handſuls out,
The one was oats, the other hay;
Puts this to's Excellency's ſnout,
And begs he would the other weigh.

My Lord ſeems pleas'd, but ſtill directs
By all means to bring down the rates;
Then, with a congee circumflex,
Buſh, ſmiling round on all, retreats.

Our liſtner ſtood a while confus'd,
But, gathering ſpirits, wiſely ran for't,
Enrag'd to ſee the world abus'd
By two ſuch whiſpering kings of Brentford.

THE PROBLEM,

" THAT MY LORD BERKELEY STINKS, WHEN HE IS IN LOVE."

DID ever problem thus perplex,
Or more employ, the female ſex?
So ſweet a paſſion, who would think,
Jove ever form'd to make a ſtink?
The ladies vow and ſwear, they'll try,
Whether it be a truth or lie.
Love's fire, it ſeems, like inward heat,
Works in my Lord by ſtool and ſweat,
Which brings a ſtink from every pore,
And from behind and from before;
Yet, what is wonderful to tell it,
None but the favourite nymph can ſmell it.
But now, to ſolve the natural cauſe
By ſober philoſophic laws:
Whether all paſſions, when in ferment,
Work out as anger does in vermin;
So, when a weazel you torment,
You find his paſſion by his ſcent.
We read of kings, who, in a fright,
Though on a throne, would fall to ſh—
Beſide all this, deep ſcholars know,
That the main ſtring of Cupid's bow
Once on a time was an a— gut;
Now to a nobler office put,
By favour or deſert preferr'd
From giving paſſage to a t—;
But ſtill, though fix'd among the ſtars,
Does ſympathize with human a—.
Thus, when you feel an hard-bound breech,
Conclude love's bow-ſtring at full ſtretch,
Till the kind looſeneſs comes, and then
Conclude the bow relax'd again.
And now, the ladies all are bent
To try the great experiment,
Ambitious of a regent's heart,
Spread all their charms to catch a f—;

Watching the firſt unfavoury wind,
Some ply before, and ſome behind.
My Lord, on fire amidſt the dames,
F—ts like a laurel in the flames.

The fair approach the ſpeaking part,
To try the back-way to his heart:
For, as when we a gun diſcharge,
Although the bore be ne'er ſo large,
Before the flame from muzzle burſt,
Juſt at the breech it ſaſhes firſt;
So from my lord his paſſion broke,
He f—d firſt, and then he ſpoke.

The ladies vaniſh in the ſmother,
To confer notes with one another;
And now they all agreed to name
Whom each one thought the happy dame.
Quoth Neal, whate'er the reſt may think,
I'm ſure 'twas I that ſmelt the ſtink.
You ſmell the ſtink! by G—, you lie,
Quoth Roſs, for I'll be ſworn 'twas I.
Ladies, quoth Levens, pray forbear:
Let's not fall out; we all had ſhare;
And, by the moſt I can diſcover,
My lord's an univerſal lover.

THE DESCRIPTION

OF

A SALAMANDER. 1706.

Pliny, Nat. Hiſt. Lib. x. c. 67. lib. xxix. c. 4.

As maſtiff dogs in modern phraſe are Call'd Pompey, Scipio, and Cæſar;
As pyes and daws are often ſtyl'd
With Chriſtian nicknames, like a child;
As we ſay Monſieur to an ape,
Without offence to human ſhape;
So men have got, from bird and brute,
Names that would beſt their natures ſuit.
The lion, eagle, fox, and boar,
Were heroes titles heretofore,
Beſtow'd as hieroglyphics fit
To ſhow their valour, ſtrength, or wit:
For what is underſtood by fame,
Beſides the getting of a name?
But, e'er ſince men invented guns,
A different way their fancy runs:
To paint a hero, we inquire
For ſomething that will conquer fire.
Would you deſcribe Turenne or Trump?
Think of a bucket or a pump.
Are theſe too low?—then find out grander,
Call my Lord Cuts a ſalamander.
'Tis well;—but, ſince we live among
Detraſtors with an evil tongue,
Who may object againſt the term,
Pliny ſhall prove what we affirm:
Pliny ſhall prove, and we'll apply,
And I'll be judg'd by ſtanders-by.

Fiſt, then, our author has defin'd
This reptile of the ſerpent kind,
With gaudy coat and ſhining train;
But loathſome ſpots his body ſtain:
Out from ſome hole obſcure he flies,
When rains deſcend, and tempeſts riſe,
Till the ſun clears the air; and then
Crawls back neglected to his den.

So, when the war has rais'd a ſtorm,
I've ſeen a ſnake in human form,

All stain'd with infamy and vice,
Leap from the dunghill in a trice,
Burnish, and make a gaudy show,
Become a general, peer, and beau,
Till peace has made the sky serene;
Then shrink into its hole again.

"All this we grant—why, then, look yonder:
"Sure that must be a Salamander!"

Farther, we are by Pliny told,
This serpent is extremely cold;
So cold, that, put it in the fire,
'Twill make the very flames expire:
Besides, it spues a filthy froth
(Whether through rage or lust, or both)
Of matter purulent and white,
Which, happening on the skin to light,
And there corrupting to a wound,
Spreads leprosy and baldness round.

So have I seen a batter'd beau,
By age and claps grown cold as snow,
Whose breath or touch, where'er he came,
Blew out Love's torch, or chill'd the flame:
And should some nymph, who ne'er was cruel,
Like Charlton cheap, or fam'd Du-Ruel,
Receive the filth which he ejects,
She soon would find the same effects
Her tainted carcase to pursue,
As from the Salamander's spue;
A dismal shedding of her locks,
And, if no leprosy, a pox.
"Then I'll appeal to each by-stander,
"If this be not a Salamander?"

TO THE EARL OF PETERBOROW,

WHO COMMANDED THE BRITISH FORCES IN SPAIN.

MORDANTO fills the trump of fame,
The Christian worlds his deeds proclaim,
And prints are crowded with his name.

In journies he outrides the post,
Sits up till midnight with his host,
Talks politics, and gives the toast;

Knows every prince in Europe's face,
Flies like a squib from place to place,
And travels not, but runs a race.

From Paris gazette à-la-main,
This day arriv'd, without his train,
Mordanto in a week from Spain.

A messenger comes all a-reek,
Mordanto at Madrid to seek;
He left the town above a week.

Next day the post-boy winds his horn,
And rides through Dover in the morn:
Mordanto's landed from Leghorn.

Mordanto gallops on alone;
The roads are with her followers strown;
This breaks a girth, and that a bone.

His body active as his mind,
Returning sound in limb and wind,
Except some leather lost behind.

A skeleton in outward figure,
His meagre corpse, though full of vigour,
Would halt behind him, were it bigger.

So wonderful his expedition,
When you have not the least suspicion,
He's with you like an apparition:

Shines in all climates like a star;
In senates bold, and fierce in war;
A land commander, and a tar:

Heroic actions early bred in,
Ne'er to be match'd in modern reading,
But by his name-fake Charles of Sweden.

ON THE UNION.

THE Queen has lately lost a part
Of her ENTIRELY-ENGLISH heart;
For want of which, by way of botch,
She piec'd it up again with SCOTCH.
Blest revolution! which creates
Divided hearts, united states!
See how the double nation lies;
Like a rich coat with skirts of frieze:
As if a man, in making posies,
Should bundle thistles up with roses.
Who ever yet a union saw
Of kingdoms without faith or law?
Henceforward let no statesmen dare
A kingdom to a ship compare;
Lest he should call our commonweal
A vessel with a double keel:
Which, just like ours, new rigg'd and mann'd,
And got about a league from land,
By change of wind to leeward side,
The pilot knew not how to guide.
So tossing faction will o'erwhelm
Our crazy double-bottom'd realm.

ON MRS. BIDDY FLOYD:

OR, THE RECEIPT TO FORM A BEAUTY†.

WHEN Cupid did his grandfire Jove entreat
To form some Beauty by a new receipt,
Jove sent, and found far in a country scene
Truth, innocence, good nature, look serene:
From which ingredients first the dextrous boy
Pick'd the demure, the awkward, and the coy.
The Graces from the Court did next provide
Breeding, and wit, and air, and decent pride:
These Venus cleans from every spurious grain
Of nice, coquet, affected, pert, and vain.
Jove mix'd up all, and his best clay employ'd;
Then call'd the happy composition Floyd.

APPOLLO OUTWITTED.

To the Honourable Mrs. Finch, afterwards Countess of Winchelsea, under her name of Ardelia.

PHOEBUS, now shortening every shade,
Up to the northern tropic came,
And thence beheld a lovely maid,
Attending on a royal dame.

The god laid down his feeble rays,
Then lighted from his glittering coach;

* The motto on Queen Anne's coronation medal.

† An elegant Latin version of this little poem is in the sixth volume of Dryden's Miscellanies.

But fenc'd his head with his own bays,
Before he durst the nymph approach.

Under those sacred leaves, secure
From common lightning of the skies,
He fondly thought he might endure
The flashes of Ardelia's eyes.

The nymph, who oft' had read in books
Of that bright god whom bards invoke,
Soon knew Apollo by his looks,
And guess'd his business ere he spoke.

He, in the old celestial cant,
Confess'd his flame, and swore by Styx,
Whate'er she would desire, to grant—
But wise Ardelia knew his tricks.

Ovid had warn'd her, to beware
Of strolling gods, whose usual trade is,
Under pretence of taking air,
To pick up sublunary ladies.

Howe'er, she gave no flat denial,
As having malice in her heart;
And was resolv'd upon a trial,
To cheat the god in his own art.

Hear my request, the virgin said;
Let which I please of all the Nine
Attend, whene'er I want their aid,
Obey my call, and only mine.

By vow oblig'd, by passion led,
The God could not refuse her prayer:
He wav'd his wreath thrice o'er her head,
Thrice mutter'd something to the air.

And now he thought to seize his due:
But she the charm already tried.
Thalia heard the call, and flew
To wait at bright Ardelia's side.

On sight of this celestial prude,
Apollo thought it vain to stay;
Nor in her presence durst be rude;
But made his leg, and went away.

He hop'd to find some lucky hour,
When on their queen the muses wait:
But Palla's owns Ardelia's power;
For vows divine are kept by fate.

Then, full of rage, Apollo spoke:
Deceitful nymph! I see thy art;
And, though I can't my gift revoke,
I'll disappoint its nobler part.

Let stubborn pride possess thee long,
And be thou negligent of fame;
With every muse to grace thy song,
May'st thou despise a poet's name!

Of modest poets thou be first;
To silent shades repeat thy verse,
Till Fame and Echo almost burst,
Yet hardly dare one line rehearse.

And last, my vengeance to complete,
May'st thou descend to take renown,
Prevail'd on by the thing you hate,
A whig, and one that wears a gown!

VANBRUGH'S HOUSE,

BUILT FROM THE RUINS OF WHITEHALL, 1706.

IN times of old, when Time was young,
And poets their own verses sung;
A verse would draw a stone or beam,
That now would overload a team;
Lead them a dance of many a mile,
Then rear them to a goodly pile.
Each number had its different power:
Heroic strains could build a tower;
Sonnets, or elegies to Chloris,
Might raise a house about two stories;
A lyric ode would slate; a catch
Would tile; an epigram would thatch.

But, to their own or landlord's cost,
Now poets feel this art is lost.
Not one of all our tuneful throng
Can raise a lodging for a song:
For Jove consider'd well the case,
Observ'd they grew a numerous race;
And, should they build as fast as write,
"T would ruin undertakers quite.
This evil therefore to prevent,
He wisely chang'd their element:
On earth the god of wealth was made
Sole patron of the building trade;
Leaving the wits the spacious air,
With licence to build castles there:
And, 'tis conceiv'd, their old pretence
To lodge in garrets comes from thence.

Premising thus, in modern way,
The better half we have to say:
Sing, muse, the house of poet Van
In higher strains than we began.

Van (for 'tis fit the reader know it)
Is both a herald and a poet;
No wonder then if nicely skilled
In both capacities to build.
As herald, he can in a day
Repair a house gone to decay;
Or, by achievement, arms, device,
Erect a new one in a trice;
And, as a poet, he has skill
To build in speculation still,
Great Jove! he cry'd, the art restore
To build by verse as heretofore,
And make my muse the architect;
What palaces shall we erect!
No longer shall forsaken Thames
Lament his old Whitehall in flames;
A pile shall from its ashes rise,
Fit to invade or prop the skies.

Jove smil'd, and, like a gentle god,
Consenting with the usual nod,
Told Van, he knew his talent best,
And left the choice to his own breast.
So Van resolv'd to write a farce;
But, well perceiving wit was scarce,
With cunning that defect supplies;
Takes a French play as lawful prize;
Steals thence his plot and every joke,
Not once suspecting Jove would smoke;
And (like a wag set down to write)
Would whisper to himself, a bite;
Then, from this motley, mingled style,
Proceeded to erect his pile.

So men of old, to gain renown, did
Build Babel with their tongues confounded.
Jove saw the cheat, but thought it best
To turn the matter to a jest:
Down from Olympus' top he slides,
Laughing as if he'd burst his sides:
Ay, thought the God, are these your tricks?
Why then old plays deserve old bricks;
And, since you're sparing of your stuff,
Your building shall be small enough.
He spake, and, grudging, lent his aid;
Th' experienc'd bricks, that knew their trade,
(As being bricks at second-hand),
Now move, and now in order stand.

The building, as the poet writ,
Rose in proportion to his wit:
And first the Prologue built a wall
So wide as to encompass all.
The Scene a wood produc'd, no more
Than a few scrubby trees before.
The Plot as yet lay deep; and so
A cellar next was dug below:
But this a work so hard was found,
Two Acts it cost him under ground:
Two other Acts, we may presume,
Were spent in building each a room.
Thus far advanc'd, he made a shift
To raise a roof with act the fifth.
The Epilogue behind did frame
A place not decent here to name.

Now poets from all quarters ran
To see the house of brother Van;
Look'd high and low, walk'd often round;
But no such house was to be found.

One asks the watermen hard-by,
"Where may the poets palace lie?"

Another of the Thames inquires,
If he has seen its gilded spires?
At length they in the rubbish spy
A thing resembling a goose-pye.
Thither in haste the poets throng,
And gaze in silent wonder long,
Till one in raptures thus began
To praise the pile and builder Van:

Thrice happy poet! who may'st trail
Thy house about thee like a snail;
Or, harness'd to a nag, at ease
Take journeys in it like a chaise;
Or in a boat, whene'er thou wilt,
Canst make it serve thee for a tilt!
Capacious house! 'tis own'd by all
Thou'rt well contriv'd, though thou art small:
For every wit in Britain's isle
May lodge within thy spacious pile.
Like Bacchus thou, as poets feign,
Thy mother burnt, are born again,
Born like a phoenix from the flame;
But neither bulk nor shape the same:
As animals of largest size
Corrupt to maggots, worms, and flies;
A type of modern wit and style,
The rubbish of an ancient pile.
So chemists boast they have a power
From the dead ashes of a flower
Some faint resemblance to produce,
But not the virtue, taste, or juice:
So modern rhymers wisely blast
The poetry of ages past;

Which after they have overthrown,
They from its ruins build their own.

TWO RIDDLES. 1707.*

I. ON A FAN.

FROM India's burning clime I'm brought,
With cooling gales like zephyrs fraught.
Not Iris, when she paints the sky,
Can show more different hue than I:
Nor can she change her form so fast;
I'm now a sail, and now a mast:
I here am red, and there am green;
A beggar there, and here a queen.
I sometimes live in house of hair,
And oft' in hand of lady fair:
I please the young, I grace the old,
And am at once both hot and cold:
Say what I am then, if you can,
And find the rhyme, and you're the man.

ANSWER.

YOUR house of hair, and lady's hand,
At first did put me to a stand.
I have it now—'tis plain enough—
Your hairy business is a muff.
Your engine fraught with cooling gales,
At once so like your masts and sails;
Your thing of various shape and hue,
Must be some painted toy, I knew:
And for the rhyme to you're the man,
What fits it better than a fan?

II. ON A BEAU.

I'm wealthy and poor,
I'm empty and full,
I'm humble and proud,
I'm witty and dull.
I'm foul, and yet fair;
I'm old, and yet young;
I lie with Moll K—r,
And toast Mrs. —.

ANSWER, BY MR. F—R.

IN rigging he's rich, though in pocket he's poor;
He cringes to courtiers, and cocks to the cits;
Like twenty he dresses, but looks like threescore;

THE HISTORY OF VANBRUGH'S HOUSE.

WHEN mother Clud had rose from play,
And call'd to take the cards away,
Van saw, but seem'd not to regard,
How Miss pick'd every painted card,

* Originally communicated by Swift to Oldisworth,
who published them in "The Muse's Mercury," 1707.

And, busy both with hand and eye,
Soon rear'd a house two stories high.
Van's genius, without thought or lecture,
Is hugely turn'd to architecture:
He view'd the edifice, and smil'd,
Vow'd it was pretty for a child;
It was so perfect in its kind,
He kept the model in his mind.

But, when he found the boys at play,
And saw them dabbling in their clay,
He stood behind a stall to lurk,
And mark the progress of their work;
With true delight observ'd them all,
Raking up mud to build a wall.
The plan he much admir'd, and took
The model in his table-book;
Thought himself now exactly skill'd,
And so resolv'd a house to build;
A real house, with rooms and stairs,
Five times at least as big as theirs;
Taller than Mifs's by two yards;
Not a sham thing of clay or cards:
And so he did; for, in a while,
He built up such a monstrous pile,
That no two chairmen could be found
Able to lift it from the ground.
Still at Whitehall it stands in view,
Just in the place where first it grew;
There all the little school-boys run,
Envyng to see themselves outdone.

From such deep rudiments as these,
Van is become by due degrees
For building fam'd, and justly reckon'd,
At Court, Vitruvius the second:
No wonder, since wise authors show
That best foundations must be low:
And now the Duke has wisely ta'en him
To be his architect at Blenheim.

But, raillery for once apart,
If this rule holds in every art;
Or if his Grace were no more skill'd in
The art of battering walls than building,
We might expect to see next year
A mouse-trap man chief engineer!

BAUCIS AND PHILEMON.

ON THE EVER-LAMENTED LOSS OF THE TWO
YEW-TREES IN THE PARISH OF CHILTHORNE,
SOMERSET. 1708.

Imitated from the Eighth Book of Ovid.

IN ancient times, as story tells,
The saints would often leave their cells,
And stroll about, but hide their quality,
To try good people's hospitality.

It happen'd on a winter-night,
As authors of the legend write,
Two brother-hermits, saints by trade,
Taking their tour in masquerade,
Disguis'd in tatter'd habits, went
To a small village down in Kent;
Where, in the strollers' canting strain,
They begg'd from door to door in vain,
Tried every tone might pity win;
But not a soul would let them in.

Our wandering saints, in woful state,
Treated at this ungodly rate,

Having through all the village past,
To a small cottage came at last!
Where dwelt a good old honest ye'man,
Call'd in the neighbourhood Philemon;
Who kindly did these saints invite
In his poor hut to pass the night;
And then the hospitable fire
Bid goody Baucis mend the fire;
While he from out the chimney took
A flitch of bacon off the hook,
And freely from the fattest side
Cut out large slices to be fry'd;
Then stepp'd aside to fetch them drink,
Fill'd a large jug up to the brink,
And saw it fairly twice go round;
Yet (what is wonderful!) they found
'Twas still replenish'd to the top,
As if they ne'er had touch'd a drop.
The good old couple were amaz'd,
And often on each other gaz'd;
For both were frighten'd to the heart,
And just began to cry,—What art!
Then softly turn'd aside to view
Whether the lights were burning blue.
The gentle pilgrims, soon aware on't,
Told them their calling, and their errand:
Good folks, you need not be afraid,
We are but saints, the hermits said;
No hurt shall come to you or yours:
But for that pack of churlish boors,
Not fit to live on Christian ground,
They and their houses shall be drown'd;
Whilst you shall see your cottage rise,
And grow a church before your eyes.

They scarce had spoke, when fair and soft
The roof began to mount aloft;
Aloft rose every beam and rafter;
The heavy wall climb'd slowly after.

The chimney widen'd, and grew higher,
Became a steeple with a spire.

The kettle to the top was hoist,
And there stood fasten'd to a joist,
But with the upside down, to show
Its inclination for below:
In vain; for a superior force,
Apply'd at bottom, stops its course:
Doom'd ever in suspense to dwell,
'Tis now no kettle, but a bell.

A wooden jack, which had almost
Lost by disuse the art to roast,
A sudden alteration feels,
Increas'd by new intestine wheels;
And, what exalts the wonder more,
The number made the motion slower:
The flier, though 't had leaden feet,
Turn'd round so quick, you scarce could see 't;
But, slacken'd by some secret power,
Now hardly moves an inch an hour.
The jack and chimney, near ally'd,
Had never left each other's side:
The chimney to a steeple grown,
The jack would not be left alone;
But, up against the steeple rear'd,
Became a clock, and still adher'd;
And still its love to household cares,
By a shrill voice at noon, declares,
Warning the cook-maid not to burn
That roast-meat which it cannot turn.

The groaning-chair began to crawl,
Like a huge snail, along the wall;
There stuck aloft in public view,
And, with small change, a pulpit grew.

The porringers, that in a row
Hung high, and made a glittering show,
To a less noble substance chang'd,
Were now but leathern buckets rang'd.

The ballads, pasted on the wall,
Of Joan of France, and English Moll,
Fair Rosamond, and Robin Hood,
The Little Children in the Wood,
Now seem'd to look abundance better,
Improv'd in picture, size, and letter;
And, high in order plac'd, describe
The heraldry of every tribe*.

A bedstead of the antique mode,
Compact of timber many a load,
Such as our ancestors did use,
Was metamorphos'd into pews;
Which still their ancient nature keep
By lodging folks dispos'd to sleep.

The cottage by such feats as these
Grown to a church by just degrees,
The hermits then desir'd their host
To ask for what he fancy'd most.
Philemon, having paus'd a while,
Return'd them thanks in homely style:
Then said, My house is grown so fine,
Methinks I still would call it mine;
I'm old, and fain would live at ease;
Make me the parson, if you please.

He spoke, and presently he feels
His grazier's coat fall down his heels:
He sees, yet hardly can believe,
About each arm a pudding-sleeve;
His waistcoat to a cassock grew,
And both assum'd a sable hue;
But, being old, continued just
As thread-bare, and as full of dust.
His talk was now of tithes and dues;
He smok'd his pipe, and read the news;
Knew how to preach old sermons next,
Vamp'd in the preface and the text;
At christenings well could act his part,
And had the service all by heart;
Wish'd women might have children fast,
And thought whose sow had farrow'd last;
Against dissenters would repine,
And stood up firm for right divine;
Found his head fill'd with many a system;
But classic authors,—he ne'er miss'd 'em.

Thus having furbish'd up a parson,
Dame Baucis next they play'd their farce on,
Instead of home-spun coifs, were seen
Good pinners edg'd with colberteen;
Her petticoat, transform'd apace,
Became black fatten flounc'd with lace.
Plain Goody would no longer down;
'Twas Madam, in her grogram gown.
Philemon was in great surprise,
And hardly could believe his eyes,
Amaz'd to see her look so prim;
And she admir'd as much at him.

* The tribes of Israel are sometimes distinguished in country churches by the ensigns given to them by Jacob.

Thus happy in their change of life
Were several years this man and wife;
When on a day, which prov'd their last,
Discourfing o'er old stories past,
They went by chance, amidst their talk,
To the church-yard to take a walk;
When Baucis hastily cry'd out,
My dear, I see your forehead sprout!
Sprout! quoth the man; what's this you tell us?
I hope you don't believe me jealous!
But yet, methinks, I feel it true;
And really yours is budding too—
Nay,—now I cannot stir my foot;
It feels as if 'twere taking root.

Description would but tire my Muse;
In short, they both were turn'd to yeaws.

Old Goodman Dobson of the green
Remembers, he the trees has seen;
He'll talk of them from noon till night,
And goes with folks to show the sight:
On Sundays, after evening-prayer,
He gathers all the parish there;
Points out the place of either yeaw;
Here Baucis, there Philemon, grew:
Till once a parson of our town,
To mend his barn, cut Baucis down;
At which 'tis hard to be believ'd
How much the other tree was griev'd,
Grew scrubbed, dy'd a-top, was stunted;
So the next parson stubb'd and burnt it.

E L E G Y

On the supposed Death of Partridge, the Almanack
Maker. 1708.

WELL; 'tis as Bickerstaff has guess'd,
Though we all took it for a jest:
Partridge is dead; nay more, he dy'd
Ere he could prove the good 'squire ly'd.
Strange, an astrologer should die
Without one wonder in the sky!
Not one of all his crony stars
To pay their duty at his herse!
No meteor, no eclipse appear'd!
No comet with a flaming beard!
The sun has rose, and gone to bed,
Just as if Partridge were not dead;
Nor hid himself behind the moon,
To make a dreadful night at noon.
He at fit periods walks through Aries,
Howe'er our earthly motion varies;
And twice a-year he'll cut th' equator,
As if there had been no such matter.

Some wits have wonder'd what analogy
There is 'twixt * cobling and astrology;
How Partridge made his optics rise
From a soe-sole to reach the skies.

A list the cobbler's temples ties,
To keep the hair out of his eyes;
From whence 'tis plain, the diadem
That princes wear, derives from them:
And therefore crowns are now a-days
Adorn'd with golden stars and rays;
Which plainly shows the near alliance
'Twixt cobling and the planets science.

* Partridge was a cobbler.

THE WORKS OF SWIFT.

Besides, that flow-pac'd sign Bootes,
As 'tis miscall'd, we know not who 'tis:
But Partridge ended all disputes;
He knew his trade, and call'd it  boots*.

The borned moon, which heretofore
Upon their shoes the Romans wore,
Whose wideness kept their toes from corns,
And whence we claim our shoeing-horns,
Shows how the art of cobbling bears
A near resemblance to the spheres.

A scrap of parchment hung by geometry
(A great refinement in barometry)
Can, like the stars, foretel the weather;
And what is parchment else but leather?
Which an astrologer might use
Either for almanacks or shoes.

Thus Partridge by his wit and parts
At once did practise both these arts:
And as the boding owl (or rather
The bat, because her wings are leather)
Steals from her private cell by night,
And flies about the candle-light;
So learned Partridge could as well
Creep in the dark from leathern cell,
And in his fancy fly as far
To peep upon a twinkling star.

Besides, he could confound the spheres,
And set the planets by the ears;
To show his skill, he Mars could join
To Venus in aspect malign;
Then call in Mercury for aid,
And cure the wounds that Venus made.

Great scholars have in Lucian read,
When Philip king of Greece was dead,
His soul and spirit did divide,
And each part took a different side:
One rose a star; the other fell
Beneath, and mended shoes in hell.

Thus Partridge still shines in each art,
The cobbling and star-gazing part;
And is install'd as good a star
As any of the Cæsars are.

Triumphant star! some pity show
On coblers militant below,
Whom roguish boys, in stormy nights,
Torment by pissing out their lights;
Or through a chink convey their smoke,
Inclos'd artificers to choke.

Thou, high exalted in thy sphere,
May'st follow still thy calling there.
To thee the Bull will lend his hide,
By Phœbus newly tann'd and dry'd;
For thee they Argo's hulk will tax,
And scrape her pitchy sides for wax:
Then Ariadne kindly lends
Her braided hair to make the ends:
The points of Sagittarius' dart
Turns to an awl by heavenly art;
And Vulcan, wheedled by his wife,
Will forge for thee a paring-knife.
For want of room by Virgo's side,
She'll strain a point, and set astride,
To take thee kindly in between;
And then the signs will be thirteen.

 See his almanack.*

THE EPITAPH.

HERE, five feet deep, lies on his back,
A cobler, starmonger, and quack;
Who to the stars in pure good will
Does to his best look upward still,
Weep, all you customers that use
His pills, his almanacks, or shoes:
And you that did your fortunes seek,
Step to his grave but once a-week.
This earth which bears his body's print,
You'll find has so much virtue in 't,
That I durst pawn my ears 'twill tell
Whate'er concerns you full as well,
In physic, stolen-goods, or love,
As he himself could when above.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE MORNING. 1709.

Now hardly here and there an hackney coach
Appearing, shew'd the ruddy morn's approach.
Now Betty from her master's bed had flown,
And softly stole to discompose her own;
The slipshod 'prentice from his master's door
Had par'd the dirt, and sprinkled round the floor.
Now Moll had whirl'd her mop with dextrous aire,
Prepar'd to scrub the entry and the stairs.
The youth with broomy stumps began to trace
The kennel's edge, where wheels had worn the place.
The small-coal-man was heard with cadence deep,
Till drown'd in shriller notes of chimney-sweep.
Duns at his Lordship's gate began to meet;
And brick-dust Moll had scream'd through half the
The turnkey now his flock returning fees, [street.
Duly let out a-nights to steal for fees:

A DESCRIPTION OF A CITY-SHOWER.

In Imitation of Virgil's Georgics. 1710.

CAREFUL observers may foretel the hour
(By sure prognostics) when to dread a shower.
While rain depends, the pensive cat gives o'er
Her frolicks, and pursues her tail no more.
Returning home at night, you'll find the sink
Strike your offending sense with double stink.
If you be wise, then go not far to dine;
You'll spend in coach-hire more than save in wine.
A coming shower your shooting corns preface,
Old aches will throb, your hollow tooth will rage.
Sauntering in coffee-house is Dulman seen;
He damns the climate, and complains of spleen.

Mean while the south, rising with dabbled wings,
A fable cloud athwart the welkin flings,
That swill'd more liquor than it could contain,
And, like a drunkard, gives it up again.
Brisk Susan whips her linen from the rope,
While the first drizzling shower is borne aslope:
Such is that sprinkling which some careless quean
Flirts on you from her mop, but not so clean:
You fly, invoke the gods; then, turning, stop
To rail; she, singing, still whirls on her mop.
Not yet the dust had shunn'd th' unequal strife,
But, aided by the wind, fought still for life;
And, wafted with its foe by violent gust,
'Twas doubtful which was rain, and which was dust.
Ah! where must needy poet seek for aid,
When dust and rain at once his coat invade?
Sole coat! where dust cemented by the rain
Erects the nap, and leaves a cloudy stain!

Now in contiguous drops the flood comes down,
Threatening with deluge this devoted town.
To shops in crowds the daggled females fly,
Pretend to cheapen goods, but nothing buy.
The templar spruce, while every spout's abroad,
Stays till 'tis fair, yet seems to call a coach.
The tuck'd-up semstresses walks with hasty strides,
While streams run down her oil'd umbrella's sides.
Here various kinds, by various fortunes led,
Commence acquaintance underneath a shed.
Triumphant Tories and desponding Whigs
Forget their feuds, and join to save their wigs.
Box'd in a chair, the beau impatient sits,
While spouts run clattering o'er the roof by fits,
And ever and anon with frightful din
The leather sounds; he trembles from within.
So when Troy chairmen bore the wooden steed,
Pregnant with Greeks impatient to be freed,
(Those bully Greeks, who, as the moderns do,
Instead of paying chairmen, ran them through)
Laocoon struck the outside with his spear,
And each imprison'd hero quack'd for fear.

Now from all parts the swelling kennels flow,
And bear their trophies with them as they go:
Filths of all hues and odours seem to tell
What street they sail'd from by their sight and smell.
They, as each torrent drives, with rapid force,
From Smithfield or St. Pulchre's shape their course,
And in huge confluence join'd at Snowhill ridge,
And from the conduit prone to Holbourn bridge.

Sweepings from butchers' stalls, dung, guts, and blood,
Drown'd puppies, stinking sprats, all drench'd
in mud,
Dead cats, and turnip-tops, come tumbling down
the flood.

ON THE LITTLE HOUSE BY THE CHURCH-YARD
OF CASTLENOCK. 1710.

WHOEVER pleaseth to inquire
Why yonder steeple wants a spire,
The gray old fellow poet * Joe
The philosophic cause will show.
Once on a time a western blast
At least twelve inches overcast,
Reckoning roof, weathercock, and all,
Which came with a prodigious fall;
And turning topsy-turvy round,
Light with its bottom on the ground;
For, by the laws of gravitation,
It fell into its proper station.

This is the little strutting pile,
You see just by the church-yard stile;
The walls in tumbling gave a knock;
And thus the steeple got a shock;
From whence the neighbouring farmer calls
The steeple, Knock; the vicar, † Walls.

The vicar once a week creeps in,
Sits with his knees up to his chin;
Here conns his notes, and takes a whet,
Till the small ragged flock is met.

A traveller, who by did pass,
Observ'd the roof behind the grass;
On tiptoe stood, and rear'd his snout,
And saw the parson creeping out;
Was much surpris'd to see a crow
Venture to build his nest so low.

A school-boy ran unto 't, and thought,
The crib was down, the blackbird caught.
A third, who lost his way by night,
Was forc'd for safety to alight;
And, stepping o'er the fabric-roof,
His horse had like to spoil his hoof.

Warburton ‡ took it in his noddle,
This building was design'd a model
Or of a pigeon-house or oven,
To bake one loaf, and keep one dove in.

Then Mrs. Johnson § gave her verdict,
And every one was pleas'd that heard it:
All that you make this stir about,
Is but a still which wants a spout.

The reverend Dr. || Raymond guess'd
More probably than all the rest;
He said, but that it wanted room,
It might have been a pigmy's tomb.

The Doctor's family came by,
And little miss began to cry;
Give me that house in my own hand!
Then madam bade the chariot stand,
Call'd to the clerk, in manner mild,
Pray, reach that thing here to the child;

* Mr. Beaumont of Trim.

|| Minister of Trim.

That thing, I mean, among the kale:
And here 's to buy a pot of ale.

The clerk said to her, in a heat,
What! sell my master's country seat,
Where he comes every week from town!
He would not sell it for a crown.
Poh! fellow, keep not such a pother;
In half an hour thou 'lt make another.

Says * Nancy, I can make for miss
A finer house ten times than this;
The Dean will give me willow-sticks,
And Joe my apron-full of bricks.

THE VIRTUES OF

SID HAMET THE MAGICIAN'S ROD. 1710.

THE rod was but a harmless wand,
While Moses held it in his hand;
But, soon as e'er he laid it down,
'Twas a devouring serpent grown.
Our great magician, Hamet Sid,
Reverses what the prophet did:
His rod was honest English wood,
That senseless in a corner stood,
Till, metamorphos'd by his grasp,
It grew an all-devouring asp;
Would hiss, and sting, and roll, and twist,
By the mere virtue of his fist;
But, when he laid it down, as quick
Resum'd the figure of a stick.

So to her midnight-feasts the hag
Rides on a broomstick for a nag,
That, rais'd by magick of her breech,
O'er sea and land conveys the witch;
But with the morning-dawn resumes
The peaceful state of common brooms.

They tell us something strange and odd
About a certain magic rod †,
That, bending down its top, divines
Whene'er the soil has golden mines;
Where there are none, it stands erect,
Scorning to show the least respect.
As ready was the wand of Sid
To bend where golden mines were hid;
In Scottish hills found precious ore ‡,
Where none e'er look'd for it before;
And by a gentle bow divin'd,
How well a cully's purse was lin'd:
To a forlorn and broken rake
Stood without motion, like a stake.

The rod of Hermes was renown'd
For charms above and under ground;
To sleep could mortal eye-lids fix,
And drive departed souls to Styx.
That rod was just a type of Sid's,
Which o'er a British senate's lids
Could scatter opium full as well,
And drive as many souls to hell.

Sid's rod was slender, white, and tall,
Which oft' he us'd to fish withal;
A plaice was fasten'd to the hook,
And many score of gudgeons took:

* The waiting-woman.

† The virgula divina, said to be attracted by minerals.

‡ Supposed to allude to the Union.

Yet still so happy was his fate,
He caught his fish, and sav'd his bait!

Sid's brethren of the conjuring tribe
A circle with their rod describe,
Which proves a magical redoubt
To keep mischievous spirits out.
Sid's rod was of a larger stride,
And made a circle thrice as wide,
Where spirits throng'd with hideous din,
And he stood there to take them in:
But, when th' enchanted rod was broke,
They vanish'd in a stinking smoke.

Achilles' sceptre was of wood,
Like Sid's, but nothing near so good;
That down from ancestors divine
Transmitted to the hero's line,
Thence, through a long descent of kings,
Came an heir-loom, as Homer sings.
Though this description looks so big,
The sceptre was a sapless twig,
Which, from the fatal day, when first
It left the forest where 'twas nurs'd,
As Homer tells us o'er and o'er,
Nor leaf, nor fruit, nor blossom, bore.
Sid's sceptre, full of juice, did shoot
In golden boughs, and golden fruit;
And he, the dragon never sleeping,
Guarded each fair Hesperian pippin.
No bobby-horse, with gorgeous top,
The dearest in Charles Mather's * shop,
Or glittering tinsel of May-fair,
Could with this rod of Sid compare.

Dear Sid, then, why wert thou so mad
To break thy rod like naughty lad!
You should have kiss'd it in your distress,
And then return'd it to your mistress;
Or made it a Newmarket † switch,
And not a rod for thy own breech.
But since old Sid has broken this,
His next may be a rod in pifs.

ATLAS; OR, THE MINISTER OF STATE.

TO THE LORD TREASURER OXFORD, 1710.

ATLAS, we read in ancient song,
Was so exceeding tall and strong,
He bore the skies upon his back,
Just as a pedlar does his pack:
But, as a pedlar overpress'd
Unloads upon a stall to rest;
Or, when he can no longer stand,
Desires a friend to lend a hand;
So Atlas, lest the ponderous spheres
Should sink, and fall about his ears,
Got Hercules to bear the pile,
That he might sit and rest a while.

Yet Hercules was not so strong,
Nor could have borne it half so long.

Great statesmen are in this condition;
And Atlas is a politician,
A premier minister of state;
Alcides one of second rate.

* An eminent toyman in Fleet-street.

† Lord Godolphin is satirised by Mr. Pope for strong attachment to the turf. See his Moral Essays.

Suppose then Atlas ne'er so wise;
Yet, when the weight of kingdoms lies
Too long upon his single shoulders,
Sink down he must, or find upholders.

A TOWN ECLOGUE. 1710.

SCENE, THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

Corydon.

Now the keen rigour of the winter's o'er,
No hail descends, and frosts can pinch no more;
Whilst other girls confess the genial spring,
And laugh aloud, or amorous ditties sing,
Secure from cold their lovely necks display,
And throw each useless chafing-dish away;
Why sits my Phillis discontented here,
Nor feels the turn of the revolving year?
Why on that brow dwell sorrow and dismay,
Where loves were wont to sport, and smiles to
play!

Phillis. Ah, Corydon! survey the 'Change
Through all the 'Change no wretch like me is found:

Alas! the day, when I, poor heedless maid,
Was to your rooms in Lincoln's-Inn betray'd;
Then how you swore, how many vows you made!
Ye listening zephyrs, that o'erheard his love,
Waft the soft accents to the Gods above.
Alas! the day; for (oh, eternal shame!)
I sold you handkerchiefs, and lost my fame.

Cor. When I forget the favour you bestow'd,
Red herrings shall be spawn'd in Tyburn Road,
Fleet-street transform'd become a flowery green,
And masts be sung where operas are seen;
The wealthy cit, and the St. James's beau,
Shall change their quarters, and their joys forego;
Stock-jobbing this to Jonathan's shall come,
At the Groom Porter's that play off his plum.

Phil. But what to me does all that love avail,
If, while I doze at home o'er porter's ale,
Each night with wine and wenches you regale?
My live-long hours in anxious cares are past,
And raging hunger lays my beauty waste.
On templars spruce in vain I glances throw,
And with shrill voice invite them as they go.
Expos'd in vain my glossy ribbands shine,
And unregarded wave upon the twine.
The week flies round; and, when my profit's
known,

I hardly clear enough to change a crown.
Cor. Hard fate of virtue, thus to be distressed,
Thou fairest of thy trade, and far the best!
As fruitmen's stalls the summer-market grace,
And ruddy peaches them; as first in place
Pum-cake is seen o'er smaller pastry ware;
And ice on that; so Phillis does appear
In play-house and in park, above the rest
Of belles mechanic, elegantly drest.

Phil. And yet Crepundia, that conceited fair,
Amidst her toys, affects a saucy air,
And views me hourly with a scornful eye.

Cor. She might as well with bright Cleora vie.

Phil. With this large petticoat I strive in vain
To hide my folly past, and coming pain:
'Tis now no secret; she, and fifty more,
Observe the symptoms I had once before:

Vol. IX.

A second babe at Wapping must be plac'd,
When I scarce bear the charges of the last.

Cor. What I could raise I sent; a pound of
plums,

Five shillings, and a coral for his gums;
To morrow I intend him something more.

Phil. I sent a frock and pair of shoes before.

Cor. However, you shall home with me to-night,
Forget your cares, and revel in delight.

I have in store a pint or two of wine,
Some cracknels, and the remnant of a chine.

And now on either side, and all around,
The weighty shop-boards fall and bars resound;
Each ready sempstress slips her pattens on,
And ties her hood, preparing to be gone.

THE FABLE OF MIDAS. 1711.

MIDAS, we are in story told,
Turn'd every thing he touch'd to gold:

B

That thing, I mean, among the kale:
And here 's to buy a pot of ale.

The clerk said to her, in a heat,
What! sell my master's country seat,
Where he comes every week from town!
He would not sell it for a crown.
Poh! fellow, keep not such a pother;
In half an hour thou 'lt make another.
Says * Nancy, I can make for miss
A finer house ten times than this;
The Dean will give me willow-sticks,
And Joe my apron-full of bricks.

THE VIRTUES OF

SID HAMET THE MAGICIAN'S ROD. 1710.

THE rod was but a harmless wand,
While Moses held it in his hand;
But, soon as e'er he laid it down,
'Twas a devouring serpent grown.
Our great magician, Hamet Sid,
Reverses what the prophet did:
His rod was honest English wood,
That senseless in a corner stood,
Till, metamorphos'd by his grasp,
It grew an all-devouring asp;
Would hiss, and sting, and roll, and twist,
By the mere virtue of his fist;
But, when he laid it down, as quick
Resum'd the figure of a stick.

So to her midnight-feasts the hag
Rides on a broomstick for a nag,
That, rais'd by magick of her breech,
O'er sea and land conveys the witch;
But with the morning-dawn resumes
The peaceful state of common brooms.

They tell us something strange and odd
About a certain magic rod †,
That, bending down its top, divines
Whene'er the soil has golden mines;
Where there are none, it stands erect,
Scorning to show the least respect.
As ready was the wand of Sid
To bend where golden mines were hid;
In Scottish hills found precious ore †,
Where none e'er look'd for it before;
And by a gentle bow divin'd,
How well a cully's purse was lin'd:
To a forlorn and broken rake
Stood without motion, like a stake.

The rod of Hermes was renown'd
For charms above and under ground;
To sleep could mortal eye-lids fix,
And drive departed souls to Styx.
That rod was just a type of Sid's,
Which o'er a British senate's lids
Could scatter opium full as well,
And drive as many souls to hell.

Sid's rod was slender, white, and tall,
Which oft' he us'd to fish withal;
A plaiice was fasten'd to the hook,
And many score of gudgeons took:

* The waiting-woman.

† The virgula divina said to be attracted by minerals.

‡ Supposed to allude to the Union.

Yet still so happy was his fate,

He caught his fish, and sav'd his bait!

Sid's brethren of the conjuring tribe
A circle with their rod describe,
Which proves a magical redoubt
To keep mischievous spirits out.
Sid's rod was of a larger stride,
And made a circle thrice as wide,
Where spirits throng'd with hideous din,
And he stood there to take them in:
But, when th' enchanted rod was broke,
They vanish'd in a stinking smoke.

Achilles' sceptre was of wood,
Like Sid's, but nothing near so good;
That down from ancestors divine
Transmitted to the hero's line,
Thence, through a long descent of kings,
Came an heir-loom, as Homer sings.
Though this description looks so big,
The sceptre was a sapless twig,
Which, from the fatal day, when first
It left the forest where 'twas nurs'd,
As Homer tells us o'er and o'er,
Nor leaf, nor fruit, nor blossom, bore.
Sid's sceptre, full of juice, did shoot
In golden boughs, and golden fruit;
And he, the dragon never sleeping,
Guarded each fair Hesperian pippin.
No hobby-horse, with gorgeous top,
The dearest in Charles Mather's * shop,
Or glittering tinsel of May-fair,
Could with this rod of Sid compare.

Dear Sid, then, why wert thou so mad
To break thy rod like naughty lad!
You should have kiss'd it in your distress,
And then return'd it to your mistress;
Or made it a Newmarket † switch,
And not a rod for thy own breech.
But since old Sid has broken this,
His next may be a rod in pifs.

ATLAS; OR, THE MINISTER OF STATE.

TO THE LORD TREASURER OXFORD, 1710.

ATLAS, we read in ancient song,
Was so exceeding tall and strong,
He bore the skies upon his back,
Just as a pedlar does his pack:
But, as a pedlar overpress'd
Unloads upon a stall to rest;
Or, when he can no longer stand,
Desires a friend to lend a hand;
So Atlas, lest the ponderous spheres
Should sink, and fall about his ears,
Got Hercules to bear the pile,
That he might sit and rest a while.

Yet Hercules was not so strong,
Nor could have borne it half so long.

Great statesmen are in this condition;
And Atlas is a politician,
A premier minister of state;
Alcides one of second rate.

* An eminent toyman in Fleet-street.

† Lord Godolphin is satirised by Mr. Pope for strong attachment to the turf. See his Moral Essays.

Suppose then Atlas ne'er so wise;
Yet, when the weight of kingdoms lies
Too long upon his single shoulders,
Sink down he must, or find upholders.

A TOWN ECLOGUE. 1710.

SCENE, THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

Corydon.

Now the keen rigour of the winter's o'er,
No hail descends, and frosts can pinch no more;
Whilst other girls confess the genial spring,
And laugh aloud, or amorous ditties sing,
Secure from cold their lovely necks display,
And throw each useless chafing-dish away;
Why sits my Phillis discontented here,
Nor feels the turn of the revolving year?
Why on that brow dwell sorrow and dismay,
Where loves were wont to sport, and smiles to
play!

Phillis. Ah, Corydon! survey the 'Change
Through all the 'Change no wretch like me is
found:

Alas! the day, when I, poor heedless maid,
Was to your rooms in Lincoln's-Inn betray'd;
Then how you swore, how many vows you made!
Ye listening zephyrs, that o'erheard his love,
Waft the soft accents to the Gods above.
Alas! the day; for (oh, eternal shame!)
I sold you handkerchiefs, and lost my fame.

Cor. When I forget the favour you bestow'd,
Red herrings shall be spawn'd in Tyburn Road,
Fleet-street transform'd become a flowery green,
And masts be sung where operas are seen;
The wealthy cit, and the St. James's beau,
Shall change their quarters, and their joys forego;
Stock-jobbing this to Jonathan's shall come,
At the Groom Porter's that play off his plum.

Phil. But what to me does all that love avail,
If, while I doze at home o'er porter's ale,
Each night with wine and wenches you regale?
My live-long hours in anxious cares are past,
And raging hunger lays my beauty waste.
On templars spruce in vain I glances throw,
And with shrill voice invite them as they go.
Expos'd in vain my glossy ribbands shine,
And unregarded wave upon the twine.
The week flies round; and, when my profit's
known,

I hardly clear enough to change a crown.

Just as a pedlar does his pack:
But, as a pedlar overpress'd
Unloads upon a stall to rest;
Or, when he can no longer stand,
Desires a friend to lend a hand;
So Atlas, lest the ponderous spheres
Should sink, and fall about his ears,
Got Hercules to bear the pile,
That he might sit and rest a while.

Yet Hercules was not so strong,
Nor could have borne it half so long.
Great statesmen are in this condition;
And Atlas is a politician,
A premier minister of state;
Alcides one of second rate.

* An eminent toyman in Fleet-street.

† Lord Godolphin is satirised by Mr. Pope for a strong attachment to the turf. See his Moral Essays.

Suppose then Atlas ne'er so wise;
Yet, when the weight of kingdoms lies
Too long upon his single shoulders,
Sink down he must, or find upholders.

A TOWN ECLOGUE. 1710.

SCENE, THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

Corydon.

Now the keen rigour of the winter's o'er,
No hail descends, and frosts can pinch no more;
Whilst other girls confess the genial spring,
And laugh aloud, or amorous ditties sing,
Secure from cold their lovely necks display,
And throw each useless chafing-dish away;
Why sits my Phillis discontented here;
Nor feels the turn of the revolving year?
Why on that brow dwell sorrow and dismay,
Where loves were wont to sport, and smiles to
play!

Phillis. Ah, Corydon! survey the 'Change
Through all the 'Change no wretch like me is
found:

Alas! the day, when I, poor heedless maid,
Was to your rooms in Lincoln's-Inn betray'd;
Then how you swore, how many vows you made!
Ye listening zephyrs, that o'erheard his love,
Waft the soft accents to the Gods above.
Alas! the day; for (oh, eternal shame!)
I sold you handkerchiefs, and lost my fame.

Cor. When I forget the favour you bestow'd,
Red herrings shall be spawn'd in Tyburn Road,
Fleet-street transform'd become a flowery green,
And masts be sung where operas are seen;
The wealthy cit, and the St. James's beau,
Shall change their quarters, and their joys forego;
Stock-jobbing this to Jonathan's shall come,
At the Groom Porter's that play off his plum.

Phil. But what to me does all that love avail,
If, while I doze at home o'er porter's ale,
Each night with wine and wenches you regale?
My live-long hours in anxious cares are past,
And raging hunger lays my beauty waste.
On templars spruce in vain I glances throw,
And with shrill voice invite them as they go.
Expos'd in vain my glossy ribbands shine,
And unregarded wave upon the twine.
The week flies round; and, when my profit's
known,

I hardly clear enough to change a crown.

Cor. Hard fate of virtue, thus to be distressed,
Thou fairest of thy trade, and far the best!
As fruitmen's stalls the summer-market grace,
And ruddy peaches them; as first in place
Frum-cake is seen o'er smaller pastry ware,
And ice on that; so Phillis does appear
In play-house and in park, above the rest
Of belles mechanic, elegantly drest.

Phil. And yet Crepundia, that conceited fair,
Amidst her toys, affects a saucy air,
And views me hourly with a scornful eye.

Cor. She might as well with bright Cleora vie.

Phil. With this large petticoat I strive in vain
To hide my folly past, and coming pain:
'Tis now no secret; she, and fifty more,
Observe the symptoms I had once before:

VOL. IX.

A second babe at Wapping must be plac'd,
When I scarce bear the charges of the last.

Cor. What I could raise I sent; a pound of
plums,

Five shillings, and a coral for his gums;
To morrow I intend him something more.

Phil. I sent a frock and pair of shoes before.

Cor. However, you shall home with me to-night,
Forget your cares, and revel in delight.

I have in store a pint or two of wine,
Some cracknels, and the remnant of a chine.

And now on either side, and all around,
The weighty shop-boards fall and bars resound;
Each ready sempstress slips her pattens on,
And ties her hood, preparing to be gone.

THE FABLE OF MIDAS. 1711.

MIDAS, we are in story told,

Turn'd every thing he touch'd to gold:

B

That thing, I mean, among the kale:
And here 's to buy a pot of ale.

The clerk said to her, in a heat,
What! sell my master's country seat,
Where he comes every week from town!
He would not sell it for a crown.
Poh! fellow, keep not such a pother;
In half an hour thou 'lt make another.
Says * Nancy, I can make for miss
A finer house ten times than this;
The Dean will give me willow-sticks,
And Joe my apron-full of bricks.

THE VIRTUES OF

SID HAMET THE MAGICIAN'S ROD. 1710.

THE rod was but a harmless wand;
While Moses held it in his hand;
But, soon as e'er he laid it down,
'Twas a devouring serpent grown.
Our great magician, Hamet Sid,
Reverses what the prophet did:
His rod was honest English wood,
That senseless in a corner stood,
Till, metamorphos'd by his grasp,
It grew an all-devouring asp;
Would hiss, and sting, and roll, and twist,
By the mere virtue of his fist;
But, when he laid it down, as quick
Resum'd the figure of a stick.

So to her midnight-feasts the hag
Rides on a broomstick for a nag,
That, rais'd by magick of her breech,
O'er sea and land conveys the witch;
But with the morning-dawn resumes
The peaceful state of common brooms.
They tell us something strange and odd
About a certain magic rod †,

That, bending down its top, divines
Whene'er the soil has golden mines;
Where there are none, it stands erect,
Scorning to show the least respect.
As ready was the wand of Sid
To bend where golden mines were hid;
In Scottish hills found precious ore ‡,
Where none e'er look'd for it before;
And by a gentle bow divin'd,
How well a cully's purse was lin'd:
To a forlorn and broken rake
Stood without motion, like a stake.

The rod of Hermes was renown'd
For charms above and under ground;
To sleep could mortal eye-lids fix,
And drive departed souls to Styx.
That rod was just a type of Sid's,
Which o'er a British senate's lids
Could scatter opium full as well,
And drive as many souls to hell.

Sid's rod was slender, white, and tall,
Which oft' he us'd to fish withal;
A *plai*ce was fasten'd to the hook,
And many score of gudgeons took:

* The waiting-woman.

† The virgula divina, said to be attracted by minerals.

‡ Supposed to allude to the Union.

Yet still so happy was his fate,
He caught his fish, and sav'd his bait!

Sid's brethren of the conjuring tribe
A circle with their rod describe,
Which proves a magical redoubt
To keep mischievous spirits out.
Sid's rod was of a larger stride,
And made a circle thrice as wide,
Where spirits throng'd with hideous din,
And he stood there to take them in:
But, when th' enchanted rod was broke,
They vanish'd in a stinking smoke.

Achilles' sceptre was of wood,
Like Sid's, but nothing near so good;
That down from ancestors divine
Transmitted to the hero's line,
Thence, through a long descent of kings,
Came an beir-loom, as Homer sings.
Though this description looks so big,
The sceptre was a sapless twig,
Which, from the fatal day, when first
It left the forest where 'twas nurs'd,
As Homer tells us o'er and o'er,
Nor leaf, nor fruit, nor blossom, bore.
Sid's sceptre, full of juice, did shoot
In golden boughs, and golden fruit;
And he, the dragon never sleeping,
Guarded each fair Hesperian pippin.
No bobby-horse, with gorgeous top,
The dearest in Charles Mather's * shop,
Or glittering tinsel of May-fair,
Could with this rod of Sid compare.

Dear Sid, then, why wert thou so mad
To break thy rod like naughty lad!
You should have kiss'd it in your distress,
And then return'd it to your mistress;
Or made it a Newmarket † switch,
And not a rod for thy own breech.
But since old Sid has broken this,
His next may be a rod in pifs.

THE FABLE OF MIDAS. 1711.

MIDAS, we are in story told,
Turn'd every thing he touch'd to gold:

B

He chip'd his beard; the pieces round
 Glitter'd like spangles on the ground:
 A codling, ere it went his lip in,
 Would straight become a golden pippin:
 He call'd for drink; you saw him sup
Potable gold on golden cup:
 His empty paunch that he might fill,
 He suck'd his victuals through a quill:
 Untouch'd it pass'd between his grinders,
 Or 't had been happy for gold-finders:
 He cock'd his hat, you would have said
 Mambrino's helm adorn'd his head:
 Whene'er he chanc'd his hands to lay
 On magazines of corn or bay,
Gold ready coin'd appear'd, instead
 Of paltry provender and bread;
 Hence by wise farmers we are told,
Old bay is equal to old gold;
 And hence a critic deep maintains,
 We learn'd to weigh our gold by grains.

This fool had got a lucky bit;
 And people fancy'd he had wit.
 Two gods their skill in music try'd,
 And both chose Midas to decide:
 He against Phœbus' harp decreed,
 And gave it for Pan's oaten reed:
 The god of wit, to show his grudge,
 Clapt asses' ears upon the judge;
 A goodly pair erect and wide,
 Which he could neither gild nor hide.
 And now the virtue of his hands
 Was lost among Pætolus' sands,
 Against whose torrent while he swims,
 The golden scurf peels off his limbs:
 Fame spreads the news, and people travel
 From far to gather golden gravel;
 Midas, expos'd to all their jeers,
 Had lost his art, and kept his ears.

This tale inclines the gentle reader
 To think upon a certain leader;
 To whom, from Midas down, descends,
 That virtue in the finger's ends.
 What else by perquisites are meant,
 By pensions, bribes, and three per cent.
 By places and commissions sold,
 And turning dung itself to gold?
 By starving in the midst of store,
 As rother Midas did before?

None e'er did modern Midas choose,
 Subject or patron of his Muse,
 But found him thus their merit scan,
 That Phœbus must give place to Pan:
 He values not the poet's praise,
 Nor will exchange his plums for bays.
 To Pan alone rich miser's call;
 And there's the jest, for Pan is ALL.
 Here English wits will be to seek,
 Howe'er, 'tis all one in the Greek.

Besides, it plainly now appears
 Our Midas too hath asses' ears;
 Where every fool his mouth applies,
 And whispers in a thousand lies:
 Such gross delusions could not pass
 Through any ears but of an ass.

But gold defiles with frequent touch;
 There's nothing fouls the hand so much:

And scholars give it for the cause
 Of British Midas' dirty paws;
 Which while the senate strove to scour,
 They wash'd away the chemic power.

While he his utmost strength apply'd,
 To swim against this popular tide,
 The golden spoils flew off apace;
 Here fell a pension, there a place;
 The torrent merciless imbibes
Commissions, perquisites, and bribes,
 By their own weight sunk to the bottom;
Much good may do them that have caught 'em!
 And Midas now neglected stands,
 With asses' ears, and dirty hands.

AN EXCELLENT NEW SONG. 1711.

BEING THE INTENDED SPEECH OF A FAMOUS ORATOR AGAINST PEACE*.

AN Orator dismal of Nottinghamshire,
 Who has forty years let out his conscience to hire,
 Out of zeal for his country, and want of a place,
 Is come up, vi & armis, to break the Queen's peace.
 He has vamp'd an old speech; and the court, to their sorrow,
 Shall hear him harangue against Prior to-morrow.
 When once he begins, he never will flinch,
 But repeats the same note a whole day, like a Finch.

I have heard all the speech repeated by Hoppy,
 And, "Mistakes to prevent, I've obtained a "copy."

THE SPEECH.

Whereas, notwithstanding, I am in great pain,
 To hear we are making a peace without Spain;
 But, most noble Senators, 'tis a great shame
 There should be a peace, while I'm Not-in-game.
 The Duke show'd me all his fine house; and the Duchess

From her closet brought out a full purse in her clutches.

I talk'd of a peace, and they both gave a start;
 His grace swore by G—d, and her grace let a f—t:

My long old-fashion'd pocket was presently cramm'd

And sooner than vote for a peace I'll be damn'd.

But some will cry Turn-coat, and rip up old stories,

How I always pretended to be for the Tories.
 I answer; the Tories were in my good graces,
 Till all my relations were put into places:
 But still I'm in principle ever the same,
 And will quit my best friends, while I'm Nct-
in-game.

When I and some others subscribed our names
 To a plot for expelling my master King James;
 I withdrew my subscription by help of a blot,
 And so might discover or gain by the plot:
 I had my advantage, and stood at defiance,
 For Daniel was got from the den of the lions:

* The Lord Treasurer having hinted a wish one evening that a ballad might be made on the Earl of Nottingham, this song was written and printed the next morning.

I came in without danger, and was I to blame?
For, rather than hang, I would be Not-in-game.
I swore to the Queen, that the Prince of Hanover

During her sacred life would never come over:
I made use of a trope; that "an heir to invite,
" Was like keeping her monument always in
" fight."

But, when I thought proper, I alter'd my note;
And in her own hearing I boldly did vote,
That her Majesty stood in great need of a Tutor,
And must have an old or a young Coadjutor:
For why; I would fain have put all in a flame,
Because, for some reasons, I was Not-in-game.

Now my new benefactors have brought me about,
And I'll vote against Peace, with Spain, or without Though the Court gives my nephews, and bro- thers, and cousins,

And all my whole family, places by dozens;
Yet, since I know where a full-purse may be found,
And hardly pay eighteen-pence tax in the pound;
Since the Tories have thus disappointed my hopes,
And will neither regard my figures nor tropes;
I'll speech against peace while Dismal's my name,
And be a true Whig, while I am Not-in-game.

THE WINDSOR PROPHECY. 1711.

WHEN a holy black Swede, the son of Bob*,
With a saint† at his chin, and a seal‡ at his fob,
Shall not see one † New-year's-day in that year,
Then let old England make good cheer:
Windsor § and Bristol § then shall be
Join'd together in the Low-coun-tree §.
Then shall the tall black Daventry Bird ||
Speak against peace right many a word;
And some shall admire his conying wit,
For many good groats his tongue shall slit.
But, spight of the Harpy that crawls on all four,
There shall be peace, pardie, and war no more.
But England must cry alack and well-a-day,
If the stick be taken from the dead sea.
And, dear England, if aught I understand,
Beware of Carrots  from Northumberland.
Carrots sown Thynne †† a deep root may get,
If so be they are in Somer set:

* Dr. John Robinson, bishop of Bristol, one of the plenipotentiaries at Utrecht.

† He was dean of Windsor, and lord privy-seal.

‡ The bishop set out from England the latter end of December, O. S.; and on his arrival at Utrecht, by the variation of the style, he found
January somewhat advanced.

§ Alluding to the deanery and bishoprick being possessed by the same person, then at Utrecht.

|| Earl of Nottingham.

 The Duchess of Somerset.

†† Thomas Thynne, of Longleat, Esq. a gentleman of very great estate, married the above lady after the death of her first husband, Henry Cavendish, Earl of Ogle, only son to Henry Duke of Newcastle, to whom she had been betrothed in her infancy.

Their * Conyngs mark thou; for I have been told,
They assassine when young, and poison when old.
Root out these Carrots, O thou †, whose name
Is backwards and forwards always the same;
And keep close to thee always that name,
Which backwards and forwards ‡ is almost the same.

And, England, would'st thou be happy still,
Bury those Carrots under a Hill §.

EPIGRAM EXTEMPORE,

BY DR. SWIFT ||.

ON Britain Europe's safety lies;
Britain is lost if Harley dies:
Harley depends upon your skill;
Think what you save, or what you kill.

EPIGRAM. 1712.

As Thomas was cudgel'd one day by his wife,
He took to the street, and fled for his life:
Tom's three dearest friends came by in the squabble, [rabble;
And sav'd him at once from the shrew and the
Then ventur'd to give him some sober advice—
But Tom is a person of honour so nice,
Too wise to take counsel, too proud to take warning, [ing:
That he sent to all three a challenge next morn-
Three duels he fought, thrice ventur'd his life;
Went home, and was cudgel'd again by his wife.

CORINNA. 1712.

This day (the year I dare not tell)
Apollo play'd the midwife's part;
Into the world Corinna fell,
And he endow'd her with his art.
But Cupid with a Satyr comes:
Both softly to the cradle creep;
Both stroke her hands, and rub her gums,
While the poor child lay fast asleep.
Then Cupid thus: This little maid,
Of love shall always speak and write.
And I pronounce (the Satyr said)
The world shall feel her scratch and bite.
Her talent she display'd betimes;
For in twice twelve revolving moons,
She seem'd to laugh and squall in rhymes,
And all her gestures were lampoons.
At six years old the subtle jade
Stole to the pantry door, and found
The butler with my lady's maid:
And you may swear the tale went round.

* Count Koningmark.

† Anna.

‡ Masbam.

§ Lady Masbam's maiden name was Hill.

|| Inscribed to the physician who attended Mr.
Harley whilst he lay wounded.

She made a song, how little miss
Was kiss'd and slobber'd by a lad:
And how, when master went to p---,
Miss came, and peep'd at all he had.

At twelve a wit and a coquette;
Marries for love, half whore, half wife;
Cuckolds, elopes, and runs in debt;
Turns authoress, and is Curll's for life.

TOLAND'S INVITATION TO DISMAL,

TO DINE WITH THE CALVES-HEAD CLUB *.

Imitated from Horace, Lib. I. Epist. 5.

Ir, dearest Dismal, you for once can dine
Upon a single dish, and tavern-wine,
Toland to you this invitation sends,
To eat the calves-head with your trusty friends.
Suspend awhile your vain ambitious hopes,
Leave hunting after bribes, forget your tropes.
To-morrow we our mystic feast prepare,
Where thou, our latest profelyte, shalt share:
When we, by proper signs and symbols, tell,
How, by brave hands, the royal traitor fell;
The meat shall represent the tyrant's head,
The wine his blood our predecessors shed;
Whilst an alluding hymn some artist sings,
We toast, "Confusion to the race of kings!"
At monarchy we nobly show our spight,
And talk what fools call treason all the night.

Who, by disgraces or ill-fortune sunk,
Feels not his soul enliven'd when he's drunk?
Wine can clear up Godolphin's cloudy face,
And fill Jack Smith with hopes to keep his place:
By force of wine, ev'n Scarborough is brave,
Hal grows more pert, and Somers not so grave;
Wine can give Portland wit, and Cleveland sense,
Montague learning, Bolton eloquence:

PEACE AND DUNKIRK:

BEING AN EXCELLENT NEW SONG UPON THE SURRENDER OF DUNKIRK TO GENERAL HILL.
1712.

*To the Tune of "The King shall enjoy his own
"again."*

SPIGHT of Dutch friends and English foes,
Poor Britain shall have peace at last:
Holland got towns, and we got blows;
But Dunkirk 's ours, we 'll hold it fast:
We have got it in a string,
And the Whigs may all go swing,
For among good friends I love to be plain;
All their false deluded hopes
Will or ought to end in ropes:
But the Queen shall enjoy her own again.

Sunderland's run out of his wits,
And Dismal double-Dismal looks;
Wharton can only swear by fits,
And strutting Hal is off the hooks;
Old Godolphin full of spleen
Made false moves, and lost his queen;
Harry look'd fierce, and shook his ragged mane:
But a Prince of high renown
Swore he 'd rather lose a crown,
Than the Queen should enjoy her own again.

Our merchant-ships may cut the Line,
And not be snapt by privateers;
And commoners who love good wine,
Will drink it now as well as peers:
Landed-men shall have their rent,
Yet our stocks rise cent. per cent.
The Dutch from hence shall no more millions
drain:
We 'll bring on us no more debts,
Nor with bankrupts fill Gazettes;
And the Queen shall enjoy her own again.

The towns we took ne'er did us good:
What signified the French to beat?
We spent our money and our blood,
To make the Dutchmen proud and great:
But the Lord of Oxford swears,
Dunkirk never shall be theirs.
The Dutch-hearted Whigs may rail and complain;
But true Englishmen may fill
A good health to General Hill;
For the Queen now enjoys her own again.

HORACE, BOOK I. EP. VII.

ADDRESS'D TO THE EARL OF OXFORD. 1713.

HARLEY, the nation's great support,
Returning home one day from court,
(His mind with public cares possess'd,
All Europe's business in his breast)

Observ'd a parson near Whitehall
Cheapening old authors on a stall.
The priest was pretty well in case,
And show'd some humour in his face;
Look'd with an easy, careless mien,
A perfect stranger to the spleen;
Of size that might a pulpit fill,
But more inclining to sit still.
My Lord (who, if a man may say 't, Loves mischief better than his meat)
Was now dispos'd to crack a jest,
And bid friend Lewis * go in quest,
(This Lewis is a cunning shaver,
And very much in Harley's favour)
In quest who might this parson be,
What was his name, of what degree;
If possible, to learn his story,
And whether he were Whig or Tory.

Lewis his patron's humour knows,
Away upon his errand goes,
And quickly did the matter sift;
Found out that it was Doctor Swift,
A clergyman of special note
For shunning those of his own coat;
Which made his brethren of the gown
Take care betimes to run him down:
No libertine, nor over nice,
Addicted to no sort of vice,
Went where he pleas'd, said what he thought;
Not rich, but ow'd no man a groat:
In state opinions à la mode,
He hated Wharton like a toad,
Had given the faction many a wound,
And libel'd all the junto round;
Kept company with men of wit,
Who often father'd what he writ:
His works were hawk'd in every street,
But seldom rose above a sheet:
Of late indeed the paper-stamp
Did very much his genius cramp:
And since he could not spend his fire,
He now intended to retire.

Said Harley, "I desire to know
From his own mouth if this be so;
Step to the Doctor straight, and say,
"I'd have him dine with me to-day."
Swift seem'd to wonder what he meant,
Nor would believe my Lord had sent;
So never offer'd once to stir;
But coldly said, "Your servant, Sir!"
"Does he refuse me?" Harley cry'd;
"He does, with insolence and pride."

Some few days after, Harley spies
The Doctor fasten'd by the eyes
At Charing-cross among the rout,
Where painted monsters are hung out:
He pull'd the string, and stopt his coach,
Beckoning the Doctor to approach.

Swift, who could neither fly nor hide,
Came sneaking to the chariot side,
And offer'd many a lame excuse:
He never meant the least abuse---
"My Lord---the honour you design'd---
"Extremely proud---but I had din'd---

* Erasmus Lewis, Esq. the treasurer's secretary.

"I'm sure I never should neglect---
"No man alive has more respect---"
"Well, I shall think of that no more,
"If you'll be sure to come at four."
The Doctor now obeys the summons,
Likes both his company and commons;
Displays his talent, sits till ten;
Next day invited comes again;
Soon grows domestic, seldom fails
Either at morning or at meals:
Came early, and departed late;
In short, the gudgeon took the bait.
My Lord would carry on the jest,
And down to Windsor takes his guest.
Swift much admires the place and air,
And longs to be a canon there;
In summer round the park to ride;
In winter, never to reside.

A canon! that's a place too mean;
No Doctor, you shall be a Dean;
Two dozen canons round your stall,
And you the tyrant o'er them all:
You need but cross the Irish seas,
To live in plenty, power, and ease.
Poor Swift departs; and, what is worse,
With borrow'd money in his purse,
Travels at least an hundred leagues,
And suffers numberless fatigues.

Suppose him now a Dean complete,
Demurely lolling in his seat;
The silver verge, with decent pride,
Stuck underneath his cushion-side:
Suppose him gone through all vexations,
Patents, instalments, abjurations,
First-fruits and tenths, and chapter-treats;
Dues, payments, fees, demands, and cheats---
(The wicked laity's contriving
To hinder clergymen from thriving).
Now all the Doctor's money's spent,
His tenants wrong him in his rent;
The farmers, spitefully combin'd,
Force him to take his tithes in kind:
And Parvifol * discounts arrears
By bills for taxes and repairs.

Poor Swift, with all his losses vex'd,
Not knowing where to turn him next,
Above a thousand pounds in debt,
Takes horie, and in a mighty fret
Rides day and night at such a rate,
He soon arrives at Harley's gate;
But was so dirty, pale, and thin,
Old Read † would hardly let him in.

Said Harley, "Welcome, Reverend Dean!
"What makes your worship look so lean?
"Why, sure you won't appear in town
"In that old wig and rusty gown?
"I doubt your heart is set on pelf
"So much, that you neglect yourself.
"What! I suppose, now stocks are high
"You've some good purchase in your eye?
"Or is your money out at use?"---
"Truce, good my Lord, I beg a truce,"
(The Doctor in a passion cry'd)
"Your raillery is misapply'd;

* The Dean's agent, a Frenchman.

† The Lord Treasurer's porter.

" Experience I have dearly bought ;
 " You know I am not worth a groat :
 " But you resolv'd to have your jest ;
 " And 'twas a folly to contest ;
 " Then, since you have now done your worst,
 " Pray leave me where you found me first."

HORACE, BOOK II. SAT. VI.

I've often wish'd that I had clear,
 For life, six hundred pounds a-year,
 A handsome house to lodge a friend,
 A river at my garden's end,
 A terrace walk, and half a rood
 Of land set out to plant a wood.

Well, now I have all this and more,
 I ask not to increase my store ;
 ' But here a grievance seems to lie,
 ' All this is mine but till I die ;
 ' I can't but think 'twould sound more clever,
 ' To me and to my heirs for ever.
 ' If I ne'er got or lost a groat,
 ' By any trick, or any fault ;
 ' And if I pray by reason's rules,
 ' And not like forty other fools :
 ' As thus, " Vouchsafe, oh gracious Maker !
 " To grant me this and t'other acre ;
 " Or, if it be thy will and pleasure,
 " Direct my plough to find a treasure !"
 ' But only what my station fits.
 ' And to be kept in my right wits,
 ' Preserve, Almighty Providence !
 ' Just what you gave me, competence :
 ' And let me in these shades compose
 ' Something in verse as true as prose ;
 ' Remov'd from all th' ambitious scene,
 ' Nor puff'd by pride, nor sunk by spleen."

In short, I'm perfectly content,
 Let me but live on this side Trent ;
 Nor cross the Channel twice a year,
 To spend six months with statesmen here.

I must by all means come to town,
 'Tis for the service of the Crown.
 " Lewis, the Dean will be of use ;
 " Send for him up, take no excuse."
 The toil, the danger of the seas,
 Great Ministers ne'er think of these ;
 Or let it cost five hundred pound,
 No matter where the money's found,
 It is but so much more in debt,
 And that they ne'er consider'd yet.

" Good Mr. Dean, go change your gown,
 " Let my Lord know you're come to town."
 I hurry me in haste away,
 Not thinking it is levee-day ;
 And find his honour in a pound,
 Hemm'd by a triple circle round,
 Chequer'd with ribbons blue and green :
 How should I thrust myself between ?
 Some wag observes me thus perplex'd,
 And, smiling, whispers to the next,
 " I thought the Dean had been too proud,
 " To juggle here among the crowd !"
 Another, in a surly fit,
 Tells me I have more zeal than wit,
 " So eager to express your love,
 " You ne'er consider whom you shove.

" But rudely press before a duke."
 I own, I'm pleas'd with this rebuke,
 And take it kindly meant, to show
 What I desire the world should know.

I get a whisper, and withdraw ;
 When twenty fools I never saw
 Come with petitions fairly penn'd,
 Desiring I would stand their friend.

This humbly offers me his case---
 That begs my interest for a place---
 A hundred other men's affairs,
 Like bees, are humming in my ears.

" To-morrow my appeal comes on ;
 " Without your help the cause is gone---"

The duke expects my lord and you,
 About some great affair, at two---

" Put my Lord Bolingbroke in mind,

" To get my warrant quickly sign'd :

" Consider, 'tis my first request."---

Be satisfy'd, I'll do my best.

Then presently he falls to teaze,

" You may for certain, if you please :

" I doubt not, if his lordship knew---

" And, Mr. Dean, one word from you---

'Tis (let me see) three years and more,

(October next it will be four)

Since Harley bid me first attend,

And chose me for an humble friend ;

Would take me in his coach to chat,

And question me of this and that ;

As, " What's o'clock ? And, " How's the wind ?"

" Whose chariot's that we left behind ?"

Or gravely try to read the lines

Writ underneath the country signs ;

Or, " Have you nothing new to-day

" From Pope, from Parnell, or from Gay ?"

Such tattle often entertains

My lord and me as far as Staipes,

As once a week we travel down

To Windsor, and again to town,

Where all that passes inter nos

Might be proclaim'd at Charing-cross.

Yet some I know with envy swell,

Because they see me us'd so well :

" How think you of our friend the Dean ?

" I wonder what some people mean ?

" My lord and he are grown so great,

" Always together, tête à tête ;

" What ! they admire him for his jokes !---

" See but the fortune of some folks !"

There flies about a strange report

Of some express arriv'd at court :

I'm stopp'd by all the fools I meet,

And catechis'd in every street.

" You, Mr. Dean, frequent the great ;

" Inform us, will the Emperor treat ?

" Or do the prints and papers lie ?

Faith, Sir, you know as much as I.

" Ah, Doctor, how you love to jest !

" 'Tis now no secret"---I protest

'Tis one to me---" Then tell us, pray,

" When are the troops to have their pay ?"

And, though I solemnly declare

I know no more than my lord mayor,

They stand amaz'd, and think me grown

The closest mortal ever known.

Thus in a sea of folly tost,
My choicest hours of life are lost;
Yet always wishing to retreat,
Oh, could I see my country seat!
There leaning near a gentle brook,
Sleep, or peruse some ancient book;
And there in sweet oblivion drown
Those cares that haunt the court and town*.

THE AUTHOR UPON HIMSELF. 1713.

[A few of the first lines are wanting.]

* * * * *

By an old ——— pursued
A crazy prelate†, and a royal prude‡;
By dull divines, who look with envious eyes
On every genius that attempts to rise;
And, pausing o'er a pipe with doubtful nod,
Give hints that poets ne'er believe in God:
So clowns on scholars as on wizards look,
And take a folio for a conjuring book.

Swift had the sin of wit, no venial crime;
Nay, 'tis affirm'd he sometimes dealt in rhyme:
Humour and mirth had place in all he writ;
He reconcil'd divinity and wit; [grace;
He mov'd, and bow'd, and talk'd with too much
Nor show'd the parson in his gait or face;
Despis'd luxurious wines and costly meat,
Yet still was at the tables of the great;
Frequented lords, saw those that saw the Queen;
At Child's § or Truby's § never once had been;
Where town and country vicars flock in tribes,
Secur'd by numbers from the laymen's gibes,
And deal in vices of the graver sort,
Tobacco, censure, coffee, pride, and port.

But, after sage monitions from his friends,
His talents to employ for nobler ends;
To better judgments willing to submit,
He turns to politics his dangerous wit.

And now, the public interest to support,
By Harley Swift invited comes to court;
In favour grows with ministers of state;
Admitted private, when superiors wait:
And Harley, not ashamed his choice to own,
Takes him to Windsor in his coach alone.
At Windsor Swift no sooner can appear,
But St. John comes and whispers in his ear:
The waiters stand in ranks; the yeoman cry,
Make room, as if a duke were passing by.

Now Finch¶ alarms the Lords: he hears for certain

This dangerous priest is got behind the curtain,
Finch, fam'd for tedious elocution, proves
That Swift oils many a spring which Harley moves.

York is from Lambeth sent, to show the Queen
A dangerous treatise* writ against the spleen;
Which, by the style, the matter, and the drift,
'Tis thought could be the work of none but Swift.

Poor York! the harmless tool of others' hate;
He sues for pardon†, and repents too late.

Now, angry Somerset‡ her vengeance vows
On Swift's reproaches for her * * * * *
From her red locks her mouth with venom fills;
And thence into the royal ear instills.

The Queen incens'd, his services forgot,
Leaves him a victim to the vengeful Scot §.
Now through the realm a proclamation spread,
To fix a price on his devoted head ||.
While innocent, he scorns ignoble flight;
His watchful friends preserve him by a sleight.

By Harley's favour once again he shines;
Is now careis'd by candidate divines,
Who change opinions with the changing scene:
Lord! how were they mistaken in the Dean!
Now Delawar ¶ again familiar grows,
And in Swift's ear thrusts half his powder'd nose.
The Scottish nation, whom he durst offend,
Again apply that Swift would be their friend.

By faction tir'd, with grief he waits awhile,
His great contending friends to reconcile,
Performs what friendship, justice, truth, require:
What could he more, but decently retire?

THE FAGGOT.

WRITTEN WHEN THE MINISTRY WERE AT VARIANCE. 1713.

OBSERVE the dying father speak:
Try, lads, can you this bundle break?
Then bids the youngest of the six
Take up a well bound heap of sticks.
They thought it was an old man's maggot,
And strove by turns to break the faggot:
In vain; the complicated wands
Were much too strong for all their hands.
See, said the fire, how soon 'tis done;
Then took and broke them one by one.
So strong you'll be, in friendship ty'd;
So quickly broke, if you divide.
Keep close then, boys, and never quarrel;
Here ends the fable and the moral.

And others who in solemn fort
Appear with slender wands at court;
Not firmly join'd to keep their ground,
But lashing one another round:
While wise men think they ought to fight
With quarter-staffs, instead of white;
Or constable with staff of peace
Should come and make the clattering cease,
Which now disturbs the Queen and court,
And gives the Whigs and rabble sport.

In history we never found
The Consuls' Fasces were unbound:
Those Romans were too wise to think on't,
Except to lash some grand delinquent.
How would they blush to hear it said,
The Prætor broke the Consul's head!
Or Consul, in his purple gown,
Came up, and knock'd the Prætor down!
Come, Courtiers: every man his stick!
Lord Treasurer, for once be quick:
And, that they may the closer cling,
Take your blue ribbon for a string.
Come, trimming Harcourt*, bring your mace;
And squeeze it in, or quit your place:
Dispatch, or else that rascal Northey†
Will undertake to do it for thee:
And be assur'd, the Court will find him
Prepar'd to leap o'er sticks, or bind 'em.

To make the bundle strong and safe,
Great Ormond, lend thy General's staff:
And, if the Crozier could be cramm'd in,
A fig for Lechmere, King, and Hambden!
You'll then defy the strongest Whig
With both his hands to bend a twig;
Though with united strength they all pull,
From Somers down to Craggs and Walpole.

CATULLUS DE LESBIA.

LESBIA for ever on me rails,
To talk of me she never fails.
Now, hang me but for all her art,
I find, that I have gain'd her heart.

The case is just the same with me;
I curse her every hour sincerely,
Yet, hang me but I love her dearly.

I rode four more to Great St. Mary,
Using four legs when two were weary;
To three fair virgins I did tie men,
In the close bands of pleasing Hymen:
I dipp'd two babes in holy water,
And purify'd their mother after.
Within an hour, and eke a half,
I preach'd three congregations deaf;
Where thundering out, with lungs long winded,
I chopp'd so fast, that few there minded.
My emblem, the laborious sun,
Saw all these mighty labours done
Before one race of his was run.
All this perform'd by Robert Hewit:

A True and Faithful INVENTORY of the GOODS
belonging to Dr. SWIFT, Vicar of Laracor;

Upon lending his House to the Bishop of Meath, till his Palace was re-built.

AN oaken, broken elbow-chair;
A cawdle-cup, without an ear;
A batter'd, shatter'd ash bedstead;
A box of deal, without a lid;
A pair of tongs, but out of joint;
A backword-poker, without point;
A pot that's crack'd across, around
With an old knotted garter bound;
An iron lock, without a key;
A wig, with hanging quite grown gray;
A curtain worn to half a stripe;
A pair of bellows, without pipe;
A dish which might good meat afford once;
An Ovid, and an old Concordance;
A bottle bottom, wooden platter,
One is for meal, and one for water:
There likewise is a copper skillet,
Which runs as fast out as you fill it;
A candlestick, snuff-dish, and save-all;
And thus his household goods you have all,
These to your Lordship as a friend,
Till you have built, I freely lend:
They'll serve your Lordship for a shift;
Why not, as well as Doctor Swift?

CADENUS AND VANESSA*.

WRITTEN AT WINDSOR, 1713.

THE shepherds and the nymphs were seen
Pleading before the Cyprian Queen.
The counsel for the fair began,
Accusing the false creature man.
The brief with weighty crimes was charg'd,
On which the pleader much enlarg'd;
That Cupid now has lost his art,
Or blunts the point of every dart;—
His altar now no longer smokes,
His mother's aid no youth invokes:
This tempts freethinkers to refine,
And bring in doubt their powers divine;

* Founded on an offer of marriage made by Miss Vanhomrigh to Dr. Swift, who was occasionally her preceptor.

Now love is dwindled to intrigue,
And marriage grown a money league.
Which crimes aforesaid (with her leave)
Were (as he humbly did conceive)
Against our sovereign lady's peace,
Against the statute in that case,
Against her dignity and crown:
Then pray'd an answer, and sat down.

The nymphs with scorn beheld their foes:
When the defendant's counsel rose,
And, what no lawyer ever lack'd,
With impudence own'd all the fact;
But, what the gentlest heart would vex,
Laid all the fault on t'other sex.
That modern love is no such thing
As what those ancient poets sing;
A fire celestial, chaste, refin'd,
Conceiv'd and kindled in the mind;
Which, having found an equal flame,
Unites, and both become the same,
In different breasts together burn,
Together both to ashes turn.
But women now feel no such fire,
And only know the gross desire.
Their passions move in lower spheres,
Where'er caprice or folly steers,
A dog, a parrot, or an ape,
Or some worse brute in human shape,
Ingross the fancies of the fair,
The few soft moments they can spare,
From visits to receive and pay;
From scandal, politics, and play;
From fans, and flounces, and brocades,
From equipage and park-parades,
From all the thousand female toys,
From every trifle that employs
The out or inside of their heads,
Between their toilets and their beds.

In a dull stream, which moving slow,
You hardly see the current flow;
If a small breeze obstruct the course,
It whirls about, for want of force,
And in its narrow circle gathers
Nothing but chaff, and straws and feathers.
The current of a female mind
Stops thus, and turns with every wind;
Thus whirling round together draws
Fools, fops, and rakes, for chaff and straws.
Hence we conclude, no women's hearts
Are won by virtue, wit, and parts:
Nor are the men of sense to blame,
For breasts incapable of flame;
The fault must on the nymphs be plac'd,
Grown so corrupted in their taste.

The pleader, having spoke his best,
Had witnesses ready to attest,
Who fairly could on oath depose,
When questions on the fact arose,
That every article was true;
Nor further these deponents knew:
Therefore he humbly would insist,
The bill might be with costs dismiss'd.
The cause appear'd of so much weight,
That Venus, from her judgment-seat,
Desir'd them not to talk so loud,
Else she must interpose a cloud:

For if the heavenly folk should know
These pleadings in the courts below,
That mortals here disdain to love,
She ne'er could show her face above;
For gods, their betters, are too wise
To value that which men despise.
And then, said she, my son and I
Must stroll in air, 'twixt land and sky;
Or else, shut out from heaven and earth,
Fly to the sea, my place of birth;
There live, with daggled mermaids pent,
And keep on fish perpetual Lent.

But, since the case appear'd so nice,
She thought it best to take advice.
The Muses, by their King's permission,
Though foes to love, attend the session,
And on their right hand took their places
In order; on the left, the Graces:
To whom she might her doubts propose
On all emergencies that rose.
The Muses oft' were seen to frown;
The Graces half-asham'd look down;
And 'twas observ'd, there were but few
Of either sex among the crew,
Whom she or her assessors knew.
The goddesses soon began to see,
Things were not ripe for a decree;
And said she must consult her books,
The lovers' Fletas, Bractons, Cokes.
First to a dapper clerk she beckon'd,
To turn to Ovid, book the second;
She then referr'd them to a place
In Virgil (vide Dido's case):
As for Tibullus's reports,
They never pass'd for law in courts:
For Cowley's briefs, and pleas of Waller,
Still their authority was smaller.

There was on both sides much to say:
She'd hear the cause another day.
And so she did; and then a third
She heard it---there she kept her word:
But, with rejoinders or replies,
Long bills, and answers stuff'd with lies,
Demur, imparlance, and essoin,
The parties ne'er could issue join:
For sixteen years the cause was spun,
And then stood where it first begun.

Now, gentle Clio, sing or say,
What Venus meant by this delay.
The goddesses, much perplex'd in mind
To see her empire thus declin'd,
When first this grand debate arose,
Above her wisdom to compose,
Conceiv'd a project in her head
To work her ends; which, if it sped,
Would show the merits of the cause
Far better than consulting laws.

In a glad hour Lucina's aid
Produc'd on earth a wondrous maid,
On whom the Queen of love was bent
To try a new experiment.
She threw her law-books on the shelf,
And thus debated with herself.

Since men allege, they ne'er can find
Those beauties in a female mind,
Which raise a flame that will endure
For ever uncorrupt and pure;

If 'tis with reason they complain,
This infant shall restore my reign.
I'll search where every virtue dwells,
From courts inclusive down to cells;
What preachers talk, or sages write;
These I will gather and unite,
And represent them to mankind
Collected in that infant's mind.

This said, she plucks in heaven's high bowers
A sprig of amaranthine flowers,
In nectar thrice infuses bays,
Three times refin'd in Titan's rays;
Then calls the Graces to her aid,
And sprinkles thrice the new-born maid:
From whence the tender skin assumes
A sweetness above all perfumes:
From whence a cleanliness remains,
Incapable of outward stains:
From whence that decency of mind,
So lovely in the female kind,
Where not one careless thought intrudes,
Less modest than the speech of prudes;
Where never blush was call'd in aid,
That spurious virtue in a maid,
A virtue but at second-hand;
They blush, because they understand.

The Graces next would act their part,
And show'd but little of their art;
Their work was half already done,
The child with native beauty shone;
The outward form no help requir'd:
Each, breathing on her thrice, inspir'd
That gentle, soft, engaging air,
Which in old times adorn'd the fair:
And said, "Vanessa be the name
"By which thou shalt be known to fame;
"Vanessa, by the gods inroll'd:
"Her name on earth shall not be told."

But still the work was not complete:
When Venus thought on a deceit;
Drawn by her doves, away she flies,
And finds out Pallas in the skies.
Dear Pallas, I have been this morn
To see a lovely infant born;
A boy in yonder isle below,
So like my own without his bow,
By beauty could your heart be won,
You'd swear it is Apollo's son:
But it shall ne'er be said, a child
So hopeful has by me been spoil'd;
I have enough besides to spare,
And give him wholly to your care.

Wisdom's above suspecting wiles:
The queen of Learning gravely smiles,
Down from Olympus comes with joy,
Mistakes Vanessa for a boy;
Then sows within her tender mind
Seeds long unknown to womankind;
For manly bosoms chiefly fit,
The seeds of knowledge, judgment, wit,
Her soul was suddenly endued
With justice, truth, and fortitude;
With honour, which no breath can stain,
Which malice must attack in vain;
With open heart and bounteous hand.
But Pallas here was at a stand;
She knew, in our degenerate days,
Bare virtue could not live on praise;

That meat must be with money bought:
She therefore, upon second thought,
Infus'd, yet as it were by stealth,
Some small regard for state and wealth;
Of which, as she grew up, there staid
A tincture in the prudent maid:
She manag'd her estate with care,
Yet lik'd three footmen to her chair.
But, lest he should neglect his studies
Like a young heir, the thrifty goddess
(For fear young master should be spoil'd)
Would use him like a younger child;
And, after long computing, found
"I would come to just five thousand pound.

The Queen of Love was pleas'd, and proud,
To see Vanessa thus endow'd:
She doubted not but such a dame
Through every breast would dart a flame:
That every rich and lordly swain
With pride would drag about her chain;
That scholars would forsake their books,
To study bright Vanessa's looks;
As she advanc'd, that womankind
Would by her model form their mind,
And all their conduct would be try'd
By her, as an unerring guide;
Offending daughters oft would hear
Vanessa's praise rung in their ear:
Miss Betty, when she does a fault,
Lets fall her knife, or spills the salt,
Will thus be by her mother chid,
"'Tis what Vanessa never did!"
Thus by the nymphs and swains ador'd,
My power shall be again restor'd,
And happy lovers bless my reign—
So Venus hop'd, but hop'd in vain.

For when in time the Martial Maid
Found out the trick that Venus play'd,
She shakes her helm, she knits her brows,
And, fir'd with indignation, vows,
To-morrow, ere the setting sun,
She'd all undo that she had done.

But in the poets we may find
A wholesome law, time out of mind,
Had been confirm'd by Fate's decree,
That gods, of whatso'er degree,
Resume not what themselves have given,
Or any brother-god in heaven;
Which keeps the peace among the gods,
Or they must always be at odds:
And Pallas, if she broke the laws,
Must yield her foe the stronger cause;
A shame to one so much ador'd
For wisdom at Jove's council-board.
Besides, she fear'd the Queen of Love
Would meet with better friends above.
And though she must with grief reflect,
To see a mortal virgin deek'd
With graces hitherto unknown
To female breasts, except her own;
Yet she would act as best became
A goddess of unspotted fame.
She knew, by augury divine,
Venus would fail in her design:
She study'd well the point, and found
Her foe's conclusions were not sound,
From premises erroneous brought;
And therefore the deductions 's nought,

And must have contrary effects
To what her treacherous foe expects.

In proper season Pallas meets
The Queen of Love, whom thus she greets
(For gods, we are by Homer told,
Can in celestial language scold):
Perfidious goddess! but in vain
You form'd this project in your brain;
A project for thy talents fit,
With much deceit and little wit.
Thou hast, as thou shalt quickly see,
Deceiv'd thyself, instead of me:
For how can heavenly wisdom prove
An instrument to earthly love?
Know'st thou not yet, that men commence
Thy votaries, for want of sense?
Nor shall Vanessa be the theme
To manage thy abortive scheme:
She'll prove the greatest of thy foes!
And yet I scorn to interpose,
But, using neither skill nor force,
Leave all things to their natural course.

The goddess thus pronounc'd her doom:
When lo! Vanessa in her bloom
Advanc'd, like Atalanta's star,
But rarely seen, and seen from far:
In a new world with caution stept,
Watch'd all the company she kept,
Well knowing, from the books she read,
What dangerous paths young virgins tread:
Would seldom at the park appear,
Nor saw the play-house twice a year;
Yet, not incurious, was inclin'd
To know the converse of mankind.

First issued from perfumers' shops,
A crowd of fashionable fops;
They ask'd her, how she lik'd the play;
Then told the tattle of the day;
A duel fought last night at two,
About a lady---you know who:
Mention'd a new Italian come
Either from Muscovy or Rome;
Gave hints of who and who's together;
Then fell a talking of the weather;
Last night was so extremely fine,
The ladies walk'd till after nine;
Then, in soft voice and speech absurd,
With nonsense every second word,
With fustian from exploded plays,
They celebrate her beauty's praise;
Run o'er their cant of stupid lies,
And tell the murders of her eyes.

With silent scorn Vanessa sat,
Scarce listening to their idle chat;
Further than sometimes by a frown,
When they grew pert, to pull them down.
At last she spitefully was bent
To try their wisdom's full extent;
And said she valued nothing less
Than titles, figure, shape and dress;
That merit should be chiefly plac'd
In judgment, knowledge, wit, and taste;
And these she, offer'd to dispute,
Alone distinguish'd man from brute:
That present times have no pretence
To virtue, in the noble sense
By Greeks and Romans understood,
To perish for our country's good.

She nam'd the ancient heroes round,
Explain'd for what they were renown'd,
Then spoke with censure or applause
Of foreign customs, rites, and laws;
Through nature and through art she rang'd,
And gracefully her subject chang'd;
In vain! her hearers had no share
In all she spoke, except to stare.
Their judgment was upon the whole,
—That lady is the dullest soul!—
Then tipt their forehead in a jeer,
As who should say---she wants it here!
She may be handsome, young, and rich,
But none will burn her for a witch!

A party next of glittering dames,
From round the purlieus of St. James,
Came early, out of pure good-will,
To see the girl in dishabille.
Their clamour, 'lightning from their chairs,
Grew louder all the way up stairs;
At entrance loudest, where they found
The room with volumes litter'd round.
Vanessa held Montaigne, and read,
Whilst Mrs. Susan comb'd her head.
They call'd for tea and chocolate,
And fell into their usual chat,
Discouraging, with important face,
On ribbons, fans, and gloves, and lace;
Show'd patterns just from India brought,
And gravely ask'd her what she thought,
Whether the red or green were best,
And what they cost? Vanessa guess'd,
As came into her fancy first;
Nam'd half the rates, and lik'd the worst.
To scandal next---What awkward thing
Was that last Sunday in the ring?
I'm sorry Mopsa breaks so fast;
I said, her face would never last.
Corinna, with that youthful air,
Is thirty, and a bit to spare:
Her fondness for a certain Earl
Began when I was but a girl!
Phillis, who but a month ago
Was marry'd to the Tunbridge beau,
I saw coquetting t'other night
In public with that odious knight!

They raily'd next Vanessa's dress:
That gown was made for old Queen Bess.
Dear Madam, let me see your head:
Don't you intend to put on red?
A petticoat without a hoop!
Sure, you are not asham'd to stoop!
With handsome garters at your knees,
No matter what a fellow sees.

Fill'd with disdain, with rage inflam'd,
Both of herself and sex asham'd,
The nymph stood silent out of spight,
Nor would vouchsafe to set them right.
Away the fair detractors went,
And gave by turns their censures vent.
She's not so handsome in my eyes:
For wit, I wonder where it lies!
She's fair and clean, and that's the most:
But why proclaim her for a toast?
A baby face; no life, no airs,
But what she learn'd at country-fairs;
Scarce knows what difference is between
Rich Flanders lace and Colberteen.

I'll undertake, my little Nancy
In flounces hath a better fancy!
With all her wit, I would not ask
Her judgment, how to buy a mask.
We begg'd her but to patch her face.
She never hit one proper place;
Which every girl at five years old
Can do as soon as she is told.
I own, that out-of-fashion stuff
Becomes the creature well enough.
The girl might pass, if we could get her
To know the world a little better.
(To know the world! a modern phrase
For visits, ombre, balls, and plays.)

Thus, to the world's perpetual shame,
The Queen of Beauty lost her aim;
Too late with grief she understood,
Pallas had done more harm than good:
For great examples are but vain,
Where ignorance begets disdain.
Both sexes, arm'd with guilt and spite,
Against Vanessa's power unite:
To copy her, few nymphs aspir'd;
Her virtues fewer swains admir'd.
So stars beyond a certain height
Give mortals neither heat nor light.

Yet some of either sex, endow'd
With gifts superior to the crowd,
With virtue, knowledge, taste, and wit,
She condescended to admit;
With pleasing arts she could reduce
Men's talents to their proper use;
And with address each genius held
To that wherein it most excell'd;
Thus, making others' wisdom known,
Could please them, and improve her own.
A modest youth said something new;
She plac'd it in the strongest view.
All humble worth she strove to raise;
Would not be prais'd, yet lov'd to praise.
The learned met with free approach,
Although they came not in a coach:
Some clergy too she would allow,
Nor quarrel'd at their awkward bow;
But this was for Cadenus' sake,
A gownman of a different make;
Whom Pallas, once Vanessa's tutor,
Had fix'd on for her coadjutor.

But Cupid, full of mischief, longs
To vindicate his mother's wrongs.
On Pallas all attempts are vain:
One way he knows to give her pain;
Vows on Vanessa's heart to take
Due vengeance, for her patron's sake,
Those early seeds by Venus sown,
In spite of Pallas, now were grown;
And Cupid hop'd they would improve
By time, and ripen into love.
The boy made use of all his craft,
In vain discharging many a shaft,
Pointed at colonels, lords, and beaux:
Cadenus warded off the blows;
For, placing still some book betwixt,
The darts were in the cover fix'd,
Or, often blunted and recoil'd,
On Plutarch's Morals struck, were spoil'd.

The queen of Wisdom could foresee,
But not prevent the Fates' decree:

And human caution tries in vain
To break that adamant chain.
Vanessa, though by Pallas taught,
By love invulnerable thought,
Searching in books for wisdom's aid,
Was, in the very search, betray'd.

Cupid, though all his darts were lost,
Yet still resolv'd to spare no cost:
He could not answer to his fame
The triumphs of that stubborn dame,
A nymph so hard to be subdued,
Who neither was conquette nor prude.
I find, said he, she wants a Doctor,
Both to adore her, and instruct her:
I'll give her what she most admires,
Among those venerable fires.
Cadenus is a subject fit,
Grown old in politics and wit,
Careless'd by ministers of state,
Of half mankind the dread and hate,
Whate'er vexations love attend,
She need no rivals apprehend.
Her sex, with universal voice,
Must laugh at her capricious choice.

Cadenus many things had writ:
Vanessa much esteem'd his wit,
And call'd for his poetic works:
Meantime the boy in secret lurks;
And, while the book was in her hand,
The urchin from his private stand
Took aim, and shot with all his strength
A dart of such prodigious length,
It pierc'd the feeble volume through,
And deep transfix'd her bosom too.
Some lines, more moving than the rest,
Stuck to the point that pierc'd her breast,
And, borne directly to the heart,
With pains unknown, increas'd her smart.

Vanessa, not in years a score,
Dreams of a gown of forty-four;
Imaginary charms can find
In eyes with reading almost blind:
Cadenus now no more appears
Declin'd in health, advanc'd in years.
She fancies music in his tongue;
No farther looks, but thinks him young.
What mariner is not afraid
To venture in a ship decay'd?
What planter will attempt to yoke
A sapling with a falling oak?
As years increase, she brighter shines:
Cadenus with each day declines:
And he must fall a prey to time,
While she continues in her prime.

Cadenus, common forms a part,
In every scene had kept his heart;
Had sigh'd and languish'd, vow'd and writ,
For pastime, or to show his wit.
But books, and time, and state affairs,
Had spoil'd his fashionable airs:
He now could praise, esteem, approve,
But understood not what was love.
His conduct might have made him styl'd
A father, and the nymph his child.
That innocent delight he took
To see the virgin mind her book,
Was but the master's secret joy
In school to hear the finest boy.

Her knowledge with her fancy grew;
 She hourly press'd for something new;
Ideas came into her mind
 So fast, his lessons lagg'd behind;
 She reason'd, without plodding long,
 Nor ever gave her judgment wrong.
 But now a sudden change was wrought:
 She minds no longer what he taught.
 Cadenus was amaz'd, to find
 Such marks of a distracted mind:
 For, though she seem'd to listen more
 To all he spoke, than e'er before,
 He found her thoughts would absent range,
 Yet guess'd not whence could spring the change.
 And first he modestly conjectures
 His pupil might be tir'd with lectures;
 Which help'd to mortify his pride,
 Yet gave him not the heart to chide:
 But, in a mild dejected strain,
 At last he ventur'd to complain;
 Said, she should be no longer teas'd,
 Might have her freedom when she pleas'd;
 Was now convinc'd he acted wrong,
 To hide her from the world so long,
 And in dull studies to engage
 One of her tender sex and age;
 That every nymph with envy own'd,
 How she might shine in the grand monde;
 And every shepherd was undone
 To see her cloister'd like a nun.
 This was a visionary scheme:
 He wak'd, and found it but a dream;
 A project far above his skill;
 For nature must be nature still.
 If he were bolder than became
 A scholar to a courtly dame,
 She might excuse a man of letters;
 Thus tutors often treat their betters:
 And, since his talk offensive grew,
 He came to take his last adieu.

Vanessa, fill'd with just disdain,
 Would still her dignity maintain,
 Instructed from her early years
 To scorn the art of female tears.

Had he employed his time so long
 To teach her what was right and wrong;
 Yet could such notions entertain
 That all his lectures were in vain?
 She own'd the wandering of her thoughts;
 But he must answer for her faults.
 She well remember'd, to her cost,
 That all his lessons were not lost.
 Two maxims she could still produce,
 And sad experience taught their use;
 That virtue, pleas'd by being shown,
 Knows nothing which it dares not own;
 Can make us without fear disclose
 Our inmost secrets to our foes:
 That common forms were not design'd
 Directors to a noble mind.
 Now, said the nymph, to let you see
 My actions with your rules agree;
 That I can vulgar forms despise,
 And have no secrets to disguise:
 I knew, by what you said and writ,
 How dangerous things were men of wit;
 You caution'd me against their charms,
 But never gave me equal arms;

Your lessons found the weakest part,
 Aim'd at the head, but reach'd the heart.

Cadenus felt within him rise
 Shame, disappointment, guilt, surprise.
 He knew not how to reconcile
 Such language with her usual style:
 And yet her words were so express'd,
 He could not hope she spoke in jest.
 His thoughts had wholly been confin'd
 To form and cultivate her mind.
 He hardly knew, till he was told,
 Whether the nymph were young or old;
 Had met her in a public place.
 Without distinguishing her face:
 Much less could his declining age
 Vanessa's earliest thoughts engage;
 And, if her youth indifference met,
 His person must contempt beget:
 Or, grant her passion be sincere,
 How shall his innocence be clear?
 Appearances were all so strong,
 The world must think him in the wrong;
 Would say, he made a treacherous use
 Of wit, to flatter and seduce:
 The town would swear, he had betray'd
 By magic spells the harmless maid:
 And every beau would have his jokes,
 That scholars were like other folks;
 And, when Platonic flights were over,
 The tutor turn'd a mortal lover!
 So tender of the young and fair!
 It show'd a true paternal care—
 Five thousand guineas in her purse!
 The doctor might have fancy'd worse—

Hardly at length he silence broke,
 And falter'd every word he spoke;
 Interpreting her complaisance,
 Just as a man sans consequence.
 She rallied well, he always knew:
 Her manner now was something new;
 And what she spoke was in an air
 As serious as a tragic player.
 But those who aim at ridicule
 Should fix upon some certain rule,
 Which fairly hints they are in jest,
 Else he must enter his protest:
 For, let a man be ne'er so wise,
 He may be caught with sober lies;
 A science which he never taught,
 And, to be free, was dearly bought;
 For, take it in its proper light,
 'Tis just what coxcombs call a bite.

But, not to dwell on things minute,
 Vanessa finish'd the dispute,
 Brought weighty arguments to prove
 That reason was her guide in love.
 She thought he had himself describ'd,
 His doctrines when she first imbib'd:
 What he had planted now was grown;
 His virtues she might call her own;
 As he approves, as he dislikes,
 Love or contempt her fancy strikes.
 Self-love, in nature rooted fast,
 Attends us first, and leaves us last:
 Why she likes him, admire not at her;
 She loves herself, and that's the matter.
 How was her tutor wont to praise
 The geniuses of ancient days!

(Those authors he so oft' had nam'd,
For learning, wit, and wisdom, fam'd)
Was struck with love, esteem, and awe,
For persons whom he never saw.
Suppose Cadenus flourish'd then,
He must adore such godlike men.
If one short volume could comprise
All that was witty, learn'd, and wise,
How would it be esteem'd and read,
Although the writer long were dead !
If such an author were alive,
How all would for his friendship strive,
And come in crowds to see his face !
And this she takes to be her case.
Cadenus answers every end,
The book, the author, and the friend ;
The utmost her desires will reach,
Is but to learn what he can teach :
His converse is a system fit
Alone to fill up all her wit ;
While every passion of her mind
In him is center'd and confin'd.

Love can with speech inspire a mute,
And taught Vanessa to dispute.
This topic, never touch'd before,
Display'd her eloquence the more :
Her knowledge, with such pains acquir'd,
By this new passion grew inspir'd ;
Through this she made all objects pass,
Which gave a tincture o'er the mass ;
As rivers though they bend and twine,
Still to their sea their course incline ;
Or, as philosophers, who find
Some favourite system to their mind,
In every point to make it fit,
Will force all nature to submit.

Cadenus, who could ne'er suspect
His lessons would have such effect,
Or be so artfully apply'd,
Insensibly came on her side.
It was an unforeseen event ;
Things took a turn he never meant.
Whoe'er excels in what we prize,
Appears a hero in our eyes :
Each girl, when pleas'd with what is taught,
Will have the teacher in her thought,
When Miss delights in her spinnet,
A fiddler may a fortune get ;
A blockhead, with melodious voice,
In boarding-schools may have his choice ;
And oft' the dancing-master's art
Climbs from the toe to touch the heart.
In learning let a nymph delight,
The pedent gets a mistress by 't.
Cadenus, to his grief and shame,
Could scarce oppose Vanessa's flame ;
And, though her arguments were strong,
At least could hardly wish them wrong.
Howe'er it came, he could not tell,
But sure she never talk'd so well.
His pride began to interpose ;
Preferr'd before a crowd of beaux !
So bright a nymph to come unsought !
Such wonder by his merit wrought !
'Tis merit must with her prevail !
He never knew her judgment fail !
She noted all she ever read !
And had a most discerning head !

'Tis an old maxim in the schools,
That flattery's the food of fools ;
Yet now and then your men of wit
Will condescend to take a bit.

So, when Cadenus could not hide,
He chose to justify, his pride ;
Construing the passion she had shown,
Much to her praise, more to his own.
Nature in him had merit plac'd,
In her a most judicious taste.
Love, hitherto a transient guest,
Ne'er held possession of his breast ;
So long attending at the gate,
Disdain'd to enter in so late.
Love, why do we one passion call,
When 'tis a compound of them all ?
Where hot and cold, where sharp and sweet,
In all their equipages meet ;
Where pleasures mix'd with pains appear,
Sorrow with joy, and hope with fear ;
Wherein his dignity and age
Forbid Cadenus to engage.
But friendship, in its greatest height,
A constant, rational delight,
Or virtue's basis fix'd to last,
When love allurements long are past,
Which gently warms, but cannot burn,
He gladly offers in return ;
His want of passion will redeem
With gratitude, respect, esteem ;
With that devotion we bestow,
When goddesses appear below.

While thus Cadenus entertains
Vanessa in exalted strains,
The nymphs in sober words entreats
A truce with all sublime conceits :
For why such raptures, flights, and fancies,
To her who durst not read romances ?
In lofty style to make replies,
Which he had taught her to despise ?
But when her tutor will affect
Devotion, duty, and respect,
He fairly abdicates the throne ;
The government is now her own ;
He has a forfeiture incur'd ;
She vows to take him at his word,
And hopes he will not think it strange,
If both should now their stations change.
The nymph will have her turn to be
The tutor ; and the pupil, he :
Though she already can discern
Her scholar is not apt to learn ;
Or wants capacity to reach
The science she designs to teach :
Wherein his genius was below
The skill of every common beau,
Who, though he cannot spell, is wise
Enough to read a lady's eyes,
And will each accidental glance
Interpret for a kind advance.

But what success Vanessa met,
Is to the world a secret yet.
Whether the nymph, to please her swain,
Talks in a high romantic strain ;
Or whether he at last descends
To act with less seraphic ends ;
Or, to compound the business, whether
They temper love and books together ;

Must never to mankind be told,
Nor shall the conscious Muse unfold.

Meantime the mournful Queen of Love
Led but a weary life above.
She ventures now to leave the skies,
Grown by Vanessa's conduct wife:
For, though by one perverse event
Pallas had cross'd her first intent;
Though her design was not obtain'd;
Yet had she much experience gain'd,
And, by the project vainly try'd,
Could better now the cause decide.
She gave due notice that both parties,
Coram Regina, prox' die Martis,
Should at their peril, without fail,
Come and appear, and save their bail.
All met; and, silence thrice proclaim'd,
One lawyer to each side was nam'd.
The judge discover'd in her face
Resentments for her late disgrace;
And, full of anger, shame, and grief,
Directed them to mind their brief,
Nor spend their time to show their reading;
She'd have a summary proceeding.
She gather'd under every head
The sum of what each lawyer said,
Gave her own reasons last, and then
Decreed the cause against the men.

But, in a weighty case like this,
To show she did not judge amiss,
Which evil tongues might else report,
She made a speech in open court;
Wherein she grievously complains,
"How she was cheated by the swains;"
On whose petition (humbly showing,
That women were not worth the wooing,
And that, unless the sex would mend,
The race of lovers soon must end)---

"She was at Lord knows what expence
"To form a nymph of wit and sense,
"A model for her sex design'd,
"Who never could one lover find.
"She saw her favour was misplac'd;
"The fellows had a wretched taste;
"She needs must tell them to their face,
"They were a stupid, senseless race;
"And, were she to begin again,
"She'd study to reform the men;
"Or add some grains of folly more
"To women, than they had before,
"To put them on an equal foot;
"And this, or nothing else, would do 't.
"This might their mutual fancy strike,
"Since every being loves its like.

"But now, repenting what was done,
"She left all business to her son;
"She puts the world in his possession,
"And let him use it at discretion."

The cryer was order'd to dismiss
The court, so made his last O yes!
The goddesses would no longer wait;
But rising from her chair of state,
Left all below at six and seven,
Harness'd her doves, and flew to heaven.

TO LOVE*.

In all I wish, how happy should I be,
Thou grand deluder, were it not for thee!
So weak thou art, that fools thy power despise;
And yet so strong, thou triumph'st o'er the wise.
Thy traps are laid with such peculiar art,
They catch the cautious, let the rash depart.
Most nets are fill'd by want of thought and care:
But too much thinking brings us to thy snare;
Where, held by thee, in slavery we stay,
And throw the pleasing part of life away.
But, what does most my indignation move,
Discretion! thou wert ne'er a friend to love:
Thy chief delight is to defeat those arts,
By which he kindles mutual flames in hearts;
While the blind loitering God is at his play,
Thou steal'st his golden-pointed darts away;
Those darts which never fail; and in their stead
Convey'st malignant arrows tipt with lead:
The heedless God, suspecting no deceits,
Shoots on, and thinks he has done wondrous feats:
But the poor nymph who feels her vitals burn,
And from her shepherd can find no return,
Laments, and rages at the power divine,
When, curst Discretion! all the fault was thine:
Cupid and Hymen thou hast set at odds,
And bred such fends between those kindred gods,
That Venus cannot reconcile her sons;
When one appears, away the other runs.
The former scales, wherein he us'd to poise
Love against love, and equal joys with joys,
Are now fill'd up with avarice and pride,
Where titles, power, and riches, still subside.
Then, gentle Venus, to thy father run,
And tell him how thy children are undone;
Prepare his bolts to give one fatal blow,
And strike Discretion to the shades below.

ODE TO SPRING.

BY A LADY †.

HAIL, blushing goddesses, beauteous Spring,
Who, in thy jocund train, dost bring
Loves and Graces, smiling Hours,
Balmy breezes, fragrant flowers;
Come, with tints of roseate hue,
Nature's faded charms renew.

Yet why should I thy presence hail?
To me no more the breathing gale
Comes fraught with sweets; no more the rose
With such transcendent beauty blows,
As when Cadenus blest the scene,
And shar'd with me those joys serene;
When, unperceiv'd, the lambent fire
Of friendship kindled new desire:
Still listening to his tuneful tongue,
The truths which angels might have sung,
Divine, impress their gentle sway,
And sweetly stole my soul away.
My guide, instructor, lover, friend,
(Dear names!) in one idea blend;

* Found in Miss Vanhomrigh's desk, after her death, in the hand-writing of Swift.

THE WORKS OF SWIFT.

Oh! still conjoin'd, your incense rise,
And waft sweet odours to the skies!

ODE TO WISDOM.

BY THE SAME.

Oh, Pallas! I invoke thy aid!
Vouchsafe to hear a wretched maid,
By tender love deprest;
'Tis just that thou should'st heal the smart
Inflicted by the subtle art,
And calm my troubled breast.

No random-shot from Cupid's bow,
But by thy guidance, soft and slow,
It sunk within my heart;
Thus, Love being arm'd with Wisdom's force,
In vain I try to stop its course,
In vain repel the dart.

O goddess! break the fatal league;
Let Love with folly and intrigue,
More fit associates find!
And thou alone within my breast,
O! deign to soothe my griefs to rest,
And heal my tortur'd mind.

A REBUS.

BY VANESSA.

Cut the name of the man * who his mistress de-
And let the first of it be only apply'd [ny'd,
To join with the prophet † who David did chide;
Then say what a horse is that runs very fast ‡;
And that which deserves to be first put the last;
Spell all then, and put them together, to find
The Name and the Virtues of him I design'd.
Like the Patriarch in Egypt, he's vers'd in the state; [great;
Like the prophet in Jewry, he's free with the
Like a racer he flies to succour with speed,
When his friends want his aid, or desert is in need.

THE DEAN'S ANSWER.

THE nymph who wrote this in an amorous fit,
I cannot but envy the pride of her wit,
Which thus she will venture profusely to throw
On so mean a design, and a subject so low.
For mean's her design, and her subject as mean,
The first but a Rebus, the last but a Dean.
A Dean's but a parson: and what is a Rebus?
A thing never known to the Muses or Phœbus.
The corruption of verse; for, when all is done,
It is but a paraphrase made on a pun.
But a genius like her's no subject can stifle,
It shows and discovers itself through a trifle.
By reading this trifle, I quickly began
To find her a great wit, but the dean a small man.
Rich ladies will furnish their garrets with stuff,
Which others for mantuas would think fine enough;
So the wit that is lavishly thrown away here,
Might furnish a second-rate poet a year.
Thus much for the verse; we proceed to the next
Where the Nymph had entirely forsaken her text:

* Jo-seph. † Nathan. ‡ Swift.

Her fine panegyrics are quite out of season,
And what she describes to be merit is treason:
The changes which faction has made in the state,
Have put the dean's politics quite out of date:
Now no one regards what he utters with freedom,
And, should he write pamphlets, no great man
would read 'em;
And should want or desert stand in need of his aid,
This racer would prove but a dull-founder'd jade

HORACE, BOOK. II. ODE I.

PARAPHRASED.

Addressed to Richard Steel, Esq. 1714.

"En qui promittit cives, urbem sibi curæ,
"Imperium fore, & Italiam, & delubra deorum."
HOR. I. Sat. vi. 34.

DICK, thou'rt resolv'd, as I am told,
Some strange arcana to unfold,
And, with the help of Buckley's pen,
To vamp the good old cause again,
Which thou (such Burnet's shrew'd advice is)
Must furbish up, and nickname Crisis.
Thou pompously wilt let us know
What all the world knew long ago,
(E'er since Sir William Gore was mayor,
And Harley fill'd the Common's chair)
That we a German Prince must own
When Anne for heaven resigns her throne.
But, more than that, thou'lt keep a rout
With—who is in—and who is out;
Thou'lt rail devoutly at the peace,
And all its secret causes trace,
The bucket-play 'twixt Whig and Tories,
Their ups and downs, with fifty stories
Of tricks the Lord of Oxford knows,
And errors of our Plenipoes.
Thou'lt tell of leagues among the great,
Portending ruin to our state;
And of that dreadful coup d'eclat,
Which has afforded thee much chat.
The queen, forsooth, (despotic) gave
Twelve coronets without thy leave!
A breach of liberty, 'tis own'd,
For which no heads have yet aton'd:
Believe me, what thou'lt undertaken
May bring in jeopardy thy bacon;
For madmen, children, wits, and fools,
Should never meddle with edg'd tools.
But, since thou'rt got into the fire,
And can'st not easily retire,
Thou must no longer deal in farce,
Nor pump to cobble wicked verse;
Until thou shalt have eas'd thy conscience,
Of spleen, of politics, and nonsense;
And, when thou'lt bid adieu to cares,
And settled Europe's grand affairs,
'Twill then, perhaps, be worth thy while
For Drury-Lane to shape thy style:
"To make a pair of jolly fellows,
"The son and father join, to tell us
"How sons may safely disobey,
"And father's never should say nay;

"By which wise conduct they grow friends
 "At last—and so the story ends *."

When first I knew thee, Dick, thou wert
 Renown'd, for skill in Faustus' art †,
 Which made thy closet much frequented
 By buxom lasses—some repented
 Their luckless choice of husbands—others,
 Impatient to be like their mothers,
 Receiv'd from thee profound directions
 How best to settle their affections.
 Thus thou, a friend to the distress'd,
 Didst in thy calling do thy best.

But now the Senate (if things bit,
 And thou at Stockbridge wert not bit)
 Must feel thy eloquence and fire,
 Approve thy schemes, thy wit admire,
 Thee with immortal honours crown,
 Whilst, Patriot-like, thou'lt strut and frown.

What though by enemies 'tis said,
 The laurel which adorns thy head,
 Must one day come in competition
 By virtue of some fly petition :
 Yet mum for that ; hope still the best,
 Nor let such cares disturb thy rest.

Methinks I hear thee loud as trumpet,
 As bag-pipe shrill, or oyster-strumpet ;
 Methinks I see thee, spruce and fine,
 With coat embroider'd richly shine,
 And dazzle all the idol faces
 As through the ball thy worship paces ;
 (Though this I speak but at a venture,
 Supposing thou hast tick with Hunter)
 Methinks I see a black-guard rout

Attend thy coach and hear them shout
 In approbation of thy tongue,
 Which (in their style) is purely bung,
 Now! now you carry all before you!

Nor dares one Jacobite or Tory
 Pretend to answer one syl—lable,
 Except the matchless hero Abel ‡.

What though her highness and her spouse
 In Antwerp § keep a frugal house,
 Yet, not forgetful of a friend,
 They'll soon enable thee to spend,
 If to Macartney || thou wilt coast,
 And to his pious patron's ghost.

Now manfully thou'lt run a tilt
 "On popes, for all the blood they've spilt,
 "For massacres, and racks, and flames,
 "For lands enrich'd by crimson streams,
 "For inquisitions taught by Spain,
 "Of which the Christian world complain."

Dick, we agree—all's true thou'lt said,
 As that my muse is yet a maid.
 But, if I may with freedom talk,
 All this is foreign to thy walk :
 Thy genius has perhaps a knack
 At trudging in a beaten track,
 But is for state affairs as fit
 As mine for politics and wit.

* This is said to be a plot of a comedy with which
 Mr. Steele has long threatened the town.

† Mr. Steele had a laboratory at Poplar.

Then let us both in time grow wise,
 Nor higher than our talents rise ;
 To some snug cellar let's repair
 From duns and debts, and drown our care ;
 Now quaff of honest ale a quart,
 Now venture at a pint of port,
 With which inspir'd, we'll club each night
 Some tender sonnet to indite,
 And with Tom D'Urfey, Philips, Dennis,
 Immortalize our Dolls and Jenneys.

HORACE, BOOK I. EP. V.

John Dennis the sheltering Poet's Invitation to Richard Steele, the secluded Party-writer, and Member, to come and live with him in the Mint. 1714.*

FIT TO BE BOUND UP WITH THE CRISIS.

If thou canst lay aside a spendthrift's air,
 And condescend to feed on homely fare,
 Such as we Minters, with ragouts unstor'd,
 Will, in defiance of the law, afford :
 Quit thy patrols with Toby's Christmas-box,
 And come to me at The Two Fighting Cocks ;
 Since printing by subscription now is grown
 The stalest, idlest cheat about the town ;
 And ev'n Charles Gildon, who, a Papist bred,
 Has an alarm against that worship spread,
 Is practising those beaten paths of cruising,
 And for new levies on Proposals musing.

'Tis true, that Bloomsbury Square's a noble place :
 But what are lofty buildings in thy case ?
 What's a fine house embellish'd to profusion,
 Where shoulder-dabbers are in execution ?
 Or whence its timorous tenant seldom fallies,
 But apprehensive of insulting bailiffs ?
 This once be mindful of a friend's advice,
 And cease to be improvidently nice ;
 Exchange the prospects that delude thy sight,
 From Highgate's steep ascent, and Hampstead's height,

With verdant scenes, that, from St. George's field,
 More durable and safe enjoyments yield.

Here I, ev'n I, that ne'er till now could find
 Ease to my troubled and suspicious mind,
 But ever was with jealousies possess'd,
 Am in a state of indolence and rest ;
 Fearful no more of Frenchmen in disguise,
 Nor looking upon strangers as on spies,
 But quite divested of my former spleen,
 Am unprovok'd without and calm within :
 And here I'll wait thy coming, till the sun
 Shall its diurnal course completely run.
 Think not that thou of sturdy butt shalt fail ;
 My landlord's cellar is stock'd with beer and ale,]
 With every sort of malt that is in use,
 And every county's generous produce.
 The ready (for here Christian faith is sick,
 Which makes us seldom trespass upon tick)
 Instantly brings the choicest liquors out,
 Whether we ask for home-brew'd or for stout,
 For mead or cyder, or, with dainties fed,
 Ring for a flask or two of white or red,

* This and the preceding poem are printed from copies in the Lambeth Library.

Such as the drawer will not fail to swear
Was drunk by Pilkington when third time mayor.
That name, methinks, so popularly known
For opposition to the church and crown,
Might make the Lusitanian grape to pass,
And almost give a sanction to the glass;
Especially with thee, whose hasty zeal
Against the late rejected commerce-bill
Made thee rise up, like an audacious elf,
To do the speaker honour, not thyself.

But, if thou soar'st above the common prices,
By virtue of subscription to thy Crisis,
And nothing can go down with thee, but wines
Press'd from Burgundian and Campanian vines,
Bid them be brought; for, though I hate the French,
I love their liquors, as though lov'st a wench;
Else thou must humble thy expensive taste,
And, with us, hold contentment for a feast.

The fire's already lighted; and the maid
Has a clean cloth upon the table laid,
Who never on a Saturday had struck,
But for thy entertainment, up a buck.
Think of this act of grace, which by your leave
Susan would not have done on Easter Eve,
Had she not been inform'd over and over,
'Twas for the ingenious Author of The Lover.

Cease therefore to beguile thyself with hopes,
Which is no more than making sandy ropes,
And quit the vain pursuit of loud applause,
That must bewilder thee in faction's cause.
Pry thee what is't to thee who guides the state?
Why Dunkirk's demolition is so late?
Or why her Majesty thinks fit to cease
The din of war, and hush the world to peace?
The clergy too, without thy aid, can tell
What texts to choose, and on what topics dwell;
And, uninstructed by thy babbling, teach
Their flocks celestial happiness to reach.
Rather let such poor souls as you and I
Say that the holidays are drawing nigh,
And that to-morrow's sun begins the week,
Which will abound with store of ale and cake,
With hams of bacon, and with powder'd beef,
Stuff'd to give field-itinerants relief.

Then I, who have within these precincts kept,
And ne'er beyond the chimney-sweeper's stept,
Will take a loose, and venture to be seen,
Since 'twill be Sunday, upon Shanks's green;
There, with erected looks and phrase sublime,
To talk of unity of place and time,
And with much malice, mix'd with little satire,
Explode the wits on t'other side o'th' water.

Why has my Lord Godolphin's special grace
Invested me with a queen's-waiter's place,
If I, debarr'd of festival delights,
Am not allow'd to spend the perquisites?
He's but a short remove from being mad,
Who at a time of jubilee is sad;
And, like a griping usurer, does spare
His money to be squander'd by his heir;
Flutter'd away in liveries and in coaches,
And washy sorts of feminine debauches.
As for my part, whatever the world may think,
I'll bid adieu to gravity, and drink;
And, though I can't put off a woeful mien,
Will be all mirth and cheerfulness within:
As, in despite of a censorious race,
I most incontinently suck my face.

What mighty projects does not he design, [wine?
Whose stomach flows, and brain turns round with Wine, powerful wine, can thaw the frozen cit,
And fashion him to humour and to wit;
Makes even S* to disclose his art,
By racking every secret from his heart,
As he flings off the statesman's fly disguise,
To name the cuckold's wife with whom he lies.
Ev'n Sarum, when he quaffs it stead of tea,
Fancies himself in Canterbury's see;
And S, when he carousing reels,
Imagines that he has regain'd the seals:
W, by virtue of its juice, can fight,
And Stanhope of commissioners make light.
Wine gives Lord William aptitude of parts,
And swells him with his family's deserts:
Whom can it not make eloquent of speech?
Whom in extremest poverty not rich?
Since, by the means of the prevailing grape,
Th*n can Lechmere's warmth not only ape,
But, half-seas-o'er, by its inspiring bounties,
Can qualify himself in several counties.
What I have promis'd, thou mayst rest assur'd,
Shall faithfully and gladly be procur'd.
Nay, I'm already better than my word,
New plates and knives adorn the jovial board:
And, lest thou at their sight shouldst make wry faces,
The girl has scower'd the pots, and wash'd the glasses,
Ta'en care so excellently well to clean 'em,
That thou mayst see thine own dear picture in 'em.

Moreover, due provision has been made,
That conversation may not be betray'd;
I have no company but what is proper
To sit with the most flagrant Whig at supper.
There's not a man among them but must please,
Since they're as like each other as are peas.
Toland and Hare have jointly sent me word,
They'll come; and Kennet thinks to make a third,
Provided he's no other invitation,
From men of greater quality and station.
Room will for Oldmixon and J—s be left;
But their discourses smell too much of theft:
There would be no abiding in the room,
Should two such ignorant pretenders come.
However, by this trusty bearer write,
If I should any other scabs invite;
Though if I may my serious judgment give,
I'm wholly for King Charles's number five:
That was the stint in which that monarch fix'd,
Who would not be with noisiness perplex'd:
And that, if thou'lt agree to think it best,
Shall be our tale of heads, without one other guest.

I've nothing more, now this is said, to say,
But to request thou'lt instantly away,
And leave the duties of thy present post,
To some well-skill'd retainer to a host;
Doubtless he'll carefully thy place supply,
And o'er his Grace's horses have an eye, [onec,
While thou, who'lt slunk through postern more than
Dost by that means avoid a crowd of duns,
And, crossing o'er the Thames at Temple-stairs,
Leav'st Philips with good words to cheat their ears.

TO LORD HARLEY,
ON HIS MARRIAGE, 1713.

AMONG the numbers who employ
Their tongues and pens to give you joy,

Dear Harley! generous youth, admit
What friendship dictates more than wit.

Forgive me, when I fondly thought
(By frequent observations taught)
A spirit so inform'd as yours
Could never prosper in amours.
'The God of Wit, and Light, and Arts,
With all acquir'd and natural parts,
Whose harp could savage beasts enchant,
Was an unfortunate gallant.
Had Bacchus after Daphne reel'd,
'The Nymph had soon been brought to yield:
Or, had embroider'd Mars pursued,
'The Nymph would ne'er have been a prude.
'Ten thousand footsteps, full in view,
Mark out the way where Daphne flew:
For such is all the sex's flight,
'They fly from learning, wit, and light:
'They fly, and none can overtake
But some gay coxcomb, or a rake.

How then, Dear Harley, could I guess
That you should meet, in love, success?
For, if those ancient tales be true,
Phœbus was beautiful as you:
Yet Daphne never slack'd her pace,
For wit and learning spoil'd his face.
And, since the same resemblance held
In gifts wherein you both excell'd,
I fancy'd every nymph would run
From you, as from Latona's son.

Then where, said I, shall Harley find
A virgin of superior mind,
With wit and virtue to discover,
And pay the merit of her lover?

This character shall Ca'endish claim,
Born to retrieve her sex's fame.
The chief among the glittering crowd,
Of titles, birth, and fortune proud,
(As fools are insolent and vain)
Madly aspir'd to wear her chain:
But Pallas, guardian of the Maid,
Descending to her charge's aid,
Held out Medusa's snaky locks,
Which stupify'd them all to stocks.
The Nymph with indignation view'd
The dull, the noisy, and the lewd:
For Pallas, with celestial light,
Had purify'd her mortal sight;
Show'd her the virtues all combin'd,
Fresh blooming, in young Harley's mind.

'Terrestrial nymphs, by former arts,
Display their various nets for hearts:
'Their looks are all by method set,
When to be prude, and when coquette;
Yet, wanting skill and power to choose,
'Their only pride is to refuse.
But, when a gooddeſs would beſtow
Her love on ſome bright youth below,
Round all the earth ſhe caſts her eyes;
And then, deſcending from the ſkies,
Makes choice of him ſhe fancies beſt,
And bids the raviſh'd youth be bleſs'd.

Thus the bright Empreſs of the Morn
Chose, for her ſpouſe, a mortal born:
'The Goddeſs made advances firſt;
Elſe what aſpiring hero durſt?
Though, like a virgin of fifteen,
She bluſhes when by mortals ſeen;

Still bluſhes, and with ſpeed retires,
When Sol purſues her with his fires.

Diana thus, Heaven's chaſteſt queen,
Struck with Endymion's graceful mien,
Down from her ſilver chariot came,
And to the Shepherd own'd her flame.

Thus Ca'endiſh, as Aurora bright,
And chaſter than the Queen of Night,
Deſcended from her ſphere, to find
A mortal of ſuperior kind.

IN SICKNESS.

Written in Ireland, October 1714.

'Tis true—then why ſhould I repine
To ſee my life ſo faſt decline?
But why obſcurely here alone,
Where I am neither lov'd nor known?
My ſtate of health none care to learn;
My life is here no ſoul's concern:
And thoſe with whom I now converſe,
Without a tear will tend my herſe.
Remov'd from kind Arbuthnot's aid,
Who knows his art, but not his trade,
Preferring his regard for me
Before his credit or his fee.

Some formal viſits, looks, and words,
What mere humanity affords,
I meet perhaps from three or four,
From whom I once expected more;
Which thoſe who tend the ſick for pay
Can act as decently as they:
But no obliging tender friend
To help at my approaching end.
My life is now a burden grown
To others, ere it be my own.

Ye formal weepers for the ſick,
In your laſt offices be quick;
And ſpare my abſent friends the grief
To hear, yet give me no relief;
Expir'd to-day, intomb'd to-morrow,
When known, will ſave a double ſorrow.

THE FABLE OF THE BITCHES.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1715.

On an Attempt to repeal the Teſt Act.

A BITCH that was full pregnant grown,
By all the dogs and curs in town,
Finding her ripen'd time was come,
Her litter teeming from her womb,
Went here and there, and every where,
To find an eaſy place to lay-her.

At length to Muſic's houſe* ſhe came,
And begg'd like one both blind and lame;
"My only friend, my dear," ſaid ſhe,
"You ſee 'tis mere neceſſity
"Hath ſent me to your houſe to whelp;
"I'll die, if you deny your help."

With fawning whine, and rueful tone,
With artful ſigh and feigned groan,
With couchant cringe, and flattering tale,
Smooth Bawty† did ſo far prevail,

* The Church of England.

† A Scotch name for a bitch; alluding to the kirk.

That Music gave her leave to litter :
But mark what follow'd—faith ! she bit her.

Whole baskets full of bits and scraps,
And broth enough to fill her paps ;
For well she knew, her numerous brood,
For want of milk, would suck her blood.

But when she thought her pains were done,
And now 'twas high time to be gone ;
In civil terms—" My friend," says she,
" My house you 've had on courtesy ;
" And now I earnestly desire,
" That you would with your cubs retire :
" For, should you stay but one week longer,
" I shall be starv'd with cold and hunger."

The guest reply'd—" My friend, your leave
" I must a little longer crave ;
" Stay till my tender cubs can find
" Their way—for now, you see, they 're blind ;
" But, when we 've gather'd strength, I swear,
" We 'll to our barn again repair."

The time pass'd on ; and Music came,
Her kennel once again to claim ;
But Bawty, lost to shame and honour,
Set all her cubs at once upon her ;
Made her retire, and quit her right,
And loudly cry'd—" A bite ! a bite !"

THE MORAL.

Thus did the Grecian wooden horse
Conceal a fatal armed force :
No sooner brought within the walls,
But Ilium's lost, and Priam falls.

HORACE, BOOK III. ODE II.

TO THE EARL OF OXFORD, LATE LORD TREASURER.

Sent to him when in the Tower, 1716.

How blest is he who for his country dies,
Since Death pursues the coward as he flies !
The youth in vain would fly from Fate's attack,
With trembling knees and terror at his back ;
Though Fear should lend him pinions like the wind,
Yet swifter Fate will seize him from behind.

Virtue repuls'd, yet knows not to repine,
But shall with unattained honour shine ;
Nor stoops to take the staff*, nor lays it down,
Just as the rabble please to smile or frown.

Virtue, to crown her favourites, loves to try
Some new unbeaten passage to the sky ;
Where Jove a seat among the gods will give
To those who die for meriting to live.

Next, faithful Silence hath a sure reward ;
Within our breast be every secret barr'd !
He who betrays his friend, shall never be
Under one roof, or in one ship, with me.
For who with traitors would his safety trust,
Lest, with the wicked, heaven involve the just ?
And, though the villain 'scape awhile, he feels
Slow vengeance, like a blood-hound, at his heels.

The ensign of the Lord Treasurer's office.

PHYLLIS ;

OR, THE PROGRESS OF LOVE, 1716.

Desponding Phyllis was endued
With every talent of a prude :
She trembled when a man drew near ;
Salute her, and she turn'd her ear ;
If o'er against her you were plac'd,
She durst not look above your waist :
She 'd rather take you to her bed,
Than let you see her dress her head :
In church you hear her, through the crowd,
Repeat the absolution loud :
In church, secure behind her fan,
She durst behold that monster man ;
There practis'd how to place her head,
And bit her lips to make them red ;
Or, on the mat devoutly kneeling,
Would lift her eyes up to the cieling,
And heave her bosom unaware,
For neighbouring beaux to see it bare.

At length a lucky lover came,
And found admittance to the dame.
Suppose all parties now agreed,
The writings drawn, the lawyer fee'd,
The vicar and the ring bespoke :
Guests, how could such a match be broke ?
See then what mortals place their bliss in !
Next morn betimes the bride was missing :
The mother scream'd, the father chid ;
Where can this idle wench be hid ?
No news of Phyl ! the bridegroom came,
And thought his bride had skulk'd for shame ;
Because her father us'd to say,
The girl had such a bashful way !

Now John the butler must be sent
To learn the road that Phyllis went.
The groom was wish'd to saddle Crop ;
For John must neither light nor stop,
But find her, wherefoe'er she fled,
And bring her back, alive or dead.

See here again the devil to do !
For truly John was missing too :
The horse and pillion both were gone !
Phyllis, it seems, was fled with John.

Old Madam, who went up to find
What papers Phyl had left behind,
A letter on the toilet sees,
To my much-honour'd father—these—
('Tis always done, romances tell us,
When daughters run away with fellows)
Fill'd with the choicest common-places,
By others us'd in the like cases.

" That long ago a fortune-teller
" Exactly said what now befel her ;
" And in a glass had made her see
" A serving-man of low degree.
" It was her fate, must be forgiven ;
" For marriages were made in heaven :
" His pardon begg'd : but, to be plain,
" She 'd do 't, if 'twere to do again :
" Thank'd God, 'twas neither shame nor sin ;
" For John was come of honest kin.
" Love never thinks of rich and poor :
" She 'd beg with John from door to door.
" Forgive her, if it be a crime ;
" She 'll never do 't another time.

"She ne'er before in all her life
 "Once disobey'd him, maid nor wife.
 "One argument she summ'd up all in,
 "The thing was done, and past recalling;
 "And therefore hop'd she should recover
 "His favour, when his passion's over.
 "She valued not what others thought her,
 "And was—his most obedient daughter."

Fair maidens, all attend the Muse,
 Who now the wandering pair pursues:
 Away they rode in homely sort,
 Their journey long, their money short;
 The loving couple well bemir'd;
 The horse and both the riders tir'd:
 Their victuals bad, their lodging worse;
 Phyl cry'd, and John began to curse;
 Phyl wish'd that she had strain'd a limb,
 When first she ventur'd out with him;
 John wish'd that he had broke a leg,
 When first for her he quitted Peg.

But what adventures more befel them,
 The Muse hath now no time to tell them,
 How Johnny wheedled, threaten'd, fawn'd,
 Till Phyllis all her trinkets pawn'd:
 How oft' she broke her marriage vows
 In kindness to maintain her spouse,
 Till swains unwholesome spoil'd the trade;
 For now the surgeons must be paid,
 To whom those perquisites are gone,
 In Christian justice due to John.

When food and raiment now grew scarce,
 Fate put a period to the farce,
 And with exact poetic justice;
 For John was landlord, Phyllis hostess;
 They kept, at Staines, the Old Blue Boar,
 Are cat and dog, and rogue and whore.

AD AMICUM ERUDITUM

THOMAM SHERIDAN, 1717.

DELICIÆ Sheridan Musarum, dulcis amice,
 Si tibi propitius Permessi ad flumen Apollo
 Occurrat, seu te mimum convivia rident,
 Æquivocosque sales spargis, seu ludere versu
 Ma'les; dic, Sheridan, quisnam fuit ille deorum,
 Quæ melior natura orto tibi tradidit artem
 Rimandi genium puerorum, atque ima cerebri
 Scrutandi? Tibi nascenti ad cunabula Pallas
 Astitit; & dixit, mentis præfaga futuræ,
 Heu, puer infelix! nostro sub sidere natus;
 Nam tu pectus eris sine corpore, corporis umbra;
 Sed levitate umbram superabis, voce cicadam:
 Musca femur, palmas tibi mus dedit, ardea crura.
 Corpore sed tenui tibi quod natura negavit,
 Hoc animi dotes supplebunt; teque docente,
 Nec longum tempus, surget tibi docta juvenus,
 Artibus egregiis animas instructa novellas.
 Grex hinc Pæonius venit, ecce, salutifer orbi.
 Ast, illi causas orant; his insula visa est
 Divinam capiti nodo constringere mitram.

Natalis te horæ non fallunt signa, sed usque
 Conscius, expeditas puero seu lætus Apollo
 Nascenti arrisit; sive illum frigidus horror
 Saturni premit, aut septem inflavere triones.

Quin tu altè penitusque latentia semina cernis,
 Quæque diu obtundendo olim sub luminis auras

Erumpent, promiss; quo ritu sæpè puella
 Sub cinere hesternis sopitos suscitatur ignes.
 Te dominum agnoscit quocunque sub ære natus;
 Quos indulgentis nimium custodia matris
 Pessundat: nam sæpè vides in stipite matrem.
 Aureus at ramus, venerandæ dona Sibyllæ,
 Æneæ sedes tantum patefecit Avernus;
 Sæpè puer tua quem tetigit semel aurea virga
 Cælumque terrasque videt, noctemque profundam.

HORACE, BOOK IV. ODE IX.

ADDRESSED TO ARCHBISHOP KING, 1718.

VIRTUE conceal'd within our breast,
 Is inactivity at best:
 But never shall the muse endure
 To let your virtues lie obscure,
 Or suffer Envy to conceal
 Your labours for the public weal.
 Within your breast all wisdom lies,
 Either to govern or advise;
 Your steady soul preserves her frame
 In good and evil times the same.
 Pale Avarice and lurking Fraud
 Stand in your sacred presence aw'd;
 Your hand alone from gold abstains,
 Which drags the slavish world in chains.

Him for a happy man I own,
 Whose fortune is not overgrown;
 And happy he, who wisely knows
 To use the gifts that Heaven bestows;
 Or, if it please the Powers Divine,
 Can suffer want, and not repine.
 The man who, infamy to shun,
 Into the arms of death would run,
 That man is ready to defend
 With life his country, or his friend.

TO MR. DELANY, Nov. 10. 1718.

To you, whose virtues, I must own
 With shame, I have too lately known;
 To you, by art and nature taught
 To be the man I long have sought,
 Had not ill fate, perverse and blind,
 Plac'd you in life too far behind;
 Or, what I should repine at more,
 Plac'd me in life too far before:
 To you the muse this verse bestows,
 Which might as well have been in prose;
 No thought, no fancy, no sublime,
 But simple topics told in rhyme.

Talents for conversation fit,
 Are humour, breeding, sense, and wit;
 The last, as boundless as the wind,
 Is well conceiv'd, though not defin'd:

For, sure, by wit is chiefly meant
 Applying well what we invent.
 What humour is, not all the tribe
 Of logic-mongers can describe;
 Here nature only acts her part,
 Unhelp'd by practice, books, or arts:
 For wit and humour differ quite;
 That gives surprise, and this delight.
 Humour is odd, grotesque, and wild,
 Only by affectation spoil'd:

'Tis never by invention got,
Men have it when they know it not.

Our conversation to refine,
Humour and wit must both combine:
From both we learn to railly well,
Wherein sometimes the French excel.
Voiture, in various lights, displays
That irony which turns to praise:
His genius first found out the rule
For an obliging ridicule:
He flatters with peculiar air
The brave, the witty, and the fair:
And fools would fancy he intends
A satire, where he most commends.

But, as a poor pretending beau,
Because he fain would make a show,
Nor can arrive at silver lace,
Takes up with copper in the place:
So the pert dunces of mankind,
Whene'er they would be thought refin'd,
As if the difference lay abstruse
'Twixt raillery and gross abuse;
To show their parts, will scold and rail,
Like porters o'er a pot of ale.
Such is that clan of boisterous bears,
Always together by the ears;
Shrewd fellows and arch wags, a tribe
That meet for nothing but a gibe;
Who first run one another down,
And then fall foul on all the town;
Skill'd in the horse-laugh and dry rub,
And call'd by excellence The Club.

I mean your Butler, Dawson, Car,
All special friends, and always jar.
The mettled and the vicious steed
Differ as little in their breed;
Nay, Voiture is as like Tom Leigh
As rudeness is to repartee.

If what you said I wish unspoke,
'Twill not suffice it was a joke:
Reproach not, though in jest, a friend
For those defects he cannot mend;
His lineage, calling, shape, or sense,
If nam'd with scorn, gives just offence.

What use in life to make men fret,
Part in worse humour than they met?
Thus all society is lost,
Men laugh at one another's cost;
And half the company is teaz'd,
That came together to be pleas'd:
For all buffoons have most in view
To please themselves by vexing you.

You wonder now to see me write
So gravely on a subject light:
Some part of what I here design,
Regards a friend* of yours and mine;
Who, neither void of sense nor wit,
Yet seldom judges what is fit,
But sallies oft' beyond his bounds,
And takes unmeasurable rounds.

When jests are carried on too far,
And the loud laugh begins the war,
You keep your countenance for shame,
Yet still you think your friend to blame:
For, though men cry they love a jest,
'Tis but when others stand the test;

* Dr. Sheridan.

And (would you have their meaning known)
They love a jest that is their own.

You must, although the point be nice,
Bestow your friend some good advice:
One hint from you will set him right,
And teach him how to be polite.
Bid him, like you, observe with care,
Whom to be hard on, whom to spare;
Nor indistinctly to suppose
All subjects like Dan Jackson's nose*.
To study the obliging jest,
By reading those who teach it best;
For prose I recommend Voiture's,
For verse (I speak my judgment) yours.
He'll find the secret out from thence,
To rhyme all day without offence;
And I no more shall then accuse
The flirts of his ill-manner'd muse.

If he be guilty, you must mend him;
If he be innocent, defend him.

A LEFT-HANDED LETTER TO DR. SHERIDAN†. 1718.

S I R,

DELANY reports it, and he has a shrewd tongue,
That we both act the part of the clown and cow-
dung; [burst,
We lie cramming ourselves, and are ready to
Yet still are no wiser than we were at first.

*Pudet hæc opprobria, I freely must tell ye,
Et dici potuisse, et non potuisse refelli.*

Though Delany advis'd you to plague me no longer,
You reply and rejoin like Hoadly of Bangor.
I must now, at one sitting, pay off my old score;
How many to answer? One, two, three, four.
But, because the three former are long ago past,
I shall, for method sake, begin with the last.
You treat me like a boy that knocks down his foe,
Who, 'ere t'other gets up, demands the rising blow.
Yet I know a young rogue, that, thrown flat on the field,

Would, as he lay under, cry out, Sirrah! yield,
So the French, when our Generals soundly did pay 'em, [Deum.

Went triumphant to church, and sang stoutly Te
So the famous Tom Leigh, when quite runaground,
Comes off by out-laughing the company round.
In every vile pamphlet you'll read the same fancies,
Having thus overthrown all our further advances.
My offers of peace you ill understood: [good?
Friend Sheridan, when will you know your own
'Twas to teach you in modester language your duty;

For, were you a dog, I could not be rude t'ye;
As a good quiet soul, who no mischief intends,
To a quarrelsome fellow, cries, Let us be friends.
But we like Antæus and Hercules fight;
The oftener you fall, the oftener you write:
And I'll use you as he did that overgrown clown,
I'll first take you up, and then take you down:
And, 'tis your own case, for you never can wound
The worst dunce in your school, till he's heav'd from the ground.

* Which was afterwards the subject of several poems
by Dr. Swift and others.

† The humour of this poem is partly lost, by the impossibility of printing it left-handed as it was written.

I beg your pardon for using my left hand, but I was in great haste, and the other hand was employed at the same time in writing some letters of business.—I will send you the rest when I have leisure: but pray come to dinner with the company you met here last.

A MOTTO FOR MR. JASON HASARD,

WOOLEN-DRAPER IN DUBLIN,

Whose Sign was the GOLDEN FLEECE.

JASON, the valiant prince of Greece,
From Colchos brought the Golden Fleece:
We comb the wool, refine the stuff,
For modern Jason, that's enough.
Oh! could we tame yon watchful * Dragon,
Old Jason would have less to brag on.

TO DR. SHERIDAN. 1718.

WHATE'ER your predecessors taught us,
I have a great esteem for Plautus;
And think your boys may gather there-hence
More wit and humour than from Terence.
But as to comic Aristophanes,
The rogue too vicious and too prophane is.
I went in vain to look for Eupolis
Down in the Strand†, just where the New Pole is;
For I can tell you one thing, that I can
(You will not find it in the Vatican).
He and Cratinus us'd, as Horace says,
To take his greatest grandees for asses.
Poets, in those days, us'd to venture high;
But these are lost full many a century.
Thus you may see, dear friend, ex pede hence,
My judgment of the old comedians.

Proceed to tragics: first, Euripides
(An author where I sometimes dip a-days)
Is rightly censured by the Stagirite,
Who says his numbers do not fadge aright.
A friend of mine that author despises
So much, he swears the very best piece is,
For aught he knows, as bad as Thespis's;
And that a woman, in these tragedies,
Commonly speaking, but a sad jade is.
At least, I'm well assur'd, that no folk lays
The weight on him they do on Sophocles.
But, above all, I prefer Æschylus,
Whose moving touches, when they please, kill us.

And now I find my muse but ill able,
To hold out longer in trifflable.
I chose those rhymes out for their difficulty;
Will you return as hard ones if I call t'ye?

STELLA'S BIRTH-DAY,

MARCH 13. 1718-19.

STELLA this day is thirty-four,
(We sha'n't dispute a year or more):
However, Stella, be not troubled,
Although thy size and years are doubled,
Since first I saw thee at sixteen,
The brightest virgin on the green:

* England.

† The fact may be true; but the rhyme cost me some trouble.

So little is thy form declin'd:
Made up so largely in thy mind.

Oh, would it please the gods to split
Thy beauty, size, and years, and wit!
No age could furnish out a pair
Of nymphs so graceful, wise, and fair;
With half the lustre of your eyes,
With half your wit, your years, and size,
And then, before it grew too late,
How should I beg of gentle Fate
(That either nymph might have her swain)
To split my worship too in twain!

DR. SHERIDAN TO DR. SWIFT. 1719.

DEAR Dean, since in cruxes and puns you and I deal,

Pray why is a woman a sieve and a riddle?
'Tis a thought that came into my noddle this morning,

In bed as I lay, Sir, a-tossing and turning.
You'll find, if you read but a few of your histories,
All women as Eve, all women are mysteries.
To find out this riddle I know you'll be eager,
And make every one of the sex a Belphegor.
But that will not do, for I mean to commend them;
I swear without jest, I an honour intend them.
In a sieve, Sir, their ancient extraction I quite tell,
In a riddle I give you their power and their title.
This I told you before: do you know what I mean, Sir?

"Not I, by my troth, Sir."—Then read it again,
Sir.

The reason I send you these lines of rhymes double,
Is purely through pity, to save you the trouble
Of thinking two hours for a rhyme as you did last
When your Pegasus canter'd it triple, and rid fast.
As for my little nag, which I keep at Parnassus,
With Phœbus's leave, to run with his asses,
He goes slow and sure, and he never is jaded,
While your fiery steed is whipp'd, spurr'd, basti-
naded.

THE DEAN'S ANSWER.

IN reading your letter alone in my hackney,
Your damnable riddle my poor brains did rack
nigh:

And when with much labour the matter I crackt,
I found you mistaken in matter of fact.

A woman's no sieve (for with that you begin),
Because she lets out more than e'er she takes in.
And that she's a riddle, can never be right,
For a riddle is dark, but a woman is light.
But, grant her a sieve, I can say something archer,
Pray what is a man? he's a fine linen searcher.

Now tell me a thing that wants interpretation,
What name for a * maid, was the first man's damnation?

If your worship will please to explain me this rebus,
I swear from henceforward you shall be my Phœbus.

From my hackney-coach, Sept. 11. }
1719, past 12. at noon. }

STELLA'S BIRTH-DAY, 1720.

ALL travellers at first incline
Where-e'er they see the fairest sign;
And, if they find the chambers neat,
And like the liquor and the meat,
Will call again, and recommend
The Angel-inn to every friend.
What though the painting grows decay'd,
The house will never lose its trade:
Nay, though the treacherous tapster Thomas
Hangs a new Angel two doors from us,
As fine as daubers' hands can make it,
In hopes that strangers may mistake it,
We think it both a shame and sin
To quit the true old Angel-inn.

Now this is Stella's case in fact,
An angel's face a little crack'd
(Could poets or could painters fix
How angels look at thirty-six):
This drew us in at first to find
In such a form an angel's mind;
And every virtue now supplies
The fainting rays of Stella's eyes.
See at her levee crowding swains,
Whom Stella freely entertains
With breeding, humour, wit, and sense;
And puts them but to small expence;
Their mind so plentifully fills,
And makes such reasonable bills,
So little gets for what she gives,
We really wonder how she lives!
And, had her stock been less, no doubt
She must have long ago run out.

Then who can think we'll quit the place
When Doll hangs out a newer face?
Or stop and light at Cloc's head,
With scraps and leavings to be fed?

Then, Clœe, still go on to prate
Of thirty-six and thirty-eight;
Pursue your trade of scandal-picking,
Your hints that Stella is no chicken;
Your innuendos, when you tell us,
That Stella loves to talk with fellows;
And let me warn you to believe
A truth, for which your soul should grieve;
That, should you live to see the day
When Stella's locks must all be gray,
When age must print a furrow'd trace:
On every feature of her face;
Though you, and all your senseless tribe,
Could art, or time, or nature bribe,
To make you look like Beauty's Queen,
And hold for ever at fifteen;
No bloom of youth can ever blind
The cracks and wrinkles of your mind:
All men of sense will pass your door,
And crowd to Stella's at fourscore.

TO STELLA,

Who collected and transcribed his Poems. 1720.

As, when a lofty pile is rais'd,
We never hear the workmen prais'd,
Who bring the lime, or place the stones;
But all admire Inigo Jones;

So, if this pile of scattered rhymes
Should be approv'd in after times;
If it both pleases and endures,
The merit and the praise are yours.

Thou, Stella, wert no longer young,
When first for thee my harp was strung,
Without one word of Cupid's darts,
Of killing eyes, or bleeding hearts?
With Friendship and Esteem possest,
I ne'er admitted Love a guest.

In all the habitudes of life,
The friend, the mistress, and the wife,
Variety we still pursue,
In pleasure seek for something new;
Or else, comparing with the rest,
Take comfort, that our own is best;
The best we value by the worst,
(As tradesmen show their trash at first);
But his pursuits were at an end,
Whom Stella chooses for a friend.

A poet starving in a garret,
Conning all topics like a parrot,
Invokes his mistress and his muse,
And stays at home for want of shoes:
Should but his muse descending drop
A slice of bread and mutton-chop;
Or kindly, when his credit's out,
Surprise him with a pint of stout;
Or patch his broken stocking-foals,
Or send him in a peck of coals;
Exalted in his mighty mind,
He flies, and leaves the stars behind;
Counts all his labours amply paid,
Adores her for the timely aid.

Or, should a porter make inquiries
For Chloe, Sylvia, Phyllis, Iris;
Be told the lodging, lane, and sign,
The bowers that hold those nymphs divine,
Fair Chloe would perhaps be found
With footmen tippling under ground;
The charming Sylvia beating flax,
Her shoulders mark'd with bloody tracks;
Bright Phyllis mending ragged smocks,
And radiant Iris in the pox.
These are the goddesses enroll'd
In Curll's collection, new and old,
Whose scoundrel fathers would not know 'em,
If they should meet them in a poem.

True poets can depress and raise,
Are Lords of infamy and praise;
They are not scurrilous in satire,
Nor will in panegyric flatter.
Unjustly poets we asperse;
Truth shines the brighter clad in verse;
And all the fictions they pursue,
Do but insinuate what is true.

Now, should my praises owe their truth
To beauty, dress, or paint, or youth,
What Stoics call without our power,
They could not be insur'd an hour:
'Twere grafting on an annual stock,
That must our expectation mock,
And, making one luxuriant shoot,
Die the next year for want of root:
Before I could my verses bring,
Perhaps you're quite another thing.

So Mævius, when he drain'd his skull
To celebrate some suburb trull,

His similes in order set,
And every crambo he could get,
Had gone through all the common-places
Worn out by wits, who rhyme on faces:
Before he could his poem close,
The lovely nymph had lost her nose,

Your virtues safely I commend;
They on no accidents depend:
Let malice look with all her eyes,
She dares not say the poet lies.

Stella, when you these lines transcribe,
Lest you should take them for a bribe,
Resolv'd to mortify your pride,
I'll here expose your weaker side.

Your spirits kindle to a flame,
Mov'd with the lightest touch of blame;
And, when a friend in kindness tries
To show you where your error lies,
Conviction does but more incense;
Perverseness is your whole defence;
Truth, judgment, wit, give place to spight,
Regardless both of wrong and right;
Your virtues all suspended wait
Till time hath open'd reason's gate;
And, what is worse, your passion bends
Its force against your nearest friends,
Which manners, decency, and pride,
Have taught you from the world to hide:
In vain; for, see, your friend hath brought
To public light your only fault;
And yet a fault we often find
Mix'd in a noble generous mind;
And may compare to Aetna's fire,
Which, though with trembling, all admire;
The heat, that makes the summit glow,
Enriching all the vales below,
Those who in warmer climes complain
From Phœbus' rays they suffer pain,
Must own that pain is largely paid
By generous wines beneath a shade.

Yet, when I find your passions rise,
And anger sparkling in your eyes,
I grieve those spirits should be spent,
For nobler ends by nature meant.
One passion with a different turn
Makes wit inflame, or anger burn:
So the sun's heat with different powers
Ripens the grape, the liquor fours:
Thus Ajax, when with rage possess'd
By Pallas breath'd into his breast,
His valour would no more employ,
Which might alone have conquer'd Troy;
But, blinded by resentment, seeks
For vengeance on his friends the Greeks.

You think this turbulence of blood
From stagnating preserves the blood,
Which thus fermenting by degrees
Exalts the spirits, sinks the lees.

Stella, for once you reason wrong;
For, should this ferment last too long,
By time subsiding, you may find
Nothing but acid left behind;
From passion you may then be freed,
When peevishness and spleen succeed.

Say, Stella, when you copy next,
Will you keep strictly to the text?
Dare you let these reproaches stand,
And to your failing set your hand?

Or, if these lines your anger fire,
Shall they in baser flames expire?
Whene'er they burn, if burn they must,
They'll prove my accusation just.

TO STELLA,

Visiting me in my Sickness, 1720.

PALLAS, observing Stella's wit
Was more than for her sex was fit,
And that her beauty, soon or late,
Might breed confusion in the state,
In high concern for human kind,
Fix'd honour in her infant mind.

But (not in wranglings to engage
With such a stupid vicious age)
If honour I would here define,
It answers faith in things divine,
As natural life the body warms,
And, scholars teach, the soul informs;
So honour animates the whole,
And is the spirit of the soul.

Those numerous virtues which the tribes
Of tedious moralists describe,
And by such various titles call,
True honour comprehends them all.
Let melancholy rule supreme,
Choler preside, or blood, or phlegm,
It makes no difference in the case,
Nor is complexion honour's place.

But, lest we should for honour take
The drunken quarrels of a rake;
Or think it seated in a scar,
Or on a proud triumphal car,
Or in the payment of a debt
We lose with sharpeners at picquet;
Or when a whore in her vocation
Keeps punctual to her assignation;
Or that on which his Lordship swears,
When vulgar knaves would lose their ears;
Let Stella's fair example preach
A lesson she alone can teach.

In points of honour to be try'd,
All passions must be laid aside:
Ask no advice, but think alone;
Suppose the question not your own.
How shall I act? is not the case;
But how would Brutus in my place?
In such a case would Cato bleed?
And how would Socrates proceed?

Drive all objections from your mind,
Else you relapse to human kind:
Ambition, avarice, and lust,
And factious rage, and breach of trust,
And flattery tipt with nauseous sneer,
And guilty shame, and servile fear,
Envy, and cruelty, and pride,
Will in your tainted heart preside.

Heroes and heroines of old
By honour only were enroll'd
Among their brethren in the skies,
To which (though late) shall Stella rise
Ten thousand oaths upon record
Are not so sacred as her word:
The world shall in its atoms end,
Ere Stella can deceive a friend.

By honour seated in her breast
 She still determines what is best:
 What indignation in her mind
 Against enslavers of mankind!
 Base kings, and ministers of state,
 Eternal objects of her hate!

She thinks that nature ne'er design'd
 Courage to man alone confin'd.
 Can cowardice her sex adorn,
 Which most exposes ours to scorn?
 She wonders where the charm appears
 In Florimel's affected fears;
 For Stella never learn'd the art
 At proper times to scream and start;
 Nor calls up all the house at night,
 And swears she saw a thing in white.
 Doll never flies to cut her face,
 Or throw cold water in her face,
 Because she heard a sudden drum,
 Or found an earwig in a plum.

Her hearers are amaz'd from whence
 Proceeds that fund of wit and sense;
 Which, though her modesty would shroud,
 Breaks like the sun behind a cloud;
 While gracefulness its art conceals,
 And yet through every motion steals.

Say, Stella, was Prometheus blind,
 And, forming you, mistook your kind?
 No; 'twas for you alone he stole
 The fire that forms a manly soul;
 Then, to complete it every way,
 He moulded it with female clay:
 To that you owe the nobler flame,
 To this the beauty of your frame.

How would ingratitude delight,
 And how would censure glut her spite,
 If I should Stella's kindness hide
 In silence, or forget with pride!
 When on my sickly couch I lay,
 Impatient both of night and day,
 Lamenting in unmanly strains,
 Call'd every power to ease my pains;
 Then Stella ran to my relief
 With cheerful face and inward grief:
 And, though by Heaven's severe decree
 She suffers hourly more than me,
 No cruel master could require,
 From slaves employed for daily hire,
 What Stella, by her friendship warm'd,
 With vigour and delight perform'd:
 My sinking spirits now supplies
 With cordials in her hands and eyes;
 Now with a soft and silent tread
 Unheard she moves about my bed.
 I see her taste each nauseous draught;
 And so obligingly am caught,
 I bless the hand from whence they came,
 Nor dare distort my face for shame.

Best pattern of true friends! beware:
 You pay too dearly for your care,
 If, while your tenderness secures
 My life, it must endanger your's;
 For such a fool was never found,
 Who pull'd a palace to the ground,
 Only to have the ruins made
 Materials for a house decay'd.

AN ELEGY

ON THE DEATH OF DEMAR, THE USURER.

Who died the 6th of July 1720.

Know all men by these presents, Death the tamer,
 By mortgage, hath secur'd the corpse of Demar:
 Nor can four hundred thousand sterling pound
 Redeem him from his prison under ground.
 His heirs might well, of all his wealth possess'd,
 Bestow to bury him one iron chest.
 Plutus the god of wealth will joy to know
 His faithful steward in the shades below,
 He walk'd the streets, and wore a threadbare cloak;
 He din'd and supp'd at charge of other folk:
 And by his looks, had he held out his palms,
 He might be thought an object fit for alms.
 So, to the poor, if he refus'd his pelf,
 He us'd them full as kindly as himself.

Where'er he went, he never saw his betters;
 Lords, knights, and squires, were all his humble
 And under band and seal the Irish nation [debtors;
 Were forc'd to own to him their obligation.

He that could once have half a kingdom bought,
 In half a minute is not worth a groat.
 His coffers from the coffin could not save,
 Nor all his interest keep him from the grave.
 A golden monument would not be right,
 Because we wish the earth upon him light.

Oh London tavern *! thou hast lost a friend,
 Though in thy walls he ne'er did farthing spend:
 He touch'd the pence, when others touch'd the pot;
 The hand that sign'd the mortgage paid the shot.

Old as he was, no vulgar known disease
 On him could ever boast a power to seize;
 "† But, as he weigh'd his gold, grim Death in
 "spight

"Cast in his dart, which made three moidores light;
 "And, as he saw his darling money fail,
 "Blew his last breath, to sink the lighter scale."
 He who so long was current, 'twould be strange
 If he should now be cry'd down since his change.

The sexton shall green sods on thee bestow;
 Alas, the sexton is thy banker now!
 A dismal banker must that banker be,
 Who gives no bills but of mortality.

EPITAPH ON A MISER.

BENEATH this verdant hillock lies
 Demar, the wealthy and the wise.
 His heirs, that he might safely rest,
 Have put his carcase in a chest;
 The very chest in which, they say,
 His other self, his money, lay.
 And, if his heirs continue kind
 To that dear self he left behind,
 I dare believe, that four in five
 Will think his better half alive.

TO MRS. HOUGHTON OF BORMOUNT,

Upon praising her Husband to Dr. Swift.

You always are making a god of your spouse;
 But this neither reason nor conscience allows:

* A tavern in Dublin, where Demar kept his office.

† These four lines were written by Stella.

Perhaps you will say, 'tis in gratitude due,
And you adore him, because he adores you.
Your argument's weak, and so you will find;
For you, by this rule, must adore all mankind.

VERSES WRITTEN ON A WINDOW,

At the Deanry House, St. Patrick's.

ARE the guests of this house still doom'd to be cheated? [be treated.
Sure the fates have decreed they by halves should
In the days of good John *, if you came here to dine, [wine.
You had choice of good meat, but no choice of good
In Jonathan's reign, if you come here to eat,
You have choice of good wine, but no choice of good meat.
O Jove! then how fully might all fides be blest,
Wouldst thou but agree to this humble request;
Put both deans in one; or, if that's too much trouble,
Instead of the deans, make the deanry double.

ON ANOTHER WINDOW †.

A BARD on whom Phœbus his spirit bestow'd,
Resolving t' acknowledge the bounty he ow'd,
Found out a new method at once of confessing,
And making the most of so mighty a blessing:
To the god he'd be grateful; but mortals he'd choose,
By making his patron preside in his house;
And wisely foresaw this advantage from thence,
That the god would in honour bear most of th'
expence: [treat
So the bard he finds drink, and leaves Phœbus to
With the thoughts he inspires, regardless of meat.
Hence they that come hither expecting to dine,
Are always fobb'd off with sheer wit and sheer wine.

APOLLO TO THE DEAN, 1720.

RIGHT trusty, and so forth—we let you to know,
We are very ill us'd by you mortals below.
For first, I have often by chemists been told,
Though I know nothing on 't, it is I that make gold, [it,
Which when you have got, you so carefully hide
That, since I was born, I hardly have spy'd it.
Then it must be allow'd, that, whenever I shine,
I forward the grass, and I ripen the vine;
To me the good fellows apply for relief, [beef:
Without whom they could neither get claret nor Yet their wine and their victuals these curmudgeon lubbards
Lock up from my sight in cellars and cupboards.
That I have an ill eye, they wickedly think,
And taint all their meat, and sour all their drink.
But, thirdly and lastly, it must be allow'd.
I alone can inspire the poetical crowd:
This is gratefully own'd by each boy in the college,
Whom if I inspire, it is not to my knowledge.

* Dean Sterne was distinguished for his hospitality.

† By Dr. Delany, in conjunction with Stella.

This every pretender to rhyme will admit,
Without troubling his head about judgment or wit.
These gentlemen use me with kindness and freedom; [em:
And as for their works, when I please I may read
They lie open on purpose on counters and stalls;
And the titles I view, when I shine on the walls.
But a comrade of yours, that traitor Delany,
Whom I for your sake love better than any,
And, of my mere motion and special good grace,
Intended in time to succeed in your place,
On Tuesday the tenth seditiously came
With a certain false traitress, one Stella by name,
To the deanry house, and on the north glass,
Where, for fear of the cold, I never can pass,
Then and there, vi et armis, with a certain utensil,
Of value five shillings, in English a pencil,
Did maliciously, falsely, and traiterously write,
Whilst Stella aforesaid stood by with a light.
My sister had lately depos'd upon oath,
That she stopt in her course to look at them both:
That Stella was helping, abetting, and aiding:
And still as he writ, stood smiling and reading:
That her eyes were as bright as myself at noon-
day, [with gray;
But her graceful black locks were all mingled
And by the description I certainly know,
'Tis the nymph that I courted some ten years ago;
Whom when I with the best of my talents endued
On her promise of yielding, she acted the prude:
That some verses were writ with felonious intent,
Direct to the north, where I never yet went:
That the letters appeared revers'd through the pane, [again;
But in Stella's bright eyes they were plac'd right
Wherein she distinctly could read every line,
And presently guess that the fancy was mine.
She can swear to the person whom oft she has seen
At night between Cavan Street and College Green.
Now you see why his verses so seldom are shown;
The reason is plain, they are none of his own:
And observe while you live, that no man is shy
To discover the goods he came honestly by.
If I light on a thought, he will certainly steal it,
And, when he has got it, find ways to conceal it:
Of all the fine things he keeps in the dark,
There's scarce one in ten but what has my mark;
And let them be seen by the world if he dare,
I'll make it appear that they're all stolen ware.
But as for the poem he writ on your sash,
I think I have now got him under my lash;
My sister transcrib'd it last night to his sorrow,
And the public shall see't, if I live till to-morrow.
Through the zodiac around, it shall quickly be spread
In all parts of the globe where your language is read.
He knows very well, I ne'er gave a refusal,
When he ask'd for my aid in the forms that are
But the secret is this, I did lately intend [usual:
To write a few verses on you, as my friend:
I studied a fortnight, before I could find,
As I rode in my chariot, a thought to my mind,
And resolv'd the next winter (for that is my time,
When the days are at shortest) to get it in rhyme;
Till then it was lock'd in my box at Parnassus;
When that subtle companion, in hopes to surpass us,
Conveys out my paper of hints by a trick, [Nick)
(For I think in my conscience he deals with Old

And, from my own stock provided with topics,
He gets to a window beyond both the tropics;
There out of my sight, just against the north zone,
Writes down my conceits, and then calls them his own;

And you, like a booby, the bubble can swallow:
Now who but Delany can write like Apollo?
High treason by statute! yet here you object,
He only stole hints, but the verse is correct;
Though the thought be Apollo's, 'tis finely ex-
press'd;

So a thief steals my horse, and has him well dress'd.
Now, whereas the sad criminal seems past repentance,

We Phœbus think fit to proceed to his sentence.
Since Delany has dar'd, like Prometheus his fire;
'To climb to our region, and thence to steal fire;
We order a vulture, in shape of the spleen,
To prey on his liver, but not to be seen.

And we order our subjects of every degree
To believe all his verses were written by me;
And, under the pain of our highest displeasure,
To call nothing his but the rhyme and the measure.

And lastly, for Stella, just out of her prime,
I'm too much revenged already by time.

In return to her scorn, I send her diseases,
But will now be her friend whenever she pleases:
And the gifts I bestow'd her will find her a lover,
Though she lives to be gray as a badger all over.

NEWS FROM PARNASSUS,

BY DR. DELANY.

PARNASSUS, February the twenty-seventh,
The poets assembled here on the eleventh,
Conven'd by Apollo, who gave them to know,
He'd have a vicegerent in his empire below;
But declar'd that no bard should this honour inherit,
Till the rest had agreed he surpass'd them in merit.
Now this, you'll allow, was a difficult case,
For each bard believ'd he'd a right to the place;
So, finding th' assembly grow warm in debate,
He put them in mind of his Phaëton's fate:
'Twas urg'd to no purpose; disputes higher rose,
Scarce Phœbus himself could their quarrels compose;

Till at length he determin'd that every bard
Should (each in his turn) be patiently heard.

First, one who believ'd he excell'd in translation,
Founds his claim on the doctrine of man's trans-
migration:

"Since the soul of great Milton was given to me,
I hope the convention will quickly agree."

"Agree!" quoth Appollo, "from whence is this fool?" [school?

"Is he just come from reading Pythagoras at
Be gone, Sir! you've got your subscriptions in time,

"And given in return neither reason nor rhyme."
To the next, says the god, "Though now I won't choose you,

"I'll tell you the reason for which I refuse you:

"Love's goddess has oft to her parents complain'd

"Of my favouring a bard who her empire disdain'd;

"That, at my instigation, a poem you writ,

"Which to beauty and youth preferri'd judgment

"and wit;

"That, to make you a laureat, I gave the first voice,

"Inspiring the Britons t' approve of my choice.

"Jove sent her to me, her power to try;

"The goddess of beauty what god can deny?

"She forbids your preferment; I grant her desire.

"Appease the fair goddess; you then may rise higher." [ceeding,

The next that appear'd had good hopes of success

For he merited much for his wit and his breeding,

'Twas wise in the Britons no favour to show him,

He else might expect they should pay what they owe him.

And therefore they prudently chose to discard

The patriot, whose merits they would not reward.

The god, with a smile, bade his favourite advance,

"You were sent by Astrea her envoy to France:

"You bent your ambition to rise in the state;

"I refuse you, because you could stoop to be great." [lator,

Then a bard who had been a successful translator

"The convention allows me a versificator."

Says Appollo, "You mention the least of your merit;

"By your works it appears you have much of my spirit.

"I esteem you so well, that to tell you the truth,

"The greatest objection against you's your youth:

"Then be not concern'd you are now laid aside;

"If you live, you shall certainly one day preside."

Another, low bending, Appollo thus greets,

"'Twas I taught your subjects to walk through the streets." [before:

"You taught them to walk! why, they knew it

"But give me the bard that can teach them to speak.

"Whenever he claims, 'tis his right, I'll confess,

"Who lately attempted my style with success;

"Who writes like Appollo has most of his spirit,

"And therefore 'tis just I distinguish his merit;

"Who makes it appear, by all he has writ,

"His judgment alone can set bounds to his wit;

"Like Virgil, correct with his own native ease,

"But excels even Virgil in elegant praise;

"Who admires the ancients, and knows 'tis their due,

"Yet writes in a manner entirely new; [due,

"Though none with more ease their depths can explore,

"Yet whatever he wants he takes from my store:

"Though I'm fond of his virtues, his pride I can see,

"In scorning to borrow from any but me; [see,

"It is owing to this, that, like Cynthia, his lays enlighten the world by reflecting my rays."

This said, the whole audience soon found out
his drift:

The convention was summon'd in favour of Swift.

THE RUN UPON THE BANKERS, 1720.

THE bold encroachers on the deep
Gain by degrees huge tracts of land,
Till Neptune, with one general sweep,
Turns all again to barren strand.

The multitude's capricious pranks
Are said to represent the seas;
Which, breaking bankers and the banks,
Resume their own when'er they please.

Money, the life-blood of the nation,
 Corrupts and stagnates in the veins,
 Unless a proper circulation
 Its motion and its heat maintains.
 Because 'tis lordly not to pay,
Quakers and aldermen in state
 Like peers have levees every day
 Of duns attending at their gate.
 We want our money on the nail;
 The banker's ruin'd if he pays:
 They seem to act an ancient tale;
 The birds are met to strip the joys.
 Riches, the wisest monarch sings,
 "Make pinions for themselves to fly:"
 They fly like bats on parchment wings,
 And geese their silver plumes supply.
 No money left for squandering heirs!
Bills turn the lenders into debtors:
 The wish of Nero now is theirs,
 "That they had never known their letters."
 Conceive the works of midnight hags,
 Tormenting fools behind their backs:
 Thus bankers o'er their bills and bags
 Sits squeezing images of wax.
 Conceive the whole enchantment broke;
 The witches left in open air,
 With power no more than other folk,
 Expos'd with all their magic ware.
 So powerful are a banker's bills,
 Where creditors demand their due;
 They break up counters, doors, and tills,
 And leave the empty chests in view.
 Thus when an earthquake lets in light
 Upon the god of gold and bell,
 Unable to endure the sight,
 He hides within his darkest cell.
 As when a conjuror takes a lease
 From Satan for a term of years,
 The tenant's in a dismal case,
 Whene'er the bloody bond appears.
 A baited banker thus desponds,
 From his own hand foresees his fall;
 They have his soul, who have his bonds;
 'Tis like the writing on the wall.
 How will the catiff wretch be scar'd,
 When first he finds himself awake
 At the last trumpet unprepar'd,
 And all his grand account to make!
 For in that universal call
 Few bankers will to heaven be mounters;
 They'll cry, "Ye shops, upon us fall!"
 "Conceal and cover us, ye counters!"
 When other hands the scales shall hold,
 And they in men and angels' sight
 Produc'd with all their bills and gold,
 "Weigh'd in the balance, and found light!"

DESCRIPTION OF AN IRISH FEAST,

Translated almost literally out of the original Irish, 1720.

OROURK's noble fare will ne'er be forgot,
 By those who were there, or those who were not.

His revels to keep, we sup and we dine
 On seven score sheep, fat bullocks, and swine.
Uisquebaugh to our feast in pails was brought up,
 An hundred at least, and a madder * our cup.
 O there is the sport! we rise with the light
 In disorderly sort from snoring all night.
 O how was I trick'd! my pipe it was broke,
 My pocket was pick'd, I lost my new cloak.
 I'm rifled, quoth Nell, of mantle and kercher †:
 Why then fare them well, the de'el take the searcher.
 Come, harper, strike up; but, first, by your favour,
 Boy, give us a cup: ah! this has some favour.
 Orourk's jolly boys ne'er dreamt of the matter, ‡
 Till, rous'd by the noise and musical clatter,
 They bounce from their nest, no longer will tarry,
 They rise ready drest, without one ave-mary. [ing;
 They dance in a round, cutting capers, and ramp-
 A mercy the ground did not burst with their stamping.
 The floor is all wet with leaps and with jumps,
 While the water and sweat splish-splash in their pumps.
 Bless you late and early, Laughlin O' Enagin!
 By my hand ‡, you dance rarely, Margery Grinagin.
 Bring straw for our bed, shake it down to the feet,
 Then over us spread the winnowing sheet:
 To show I don't flinch, fill the bowl up again;
 Then give us a pinch of your sneezing, a yeen §.
 Good Lord! what a fight, after all their good cheer,
 For people to fight in the midst of their beer!
 They rise from their feast, and hot are their brains,
 A cubit at least the length of their skeans ||.
 What stabs and what cuts, what clattering of sticks;
 What strokes on the guts, what bastings and kicks!
 With cudgels of oak well harden'd in flame,
 An hundred heads broke, an hundred struck lame.
 You churl, I'll maintain my father built Lusk,
 The Castle of Slain, and Carrick Drumrusk:
 The Earl of Kildare, and Moynalta his brother,
 As great as they are, I was nurs'd by their mother.
 Ask that of old madam; she'll tell you who's who
 As far up as Adam, she knows it is true,
 Come down with that beam, if cudgels are scarce.
 A blow on the weam, or a kick on the a—se.

AN EXCELLENT NEW SONG,

ON A SEDITIOUS PAMPHLET ¶, 1720.

To the tune of "Packington's Pound."

BROCADOS and damasks, and tabbies, and gauzes,
 Are by Robert Ballentine lately brought over,
 With forty things more; now hear what the law says, [lover.
 Whoe'er will not wear them is not the king's
 Though a printer and dean
 Seditiously mean
 Our true Irish hearts from old England to wean;

* A wooden vessel.

† Handkerchief.

‡ An Irish oath.

§ Irish for a woman.

|| Daggers, or short swords.

¶ Proposals for the universal use of Irish manufactures, for which Waters the printer was severely prosecuted.

We'll buy English filks for our wives and our daughters,
In spite of his deanship and journeyman Waters.

In England the dead in woollen are clad,
The dean and his printer then let us cry fy on;
To be cloth'd like a carcase, would make a Teague
Since a living dog better is than a dead lion. [mad,

Our wives they grow fullen
At wearing of woollen,
And all we poor shop-keepers must our horns
pull in. [daughters,
Then we'll buy English filks for our wives and our
In spite of his deanship and journeyman Waters.

Whoever our trading with England would hinder,
To inflame both the nations do plainly conspire;
Because Irish linen will soon turn to tinder,
And wool it is greasy, and quickly takes fire.

Therefore I assure you,
Our noble grand jury,
When they saw the dean's book, they were in a great fury.

They would buy English filks for their wives and their daughters,
In spite of his deanship and journeyman Waters.

This wicked rogue Waters, who always is sinning,
And before corum nobis so oft has been call'd, Henceforward shall print neither pamphlets nor linen, [mawl'd:

And, if swearing can do't, shall be fwingly
And as for the dean,

You know whom I mean,
If the printer will 'peach him, he'll scarce come off
clean. [daughters,

Then we'll buy English filks for our wives and our
In spite of his deanship and journeyman Waters.

THE PROGRESS OF BEAUTY.

1720.

WHEN first Diana leaves her bed,
Vapours and steams her looks disgrace,
A frowzy dirty-colour'd red
Sits on her cloudy wrinkled face:

But by degrees, when mounted high,
Her artificial face appears
Down from her window in the sky,
Her spots are gone, her visage clears.

'Twixt earthly females and the moon
All parallels exactly run:
If Celia should appear too soon,
Alas, the nymph would be undone!

To see her from her pillow rise,
All reeking in a cloudy steam,
Crack'd lips, foul teeth, and gummy eyes,
Poor Strephon! how would he blaspheme!

Three colours, black, and red, and white,
So graceful in their proper place,
Remove them to a different scite,
They form a frightful hideous face;

For instance, when the lily skips
Into the precincts of the rose,
And takes possession of the lips,
Leaving the purple to the nose:

5

So Celia went entire to bed;
All her complexion safe and sound;
But, when she rose, white, black, and red,
Though still in fight, had chang'd their ground:

The black, which would not be confin'd,
A more inferior station seeks;
Leaving the fiery red behind,
And mingles in her muddy cheeks.

But Celia can with ease reduce,
By help of pencil, paint and brush;
Each colour to its place and use,
And teach her cheeks again to blush.

She knows her early self no more,
But fill'd with admiration stands;
As other painters oft' adore
The workmanship of their own hands!

Thus, after four important hours,
Celia's the wonder of her sex:
Say, which among the heavenly powers
Could cause such marvellous effects?

Venus, indulgent to her kind,
Gave women all their hearts could wish;
When first she taught them where to find
White lead and Lusitanian* dish.

Love with white-lead cements his wings:
White-lead was sent us to repair
Two brightest, brittlest, earthly things,
A lady's face, and China-ware.

She ventures now to lift the fash:
The window is her proper sphere:
Ah, lovely nymph! be not too rash,
Nor let the beaux approach too near.

Take pattern by your sister star:
Delude at once and bless our sight;
When you are seen, be seen from far,
And chiefly choose to shine by night.

But art no longer can prevail,
When the materials all are gone;
The best mechanic hand must fail,
Where nothing's left to work upon.

Matter, as wise logicians say,
Cannot without a form subsist;
And form, say I, as well as they,
Must fail, if matter brings no gift.

And this is fair Diana's case;
For all astrologers maintain,
Each night a bit drops off her face,
When mortals say she's in her wane:

While Partridge† wisely shows the cause
Efficient of the moon's decay,
That Cancer with his poisonous claws
Attacks her in the milky way:

But Gadbury, in art profound,
From her pale cheeks pretends to show;
That swain Endymion‡ is not found,
Or else that Mercury's her foe.

* Portugal.

† Partridge and Gadbury wrote each an ephemeris.

‡ A young shepherd, of whom Diana was feigned to be enamoured.

But, let the cause be what it will,
In half a month she looks so thin,
That Flamsteed † can, with all his skill,
See but her forehead and her chin.

Yet, as she waxes, she grows discreet,
Till midnight never shows her head;
So rotting Celia strolls the street,
When sober folks are all a-bed:

For sure, if this be Luna's fate,
Poor Celia, but of mortal race,
In vain expects a longer date
To the materials of her face.

When Mercury her tresses mows,
To think of black-lead combs is vain;
No painting can restore a nose,
Nor will her teeth return again.

Ye powers, who over love preside!
Since mortal beauties drop so soon,
If ye would have us well supply'd,
Send us new nymphs with each new moon!

THE PROGRESS OF POETRY.

THE farmer's goose, who in the stubble
Has fed without restraint or trouble,
Grown fat with corn, and sitting still,
Can scarce get o'er the barn-door fill;
And hardly waddles forth to cool
Her belly in the neighbouring pool;
Nor loudly cackles at the door;
For cackling shows the goose is poor.

But, when she must be turn'd to graze,
And round the barren common strays,
Hard exercise and harder fare
Soon make my dame grow lank and spare:
Her body light, she tries her wings,
And scorns the ground, and upward springs;
While all the parish, as she flies,
Hear sounds harmonious from the skies.

Such is the poet fresh in pay
(The third night's profits of his play);
His morning-draughts till noon can swill
Among his brethren of the quill:
With good roast beef his belly full,
Grown lazy, foggy, fat, and dull,
Deep sunk in plenty and delight,
What poet e'er could take his flight?
Or stuff'd with phlegm up to the throat,
What poet e'er could sing a note?
Nor Pegasus could bear the load
Along the high celestial road;
The steed, oppress'd, would break his girth,
To raise the lumber from the earth.

But view him in another scene,
When all his drink is Hippocrene,
His money spent, his patrons fail,
His credit out for cheese and ale;
His two-years coat so smooth and bare,
Through every thread it lets in air;
With hungry meals his body pin'd,
His guts and belly full of wind;
And, like a jockey for a race,
His flesh brought down to flying case:
Now his exalted spirit loaths
Incumbrances of food and clothes;

Supported high on wings of paper;
He singing flies, and flying sings,
While from below all Grub-street rings.

THE SOUTH SEA PROJECT. 1721.

" Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto,
" Arma virum, tabulæque, et Troia gaza per undas."

VIRG.

YE wise philosophers, explain
What magic makes our money rise,
When dropp'd into the Southern main;
Or do these jugglers cheat our eyes?

Put in your money fairly told;
Preslo! be gone—"Tis here again:
Ladies and gentlemen, behold,
Here's every piece as big as ten.

Thus in a basin drop a shilling
Then fill the vessel to the brim;
You shall observe, as you are filling,
The ponderous metal seems to swim

It rises both in bulk and height,
Behold it swelling like a soap;
The liquid medium cheats your sight;
Behold it mounted to the top!

In stock three hundred thousand pound;
I have in view a lord's estate;
My manors all contiguous round;
A coach and six, and serv'd in plate!

Thus, the deluded bankrupt raves;
Puts all upon a desperate bet;
Then plunges in the Southern waves,
Dipt over head and ears—in debt.

So, by a calenture misled,
The mariner with rapture sees,
On the smooth ocean's azure bed,
Enamel'd fields and verdant trees:

With eager haste he longs to rove
In that fantastic scene, and thinks
It must be some enchanted grove;
And in he leaps, and down he sinks.

Five hundred chariots, just bespoke,
Are sunk in these devouring waves,
The horses drown'd, the harness broke,
And here the owners find their graves.

Like Pharaoh, by directors led;
They with their spoils went safe before;
His chariots, tumbling out the dead,
Lay shatter'd on the Red-Sea shore.

Rais'd up on Hope's aspiring plumes,
The young adventurer o'er the deep
An eagle's flight and state assumes,
And scorns the middle-way to keep.

On paper wings he takes his flight,
With wax the father bound them fast;
The wax is melted by the height,
And down the towering boy is cast.

A moralist might here explain
The rashness of the Cretan youth;

Describe his fall into the main,
And from a fable form a truth.

His wings are his paternal rent,
He melts the wax at every flame;
His credit funk, his money spent,
In Southern Seas he leaves his name.

Inform us, you that best can tell,
Why in yon' dangerous gulph profound,
Where hundreds and where thousands fell,
Fools chiefly float, the wise are drown'd?

So have I seen from Severn's brink
A flock of geese jump down together;
Swim, where the bird of Jove would sink,
And, swimming, never wet a feather.

But, I affirm, 'tis false in fact,
Directors better knew their tools;
We see the nation's credit crack'd,
Each knave hath made a thousand fools.

One fool may from another win,
And then get off with money stor'd;
But, if a sharp once comes in,
He throws at all, and sweeps the board.

As fishes on each other prey,
The great ones swallowing up the small;
So fares it in the Southern Sea;
The whale directors eat up all.

When stock is high, they come between,
Making by second-hand their offers;
Then cunningly retire unseen,
With each a million in his coffers.

So when upon a moon-shine night
An ass was drinking at a stream;
A cloud arose, and stopp'd the light,
By intercepting every beam:

The day of judgment will be soon
(Cries out a sage among the crowd);
An ass hath swallow'd up the moon!
(The moon lay safe behind a cloud).

Each poor subscriber to the sea
Sinks down at once, and there he lies;
Directors fall as well as they,
Their fall is but a trick to rise.

So fishes, rising from the main,
Can soar with moisten'd wings on high;
The moisture dry'd, they sink again,
And dip their fins again to fly.

Undone at play, the female troops
Come here their losses to retrieve;
Ride o'er the waves in spacious hoops,
Like Lapland witches in a sieve.

Thus Venus to the sea descends,
As poets feign; but where's the moral?
It shows the Queen of love intends
To search the deep for pearl and coral.

The sea is richer than the land,
I heard it from my grannam's mouth;
Which now I clearly understand,
For by the sea she meant the South.

Thus by directors we are told,
"Pray, Gentlemen, believe your eyes;

Our ocean's cover'd o'er with gold,
Look round and see how thick it lies!

We, Gentlemen, are your assistants,
We'll come, and hold you by the chin.—"
Alas! all is not gold that glisters,
Ten thousand sink by leaping in.

Oh! would those patriots be so kind,
Here in the deep to wash their hands,
Then, like Pactolus, we should find
The sea indeed had golden sands.

A shilling in the batb you fling;
The silver takes a nobler hue,
By magic virtue in the spring,
And seems a guinea to your view.

But, as a guinea will not pass
At market for a farthing more,
Shown through a multiplying-glass,
Than what it always did before:

So cast it in the Southern Seas,
Or view it through a jobber's bill;
Put on what spectacles you please,
Your guinea's but a guinea still.

One night a fool into a brook
Thus from a hillock looking down,
The golden stars for guineas took,
And silver Cynthia for a crown.

The point he could no longer doubt;
He ran, he leapt into the flood;
There sprawl'd awhile, and scarce got out,
All cover'd o'er with slime and mud.

"Upon the water cast thy bread,
"And after many days thou'lt find it;"
But gold upon this ocean spread
Shall sink, and leave no mark behind it.

There is a gulph, where thousands fell,
Here all the bold adventurers came,
A narrow sound, though deep as hell;
'Change-Alley is the dreadful name.

Nine times a day it ebbs and flows;
Yet he that on the surface lies,
Without a pilot seldom knows
The time it falls, or when 'twill rise.

Subscribers here by thousands float,
And jostle one another down;
Each paddling in his leaky boat;
And here they fish for gold, and drown.

"Now bury'd in the depth below,
"Now mounted up to heaven again,
"They reel and stagger to and fro,
"At their wits end, like drunken men."

Mean time secure on Garraway † cliffs,
A savage race by shipwrecks fed,
Lie waiting for the founder'd skiffs,
And strip the bodies of the dead.

But these, you say, are factious lies,
From some malicious Tory's brain;
For, where Directors get a prize,
The Swifts and Dutch whole millions drain.

* Psalm cvii. † A coffee-house in 'Change-Alley.

Thus, when by rooks a lord is ply'd,
 Some cully often wins a bet,
 By venturing on the cheating side,
 Though not into the secret let.

While some build castles in the air,
Directors build them in the seas;
Subscribers plainly see them there,
 For fools will see as wise men please.

Thus oft' by mariners are shown
 (Unless the men of Kent are liars)
 Earl Godwin's castles overflown.
 And palace-roofs, and steeple-spires.

Mark where the fly Directors creep,
 Nor to the shore approach too nigh!
 The monsters nestle in the deep,
 To seize you in your passing by.

Then, like the dogs of Nile, be wise,
 Who, taught by instinct how to shun
 The crocodile, that lurking lies,
 Run as they drink, and drink and run.

Antæus could, by magic charms,
 Recover strength when'er he fell;
 Alcides held him in his arms,
 And sent him up in air to bell.

Directors, thrown into the sea,
 Recover strength and vigour there;
 But may be tam'd another way,
 Suspended for a while in air.

Directors! for 'tis you I warn,
 By long experience we have found
 What plannet rul'd when you were born:
 We see you never can be drown'd.

Beware, nor over-bulky grow,
 Nor come within your cully's reach;
 For, if the sea should sink so low
 To leave you dry upon the beach,

You'll owe your ruin to your bulk:
 Your foes already waiting stand,
 To tear you like a founder'd hulk,
 While you lie helpless on the sand.

Thus, when a whale has lost the tide,
 The coasters crowd to seize the spoil;
 The monster into parts divide,
 And strip the bones, and melt the oil.

Oh! may some western tempest sweep
 These locusts whom our fruits have fed,
 That plague Directors to the deep,
 Driv'n from the South-Sea to the Red!

May he, whom Nature's laws obey,
 Who lifts the poor, and sinks the proud,
 "Quiet the raging of the sea,
 "And still the madness of the crowd!"

But never shall our isle have rest,
 Till those devouring swine run down,
 (The devils leaving the posselt)
 And headlong in the waters drown.

The nation then too late will find,
 Computing all their cost and trouble,
Directors' promises but wind,
 South-Sea at best a mighty bubble.

VOL. IX.

THE DOG AND SHADOW.

ORE cibum portans catulus dum spectat in undis,
 Apparet liquido prædæ melioris imago:
 Dum speciosa diu damna admiratur, et alte
 Ad latice inhiat, cadit imo vortice præceps
 Ore cibus, nec non simulachrum corripit una.
 Occupat ille avibus deceptis faucibus umbram;
 Illudit species, ac dentibus aëra mordet.

TO A FRIEND,

Who had been much abused in many different Libels.

THE greatest monarch may be stabb'd by night,
 And fortune help the murderer in his flight;
 The vilest ruffian may commit a rape,
 Yet safe from injur'd innocence escape;
 And calumny, by working under ground,
 Can, unreveng'd, the greatest merit wound.
 What's to be done? Shall wit and learning choose
 To live obscure, and have no fame to lose?
 By censure frightened out of honour's road,
 Nor dare to use the gifts by Heaven bestow'd?
 Or fearless enter in through virtue's gate,
 And buy distinction at the dearest rate?

BILLET TO THE COMPANY OF PLAYERS.

THE inclosed Prologue is formed upon the story of the Secretary's not suffering you to act, unless you would pay him 300l. per annum; upon which you got a licence from the Lord Mayor to act as strollers.

The Prologue supposes, that, upon your being forbidden to act, a company of country strollers came and hired the Playhouse, and your clothes,
 &c. to act in.

THE PROLOGUE.

OUR set of strollers, wandering up and down,
 Hearing the house was empty, came to town;
 And, with a licence from our good Lord Mayor,
 Went to one Griffith, formerly a player;
 Him we persuaded, with a moderate bribe,
 To speak to Erlington and all the tribe,
 To let our company supply their places,
 And hire us out their scenes, and clothes, and faces.
 Is not the truth the truth? Look full on me;
 I am not Erlington, nor Griffith he.

When we perform, look sharp among our crew,
 There's not a creature here you ever knew.
 The former folks were servants to the king;
 We, humble strollers, always on the wing.
 Now, for my part, I think upon the whole,
 Rather than starve, a better man would stroll.

Stay, let me see—Three hundred pounds a year,
 For leave to act in town! 'Tis plaguy dear.
 Now, here's a warrant; Gallants, please to mark,
 For three thirteens and sixpence to the clerk.
 Three hundred pounds! Were I the price to fix,
 The public should bestow the actors six.
 A score of guineas, given underhand,
 For a good word or so, we understand.

D

To help an honest lad, that's out of place,
May cost a crown or so; a common case:
And, in a crew, 'tis no injustice thought
To ship a rogue, and pay him not a groat.
But, in the chronicles of former ages,
Who ever heard of servants paying wages?

I pity Erlington with all my heart;
Would he were here this night to act my part!
I told him what it was to be a stroller;
How free we acted, and had no comptroller:
In every town we wait on Mr. Mayor,
First get a licence, then produce our ware;
We sound a trumpet, or we beat a drum;
Huzza! the (school-boys) roar the players are come!
And then we cry, to spur the bumpkins on,
Gallants, by Tuesday next we must be gone.
I told him, in the smoothest way I could,
All this and more, yet it would do no good.
But Erlington, tears falling from his cheeks,
He that has shone with Betterton and Wilks,
To whom our country has been always dear,
Who chose to leave his dearest pledges here,
Owns all your favours, here intends to stay,
And, as a stroller, act in every play:
And the whole crew this resolution takes,
To live and die all strollers for your sakes;
Not frightened with an ignominious name,
For your displeasure is their only shame.

A pox in Erlington's majestic tone!
Now to a word of business in our own.
Gallants, next Thursday night will be our last;
Then, without fail, we pack up for Belfast.
Lose not your time, nor our diversions miss,
The next we act shall be as good as this.

EPIGRAM.

GREAT folks are of a finer mold;
Lord! how politely they can scold!
While a coarse English tongue will itch
For whore and rogue, and dog and bitch.

PROLOGUE

TO A PLAY FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE DISTRESSED
WEAVERS, BY DR. SHERIDAN.

Spoken by Mr. Erlington, 1721.

GREAT cry and little wool—is now become
The plague and proverb of the weaver's loom:
No wool to work on, neither weft nor warp;
Their pockets empty, and their stomach's sharp.
Provok'd, in loud complaints to you they cry:
Ladies, relieve the weavers, or they die!
For sake your silks for stuffs; nor think it strange
To shift your clothes, since you delight in change.
One thing with freedom I'll presume to tell—
The men will like you every bit as well.

See, I am dress'd from top to toe in stuff;
And, by my troth, I think I'm fine enough:
My wife admires me more, and swears she never,
In any dress, beheld me look so clever.
And, if a man be better in such ware,
What great advantage must it give the fair!
Our wool from lambs of innocence proceeds:
Silks come from maggots, calicoes from weeds:
Hence 'tis by sad experience that we find
Ladies in silks to vapours much inclin'd—
And what are they but maggots in the mind?

For which I think it reason to conclude
That clothes may change our temper like our food.
Chintzes are gaudy, and engage our eyes
Too much about the party-colour'd dyes:
Although the lustre is from you begun,
We see the rainbow, and neglect the sun.

How sweet and innocent's the country maid,
With small expence in native wool array'd;
Who copies from the fields her homely green,
While by her shepherd with delight she's seen!
Should our fair ladies dress like her in wool,
How much more lovely, and how beautiful,
Without their Indian drapery, they'd prove,
Whilst wool would help to warm us into love!
Then, like the famous Argonauts of Greece,
We'd all contend to gain the Golden Fleece!

EPILOGUE BY THE DEAN.

SPOKEN BY MR. GRIFFITH.

Who dares affirm this is no pious age,
When charity begins to tread the stage?
When actors, who, at best, are hardly saviors,
Will give a night of benefit to Weavers?
Stay—let me see, how finely will it sound!
Imprimis, From his Grace* an hundred pound.
Peers, clergy, gentry, all are benefactors;
And then comes in the item of the actors.

Item, The actors freely gave a day—
The Poet had no more who made the play.
But whence this wondrous charity in players?
They learnt it not at Sermons, or at Prayers:
Under the rose, since here are none but friends,
(To own the truth) we have some private ends.
Since waiting-women, like exacting jades,
Hold up the prices of their old brocades;
We'll dress in manufactures made at home,
Equip our kings and generals at The Comb†.
We'll rig from Meath-street Ægypt's haughty queen,

And Antony shall court her in ratteen.
In blue shalloon shall Hannibal be clad,
And Scipio trail an Irish purple plaid.
In drugget dress'd, of thirteen pence a yard,
See Philip's son amidst his Persian guard;
And proud Roxana, fir'd with jealous rage,
With fifty yards of crape shall sweep the stage.
In short, our kings and princesses within
Are all resolv'd this project to begin;
And you, our subjects, when you here resort,
Must imitate the fashion of the Court.

Oh! could I see this audience clad in stuff,
Though money's scarce, we should have trade
enough:

But chintz, brocades, and lace, take all away,
And scarce a crown is left to see a play.
Perhaps you wonder whence this friendship springs
Between the Weavers and us Play-house Kings;
But Wit and Weaving had the same beginning;
Pallas first taught us Poetry and Spinning:
And, next, observe how this alliance fits,
For Weavers now are just as poor as Wits:

* Archbishop King.

† A street famous for Woollen Manufactures.

Their brother quill-men, workers for the stage,
For sorry stuff can get a crown a page;
But Weavers will be Kinder to the Players,
And sell for twenty-pence a yard of theirs.
And, to your knowledge, there is often less in
The Poet's wit, than in the Player's dressing.

A POEM, BY DR. DELANY,

ON THE PRECEDING PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE.

"Fœmineo generi tribuantur."

THE muses, whom the richest silks array,
Refuse to fling their shining gowns away:
The pencil clothes the nine in bright brocades,
And gives each colour to the pictur'd maids;
Far above mortal-dress the sisters shine,
Pride in their Indian robes, and must be fine.
And shall two bards in concert rhyme and huff,
And fret these muses with their play-house stuff?

The player in mimic piety may storm,
Deplore the comb, and bid her heroes arm:
The arbitrary mob, in paltry rage,
May curse the belles and chintzes of the age:
Yet still the artist worm her silk shall share,
And spin her thread of life in service of the fair.

The cotton-plant, whom satire cannot blast,
Shall bloom the favourite of these realms, and last;

Like yours, ye fair, her fame from censure grows,
Prevails in charms, and glares above her foes:
Your injur'd plant shall meet a loud defence,
And be the emblem of your innocence.

Some bard, perhaps, whose landlord was a weaver,

Penn'd the low prologue, to return a favour:
Some neighbour wit, that would be in the vogue,
Work'd with his friend, and wove the epilogue.
Who weaves the chaplet, or provides the bays,
For such wool-gathering sonnetteers as these?
Hence then, ye home-spun witlings, that persuade
Miss Chloe to the fashion of her maid.
Shall the wide hoop, that standard of the town,
Thus act subservient to a poplin gown?
Who 'd smell of wool all over? 'Tis enough
The under-petticoat be made of stuff.
Lord! to be wrapt in flannel just in May,
When the fields dress'd in flowers appear so gay!

And shall not Miss be flower'd as well as they.

In what weak colours would the plaid appear,
Work'd to a quilt, or studded in a chair!
The skin, that vies with silk, would fret with stuff;
Or who could bear in bed a thing so rough?
Ye knowing fair, how eminent that bed,
Where the chintze diamonds with the silken
thread,

Where rustling curtains call the curious eye,
And boast the streaks and paintings of the sky!
Of flocks they 'd have your milky ticking full;
And all this for the benefit of wool!

"But where," say they, "shall we bestow
these weavers,

"That spread our streets, and are such piteous cravers?"

The silk-worms (brittle beings!) prone to fate,
Demand their care to make their webs complete:

These may they tend, their promises receive;
We cannot pay too much for what they give!

ON GAULSTOWN HOUSE.

BY DR. DELANY *.

'Tis so old, and so ugly, and yet so convenient,
You 're sometimes in pleasure, though often in pain
in't: [ease in 't;

'Tis so large, you may lodge a few friends with
You may turn and stretch at your length if you please in't:

'Tis so little, the family live in a press in't,
And poor Lady Betty † has scarce room to dress
in't: [in't;

'Tis so cold in the winter, you can't bear to lie
And so hot in the summer, you 're ready to fry in't: [a tun;

'Tis so brittle, 'twould scarce bear the weight of Yet so staunch, that it keeps out a great deal of sun: [through it,

'Tis so crazy, the weather with ease beats quite
And you 're forc'd every year in some part to renew it.

'Tis so ugly, so useful, so big, and so little;

'Tis so staunch, and so crazy, so strong, and so brittle;

'Tis at one time so hot, and another so cold;

It is part of the new, and part of the old;

It is just half a blessing, and just half a curse---

I wish then, dear George, it were better or worse.

THE COUNTRY-LIFE.

PART OF A SUMMER SPENT AT GAULSTOWN-HOUSE.

THALIA, tell in sober lays,
How George ‡, Nim §, Dan ||, Dean ¶, pass
their days;

And, should our Gaulston's art grow fallow,
Yet Neget quis carmina Gallo?

Here (by the way) by Gallus mean I

Not Sheridan, but friend Delany.

Begin, my Muse. First from our bowers

We sallly forth at different hours;

At seven the Dean, in night-gown dress'd,

Goes round the house to wake the rest;

At nine, grave Nim, and George facetious,

Go to the Dean, to read Lucretius;

At ten, my lady comes and hectors,

And kisses George, and ends our lectures;

And when she has him by the neck fast,

Halls him, and scolds us down to breakfast.

* The seat of George Rochfort, Esq. (father to the Earl of Belvidere); where Dr. Swift and an agreeable set of friends spent part of the summer of 1721.

† Daughter to the Earl of Drogheda, and the wife of Mr. Rochfort.

‡ Mr. Rochfort.

§ His brother, Mr. John Rochfort, who was called Nimrod, from his great attachment to the chase.

|| Rev. Daniel Jackson. ¶ Dr. Swift.

We squander there an hour or more,
 And then all hands, boys, to the oar;
 All, heteroclite Dan except,
 Who neither time nor order kept,
 But, by peculiar whimsies drawn,
 Peeps in the ponds to look for spawn;
 O'ersees the work, or Dragon * rows,
 Or mars a text, or mends his hose;
 Or---but proceed we in our journal---
 At two, or after, we return all:
 From the four elements ascending,
 Warn'd by the bell, all folks come trembling:
 From airy garrets some descend,
 Some from the lake's remotest end:
 My Lord † and Dean the fire forsake;
 Dan leaves the earthly spade and rake:
 The loiterers quake, no corner hides them,
 And Lady Betty soundly chides them.
 Now water 's brought, and dinner 's done:
 With " Church and King " the lady 's gone;
 (Not reckoning half an hour we pass
 In talking o'er a moderate glass).
 Dan, growing drowsy, like a thief
 Steals off to dose away his beef;
 And this must pass for reading Hammond---
 While George and Dean go to backgammon.
 George, Nim, and Dean, set out at four,
 And then again, boys, to the oar.
 But when the sun goes to the deep,
 (Not to disturb him in his sleep,
 Or make a rumbling o'er his head,
 His candle out, and he a-bed)
 We watch his motions to a minute,
 And leave the flood when he goes in it.
 Now stinted in the shortening day,
 We go to prayers, and then to play,
 Till supper comes; and after that
 We sit an hour to drink and chat.
 'Tis late---the old and younger pairs,
 By Adam ‡ lighted, walk up stairs. §
 The weary Dean goes to his chamber;
 And Nim and Dan to garret clamber.
 So when the circle we have run,
 The curtain falls, and all is done.
 I might have mention'd several facts,
 Like episodes between the acts;
 And tell who loses and who wins,
 Who gets a cold, who breaks his shins;
 How Dan caught nothing in his net,
 And how the boat was overset.
 For brevity I have retrench'd
 How in the lake the Dean was drench'd:
 It would be an exploit to brag on,
 How valiant George rode o'er the Dragon;
 How steady in the storm he sat,
 And sav'd his oar, but lost his hat:
 Now Nim (no hunter e'er could match him)
 Still brings us hares, when he can catch them:
 How skillfully Dan mends his nets;
 How fortune fails him when he sets;
 Or how the Dean delights to vex
 The ladies, and lampoon their sex.

* A small boat so called.

† Mr. Rochfort's father was Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland.

‡ The Butler.

I might have told how oft' Dean Percivale
 Displays his pedantry unmerciful;
 How haughtily he cocks his nose,
 To tell what every school-boy knows;
 And with his finger and his thumb,
 Explaining, strikes opposers dumb:
 But now there needs no more be said on't,
 Nor how his wife, that female pedant,
 Shows all her secrets of house-keeping;
 For candles how she trucks her dripping;
 Was forc'd to send three miles for yeast,
 To brew her ale, and raise her paste;
 Tells every thing that you can think of,
 How she cur'd Charley of the chincough;
 What gave her brats, and pigs the measles,
 And how her doves were kill'd by weasels;
 How Jowler howl'd, and what a fright
 She had with dreams the other night.
 But now, since I have gone so far on,
 A word or two of Lord Chief Baron;
 And tell how little weight he sets
 On all Whig papers and Gazettes;
 But for the politics of Pue,
 Thinks every syllable is true.
 And since he owns the King of Sweden
 Is dead at last, without evading,
 Now all his hopes are in the Czar:
 " Why, Muscovy is not so far:
 " Down the Black Sea, and up the Streights,
 " And in a month he's at your gates;
 " Perhaps, from what the packet brings,
 " By Christmas we shall see strange things."
 Why should I tell of ponds and drains,
 What carps we met with for our pains;
 Of sparrows tame, and nuts innumerable
 To choke the girls, and to consume a rabble?
 But you, who are a scholar, know
 How transient all things are below,
 How prone to change is human life!
 Last night arriv'd Clem * and his wife---
 This grand event hath broke our measures;
 Their reign began with cruel seizures:
 The Dean must with his quilt supply
 The bed in which those tyrants lie:
 Nim lost his wig-block, Dan his jordan
 (My lady says, she can't afford one);
 George is half-scar'd out of his wits,
 For Clem gets all the dainty bits.
 Henceforth expect a different survey,
 This house will soon turn topsy-turvy:
 They talk of further alterations,
 Which causes many speculations.

GEORGE-NIM-DAN-DEAN'S ANSWER.

DEAR Sheridan! a gentle pair
 Of Gaulstown lads (for such they are)
 Besides a brace of grave divines,
 Adore the smoothness of thy lines;
 Smooth as our bason's silver flood,
 Ere George had robb'd it of its mud;
 Smoother than Pegasus' old shoe,
 Ere Vulcan comes to make him new.
 The board on which we set our a---s,
 Is not so smooth as are thy verses,
 Compar'd with which (and that's enough)
 A smoothing-iron itself is rough.
 Nor praise I less that circumcision,
 By modern poets call'd ellusion,
 With which, in proper station plac'd,
 Thy polish'd lines are firmly brac'd.
 Thus a wise tailor is not pinching,
 But turns at every seam an inch in;
 Or else, be sure, your broad-cloth breeches
 Will ne'er be smooth, nor hold their stitches.
 Thy verse, like bricks, defy the weather,
 When smooth'd by rubbing them together;
 Thy words so closely wedg'd and short are
 Like walls, more lasting without mortar:
 By leaving out the needless vowels,
 You save the charge of lime and trowels.
 One letter still another locks,
 Each groov'd and dove-tail'd like a box.
 Thy muse is tuckt-up and succinct;
 In chains thy syllables are linkt;
 Thy words together ty'd in small hanks,
 Close as the Macedonian phalanx;
 Or like the umbo of the Romans,
 Which fiercest foes could break by no means.
 The critic to his grief will find,
 How firmly these indentures bind.
 So, in the kindred painter's art,
 The shortening is the nicest part.

Philologers of future ages,
 How will they pore upon thy pages!

* Dr. James Stopford, afterwards bishop of Cloyne.

Nor will they dare to break the joints,
 But help thee to be read with points:
 Or else, to show their learned labour, you
 May backward be perus'd like Hebrew,
 Where they need not lose a bit
 Or of thy harmony or wit.
 To make a work completely fine,
 Number and weight and measure join;
 Then all must grant your lines are weighty.
 Where thirty weigh as much as eighty.
 All must allow your numbers more,
 Where twenty lines exceed fourscore;
 Nor can we think our measure short,
 Where less than forty fill a quart,
 With Alexandrian in the close,
 Long, long, long, long, like Dan's long nose.

GEORGE NIM-DAN-DEAN'S INVITA- TION TO THOMAS SHERIDAN.

Gaulstown, Aug. 2. 1721.

DEAR Tom, this verse, which however the beginning may appear, yet in the end's good metre,
 Is sent to desire that, when your August vacation
 comes, your friends you'd meet here.
 For why should you stay in that filthy hole, I mean
 the city so smoky,
 When you have not one friend left in town, or at least not one that's witty, to joke w' ye?
 For, as for honest John*, though I'm not sure on't, yet I'll be hang'd, lest he
 Be gone down to the county of Wexford with that great peer the Lord Anglesey.
 Oh! but I forgot; perhaps, by this time, you may have one come to town, but I don't know whether he be friend or foe, Delany:
 But, however, if he be come, bring him down, and you shall go back in a fortnight, for I know
 there's no delaying ye.
 Oh! I forgot too; I believe there may be one more: I mean that great fat joker, friend Hel-
sham, he
 Th't wrote the prologue†, and if you stay with him, depend on't, in the end, he'll sham ye.
 Bring down Long Shanks Jim too; but now I think on't, he's not yet come from Courtown, I fancy;
 For I heard, a month ago, that he was down there,
 a-courting sly Nancy.
 However, bring down yourself, and you bring down all; for, to say it we may venture,
 In thee Delany's spleen, John's mirth, Hellsham's jokes, and the soft soul of amorous Jemmy centre.

* Supposed to be Dr. Walmsley.

† One spoken by young Putland, 1720, before Hippolytus; in which Dr. Sheridan (who had written a prologue for the occasion) was most unexpectedly and egregiously laughed at. Both the prologues are printed in the "Supplement to Swift's Works."

P O S T S C R I P T.

I had forgot to desire you to bring down what I say you have, and you'll believe me as sure as a gun, and own it ;
 I mean, what no other mortal in the universe can boast of, your own spirit of pan, and own wit.
 And now I hope you'll excuse this rhyming, which I must say is (though written somewhat at large) trim and clean ;
 And so I conclude, with humble respects as usual,
 Your most dutiful and obedient
 GEORGE-NIM-DAN-DEAN.

TO GEORGE NIM-DAN-DEAN, ESQ.

Upon his incomparable Verses, &c.

BY DR. DELANY, IN SHERIDAN'S NAME *.

HAIL, human compound quadrifarious,
 Invincible as Wight Briareus !
 Hail ! doubly-doubled mighty merry one,
 Stronger than triple-body'd Geryon !
 O may your vastness deign t' excuse
 The praises of a puny muse,
 Unable, in her utmost flight,
 To reach thy huge Colossian height.
 T' attempt to write like thee were frantic,
 Whose lines are, like thyself, gigantic.
 Yet let me blest, in humbler strain,
 Thy vast, thy bold Cambyesian vein,
 Pour'd out t' enrich thy native isle,
 As Egypt wont to be with Nile.
 Oh, how I joy to see thee wander,
 In many a winding loose meander,
 In circling mazes, smooth and supple,
 And ending in a clink quadruple ;
 Loud, yet agreeable withal.
 Like rivers rattling in their fall !
 Thine, sure, is poetry divine,
 Where wit and majesty combine ;
 Where every line, as huge as seven,
 If stretch'd in length, would reach to Heaven ;
 Here all comparing would be slandering,
 The least is more than Alexandrine.

Against thy verse Time fees with pain,
 He whets his envious scythe in vain ;
 For, though from thee he much may pare,
 Yet much thou still wilt have to spare.

Thou hast alone the skill to feast
 With Roman elegance of taste,
 Who hast of rhymes as fast resources
 As Pompey's caterer of courses.

Oh thou, of all the Nine inspir'd !
 My languid soul, with teaching tir'd,
 How is it raptur'd, when it thinks
 On thy harmonious set of clinks ;
 Each answering each in various rhymes,
 Like echo to St. Patrick's chimes !

Thy muse, majestic in her rage,
 Moves like Statira on the stage ;
 And scarcely can one page sustain
 The length of such a flowing train :
 Her train, of variégated dye,
 Shows like Thaumantia's in the sky ;

* These were all written in circles.

Alike they glow, alike they please,
 Alike imprest by Phœbus' rays.

Thy verse--(Ye Gods ! I cannot bear it)
 To what, to what shall I compare it ?
 'Tis like, what I have oft' heard spoke on,
 The famous statue of Laocoon.
 'Tis like---O yes, 'tis very like it,
 The long, long string, with which you fly kite,
 'Tis like what you, and one or too more,
 Roar to your Echo * in good humour ;
 And every couplet thou hast writ
 Conclude like Rattab-whittab-whit †.

TO MR. THOMAS SHERIDAN.

Upon his Verses written in Circles.

BY DR. SWIFT.

It never was known that circular letters,
 By humble companions, were sent to their bet-
 ters :

And, as to the subject, our judgment, meherc'le,
 Is this, that you argue like fools in a circle.
 But now for your verses ; we tell you, imprimis,
 The segment so large 'twixt your reason and rhyme is,

That we walk all about, like a horse in a pound,
 And, before we find either, our noddles turn
 round. [rant,

Sufficient it were, one would think, in your mad
 To give us your measures of line by a quadrant.

But we took our dividers, and found your d---n'd metre,

In each single verse took up a diameter.

But how, Mr. Sheridan, came you to venture
 George, Dan, Dean, and Nim, to place in the centre ‡ ?

'Twill appear, to your cost, you are fairly tre-
 pann'd,

For the chord of your circle is now in their hand ;
 The chord, or the radius, it matters not whether,
 By which your jade Pegasus, fixt in a tether,
 As her betters are us'd, shall be lash'd round the ring. [the string.

Three fellows with whips, and the Dean holds
 Will Hancock declares, you are out of your com-
 pafs,

To encroach on his art by writing of bombasts ;
 And has taken just now a firm resolution
 To answer your style without circumlocution.

Lady Betty§ presents you her service most humble,

And is not afraid your worship will grumble.
 That she makes of your verses a hoop for Miss
 Tam ||,

Which is all at present ; and so I remain—

* At Gaulstown there is a remarkably famous echo.

† An allusion to the sound produced by the echo.

‡ Their figures were in the centre of the verses.

§ The Lady of George Rockfort, Esq.

|| Miss Thomason, Lady Betty's daughter.

ON DR. SHERIDAN'S CIRCULAR
VERSES.

BY MR. GEORGE ROCHFORD.

WITH music and poetry equally blest,
A bard thus Apollo most humbly addrest;
" Great Author of harmony, verses, and light!
" Assisted by thee, I both fiddle and write.
" Yet unheeded I scrape, or I scribble all day;
" My verse is neglected, my tune's thrown away.
" Thy substitute here, Vice-Apollo, disdains
" To vouch for my numbers, or list to my strains;
" Thy manuel signet refuses to put
" To the airs I produce from the pen or the gut.
" Be thou then propitious, great Phœbus; and " grant
" Relief, or reward, to my merit, or want.
" Though the Dean and Delany transcendently
" shine,
" O brighten one solo or sonnet of mine!
" With them I'm content thou should'st make
" thy abode:
" But visit thy servant in jig or in ode,
" Make one work immortal; 'tis all I request."
Apollo look'd pleas'd; and, resolving to jest,
Reply'd, " Honest friend, I've consider'd thy case;
" Nor dislike thy well meaning and humourous
" face.
" Thy petition I grant: the boon is not great:
" Thy works shall continue; and here's the re-
" ceipt,
" On rondeaus hereafter thy fiddle-strings spend:
" Write verses in circles; they never shall end."

ON DAN JACKSON'S PICTURE,

Cut in Silk and Paper.

To fair Lady Betty, Dan sat for his picture,
And defy'd her to draw him so oft' as he piqu'd
her.
He knew she'd no pencil or colouring by her,
And therefore he thought he might safely defy
her.
Come sit, says my Lady; then whips up her scissar,
And cuts out his coxcomb in silk in a trice, Sir.
Dan sat with attention, and saw with surprize
How she lengthen'd his chin, how she hollow'd his eyes;
But flatter'd himself with a secret conceit,
That his thin lantern jaws all her art would defeat.
Lady Betty observ'd it, then pulls out a pin,
And varies the grain of the stuff to his grin;
And, to make roasted silk to resemble his raw-bone,
She rais'd up a thread to the jet of his jaw-bone;
Till at length in exactest proportion he rose,
From the crown of his head to the arch of his nose. [all,
And if Lady Betty had drawn him with wig and
'Tis certain the copy had out-done the original.

* See "Apollo to the Dean." p. 190.

Well, that's but my outside, says Dan with a vapour.
Say you so, says my Lady; I've lin'd it with paper.
PATR. DELANY sculp.

ON THE SAME PICTURE.

GLARISSA draws her scissars from the case,
To draw the lines of poor Dan Jackson's face.
One sloping cut made forehead, nose, and chin;
A nick produc'd a mouth, and made him grin, }
Such as in tailors' measure you have seen.
But still were wanting his grimalkin eyes,
For which grey worsted stocking paint supplies.
Th' unravel'd thread through needle's eye con-
vey'd
Transferr'd itself into his pasteboard head.
How came the scissars to be thus out-done?
The needle had an eye, and they had none.
O wondrous force of art! now look at Dan---
You'll swear the pasteboard was the better man.
" The devil!" says he, " the head is not so full!"
Indeed it is---behold the paper skull.
THO. SHERIDAN sculp.

ON THE SAME PICTURE.

DAN's evil genius in a trice
Had stripp'd him of his coin at dice.
Chloe, observing this disgrace,
On Pam cut out his rueful face.
By G--, says Dan, 'tis very hard,
Cut out at dice, cut out at card!
G. ROCHFORD sculp.

ON THE SAME PICTURE.

WHILST you three merry poets traffic
To give us a description graphic
Of Dan's large nose in modern Sapphic;
I spend my time in making Sermons,
Or writing libels on the Germans,
Or murmuring at Whigs' preferments.
But when I would find rhyme for Rochfort,
And look in English, French, and Scotch for't,
At last I'm fairly forc'd to botch for't.
Bid Lady Betty recollect her,
And tell, who was it could direct her
To draw the face of such a spectre.
I must confess, that as to me, Sirs,
Though I ne'er saw her hold the scissars,
I now could safely swear it is hers.
'Tis true no nose could come in better;
'Tis a vast subject stuff'd with matter,
Which all may handle, none can flatter.
Take courage, Dan; this plainly shows,
That not the wisest mortal knows
What fortune may befall his nose.
Shew me the brightest Irish toast,
Who from her lover e'er could boast
Above a song, or two at most;
For thee three poets now are drudging all
To praise the cheeks, chin, nose, the bridge and all,
Both of the picture and the original.

Thy nose's length and fame extend,
So far, dear Dan, that every friend
Tries who shall have it by the end.

And future poets, as they rise,
Shall read with envy and surprise
Thy nose out-shining Cælia's eyes.

JON. SWIFT.

DAN JACKSON'S DEFENCE.

"My verse little better you'll find than my face is
"A word to the wise—ut pictura pōis."

THREE merry lads, with envy stung,
Because Dan's face is better hung,
Combin'd in verse to rhyme it down,
And in its place set up their own;
As if they'd run it down much better
By number of their feet in metre,
Or that its red did cause their spite,
Which made them draw in black and white,
Be that as 'twill, this is most true,
They were inspir'd by what they drew.
Let them such critics know, my face
Gives them their comeliness and grace:
Whilst every line of face does bring
A line of grace to what they sing.
But yet methinks, though with disgrace
Both to the picture and the face,
I should name them who do rehearse
The story of the picture-farce;
The Squire, in French as hard as stone,
Or strong as rock, that's all as one,
On face, on cards is very brisk, Sirs,
Because on them you play at whisk, Sirs.
But much I wonder, why my crany
Should envy'd be by De-el-any:
And yet much more, than half-name-fake
Should join a party in the freak;
For sure I am it was not safe
Thus to abuse his better half,
As I shall prove you, Dan, to be,
Divisim and conjunctively.
For if Dan love not Sherry, can
Sherry be any thing to Dan?
This is the case whene'er you see
Dan makes nothing of Sherry;
Or should Dan be by Sherry o'erta'en,
Then Dan would be poor Sherridane:
'Tis hard then he should be decry'd
By Dan with Sherry by his side.
But, if the case must be so hard,
That faces suffer by a card,
Let critics censure, what care I?
Back-biters only we defy:
Faces are free from injury.

MR. ROCHFORT'S REPLY.

You say your face is better hung
Than ours---by what? by nose or tongue?
In not explaining, you are wrong

Because we thus must state the case,
That you have got a hanging face,
Th' untimely end's a damn'd disgrace to us, Sir.

of noose, Sir.

But yet be not cast down; I see
A weaver will your hangman be;
You'll only hang in tapestry with many.

And then the ladies, I suppose,
Will praise your longitude of nose,
For latent charms within your clothes,

dear Danny.

Thus will the fair of every age
From all parts make their pilgrimage,
Worship thy nose with pious rage of love, Sir.

All their region will be spent
About thy woven monument,
And not one orison be sent to Jove, Sir.

You the fam'd idol will become,
As gardens grac'd in ancient Rome,
By matron's worship'd in the gloom of night.

O happy Dan! thrice happy sure!
Thy fame for ever shall endure,
Who after death can love secure

at sight.

So far I thought it was my duty
To dwell upon thy boasted beauty;
Now I'll proceed a word or two t' ye,

in answer

To that party where you carry on
This paradox, that rock and stone
In your opinion are all one.

How can, Sir,

A man of reasoning so profound,
So stupidly be run aground,
As things so differently to confound

t' our senses?

Except you judg'd them by the knock
Of near an equal hardy block:
Such an experimental stroke

convinces.

Then might you be, by dint of reason,
A proper judge on this occasion;
'Gainst feeling there's no disputation,

is granted.

Therefore to thy superior wit,
Who made the trial, we submit;
Thy head to prove the truth of it

we wanted.

In one assertion you're to blame,
Where Dan and Sherry's made the same,
Endeavouring to have your name

refin'd, Sir.

You'll see most grossly you mistook:
If you consult your spelling-book,
(The better half you say you took)

you'll find, Sir,

S, H, E, She---and R, I, ri,
Both put together make Sherry;
D, A, N, Dan---makes up the three syllables.

Dan is but one, and Sherri two;
Then, Sir, your choice will never do;
Therefore I've turn'd, my friend, on you

the tables.

DR. DELANY'S REPLY.

ASSIST me, my Muse, whilst I labour to limn him :
Credite, Pisones, isti tabulae persimilem.

You look and you write with so different a grace,
That I envy your verse, tho' I did not your face.
And to him that thinks rightly, there's reason
enough,

'Cause one is as smooth as the other is rough.

But much I'm amaz'd you should think my design } quin grin,
Was to rhyme down your nose, or your harle-
Which you yourself wonder the de'el should malign. }

And if 'tis so strange, that your monstership's crany
Should be envy'd by him, much less by Delany.

Though I own to you, when I consider it stricter,
I envy the painter, although not the picture.

And justly she's envy'd, since a fiend of Hell
Was never drawn right but by her and Raphael.

Next, as to the charge, which you tell us is true
That we were inspir'd by the subject we drew;
Inspir'd we were, and well, Sir, you knew it,
Yet not by your nose, but the fair one that drew it:
Had your nose been the muse, we had ne'er been inspir'd,

Though perhaps it might justly 've been said we were fir'd.

As to the division of words in your staves,
Like my countryman's horn-comb, into three halves,

I meddle not with't, but presume to make merry.
You call'd Dan one half, and t'other half Sherry:
Now if Dan's a half, as you call 't o'er and o'er,
Then it can't be deny'd that Sherry's two more:
For pray give me leave to say, Sir, for all you,
That Sherry's at least of double the value.

But perhaps, Sir you did it to fill up the verse: }
So crowds in a concert (like actors in farce)
Play two parts in one, when scrapers are scarce. }
But be that as 'twill, you'll know more anon, Sir,
When Sheridan sends to Merry Dan answer.

SHERIDAN'S REPLY.

THREE merry lads you own we are;
'Tis very true, and free from care;
But envious we cannot bear,

believe, Sir.

For, were all forms of beauty thine,
Were you like Nereus soft and fine,
We should not in the least repine,

or grieve, Sir.

Then know from us, most beauteous Dan,
That roughness best becomes a man;
'Tis women should be pale and wan,

and taper.

And all your trifling beaux and fops,
Who comb their brows, and sleek their chops,
Are but the offspring of toy-shops,

meer vapour.

We know your morning-hours you pass
To cull and gather out a face;
Is this the way you take your glass?

Forbear it.

Those loads of paint upon your toilet,
Will never mend your face, but spoil it;
It looks as if you did par-boil it:

Drink claret

Your cheeks, by sleeking, are so lean,
That they're like Cynthia in the wane.
Or breast of goose when 'tis pick'd clean,

or pullet.

See what by drinking you have done:
You've made your phiz a skeleton,
From the long distance of your crown

t' your gullet!

A REJOINDER,

BY THE DEAN, IN JACKSON'S NAME.

WEARIED with saying grace and prayer,
I hasten down to country air,
To read your answer and prepare,

reply to't.

But your fair lines so grossly flatter,
Pray do they praise me, or bespatter?
I must suspect you mean the latter---

Ah! fly-boot!

It must be so! what else, alas,
Can mean by culling of a face,
And all that stuff of toilet, glass,

and box-comb?

But be't as 'twill, this you must grant,
That you're a dawb, whilst I but paint;
Then which of us two is the quaint-

er coxcomb

I value not your jokes of noose,
Your gibes, and all your foul abuse,
More than the dirt beneath my shoes,

nor fear it.

Yet one thing vexes me, I own,
Thou sorry scare-crow of skin and bone;
To be call'd lean by a skeleton,

who'd bear it?

'Tis true indeed to curry friends,
You seem to praise, to make amends,
And yet, before your stanza ends,

you flout me

'Bout latent charms beneath my cloaths;
For every one that knows me knows
That I have nothing like my nose

about me.

I pass now where you flee and laugh.

'Cause I call Dan my better half!

Oh there you think you have me safe!

But hold, Sir:

Is not a penny often found to be much greater than a pound?

By your good leave, my most profound and bold, Sir.

Dan's noble mettle, Sherry base;
So Dan's the better, though the less:
An ounce of gold's worth ten of brass,

dull pedant!

As to your spelling, let me see,
If SHE makes sher, and RI makes ry,
Good spelling-master! your crany

has lead on't.

ANOTHER REJOINDER,

BY THE DEAN, IN JACKSON'S NAME.

THREE days for answer I have waited ;
 I thought an ace you'd ne'er have bated ;
 And art thou forc'd to yield, ill-fated poetaster ?
 Henceforth acknowledge that a nose
 Of thy dimension's fit for prose ;
 But every one that knows Dan, knows thy master.
 Blush for ill-spelling, for ill lines,
 And fly with hurry to ramines ;
 Thy fame, thy genius now declines,
 proud boaster.
 I hear with some concern you roar,
 And flying think to quit the score
 By clapping billets on your door and posts, Sir,
 Thy ruin, Tom, I never meant ;
 I'm griev'd to hear your banishment,
 But pleas'd to find you do relent and cry on.
 I maul'd you, when you look'd so bluff,
 But now I'll secret keep your stuff ;
 For know, prostration is enough to th' lion.

SHERIDAN'S SUBMISSION.

BY THE DEAN.

" Cedo jam, miseræ cognoscens præmia rixæ,
 " Si risca est, ubi tu pulsas ego vapulo tantum."

POOR Sherry, inglorious,
 To Dan the victorious,
 Presents as 'tis fitting,
 Petition and greeting.

TO you victorious and brave,
 Your now-subdued and suppliant slave
 Most humbly sues for pardon ;
 Who when I fought still cut me down,
 And when I vanish'd fled the town,
 Pursued and laid me hard on.
 Now lowly crouch'd I cry peccavi,
 And prostrate supplicate pour ma vie :
 Your mercy I rely on ;
 For you, my conqueror and my king,
 In pardoning as in punishing,
 Will shew yourself a lion.
 Alas ! Sir, I had no design,
 But was unwarily drawn in ;
 For spite I ne'er had any :
 'Twas the damn'd squire with the hard name ;
 The de'ol too that ow'd me a shame,
 The devil and Delany ;
 They tempted me t' attack your highness,
 And then, with wonted wile and slyness,
 They left me in the lurch :
 Unhappy wretch ! for now, I ween,
 I've nothing left to vent my spleen
 But ferula and birch :
 And they, alas ! yield small relief,
 Seem rather to renew my grief ;
 My wounds bleed all anew :

For every stroke goes to my heart,
 And at each lash I feel the smart
 Of lash laid on by you.

To the Rev. DANIEL JACKSON ;

To be humbly presented by Mr. SHERIDAN in Person, with Respect, Care, and Speed.

DEAR DAN.

HERE I return my trust, nor ask
 One penny for remittance ;
 If I have well perform'd my task,
 Pray send me an acquittance.
 Too long I bore this weighty pack,
 As Hercules the sky ;
 Now take him you, Dan Atlas, back,
 Let me be stander-by.
 Not all the witty things you speak
 In compais of a day,
 Not half the puns you make a week,
 Should bribe his longer stay.
 With me you left him out at nurse,
 Yet are you not my debtor ;
 For, as he hardly can be worse,
 I ne'er could make him better.
 He rhymes and puns, and puns and rhymes,
 Just as he did before ;
 And when he's lash'd a hundred times,
 He rhymes and puns the more.
 When rods are laid on school-boys bums,
 The more they frisk and skip :
 The school-boy's top but louder hums,
 The more they use the whip.
 Thus, a lean beast beneath a load
 (A beast of Irish breed)
 Will, in a tedious, dirty road,
 Outgo the prancing steed.
 You knock him down and down in vain,
 And lay him flat before ye ;
 For, soon as he gets up again,
 He'll strut, and cry, Victoria !
 At every stroke of mine he fell :
 'Tis true he roar'd and cry'd ;
 But his impenetrable shell
 Could feel no harm beside.
 The tortoise thus, with motion slow,
 Will clamber up a wall ;
 Yet, senseless to the hardest blow,
 Gets nothing but a fall.
 Dear Dan, then, why should you or I,
 Attack his pericrany ?
 And, since it is in vain to try,
 We'll send him to Delany.

POSTSCRIPT.

Lean Tom, when I saw him, last week, on his horse awry,
 Threaten'd loudly to turn me to stone with his forcery.
 But, I think, little Dan, that, in spite of what our foe says,
 He will find I read Ovid and his Metamorphosis.

For omitting the] (first where I make a comparison,

With a sort of allusion to Putland or Harrison)
Yet, by my description, you'll find he in short is
A pack and a garran, a top and a tortoise.

So I hope from henceforward you ne'er will ask,
can I maul

This teasing, conceited, rude, insolent animal?
And, if this rebuke might turn to his benefit,
(For I pity the man) I should be glad then of it.

TO DR. SHERIDAN,

ON HIS "ART OF PUNNING."

HAD I ten thousand mouthis and tongues,
Had I ten thousand pair of lungs,
Ten thousand sculls with brains to think,
Ten thousand standishes of ink,
Ten thousand hands and pens, to write
Thy praise I'd study day and night.

Oh may thy Work for ever live!
(Dear Tom, a friendly zeal forgive)
May no vile miscreant saucy Cook
Presume to tear thy learned Book,
To finge his fowl for nicer guest,
Or pin it on the turkey's breast.
Keep it from pasty bak'd or flying,
From broiling stake, or fritters frying,
From lighting pipe, or making snuff,
Or casing up a feather muff;
From all the several ways the Grocer
(Who to the learned world's a foe, Sir)
Has found in twisting, folding, packing,
His brains and ours at once a racking.
And may it never curl the bead,
Of either living block or dead!
Thus, when all dangers they have past,
Your leaves, like leaves of brass, shall last.
No blast shall from a critic's breath,
By vile infection, cause their death,
Till they in flames at last expire,
And help to set the world on fire.

STELLA TO DR. SWIFT,

ON HIS BIRTH-DAY, NOV. 30. 1721.

ST. Patrick's Dean, your country's pride,
My early and my only guide,
Let me among the rest attend,
Your pupil and your humble friend,
To celebrate in female strains
The day that paid your mother's pains;
Descend to take that tribute due
In gratitude alone to you.
When men began to call me fair,
You interpos'd your timely care;
You early taught me to despise
The ogling of a coxcomb's eyes;
Show'd where my judgment was misplac'd;
Refin'd my fancy and my taste.

Behold that beauty just decay'd,
Invoking art to nature's aid:
Forsook by her admiring train,
She spreads her tatter'd nets in vain:

Short was her part upon the stage;
Went smoothly on for half a page;
Her bloom was gone, she wanted art,
As the scene chang'd, to change her part;
She, whom no lover could resist,
Before the second act was hiss'd.
Such is the fate of female race
With no endowments but a face;
Before the thirtieth year of life,
A maid forlorn, or hated wife.

Stella to you, her tutor, owes
That she has ne'er resembled those;
Nor was a burden to mankind
With half her course of years behind,
You taught how I might youth prolong,
By knowing what was right and wrong;
How from my heart to bring supplies
Of lustre to my fading eyes;
How soon a beauteous mind repairs
The loss of chang'd or falling hairs;
How wit and virtue from within
Send out a smoothness o'er the skin:
Your lectures could my fancy fix,
And I can please at thirty-six.
The sight of Chloe at fifteen
Coquetting, gives me not the spleen;
The idol now of every fool,
Till time shall make their passions cool;
Then tumbling down time's steepy hill,
While Stella holds her station still.
Oh! turn your precepts into laws,
Redeem the women's ruin'd cause;
Retrieve lost empire to our sex,
That men may bow their rebel necks.

Long be the day that gave you birth,
Sacred to friendship, wit, and mirth!
Late dying may you cast a shred
Of your rich mantle o'er my head;
To bear with dignity my sorrow,
One day alone, then die to-morrow!

TO STELLA,

ON HER BIRTH-DAY. 1721-2.

WHILE, Stella, to your lasting praise,
The Muse her annual tribute pays,
While I assign myself a task
Which you expect, but scorn to ask;
If I perform this task with pain,
Let me of partial fate complain;
You every year the debt enlarge,
I grow less equal to the charge:
In you each virtue brighter shines,
But my poetic vein declines;
My harp will soon in vain be strung,
And all your virtues left unsung:
For none among the upstart race
Of poets dare assume my place;
Your worth will be to them unknown,
They must have Stella's of their own;
And thus, my stock of wit decay'd,
I dying leave the debt unpaid,
Unless Delany, as my heir,
Will answer for the whole arrear.

ON THE GREAT BURIED BOTTLE.

BY DR. DELANY.

AMPHORA, quæ mæstum linquis, lætumque revives
 Arentem dominum, sit tibi terra levis. [mor ;
 Tu quoque depositum serves, neve opprime, mar-
 Amphora non meruit tam pretiosa mori.

EPITAPH, BY THE SAME.

Hoc tumulato jacet proles Lenæa sepulchro,
 Immortale genus, nec peritura jacet ;
 Quin oritura iterum, matris concreditur alvo ;
 Bis natum referunt te quoque, Bacche Pater.

STELLA'S BIRTH-DAY:

A great Bottle of Wine, long buried, being that Day dug up. 1722-3.

RESOLV'D my annual verse to pay,
 By beauty bound, on Stella's day,
 Furnish'd with paper, pens, and ink,
 I gravely sat me down to think :
 I bit my nails, and scratch'd my head,
 But found my wit and fancy fled :
 Or, if with more than usual pain,
 A thought came slowly from my brain,
 It cost me Lord knows how much time
 To shape it into sense and rhyme :
 And, what was yet a greater curse.
 Long thinking made my fancy worse.
 Forsaken by th' inspiring Nine,
 I waited at Apollo's shrine :
 I told him what the world would say,
 If Stella were unfung to-day ;
 How I should hide my head for shame,
 When both the Jacks and Robin came ;
 How Ford would frown, how Jim would leer ;
 How Sheridan the rogue would sneer,
 And swear it does not always follow,
 That semel 'n anno ridet Apollo.
 I have assur'd them twenty times,
 That Phœbus help'd me in my rhymes ;
 Phœbus inspir'd me from above,
 And he and I were hand and glove.
 But, finding me so dull and dry since,
 They'll call it all poetic licence ;
 And, when a brag of aid divine,
 Think Eusden's right as good as mine.
 Nor do I ask for Stella's sake ;
 'Tis my own credit lies at stake :
 And Stella will be fung, while I
 Can only be a stander-by.

Apollo, having thought a little,
 Return'd this answer to a tittle.

Though you should live like old Methusalem,
 I furnish hints, and you shall use all 'em,
 You yearly sing as she grows old,
 You'd leave her virtue's half untold.
 But, to say truth, such dullness reigns
 Through the whole set of Irish deans,
 I'm daily stunn'd with such a medley,
 Dean W—, Dean D—, and Dean Smedley,
 That, let what Dean soever come,
 My orders are, I'm not at home ;
 And, if your voice had not been loud,
 You must have pass'd among the crowd.

But now, your danger to prevent,
 You must apply to Mrs. Brent ;
 For she, as priestess, knows the rites
 Wherein the god of earth delights,
 First, nine ways looking, let her stand
 With an old poker in her hand ;
 Let her describe a circle round
 In Saunders' cellar, on the ground :
 A spade let prudent Archy hold,
 And with discretion dig the mould ;
 Let Stella look with watchful eye,
 Rebecca, Ford, and Grattans by.

Behold the bottle, where it lies
 With neck elated towards the skies !
 The god of winds and god of fire
 Did to its wondrous birth conspire ;
 And Bacchus, for the poet's use,
 Pour'd in a strong inspiring juice.
 See ! as you raise it from its tomb,
 It drags behind a spacious womb,
 And in the spacious womb contains
 A sovereign medicine for the brains.

You'll find it soon, if fate consents ;
 If not, a thousand Mrs. Brents,
 Ten thousand Archys arm'd with spades,
 May dig in vain to Pluto's shades.

From thence a plenteous draught infuse,
 And boldly then invoke the Muse
 (But first let Robert, on his knees,
 With caution drain it from thee lees) :
 The Muse will at your call appear,
 With Stella's praise to crown the year.

A SATIRICAL ELEGY

ON THE DEATH OF A LATE FAMOUS GENERAL.

His Grace ! impossible ! what dead !
 Of old age too, and in his bed !
 And could that mighty warrior fall,
 And so inglorious, after all !
 Well, since he's gone, no matter how,
 The last loud trump must wake him now :
 And, trust me, as the noise grows stronger,
 He'd wish to sleep a little longer.
 And could he be indeed so old
 As by the news-papers we're told ?
 Threescore, I think is pretty high ;
 'Twas time in conscience he should die !
 This world he cumber'd long enough ;
 He burnt his candle to the snuff ;
 And that's the reason some folks think,
 He left behind so great a f—k.
 Behold his funeral appears,
 Nor widow's sighs, nor orphan's tears,
 Wont at such times each heart to pierce,
 Attend the progress of his herse.
 But what of that ? his friends may say,
 He had those honours in his day.
 True to his profit and his pride,
 He made them weep before he dy'd.
 Come hither, all ye empty things !
 Ye bubbles rais'd by breath of kings !
 Who float upon the tide of state ;
 Come hither, and behold your fate ;
 Let pride be taught by this rebuke,
 How very mean a thing 's a Duke ;

From all his ill-got honour's flung,
Turn'd to that dirt from whence he sprung.

DEAN SMEDLEY'S PETITION TO THE DUKE OF GRAFTON.

"Non domus aut fundus—"

HOR.

It was, my lord, the dextrous shift
Of t'other Jonathan, viz. Swift;
But now St. Patrick's saucy dean,
With silver verge and surplice clean,
Of Oxford, or of Ormond's grace,
In looser rhyme to beg a place.

A place he got, yclept a stall,
And eke a thousand pounds withal;
And, were he a less witty writer,
He might as well have got a mitre.

Thus I the Jonathan of Clogher,
In humble lays my thanks to offer,
Approach your grace with grateful heart,
My thanks and verse both void of art,
Content with what your bounty gave,
No larger income do I crave;
Rejoicing that, in better times,
Grafton requires my loyal lines.
Proud! while my patron is polite,
I likewise to the patriot write!
Proud! that at once I can commend
King George's and the Muses' friend!
Endear'd to Britain; and to thee
(Disjoin'd, Hibernia, by the sea)
Endear'd by twice three anxious years,
Employ'd in guardian toils and cares;
By love, by wisdom, and by skill;
For he has fav'd thee 'gainst thy will.

But where shall Smedley make his nest,
And lay his wandering head to rest?
Where shall he find a decent house,
To treat his friends and cheer his spouse?
Oh! tack, my lord, some pretty cure;
In wholesome soil, and æther pure;
The garden stor'd with artless flowers,
In either angle shady bowers.
No gay parterre, with costly green,
Within the ambient hedge be seen:
Let Nature freely take her course,
Nor fear from me ungrateful force;
No sheers shall check her sprouting vigour,
Nor shape the yews to antic figure:
A limpid brook shall trout supply,
In May, to take the mimic fly;
Round a small orchard may it run,
Whose apples redden to the sun.
Let all be snug and warm, and neat;
For fifty turn'd a safe retreat.
A little Euston may it be,
Euston I'll crave on every tree.
But then, to keep it in repair,
My lord—twice fifty pounds a year
Will barely do; but if your grace
Could make them hundreds—charming place!
Thou then would'st show another face.

Clogher! far north, my lord, it lies,
Midst snowy hills, inclement skies;
One shivers with the arctic wind;
One hears the polar axis grind.

Good John * indeed, with beef and claret,
Makes the place warm that one may bear it,
He has a purse to keep a table,
And eke a soul as hospitable.
My heart is good; but affets fail,
To fight with storms of snow and hail.
Besides the country's thin of people,
Who seldom meet but at the steeple:
The strapping dean, that's gone to Down,
Ne'er nam'd the thing without a frown;
When, much fatigu'd with sermon-study,
He felt his brain grow dull and muddy;
No fit companion could be found,
To push the lazy bottle round;
Sure then, for want of better folks
To pledge, his clerk was orthodox.

Ah! how unlike to Gerard-street,
Where beaux and belles in parties meet;
Where gilded chairs and coaches throng,
And jostle as they trowl along:
Where tea and coffee hourly flow,
And gape-seed does in plenty grow;
And Griz (no clock more certain) cries,
Exact at seven, "Hot mutton-pies!"
There lady Luna in her sphere
Once shone, when Paunceforth was not near;
But now she wanes, and, as 'tis said,
Keeps sober hours, and goes to bed.
There—but 'tis endless to write down
All the amusements of the town;
And spouse will think herself quite undone,
To trudge to Connor † from sweet London;
And care we must our wives to please,
Or else—we shall be ill at ease.

You see, my lord, what 'tis I lack;
'Tis only some convenient tack,
Some parsonage-house, with garden sweet,
To be my late, my last retreat;
A decent church close by its side,
There preaching, praying, to reside;
And, as my time securely rolls,
To save my own, and other souls.

THE DUKE'S ANSWER.

BY DR. SWIFT.

DEAR Smed, I read thy brilliant lines,
Where wit in all its glory shines;
Where compliments, with all their pride,
Are by their numbers dignified:
I hope to make you yet as clean
As that same Viz. St. Patrick's dean.
I'll give thee surplice, verge, and stall,
And may be something else withal;
And, were you not so good a writer,
I should present you with a mitre.
Write worse then, if you can—Be wise—
Believe me, 'tis the way to rise.
Talk not of making of thy nest:
Ah! never lay thy head to rest!
That head so well with wisdom fraught,
That writes without the toil of thought!

* Bishop Sterne.

† The bishoprick of Connor is united to that of Down; but there are two deans.

While others rack their busy brains,
 You are not in the least at pains.
 Down to your deanry now repair,
 And build a castle in the air.
 I'm sure a man of your fine sense
 Can do it with a small expence.
 There your dear spouse and you together
 May breathe your bellies full of æther.
 When lady Luna is your neighbour,
 She'll help your wife when she's in labour;
 Well skill'd in midwife artifices,
 For she herself oft' falls in pieces.
 There you shall see a raree-show
 Will make you scorn this world below,
 When you behold the milky way,
 As white as snow, as bright as day;
 The glittering constellations roll
 About the grinding Arctic pole;
 The lovely tingling in your ears,
 Wrought by the music of the spheres—
 Your spouse shall then no longer hector,
 You need not fear a curtain-lecture;
 Nor shall she think that she is undone
 For quitting her belov'd London.
 When she's exalted in the skies,
 She'll never think of mutton-pies;
 When you're advanc'd above dean Viz,
 You'll never think of goody Griz.
 But ever, ever, live at ease,
 And strive, and strive, your wife to please;
 In her you'll centre all your joys,
 And get ten thousand girls and boys:
 Ten thousand girls and boys you'll get,
 And they like stars shall rise and set;
 While you and spouse, transform'd, shall soon
 Be a new sun and a new moon:
 Nor shall you strive your horns to hide,
 For then your horns shall be your pride.

VERSES BY STELLA.

If it be true, celestial Powers,
 That you have form'd me fair,
 And yet, in all my vainest hours,
 My mind has been my care;
 Then, in return, I beg this grace,
 As you were ever kind,
 What envious Time takes from my face,
 Bestow upon my mind!

JEALOUSY. BY THE SAME*.

O SHIELD me from his rage, celestial Powers;
 This tyrant that imbitters all my hours!
 Ah, Love! you've poorly play'd the hero's part:
 You conquer'd, but you can't defend my heart.
 When first I bent beneath your gentle reign,
 I thought this monster banish'd from your train:
 But you would raise him to support your throne;
 And now he claims your empire as his own.
 Or tell me, tyrants! have you both agreed,
 That where one reigns, the other shall succeed?

DR. DELANY'S VILLA.

Would you that Delville I describe?
 Believe me, Sir, I will not gibe:
 For who would be satirical
 Upon a thing so very small?

You scarce upon the borders enter,
 Before you're at the very centre.
 A single crow can make it night,
 When o'er your farm she takes her flight:
 Yet, in this narrow compass, we Observe a vast variety;
 Both walks, walls, meadows, and parterres,
 Windows and doors, and rooms and stairs,
 And hills and dales, and woods and fields,
 And hay, and grass, and corn, it yields;
 All to your haggard brought so cheap in,
 Without the mowing or the reaping:
 A razor, though to say't I'm loth,
 Would shave you and your meadows both.

Though small's the farm, yet here's a house
 Full large to entertain a mouse,
 But where a rat is dreaded more
 Than savage Caledonian boar;
 For, if it's enter'd by a rat,
 There is no room to bring a cat.

A little rivulet seems to steal
 Down through a thing you call a vale,
 Like tears adown a wrinkled cheek,
 Like rain along a blade of leek;
 And this you call your sweet meander,
 Which might be suck'd up by a gander,
 Could he but force his nether bill
 To scoop the channel of the rill:
 For sure you'd make a mighty clutter,
 Were it as big as city-gutter.

Next come I to your kitchen-garden,
 Where one poor mouse would fare but hard in;
 And round this garden is a walk,
 No longer than a tailor's chalk:
 Thus I compare what space is in it,
 A snail creeps round it in a minute.
 One lettuce makes a shift to squeeze
 Up through a tuft you call your trees;
 And, once a year, a single rose
 Peeps from the bud, but never blows;
 In vain then you expect its bloom!
 It cannot blow for want of room.

In short, in all your boasted seat,
 There's nothing but yourself that's GREAT.

ON ONE OF THE WINDOWS AT DELVILLE.

A BARD, grown desirous of saving his pelf,
 Built a house he was sure would hold none but himself.
 This enrag'd god Apollo, who Mercury sent,
 And bid him go ask what his votary meant.
 "Some foe to my empire has been his adviser:
 "'Tis of dreadful portent when a poet turns miser!"
 "Tell him, Hermes, from me, tell that subject
 "of mine,
 "I have sworn by the Styx to defeat his design;

" For wherever he lives, the Muses shall reign ;
 " And the Muses, he knows, have a numerous
 " train."

CARBERIÆ RUPES,

IN COMITATU CORGAGENSIS. 1723.

ECCE ingens fragmen scopuli, quod vertice summo
 Desuper impendet, nullo fundamine nixum
 Decidit in fluctus: maria undique & undique faxa
 Horrifono stridore tonant, et ad æthera murmur
 Erigitur; trepidatque suis Neptunus in undis.
 Nam, longâ venti rabie, atque aspergine crebrâ
 Æquorei laticis, spicus imâ rupe cavatur:
 Jam ultura ruit, jam summa cacumina nutant;
 Jam cadit in præceps moles, et verberat undas.
 Attonitus credas, hinc dejecisse Tonantem
 Montibus impositos montes, et Pelion altum.
 In capita anguipedum cœlo jaculâsse gigantum.

Sæpe etiam spelunca immani aperitur hiatu
 Exesa è scopulis, et utrinque foramina pandit,
 Hinc atque hinc a ponto ad pontum pervia Phœbo.
 Cautibus enormè junctis laquearia tecti
 Formantur; moles olim ruitura supernè.
 Fornice sublimi nidos posuere palumbes,
 Inque imo stagni posuere cubilia phocæ.

Sed, cum sævit hyems, et venti, carcere rupto,
 Immenso volvunt fluctus ad culmina montis;
 Non obfessæ arces, non fulmina vindice dextrâ
 Missa Jovis, quoties inimicas sævit in urbes,
 Exæquant sonitum undarum, veniente procellâ:
 Littora littoribus reboant; vicinia latè,
 Gens assueta mari, et pedibus percurrere rupes,
 Terretur tamen, et longè fugit, arva relinquens.

Gramina dum carpunt pendentes rupe capellæ,
 Vi salientis aque de summo præcipitantur,
 Et dulces animas imo sub gurgite linqunt.

Piscator terrâ non audet vellere funem;
 Sed latet in portu tremebundus, et aëra sudum
 Haud sperans, Nereum precibus votisque fatigat.

CARBERY ROCKS,

TRANSLATED BY DR. DUNKIN.

Lo! from the top of yonder cliff, that shrouds
 Its airy head amidst the azure clouds,
 Hangs a huge fragment; destitute of props,
 Prone on the waves the rocky ruin drops;
 With hoarse rebuff the swelling seas rebound,
 From shore to shore the rocks return the sound:
 The dreadful murmur heaven's high convex cleaves,
 And Neptune shrinks beneath his subject waves;
 For long the whirling winds and beating tides
 Had scoop'd a vault into its nether sides.
 Now yields the base, the summits nod, now urge
 Their headlong course, and lash the foundering surge.

Not louder noise could shake the guilty world,
 When Jove heap'd mountains upon mountains hurl'd;

Retorting Pelion from his dread abode,
 To crush Earth's rebel-sons beneath the load.

Oft' too with hideous yawn the cavern wide
 Presents an orifice on either side,
 A dismal orifice, from sea to sea
 Extended, pervious to the God of Day:

Uncouthly join'd, the rocks stupendous form
 An arch, the ruin of a future storm:
 High on the cliff their nests the Woodquests make,
 And Sea-calves stable in the oozy lake.

But when bleak Winter with his fullen train
 Awakes the winds to vex the watery plain;
 When o'er the craggy steep without control,
 Big with the blast, the raging billows roll;
 Not towns beleaguér'd, not the flaming brand,
 Darted from Heaven by Jove's avenging hand,
 Oft' as on impious men his wrath he pours,
 Humbles their pride, and blasts their gilded towers,
 Equal the tumult of this wild uproar:

Waves rush o'er waves, rebellows shore to shore.
 The neighbouring race, though wont to brave
 the shocks

Of angry seas, and run along the rocks,
 Now pale with terror, while the ocean foams,
 Fly far and wide, nor trust their native homes.

The goats, while pendent from the mountain-top
 The wither'd herb improvident they crop,
 Wash'd down the precipice with sudden sweep,
 Leave their sweet lives beneath th' unfathom'd deep.

The frightened fisher, with desponding eyes,
 Though safe, yet trembling in the harbour lies,
 Nor hoping to behold the skies serene,
 Wearies with vows the monarch of the main.

UPON THE HORRID PLOT DISCOVERED
BY HARLEQUIN,

THE BISHOP OF ROCHESTER'S FRENCH DOG *.

In a Dialogue between a Whig and a Tory. 1723.

I ASK'D a Whig the other night,
 How came this wicked plot to light?
 He answer'd, that a dog of late
 Inform'd a minister of state.
 Said I, from thence I nothing know;
 For are not all informers so?
 A villain who his friend betrays,
 We style him by no other phrase;
 And so a perjur'd dog denotes
 Porter, and Prendergast, and Oates,
 And forty others I could name.

Whig. But, you must know, this dog was lame.

Tory. A weighty argument indeed!
 Your evidence was lame:---proceed:
 Come, help your lame dog o'er the style.

Whig. Sir, you mistake me all this while:
 I mean a dog (without a joke)
 Can howl, and bark, but never spoke.

Tory. I'm still to speak, which dog you mean;
 Whether cur Plunkett, or whelp Skee, or
 An English or an Irish hound;
 Or t'other puppy, that was drown'd;
 Or Mason, that abandon'd bitch:
 Then pray be free, and tell me which:
 For every stander-by was marking
 That all the noise they made was barking.
 You pay them well; the dogs have got
 Their dog-heads in a porridge pot:

* See the "State Trials," Vol. VI.

And 'twas but just; for wise men say,
That every dog must have his day.
Dog Walpole laid a quart of nog on't,
He'd either make a hog or dog on't;
And look'd, since he has got his wish,
As if he had thrown down a dish.
Yet this I dare foretel you from it,
He'll soon return to his own vomit.

Whig. Besides, this horrid plot was found
By Neynoe, after he was drown'd.

Tory. Why then the proverb is not right,
Since you can teach dead dogs to bite.

Whig. I prov'd my proposition full:
But Jacobites are strangely dull.
Now let me tell you plainly, Sir,
Our witness is a real cur,
A dog of spirit for his years,
Has twice two legs, two hanging ears;
His name is Harlequin, I wot,
And that's a name in every plot:
Resolv'd to save the British nation,
Though French by birth and education;
His correspondence plainly dated,
Was all decypher'd and translated:
His answers were exceeding pretty
Before the secret wise committee:
Confess'd as plain as he could bark;
Then with his fore-foot set his mark.

Tory. Then all this while have I been bubbled,
I thought it was a dog in doublet:
The matter now no longer sticks;
For statesmen never want dog-tricks.
But since it was a real cur,
And not a dog in metaphor,
I give you joy of the report,
That he's to have a place at court.

Whig. Yes, and a place he will grow rich in;
A turn-spit in the royal kitchen.
Sir, to be plain, I tell you what,
We had occasion for a plot:
And, when we found the dog begin it,
We guess'd the bishop's foot was in it.

Tory. I own it was a dangerous project;
And you have prov'd it by dog-logic.
Sure such intelligence between
A dog and bishop ne'er was seen,
Till you began to change the breed;
Your bishops all are dogs indeed!

STELLA AT WOOD-PARK.

A House of Charles Ford, Esq. near Dublin. 1723.

" —Cuicumque nocere volebat,
" Vestimenta dabat pretiosa."

DON Carlos in a merry spight,
Did Stella to his house invite;
He entertain'd her half a year
With generous wines and costly cheer.
Don Carlos made her chief director,
That she might o'er the servants hector.
In half a week the dame grew nice,
Got all things at the highest price:
Now at the table-head she sits,
Presented with the nicest bits:

She look'd on partridges with scorn,
Except they tasted of the corn;
A haunch of venison made her sweat,
Unless it had the right fumette.
Don Carlos earnestly would beg,
Dear madam, try this pigeon's leg;
Was happy, when he could prevail
To make her only touch a quail.
Through candle-light she view'd the wine,
To see that every glass was fine.
At last, grown prouder than the devil
With feeding high and treatment civil,
Don Carlos now began to find
His malice work as he design'd.
The winter-sky began to frown;
Poor Stella must pack off to town:
From purling streams and fountains bubbling,
To Liffy's stinking tide at Dublin;
From wholesome exercise and air,
To flogging in an easy chair;
From stomach sharp, and hearty feeding,
To piddle like a lady breeding;
From ruling there the household singly,
To be directed here by Dingley *;
From every day a lordly banquet,
To half a joint, and God be thanked;
From every meal Pontack in plenty,
To half a pint one day in twenty;
From Ford attending at her call,
To visits of — — —
From Ford who thinks of nothing mean,
To the poor doings of the Dean;
From growing richer with good cheer,
To running-out by starving here.

But now arrives the dismal day;
She must return to Ormond Quay †.
The coachman stopt; she look'd, and swore
The rascal had mistook the door:
At coming in, you saw her stoop;
The entry brush'd against her hoop:
Each moment rising in her airs,
She curst the narrow winding stairs;
Began a thousand faults to spy:
The cieling hardly six feet high;
The smutty waincoat full of cracks;
And half the chairs with broken backs:
Her quarter's out at Lady-day;
She vows she will no longer stay
In lodgings like a poor Grizette,
While there are lodgings to be let.

Howe'er to keep her spirits up,
She sent for company to sup:
When all the while you might remark,
She strove in vain to ape Wood-park.
Two bottles call'd for (half her store;
The cupboard could contain but four):
A supper worthy of herself,
Five nothings in five plates of delf.

Thus for a week the farce went on
When, all her country-savings gone,
She fell into her former scene,
Small beer, a herring, and the Dean.

Thus far in jest: though now, I fear,
You think my jesting too severe;

* The constant companion of Stella.

† Where the two ladies lodged.

But poets, when a hint is new,
 No matter whether false or true :
 Yet raillery gives no offence,
 Where truth has not the least pretence ;
 Nor can be more securely plac'd
 Than on a nymph of Stella's taste.
 I must confess, your wine and vittle
 I was too hard upon a little :
 Your table neat, your linen fine ;
 And, though in miniature, you shine :
 Yet, when you sigh to leave Wood-park,
 The scene, the welcome, and the spark,
 To languish in this odious town,
 And pull your haughty stomach down ;
 We think you quite mistake the case,
 The virtue lies not in the place :
 For, though my raillery were true,
 A cottage is Wood-park with you.

COPY OF THE BIRTH-DAY VERSES

ON MR. FORD.

COME, be content, since out it must,
 For Stella has betray'd her trust ;
 And, whispering, charg'd me not to say
 That Mr. Ford was born to-day ;
 Or, if at last I needs must blab it,
 According to my usual habit,
 She bid me, with a serious face,
 Be sure conceal the time and place ;
 And not my compliment to spoil,
 By calling this your native soil ;
 Or vex the ladies, when they knew
 That you are turning forty-two :
 But, if these topics shall appear
 Strong arguments to keep you here,
 I think, though you judge hardly of it,
 Good-manners must give place to profit.

The nymphs with whom you first began
 Are each become a barridan ;
 And Montague so far decay'd,
 Her lovers now must all be paid ;
 And every belle that since arose
 Has . . . contemporary beaux.
 Your former comrades, once so bright,
 With whom you toasted half the night,
 Of rheumatism and pox complain,
 And bid adieu to dear champaign.
 Your great protectors, once in power,
 Are now in exile or the Tower.
 Your foes triumphant o'er the laws,
 Who hate your person and your cause,
 If once they get you on the spot,
 You must be guilty of the plot :
 For, true or false, they'll ne'er inquire,
 But use you ten times worse than Prior.

Vol. IX

Hear him blaspheme, and swear, and rail,
 Threatening the pillory and jail :
 If this you think a pleasing scene,
 To London straight return again ;
 Where, you have told us from experience,
 Are swarms of bugs and presbyterians.

I thought my very spleen would burst,
 When fortune hither drove me first ;
 Was full as hard to please as you,
 Nor persons names nor places knew :
 But now I act as other folk,
 Like prisoners when their jail is broke.

If you have London still at heart,
 We'll make a small one here by art :
 The difference is not much between
 St. James's Park, and Stephen's Green ;
 And Dawson-street will serve as well
 To lead you thither as Pall-Mall.
 Nor want a passage through the palace,
 To choke your sight, and raise your malice :
 The Deanry-house may well be match'd,
 Under correction, with the Thatcht *.

Nor shall I, when you hither come,
 Demand a crown a quart for stum.
 Then, for a middle-aged charmer,
 Stella may vie with your Monthermer ;
 She's now as handsome every bit,
 And has a thousand times her wit.
 The Dean and Sheridan, I hope,
 Will half supply a Gay and Pope.
 Corbet †, though yet I know his worth not,
 No doubt will prove a good Arbuthnot.
 I throw into the bargain Tim ;
 In London can you equal him ?
 What think you of my favourite clan,
 Robin ‡, and Jack, and Jack and Dan,
 Fellows of modest worth and parts,
 With cheerful looks and honest hearts ?
 Can you on Dublin look with scorn ?
 Yet here were you and Ormond born.

Oh ! were but you and I so wise,
 To see with Robert Grattan's eyes !
 Robin adores that spot of earth,
 That literal spot which gave him birth ;
 And swears, " Belcamp || is, to his taste,
 " As fine as Hampton-court at least."
 When to your friends you would enhance
 The praise of Italy or France,
 For grandeur, elegance, and wit,
 We gladly hear you, and submit :
 But then, to come and keep a clutter,
 For this or that side of the gutter,
 To live in this or t' other isle,
 We cannot think it worth your while ;
 For, take it kindly or amiss,
 The difference but amounts to this :
 We bury on our side the channel
 In linen ; and on yours in flannel §.

* A famous tavern in St. James's Street.

† Dr. Corbet, afterwards dean of St. Patrick's.

‡ R. and I. Grattan, and J. and D. Jackson.

|| In Fingall, about five miles from Dublin.

§ The law for burying in woollen was extended to Ireland in 1733.

You for the news are ne'er to seek;
While we, perhaps, may wait a week:
You happy folks are sure to meet
An hundred whores in every street;
While we may trace all Dublin o'er
Before we find out half a score.

You see my arguments are strong;
I wonder you held out so long:
But, since you are convinc'd at last,
We'll pardon you for what is past.
So---let us now for whist prepare;
Twelve-pence a corner, if you dare.

JOAN CUDGELS NED. 1723.

JOAN cudgels Ned, yet Ned's a bully;
Will cudgels Bess, yet Will's a cully.
Die Ned and Bess; give Will to Joan,
She dares not say her life's her own.
Die Joan and Will; give Bess to Ned,
And every day she combs his head.

A QUIBBLING ELEGY, ON JUDGE BOAT. 1723.

To mournful ditties, Clio, change thy note,
Since cruel fate hath sunk our justice Boat.
Why should he sink, where nothing seem'd to press,

His lading little, and his ballast less?
Tost in the waves of this tempestuous world,
At length, his anchor fixt and canvas furl'd,
To Lazy-hill * retiring from his court,
At his Ring's-end * he founders in the port.
With water † fill'd, he could no longer float,
The common death of many a stronger boat.

A post so fill'd on nature's laws entrenches:
Benches on boats are plac'd, not boats on benches.
And yet our Boat (how shall I reconcile it?)
Was both a Boat, and in one sense a pilot.
With every wind he sail'd, and well could tack;
Had many pendents, but abhorr'd a Jack ‡.
He's gone, although his friends began to hope
That he might yet be lifted by a rope.

Behold the awful bench, on which he sat!
He was as hard and ponderous wood as that:
Yet, when his sand was out, we find at last,
That death has overfet him with a blast.
Our Boat is now sail'd to the Stygian ferry,
There to supply old Charon's leaky wherry:
Charon in him will ferry souls to hell;
A trade our Boat § hath practis'd here so well:
And Cerberus hath ready in his paws
Both pitch and brimstone, to fill up his flaws.
Yet, spite of death and fate, I here maintain
We may place Boat in his old post again.
The way is thus; and well deserves your thanks:
Take the three strongest of his broken planks,
Fix them on high, conspicuous to be seen,
Form'd like the triple-tree near Stephen's-green ||;

* Two villages near the sea.

† It was said he died of a dropsy.

‡ A cant word for a Jacobite.

§ In condemning malefactors, as a judge.

|| Where the Dublin gallows stands.

And, when we view it thus with thief at end on 't, [the pendant!
We'll cry, Look, here's our Boat, and there's

THE EPITAPH.

HERE lies judge Boat within a coffin;
Pray, gentle folks, forbear your scoffing.
A Boat a judge! yes; where's the blunder?
A wooden judge is no such wonder.
And in his robes, you must agree,
No Boat was better deckt than he.
'Tis needless to describe him fuller;
In short, he was an able sculler.

PETHOX * THE GREAT.

FROM Venus born, thy beauty shows;
But who thy father, no man knows:
Nor can the skilful herald trace
The founder of thy ancient race;
Whether thy temper, full of fire,
Discovers Vulcan for thy fire,
The god who made Scamander boil,
And round his margin sing'd the soil
(From whence, philosophers agree,
An equal power descends to thee);
Whether from dreadful Mars you claim
The high descent from whence you came,
And, as a proof, show numerous scars
By fierce encounters made in wars,
Those honourable wounds you bore
From head to foot, and all before,
And still the bloody field frequent,
Familiar in each leader's tent;
Or whether, as the learn'd contend,
You from the neighbouring Gaul descend;
Or from Parthenope the proud,
Where numberless thy votaries crowd;
Whether thy great forefather came
From realms that bear Vesputio's name
(For so conjecturers would obtrude,
And from thy painted skin conclude);
Whether, as Epicurus shows,
The world from justling seeds arose,
Which, mingling with prolific strife
In chaos, kindled into life:
So your production was the same,
And from contending atoms came.

Thy fair indulgent mother crown'd
Thy head with sparkling rubies round;
Beneath thy decent steps the road
Is all with precious jewels strow'd.
The bird of Pallas knows his post,
Thee to attend, where'er thou goest.

Eyzantians boast, that on the clod
Where once their Sultan's horse had trod,
Grows neither grass, nor shrub, nor tree:
The same thy subjects boast of thee.

The greatest lord, when you appear,
Will deign your livery to wear,
In all the various colours seen
Of red and yellow, blue and green.

With half a word, when you require,
The man of business must retire.

* This name is plainly an anagram.

The haughty minister of state
With trembling must thy leisure wait;
And, while his fate is in thy hands,
The business of the nation stands.

Thou dar'st the greatest prince attack,
Canst hourly set him on the rack;
And, as an instance of thy power,
Inclose him in a wooden tower.
With pungent pains on every side:
So Regulus in torments dy'd.

From thee our youth all virtues learn,
Dangers with prudence to discern;
And well thy scholars are endued
With temperance, and with fortitude;
With patience, which all ills supports;
And secrecy, the art of courts.

The glittering beau could hardly tell,
Without your aid, to read or spell;
But, having long convers'd with you,
Knows how to write a billet-doux.

With what delight, methinks, I trace
Your blood in every noble race!
In whom thy features, shape, and mien,
Are to the life distinctly seen!
The Britons, once a savage kind,
By you were brighten'd and refin'd,
Descendants to the barbarous Huns,
With limbs robust, and voice that stuns:
But you have moulded them afresh,
Remov'd the tough superfluous flesh,
Taught them to modulate their tongues,
And speak without the help of lungs.

Proteus on you bestow'd the boon
To change your visage like the moon;
You sometimes half a face produce,
Keep t' other half for private use.

How fam'd thy conduct in the fight
With Hermes, son of Pleias bright!
Out-number'd, half-encompass'd round,
You strove for every inch of ground;
Then, by a soldiery retreat,
Retir'd to your imperial seat.
The victor, when your steps he trac'd,
Found all the realms before him waste:
You, o'er the high triumphal arch
Pontific, made your glorious march;
The wondrous arch behind you fell,
And left a chasm profound as hell:
You, in your capitol secur'd,
A siege as long as Troy endur'd.

MARY THE COOK-MAID'S LETTER TO DR. SHERIDAN. 1723.

WELL, if ever I saw such another man since my mother bound my head!
You a gentleman! marry come up! I wonder where you were bred.
I'm sure such words do not become a man of your cloth;
I would not give such language to a dog, faith
and troth.
Yes, you call'd my master a knave: fie, Mr. Sheridan! 'tis a shame
For a parson, who should know better things, to come out with such a name,

Knave in your teeth, Mr. Sheridan! 'tis both a shame and a sin;

And the Dean, my master, is an honefter man
than you and all your kin:

He has more goodness in his little finger, than you have in your whole body:

My master is a parsonable man, and not a spindle-
shank'd hoddie-doddy.

And now, whereby I find you would fain make an excuse,

Because my master one day, in anger, call'd you
goose;

Which, and I am sure I have been his servant
four years since October,

And he never call'd me worse than sweet-heart,
drunk or sober:

Not that I know his reverence was ever concern'd
to my knowledge,

Though you and your come-rogues keep him out
so late in your college.

You say you will eat grass on his grave: a christian eat grass!

Whereby you now confess yourself to be a goose
or an ass:

But that's as much as to say, that my master should die before ye;

Well, well, that 's as God pleases; and I don't believe that 's a true story:

And so say I told you so, and you may go tell my master; what care I?

And I don't care who knows it; 'tis all one to Mary,

Every body knows that I love to tell truth and shame the devil;

I am but a poor servant; but I think gentlefolks should be civil.

Besides, you found fault with our victuals one day
that you was here:

I remember it was on a Tuesday of all days in the year.

And Saunders the man says you are always jest-
ing and mocking:

Mary, said he, (one day as I was mending my master's stocking)

My master is so fond of that minister that keeps the school---

I thought my master a wise man, but that man makes him a fool.

Saunders, said I, I would rather than a quart of ale

He would come into our kitchen, and I would pin
a dish-clout to his tail.

And now I must go, and get Saunders to direct
this letter;

For I write but a sad scrawl; but my sister Mar-
get, she writes better.

Well, but I must run and make the bed, before my master comes from prayers;

And see now, it strikes ten, and I hear him coming up stairs;

Whereof I could say more to your verses, if I could write written hand:

And so I remain, in a civil way, your servant to command,

MARY.

A NEW-YEAR'S-GIFT

FOR BEC *. 1723-4.

RETURNING Janus now prepares,
 For Bec, a new supply of cares,
 Sent in a bag to Doctor Swift,
 Who thus displays the New-year's-gift.
 First, this large parcel brings you tidings
 Of our good Dean's eternal chidings;
 Of Nelly's pertness, Robin's leafings,
 And Sheridan's perpetual teasings.
 This box is cramm'd on every side
 With Stella's magisterial pride.
 Behold a cage with sparrows fill'd,
 First to be fondled, then be kill'd.
 Now to this hamper I invite you,
 With six imagin'd cares to fright you.
 Here in this bundle Janus sends
 Concerns by thousands for your friends:
 And here's a pair of leathern pokes,
 To hold your cares for other folks.
 Here from this barrel you may broach
 A peck of troubles for a coach.
 This ball of wax your ears will darken,
 Still to be curious, never hearken.
 Lest you the town may have less trouble in,
 Bring all your Quilca's † cares to Dublin,
 For which he sends this empty sack;
 And so take all upon your back.

DINGLEY AND BRENT ‡.

A SONG,

To the Tune of "Ye Commons and Peers."

DINGLEY and Brent,
 Wherever they went,
 Ne'er minded a word that was spoken;
 Whatever was said,
 They ne'er troubled their head,
 But laugh'd at their own silly joking.
 Should Solomon wise
 In majesty rise,
 And show them his wit and his learning;
 They never would hear,
 But turn the deaf ear,
 As a matter they had no concern in.
 You tell a good jest;
 And please all the rest;
 Comes Dingley, and asks you, What was it?
 And, curious to know,
 Away she will go
 To seek an old rag in the closet.

TO STELLA. 1623-4.

Written on the Day of her Birth, but not on the Subject, when I was sick in Bed.

TORMENTED with incessant pains,
 Can I devise poetic strains?

* Mrs. Dingley, Stella's friend and companion.

† A country-house of Dr. Sheridan.

‡ Dr. Swift's house-keeper.

Time was, when I could yearly pay
 My verse on Stella's native day:
 But now, unable grown to write,
 I grieve she ever saw the light.
 Ungrateful! since to her I owe
 That I these pains can undergo.
 She tends me, like an humble slave;
 And, when indecently I rave,
 When out my brutish passions break,
 With gall in every word I speak,
 She, with soft speech, my anguish cheers,
 Or melts my passions down with tears:
 Although 'tis easy to descry
 She wants assistance more than I;
 Yet seems to feel my pains alone,
 And is a Stoic in her own.
 When, among scholars, can we find
 So soft, and yet so firm a mind?
 All accidents of life conspire
 To raise up Stella's virtue higher,
 Or else to introduce the rest
 Which had been latent in her breast.
 Her firmness who could e'er have known,
 Had she not evils of her own?
 Her kindness who could ever guess,
 Had not her friends been in distress?
 Whatever base returns you find
 From me, dear Stella, still be kind.
 In your own heart you'll reap the fruit,
 Though I continue still a brute.
 But, when I once am out of pain,
 I promise to be good again:
 Mean time, your other juster friends
 Shall for my follies make amends;
 So may we long continue thus,
 Admiring you, you pitying us.

ON DREAMS.

AN IMITATION OF PETRONIUS.

"Somnia quæ mentes ludunt volitantibus um-bris," &c.

THOSE dreams that on the silent night intrude,
 And with false flitting shades our minds delude,
 Jove never sends us downward from the skies;
 Nor can they from infernal mansions rise;
 But all are mere productions of the brain,
 And fools consult interpreters in vain.

For, when in bed we rest our weary limbs,
 The mind unburden'd sports in various whims;
 The busy head with mimic art runs o'er
 The scenes and actions of the day before.

The drowsy tyrants, by his minions led,
 To regal rage devote some patriot's head.
 With equal terrors, not with equal guilt,
 The murderer dreams of all the blood he spilt.

The soldier smiling hears the widow's cries,
 And stabs the son before the mother's eyes.
 With like remorse his brother of the trade,
 The butcher, fells the lamb beneath his blade.

The statesman rakes the town to find a plot,
 And dreams of forfeitures by treason got.

Nor less Tom-t—d-man, of true statesman mold,
Collects the city filth in search of gold.

Orphans around his bed the lawyer fees,
And takes the plaintiff's and defendant's fees.
His fellow pick-purse, watching for a job,
Fancies his fingers in the cully's sob.

The kind physician grants the husband's prayers
Or gives relief to long expecting heirs.
The sleeping hangman ties the fatal noose,
Nor unsuccessful waits for dead men's shoes.

The grave divine, with knotty points perplexed,
As if he was awake, nods o'er his text:
While the sly mountebank attends his trade,
Harangues the rabble, and is better paid.

The hireling senator of modern days
Bedaubs the guilty great with nauseous praise:
And Dick the scavenger, with equal grace,
Flirts from his cart the mud in * * * * *'s face.

WHITSHED'S * MOTTO

ON HIS COACH. 1724.

LIBERTAS et natale solum:

Fine words! I wonder where you stole 'em.
Could nothing but thy chief reproach
Serve for a motto on thy coach?
But let me now the words translate:
Natale solum, my estate;
My dear estate, how well I love it!
My tenants, if you doubt, will prove it.
They swear I am so kind and good,
I hug them, till I squeeze their blood.

Libertas bears a large import:
First, how to swagger in a court;
And, secondly, to show my fury
Against an un-complying jury;
And, thirdly, 'tis a new invention,
To favour Wood, and keep my pension;
And, fourthly, 'tis to play an odd trick,
Get the great seal, and turn out Broderick;
And, fifthly, (you know whom I mean)
To humble that vexatious Dean;
And, sixthly, for my soul, to barter it
For fifty times its worth to Carteret †.

Now, since your motto thus you construe,
I must confess you've spoken once true.

Libertas et natale solum:

You had good reason, when you stole 'em.

SENT BY DR. DELANY TO Dr. SWIFT,

In order to be admitted to speak to him when he was deaf. 1724.

DEAR sir, I think 'tis doubly hard,
Your ears and doors should both be barr'd.
Can any thing be more unkind?
Must I not see, 'cause you are blind?
Methinks a friend at night should cheer you,
A friend that loves to see and hear you.
Why am I robb'd of that delight,
When you can be no loser by't?
Nay, when 'tis plain (for what is plainer?)
That, if you heard, you'd be no gainer?

* The chief justice who prosecuted the Drapier.

† Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

For sure you are not yet to learn,
That hearing is not your concern.
Then be your doors no longer barr'd:
Your business, sir, is to be heard.

THE ANSWER.

THE wise pretend to make it clear,
'Tis no great loss to lose an ear.
Why are we then so fond of two,
When by experience one would do?
'Tis true, say they, cut off the head,
And there's an end; the man is dead;
Because, among all human race,
None e'er was known to have a brace:
But confidently they maintain,
That where we find the members twain,
The loss of one is no such trouble,
Since t' other will in strength be double.
The limb surviving, you may swear,
Becomes his brother's lawful heir:
Thus, for a trial, let me beg of
Your reverence but to cut one leg off,
And you will find, by this device,
The other will be stronger twice;
For every day you shall be gaining
New vigour to the leg remaining.
So, when an eye has lost its brother,
You see the better with the other.
Cut off your hand, and you may do
With t' other hand the work of two;
Because the soul her power contracts,
And on the brother limb re-acts.

But yet the point is not so clear in
Another case, the sense of hearing:
For, though the place of either ear
Be distant as one head can bear;
Yet Galen most acutely shows you,
(Consult his book de partium usu)
That from each ear, as he observes,
There creep two auditory nerves,
Not to be seen without a glass,
Which near the os petrosum pass;
Thence to the neck; and moving thorough there,
One goes to this, and one to t' other ear;
Which made my grand-dame always stuff her ears,

Both right and left, as fellow-sufferers.
You see my learning; but, to shorten it,
When my left ear was deaf a fortnight,
To t' other ear I felt it coming on:
And thus I solve this hard phenomenon.
'Tis true, a glass will bring supplies
To weak, or old, or clouded eyes;
Your arms, though both your eyes were lost,
Would guard your nose against a post;
Without your legs, two legs of wood
Are stronger and almost as good;
And as for hands, there have been those
Who, wanting both, have us'd their toes.*
But no contrivance yet appears
To furnish artificial ears.

* There have been instances of a man's writing with his foot.

A QUIET LIFE AND A GOOD NAME.

To a Friend who married a Shrew. 1724.

NELL scolded in so loud a din,
That Will durst hardly venture in;
He mark'd the conjugal dispute;
Nell roar'd incessant, Dick sat mute;
But, when he saw his friend appear,
Cry'd bravely, Patience, good my dear!
At sight of Will, she bawl'd no more,
But hurry'd out, and clapp'd the door.

Why Dick! the devil's in thy Nell,
(Quoth Will) thy house is worse than hell:
Why what a peal the jade has rung!
D—m her, why don't you slit her tongue?
For nothing else will make it cease.
Dear Will, I suffer this for peace:
I never quarrel with my wife;
I bear it for a quiet life.

Scripture, you know, exhorts us to it;
Bids us to seek peace, and ensue it.

Will went again to visit Dick;
And entering in the very nick,
He saw virago Nell belabour,
With Dick's own staff, his peaceful neighbour:
Poor Will, who needs must interpose,
Receiv'd a brace or two of blows,

But now, to make my story short,
Will drew out Dick to take a quart.
Why, Dick, thy wife has devilish whims;
Ods-buds! why don't you break her limbs?
If she were mine, and had such tricks,
I'd teach her how to handle sticks:
Z—nds! I would ship her to Jamaica,
Or truck the carrion for tobacco:

I'd send her far enough away—
Dear Will; but what would people say?
Lord! I should get so ill a name,
The neighbours round would cry out shame.

Dick suffer'd for his peace and credit;
But who believ'd him, when he said it!
Can he who makes himself a slave,
Consult his peace, or credit save?
Dick found it by his ill success.
His quiet small, his credit less.

She serv'd him at the usual rate;
She stunn'd, and then she broke, his pate:
And, what he thought the hardest case,
The parish jeer'd him to his face;
Those men who wore the breeches least,
Call'd him a cuckold, fool, and beast.
At home he was pursued with noise;
Abroad was pester'd by the boys:
Within his wife would break his bones;
Without, they pelted him with stones:
The 'prentices procur'd a *riding,
To act his patience, and her chiding.

False patience and mistaken pride!
There are ten thousand Dicks beside,
Slaves to their quiet and good name,
Are us'd like Dick, and bear the blame.

* A well-known humorous cavalcade, in ridicule of a scolding wife and hen-peck'd husband.

THE BIRTH OF MANLY VIRTUE,

Inscrib'd to Lord CARTERET, 1724.

"Gratior & pulchro veniens in corpore Virtus."

VIRG.

ONCE on a time, a righteous sage,
Griev'd at the vices of the age,
Applied to Jove with fervant prayer:

"O Jove, if Virtue be so fair
"As it was deem'd in former days
"By Plato and by Socrates,
"Whose beauties mortal eyes escape,
"Only for want of outward shape;
"Make then its real excellence,
"For once, the theme of human sense:
"So shall the eye, by form confin'd,
"Direct and fix the wandering mind,
"And long-deluded mortals see
"With rapture what they us'd to flee."

Jove grants the prayer, gives Virtue birth,
And bids him bless and mend the earth.
Behold him blooming fresh and fair,
Now made—ye gods—a son and heir:
An heir; and, stranger yet to hear,
An heir; an orphan of a peer;
But prodigies are wrought to prove
Nothing impossible to Jove.

Virtue was for this sex design'd
In mild reproof to womankind;
In manly form to let them see
The loveliness of modesty,
The thousand decencies that shone
With lessen'd lustre in their own;
Which few had learn'd enough to prize,
And some thought modish to despise.

To make his merit more discern'd,
He goes to school—he reads—is learn'd;
Rais'd high, above his birth, by knowledge,
He shines distinguish'd in a college;
Resolv'd nor honour, nor estate,
Himself alone should make him great.
Here soon for every art renown'd,
His influence is diffus'd around;
Th' inferior youth, to learning led,
Less to be fam'd than to be fed,
Behold the glory he has won,
And blush to see themselves outdone;
And now inflam'd with rival rage,
In scientific strife engage;
Engage—and, in the glorious strife,
The arts new-kindle into life.

Here would our hero ever dwell,
Fix'd in a lonely learned cell;
Contented to be truly great,
In Virtue's best-belov'd retreat;
Contented he—but Fate ordains,
He now shall shine in nobler scenes
(Rais'd high, like some celestial fire,
To shine the more, still rising higher);
Completely form'd in every part,
To win the soul and glad the heart.
The powerful voice, the graceful mien,
Lovely alike, or heard, or seen;
The outward form and inward vie,
His soul bright beaming from his eye,

Ennobling every act and air,
With just, and generous, and sincere.

Accomplish'd thus, his next resort
Is to the council and the court,
Where Virtue is in least repute,
And interest the one pursuit;
Where right and wrong are bought and sold,
Barter'd for beauty, and for gold;
Here Manly Virtue, even here,
Pleas'd in the person of a peer,
A peer; a scarcely-bearded youth,
Who talk'd of justice and of truth,
Of innocence the surest guard,
Tales here forgot, or yet unheard;
That he alone deserv'd esteem,
Who was the man he wish'd to seem;
Call'd it unmanly and unwise,
To lurk behind a mean disguise;
(Give fraudulent Vice the mask and screen,
'Tis Virtue's interest to be seen);
Call'd want of shame want of sense,
And found, in blushes, eloquence.

Thus, acting what he taught so well,
He drew dumb Merit from her cell,
Led with amazing art along
The bashful dame, and loos'd her tongue;
And, whilst he made her value known,
Yet more display'd and rais'd his own.

Thus young, thus proof to all temptations,
He rises to the highest stations
(For where high honour is the prize,
True Virtue has a right to rise):
Let courtly slaves low bend the knee
To Wealth and Vice in high degree:
Exalted Worth disdains to owe
Its grandeur to its greatest foe.

Now rais'd on high, see Virtue shows
The godlike ends for which he rose;
For him, let proud Ambition know
The height of glory here below,
Grandeur, by goodness made complete!
To bless, is truly to be great!
He taught how men to honour rise,
Like gilded vapours to the skies,
Which, howsoever they display
Their glory from the god of day,
Their noblest use is to abate
His dangerous excess of heat,
To shield the infant fruits and flowers,
And bless the earth with genial showers.
Now change the scene; a nobler care
Demands him in a higher sphere*:
Distress of nations calls him hence,
Permitted so by Providence;
For models, made to mend our kind,
To no one clime should be confin'd;
And Manly Virtue, like the sun,
His course of glorious toils should run;
Alike diffusing in his flight
Congenial joy, and life, and light.
Pale Envy sickens, Error flies,
And Discord in his presence dies;
Oppression hides with guilty dread,
And Merit rears her drooping head;

* Lord Carteret had the honour of mediating peace for Sweden with Denmark and with the Czar.

The arts revive, the vallies sing,
And winter softens into spring:
The wondering world, where'er he moves,
With new delight looks up and loves;
One sex consenting to admire,
Nor less the other to desire;
Whilst he, though seated on a throne,
Confines his love to one alone;
The rest condemn'd, with rival voice
Repining, do applaud his choice.

Fame now reports, the Western Isle
Is made his mansion for a while,
Whose anxious natives night and day
(Happy beneath his righteous sway)
Weary the gods with ceaseless prayer,
To bless him, and to keep him there;
And claim it as a debt from fate,
Too lately found, to lose him late.

VERSES ON THE UPRIGHT JUDGE

Who condemned the Drapier's Printer.

THE church I hate, and have good reason
For there my grandfire cut his weazand:
He cut his weazand at the altar;
I keep my gullet for the halter.

ON THE SAME.

IN church your grandfire cut his throat:
To do the job too long he tarry'd;
He should have had my hearty vote
To cut his throat before he marry'd.

ON THE SAME.

(The Judge speaks.)

I'm not the grandson of that ass * Quin;
Nor can you prove it, Mr. Pasquin.
My grand-dame had gallants by twenties,
And bore my mother by a 'prentice.
This when my grandfire knew, they tell us he
In Christ-Church cut his throat for jealousy.
And, since the alderman was mad you say,
Then I must be so too, ex traduce.

RIDDLES

BY DR. SWIFT AND HIS FRIENDS.

Written in or about the year 1724.

I. ON A PEN.

IN youth exalted high in air,
Or bathing in the waters fair,
Nature to form me took delight,
And clad my body all in white,
My person tall, and slender waist,
On either side with fringes grac'd;
Till me that tyrant man espy'd,
And dragg'd me from my mother's side
No wonder now I look so thin:
The tyrant stript me to the skin:

* An alderman.

THE WORKS OF SWIFT.

My skin he flay'd, my hair he cropt;
At head and foot my body lopt;
And then, with heart more hard than stone,
He pick'd my marrow from the bone.
To vex me more, he took a freak
To slit my tongue, and make me speak:
But, that which wonderful appears,
I speak to eyes, and not to ears.
He oft' employs me in disguise,
And makes me tell a thousand lies:
To me he chiefly gives in trust
To please his malice or his lust:
From me no secret he can hide;
I see his vanity and pride:
And my delight is to expose
His follies to his greatest foes.

All languages I can command,
Yet not a word I understand.
Without my aid, the best divine
In learning would not know a line:
The lawyer must forget his pleading;
The scholar could not show his reading.

Nay, man my master is my slave;
I give command to kill or save;
Can grant ten thousand pounds a-year,
And make a beggar's brat a peer.
But, while I thus my life relate,
I only hasten on my fate.
My tongue is black, my mouth is furr'd,
I hardly now can force a word.
I die unpitied and forgot,
And on some dunghill left to rot.

II. ON GOLD.

ALL-RULING tyrant of the earth,
To vilest slaves I owe my birth.
How is the greatest monarch blest,
When in my gaudy livery drest!
No haughty nymph has power to run
From me, or my embraces shun.
Stabb'd to the heart, condemn'd to flame,
My constancy is still the same.
The favourite messenger of Jove,
And Lemnian god, consulting strove
To make me glorious to the sight
Of mortals, and the gods delight.
Soon would their altars' flame expire,
If I refuse to lend them fire.

III.

By fate exalted high in place,
Lo, here I stand with double face;
Superior none on earth I find;
But see below me all mankind.
Yet, as it oft' attends the great,
I almost sink with my own weight.
At every motion undertook,
The vulgar all consult my look.
I sometimes give advice in writing,
But never of my own inditing.

I am a courtier in my way;
For those who rais'd me, I betray;
And some give out, that I entice
To lust, and luxury, and dice;
Who punishments on me inflict;
Because they find their pockets pickt.

By riding post, I lose my health;
And only to get others wealth.

IV. ON THE POSTERIOBS.

BECAUSE I am by nature blind,
I wisely choose to walk behind;
However, to avoid disgrace,
I let no creature see my face.
My words are few, but spoke with sense;
And yet my speaking gives offence:
Or, if to whisper I presume,
The company will fly the room.
By all the world I am oppress'd;
And my oppression gives them rest.
Through me, though fore against my will,
Instructors every art instil.
By thousands I am sold and bought,
Who neither get nor lose a groat;
For none, alas! by me can gain,
But those who give me greatest pain.
Shall man presume to be my master,
Who's but my caterer and taster?
Yet, though I always have my will,
I am but a mere dependor still;
An humble banger on at best,
Of whom all people make a jest.

In me detractors seek to find
Two vices of a different kind:
I'm too profuse, some censurers cry;
And all I get, I let it fly:
While others give me many a curse,
Because too close I hold my purse.
But this I know, in either case
They dare not charge me to my face.
'Tis true indeed, sometimes I save,
Sometimes run out of all I have;
But, when the year is at an end,
Computing what I get and spend,
My goings-out, and comings-in,
I cannot find I lose or win;
And therefore all that know me say,
I justly keep the middle way.
I'm always by my betters led;
I last get up, and first a-bed;
Though, if I rise before my time,
The learn'd in sciences sublime
Consult the stars, and thence foretel
Good luck to those with whom I dwell.

V. ON A HORN.

THE joy of man, the pride of brutes,
Domestic subjects for disputes,
Of plenty thou the emblem fair,
Adorn'd by nymphs with all their care!
I saw thee rais'd to high renown,
Supporting half the British crown;
And often have I seen thee grace
The chaste Diana's infant face;
And whensoever you please to shine,
Less useful is her light than thine:
Thy numerous fingers know their way,
And oft in Celia's tresses play.
To place thee in another view,
I'll show the world strange things and true;

What lords and dames of high degree
May justly claim their birth from thee.
The soul of man with spleen you vex;
Of spleen you cure the female sex.
Thee for a gift the courtier sends
With pleasure to his special friends:
He gives, and with a generous pride,
Contrives all means the gift to hide:
Nor oft' can the receiver know,
Whether he has the gift or no.
On airy wings you take your flight,
And fly unseen both day and night;
Conceal your form with various tricks;
And few know how or where you fix;
Yet some, who ne'er bestow'd thee, boast
That they to others give thee most.
Mean time, the wise a question start,
If thou a real being art;
Or but a creature of the brain,
That gives imaginary pain.
But the fly giver better knows thee,
Who feels true joys when he bestows thee.

VI. ON A CORKSCREW.

THOUGH I, alas! a prisoner be,
My trade is prisoners to set free.
No slave his lord's commands obeys
With such insinuating ways.
My genius, piercing, sharp, and bright,
Wherein the men of wit delight.
The clergy keep me for their ease
And turn and wind me as they please.
A new and wondrous art I show
Of raising spirits from below;
In scarlet some, and some in white;
They rise, walk round, yet never fright.
In at each mouth the spirits pass,
Distinctly seen, as through a glass;
O'er head and body make a rout,
And drive at last all secrets out:
And still, the more I show my art,
The more they open every heart.

A greater chemist none than I,
Who from materials hard and dry
Have taught men to extract with skill
More precious juice than from a still.

Although I'm often out of case,
I'm not asham'd to show my face.
Though at the tables of the great
I near the side-board take my seat;
Yet the plain 'squire, when dinner's done,
Is never pleas'd till I make one:
He kindly bids me near him stand,
And often takes me by the hand.
I twice a day a bunting go,
Nor ever fail to seize my foe;
And, when I have him by the pole,
I drag him upwards from his bole;
Though some are of so stubborn kind,
I'm forc'd to leave a limb behind.
I hourly wait some fatal end;
For I can break, but scorn to bend.

VII. THE GULF OF ALL HUMAN POSSESSIONS.

Come hither, and behold the fruits,
Vain man! of all thy vain pursuits.

Take wise advice, and look behind,
Bring all past actions to thy mind.
Here you may see, as in a glass,
How soon all human pleasures pass.
How will it mortify thy pride,
To turn the true impartial side!
How will your eyes contain their tears,
When all the sad reverse appears!

This cave within its womb confines
The last result of all designs:
Here lie deposited the spoils
Of busy mortals' endless toils:
Here, with an easy search, we find
The soul corruptions of mankind.
The wretched purchase here behold
Of traitors who their country sold.

This gulf insatiable imbibes
The lawyer's fees, the statesman's bribes.
Here, in their proper shape and mien,
Fraud, perjury, and guilt are seen.

Necessity, the tyrant's law,
All human race must hither draw;
All prompted by the same desire,
The vigorous youth, and aged fire.
Behold, the coward and the brave,
The haughty prince, the humble slave,
Physician, lawyer, and divine,
All make oblations at this shrine.
Some enter boldly, some by stealth,
And leave behind their fruitless wealth.
For while the bashful sylvan maid,
As half asham'd, and half afraid,
Approaching finds it hard to part
With that which dwelt so near her heart;
The courtly dame, unmov'd by fear,
Profusely pours her offerings here.

A treasure here of learning lurks,
Huge heaps of never-dying works;
Labours of many an ancient sage,
And millions of the present age.

In at this gulf all offerings pass
And lie an undistinguish'd mass.
Deucalion, to restore mankind,
Was bid to throw the stones behind;
So those who here their gifts convey
Are forc'd to look another way;
For few, a chosen few, must know
The mysteries that lie below.

Sad charnel-house! a dismal dome,
For which all mortals leave their home!
The young, the beautiful, and brave,
Here bury'd in one common grave!
Where each supply of dead renews
Unwholesome damps, offensive dews;
And lo! the writing on the walls
Points out where each new victim falls;
The food of worms and beasts obscene,
Who round the vault luxuriant reign.

See where those mangled corpses lie,
Condemn'd by female hands to die!
A comely dame, once clad in white,
Lies there consign'd to endless night;
By cruel hands her blood was spilt,
And yet her wealth was all her guilt.

And here six virgins in a tomb,
All-beauteous offspring of one womb,
Oft' in the train of Venus seen,
As fair and lovely as their queen:

In royal garments each was drest,
Each with a gold and purple vest:
I saw them of their garments stript;
Their throats were cut, their bellies ript;
Twice were they bury'd, twice were born,
Twice from their sepulchres were torn;
But now dismember'd here are cast,
And find a resting-place at last.

Here oft' the curious traveller finds
The combat of opposing winds;
And seeks to learn the secret cause,
Which alien seems from nature's laws,
Why at this cave's tremendous mouth
He feels at once both north and south;
Whether the winds, in caverns pent,
Through clefts oppugnant force a vent;
Or whether, opening all his stores,
Fierce Æolus in tempest roars.

Yet, from this mingled mass of things,
In time a new creation springs.
These crude materials once shall rise
To fill the earth, and air, and skies;
In various forms appear again,
Of vegetables, brutes, and men.
So Jove pronounc'd among the gods,
Olympus trembling as he nods.

VIII. LOUISA * TO STREPHON.

AH! Strephon, how can you despise
Her who without thy pity dies?
To Strephon I have still been true,
And of as noble blood as you;
Fair issue of the genial bed,
A virgin in thy bosom bred;
Embrac'd thee closer than a wife;
When thee I leave, I leave my life.
Why should my shepherd take amiss,
That oft' I wake thee with a kiss?
Yet you of every kiss complain;
Ah! is not love a pleasing pain?
A pain which every happy night
You cure with ease and with delight;
With pleasure, as the poet sings,
Too great for mortals less than kings.

Chloe, when on thy breast I lie,
Observes me with revengeful eye:
If Chloe o'er thy heart prevails,
She'll tear me with her desperate nails,
And with relentless hands destroy
The tender pledges of our joy.
Nor have I bred a spurious race;
They all were born from thy embrace.
Consider, Strephon, what you do;
For, should I die for love of you,
I'll haunt thy dreams, a bloodless ghost;
And all my kin (a numerous host,
Who down direct our lineage bring
From victors o'er the Memphian king;
Renown'd in sieges and campaigns,
Who never fled the bloody plains,
Who in tempestuous seas can sport,
And scorn the pleasures of a court,
From whom great Sylla found his doom,
Who scourg'd to death that scourge of Rome)

* This Riddle is solved by an Anagram.

Shall on thee take a vengeance dire;
Thou, like Alcides, shalt expire,
When his envenom'd shirt he wore,
And skin and flesh in pieces tore.
Nor less that shirt, my rival's gift,
Cut from the piece that made her shift,
Shall in thy dearest blood be dy'd,
And make thee tear thy tainted hide.

IX.

DEPRIV'D of root, and branch, and rind,
Yet flowers I bear of every kind;
And such is my prolific power,
They bloom in less than half an hour;
Yet standers-by may plainly see
They get no nourishment from me.
My head with giddiness goes round,
And yet I firmly stand my ground:
All over naked I am seen,
And painted like an Indian queen.
No couple-beggar in the land
E'er join'd such numbers hand in hand;
I join them fairly with a ring;
Nor can our parson blame the thing:
And, though no marriage words are spoke,
They part not till the ring is broke;
Yet hypocrite fanatics cry,
I'm but an idol rais'd on high:
And once a weaver in our town,
A damn'd Cromwellian, knock'd me down,
I lay a prisoner twenty years,
And then the jovial cavaliers
To their old post, restor'd all three,
I mean the church, the king, and me.

X. ON THE MOON.

I WITH borrow'd silver shine,
What you see is none of mine.
First I show you but a quarter,
Like the bow that guards the Tartar;
Then the half, and then the whole,
Ever dancing round the pole.
And what will raise your admiration,
I am not one of God's creation,
But sprung (and I this truth maintain)
Like Pallas from my father's brain.
And, after all, I chiefly owe
My beauty to the shades below.
Most wondrous forms you see me wear,
A man, a woman, lion bear,
A fish, a fowl, a cloud, a field,
All figures heaven or earth can yield;
Like Daphne, sometimes in a tree:
Yet am not one of all you see.

XI. ON A CIRCLE.

I'm up and down, and round about,
Yet all the world can't find me out;
Though hundreds have employ'd their leisure,
They never yet could find my measure.
I'm found almost in every garden,
Nay in the compass of a farthing.
There's neither chariot, coach, nor mill,
Can move an inch, except I will.

XII. ON INK.

I AM jet black, as you may see,
The son of pitch, and gloomy night,
Yet all that know me will agree,
I'm dead except I live in light.

Sometimes in panegyric high,
Like lofty Pindar, I can soar;
And raise a virgin to the sky,
Or sink her to a pocky whore.

My blood this very day is sweet,
To-morrow of a bitter juice;
Like milk, 'tis cried about the street,
And so apply'd to different use.

Most wondrous is my magic power:
For with one colour I can paint;
I'll make the devil a faint this hour,
Next make a devil of a faint.

Through distant regions I can fly,
Provide me but with paper wings;
And fairly show a reason, why
There should be quarrels among kings.

And, after all, you'll think it odd,
When learned doctors will dispute,
That I should point the word of God,
And show where they can best confute.

Let lawyers bawl and strain their throats:
'Tis I that must the lands convey,
And strip the clients to their coats,
Nay, give their very souls away.

XIII. ON THE FIVE SENSES.

ALL of us in one you'll find,
Brethren of a wondrous kind;
Yet among us all no brother
Knows one tittle of the other.
We in frequent councils are,
And our marks of things declare,
Where, to us unknown, a clerk
Sits, and takes them in the dark.
He's the register of all
In our ken, both great and small;
By us forms his laws and rules:
He's our master, we his tools;
Yet we can with greatest ease
Turn and wind him where we please.

One of us alone can sleep,
Yet no watch the rest will keep,
But the moment that he closes,
Every brother else reposes.

If wine's bought, or victuals drest,
One enjoys them for the rest.

Pierce us all with wounding steel,
One for all of us will feel.

Though ten thousand cannons roar,
Add to them ten thousand more,
Yet but one of us is found
Who regards the dreadful sound.

Do what is not fit to tell,
There's but one of us can smell.

XIV. FONTINELLA TO FLORINDA.

WHEN on my bosom thy bright eyes,
Florinda, dart their heavenly beams,
I feel not the least love-surprise,
Yet endless tears flow down in streams;
There's nought so beautiful in thee,
But you may find the same in me.

The lilies of thy skin compare;
In me you see them full as white.
The roses of your cheeks, I dare
Affirm, can't glow to more delight.
Then, since I show as fine a face,
Can you refuse a soft embrace?

Ah! lovely nymph, thou'rt in thy prime!
And so am I whilst thou art here;
But soon will come the fatal time,
When all we see shall disappear.
'Tis mine to make a just reflexion,
And yours to follow my direction.

Then catch admirers while you may;
Treat not your lovers with disdain;
For time with beauty flies away,
And there is no return again.
To you the sad account I bring,
Life's autumn has no second spring.

XV. ON AN ECHO.

NEVER sleeping, still awake,
Pleasing most when most I speak;
The delight of old and young,
Though I speak without a tongue.
Nought but one thing can confound me,
Many voices joining round me;
Then I fret, and rave, and gabble,
Like the labourers of Babel.
Now I am a dog, or cow;
I can bark, or I can low;
I can bleat, or I can sing
Like the warblers of the spring.
Let the love-sick bard complain,
And I mourn the cruel pain;
Let the happy swain rejoice,
And I join my helping voice;
Both are welcome, grief or joy,
I with either sport or toy.
Though a lady, I am stout,
Drums and trumpets bring me out:
Then I clash, and roar, and rattle,
Join in all the din of battle.
Jove, with all his loudest thunder,
When I'm vex'd, can't keep me under;
Yet so tender is my ear,
That the lowest voice I fear.
Much I dread the courtier's fate,
When his merit's out of date;
For I hate a silent breath,
And a whisper is my death.

XIV. ON A SHADOW IN A GLASS.

By something form'd, I nothing am,
Yet every thing that you can name.

In no place have I ever been,
 Yet every where I may be seen;
 In all things false, yet always true,
 I'm still the same—but ever new.
 Lifeless, life's perfect form I wear,
 Can show a nose, eye, tongue, or ear,
 Yet neither smell, see, taste, or hear.
 All shapes and features I can boast,
 No flesh, no bones, no blood—no ghost;
 All colours, without paint, put on,
 And change like theameleon.
 Swiftly I come, and enter there,
 Where not a chink lets in the air;
 Like thought, I'm in a moment gone,
 Nor can I ever be alone;
 All things on earth I imitate,
 Faster than nature can create;
 Sometimes imperial robes I wear,
 Anon in beggar's rags appear;
 A giant now, and strait an elf,
 I'm every one, but ne'er myself;
 Ne'er sad I mourn, ne'er glad rejoice;
 I move my lips, but want a voice;
 I ne'er was born, nor e'er can die;
 Then prythee tell me what am I.

XVII.

Most things by me do rise and fall,
 And as I please they're great and small;
 Invading foes, without resistance,
 With ease I make to keep their distance;
 Again, as I'm dispos'd, the foe
 Will come, though not a foot they go.
 Both mountains, woods, and hills, and rocks,
 And gaming goats, and fleecy flocks,
 And lowing herds, and piping swains,
 Come dancing to me o'er the plains.
 The greatest whale that swims the sea
 Does instantly my power obey.
 In vain from me the sailor flies;
 The quickest ship I can surprise,
 And turn it as I have a mind,
 And move it against tide and wind.
 Nay, bring me here the tallest man,
 I'll squeeze him to a little span;
 Or bring a tender child and pliant,
 You'll see me stretch him to a giant;
 Nor shall they in the least complain,
 Because my magic gives no pain.

XVIII. ON TIME.

Ever eating, never cloying,
 All devouring, all destroying,
 Never finding full repast,
 Till I eat the world at last.

XIX. ON THE GALLOWS.

There is a gate, we know full well,
 That stands 'twixt heaven, and earth, and hell,
 Where many for a passage venture,
 Yet very few are fond to enter;
 Although 'tis open night and day,
 They for that reason shun this way:

Both dukes and lords abhor its wood,
 They can't come near it for their blood.
 What other way they take to go,
 Another time I'll let you know.
 Yet commoners with greatest ease
 Can find an entrance when they please.
 The poorest hither march in state
 (Or they can never pass the gate),
 Like Roman generals triumphant,
 And then they take a turn and jump on't.
 If gravest parsons here advance,
 They cannot pass before they dance;
 There's not a soul that does resort here,
 But strips himself to pay the porter.

XX. ON THE VOWELS.

We are little airy creatures,
 All of different voice and features:
 One of us in glass is set,
 One of us you'll find in jet,
 T'other you may see in tin,
 And the fourth a box within;
 If the fifth you should pursue,
 It can never fly from you.

XXI. ON SNOW.

From heaven I fall, though from earth I begin:
 No lady alive can show such a skin.
 I'm bright as an angel, and light as a feather;
 But heavy and dark when you squeeze me together.
 Though candour and truth in my aspect I bear,
 Yet many poor creatures I help to ensnare.
 Though so much of heaven appears in my make,
 The foulest impressions I easily take.
 My parent and I produce one another,
 The mother the daughter, the daughter the mother.

XXII. ON A CANON.

BEGOTTEN, and born, and dying with noise,
 The terror of women, and pleasure of boys,
 Like the fiction of poets concerning the wind,
 I'm chiefly unruly when strongest confin'd.
 For silver and gold I don't trouble my head,
 But all I delight in is pieces of lead;
 Except when I trade with a ship or a town,
 Why then I make pieces of iron go down.
 One property more I would have you remark,
 No lady was ever more fond of a spark;
 The moment I get one, my soul's all a-fire,
 And I roar out my joy, and in transport expire.

XXIII. ON A PAIR OF DICE.

We are little brethren twain,
 Arbiters of loss and gain;
 Many to our counters run,
 Some are made, and some undone:
 But men find it to their cost,
 Few are made, but numbers lost.
 Though we play them tricks for ever,
 Yet they always hope our favour.

XXIV. ON A CANDLE.

TO LADY CARTERET.

Of all inhabitants on earth,
 To man alone I owe my birth;
 And yet the cow, the sheep, the bee,
 Are all my parents more than he.
 I, a virtue strange and rare,
 Make the fairest look more fair;
 And myself, which is yet rarer,
 Growing old, grow still the fairer.
 Like fots, alone I'm dull enough,
 When dos'd with smoke, and smear'd with snuff;
 But, in the midst of mirth and wine,
 I with double lustre shine.
 Emblem of the fair am I,
 Polish'd neck, and radiant eye;
 In my eye my greatest grace,
 Emblem of the Cyclop's race;
 Metals I like them subdued,
 Slave like them to Vulcan too.
 Emblem of a monarch old,
 Wise, and glorious to behold,
 Wasted he appears, and pale,
 Watching for the public weal:
 Emblem of the bashful dame,
 That in secret feeds her flame,
 Often aiding to impart
 All the secrets of her heart.
 Various is my bulk and hue;
 Big like Bess, and small like Sue;
 Now brown and burnish'd as a nut,
 At other times a very flut;
 Often fair, and soft, and tender,
 Taper, tall, and smooth, and slender;
 Like Flora deck'd with various flowers;
 Like Phœbus, guardian of the hours:
 But, whatever be my dress,
 Greater be my size or less,
 Swelling be my shape or small,
 Like thyself I shine in all.
 Clouded if my face is seen,
 My complexion wan and green,
 Languid like a love-sick maid,
 Steel affords me present aid.
 Soon or late, my date is done,
 As my thread of life is spun;
 Yet to cut the fatal thread
 Oft' revives my drooping head:
 Yet I perish in my prime,
 Seldom by the death of time;
 Die like lovers as they gaze,
 Die for those I live to please;
 Pine unpitied to my urn,
 Nor warm the fair for whom I burn;
 Unpitied, unlamented too,
 Die like all that look on you.

XXV. TO LADY CARTERET.

BY DR. DELANY.

I REACH all things near me, and far off to boot,
 Without stretching a finger, or stirring a foot;
 I take them all in too, to add to your wonder,
 Though many and various, and large and afunder.

Without jostling or crowding they pass side by side,
 Through a wonderful wicket, not half an inch
 wide:

Then I lodge them at ease in a very large store,
 Of no breadth or length, with a thousand things
 more.

All this I can do without witchcraft or charm;
 Though sometimes, they say, I bewitch and do harm.

Though cold, I inflame; and though quiet, invade;
 And nothing can shield from my spell but a shade.
 A thief that has robb'd you, or done you disgrace,
 In magical mirror I'll show you his face:

Nay, if you'll believe what the poets have said,
 They'll tell you I kill, and can call back the dead.

Like conjurers safe in my circle I dwell;

I love to look black too, it heightens my spell.

Though my magic is mighty in every hue,

Who see all my power must see it in you.

ANSWERED BY DR. SWIFT.

WITH half an eye your riddle I spy.

I observe your wicket hemm'd in by a thicket,

And whatever passes is strained through glasses.

You say it is quiet: I flatly deny it.

It wanders about, without stirring out;

No passion so weak but gives it a tweak;

Love, joy, and devotion, set it always in motion.

And as for the tragic effects of its magic,

Which you say it can kill or revive at its will,

The dead are all found, and revive above ground.

After all you have writ, it cannot be wit;

Which plainly does follow, since it flies from Apollo.

Its cowardice such, it cries at a touch:

'Tis a perfect milkop, grows drunk with a drop.

Another great fault, it cannot bear salt:

And a hair can disarm it of every charm.

A RECEIPT

TO RESTORE STELLA'S YOUTH. 1724-5.

THE Scottish hinds, too poor to house

In frosty nights their starving cows,

While not a blade of grass or hay

Appears from Michaelmas to May,

Must let their cattle range in vain

For food along the barren plain.

Meagre and lank with fasting grown,

And nothing left but skin and bone;

Expos'd to want, and wind, and weather,

They just keep life and soul together,

Till summer-showers and evening's dew

Again the verdant glebe renew;

And, as the vegetables rise,

The famish'd cow her want supplies:

Without an ounce of last year's flesh,

Whate'er she gains is young and fresh;

Grows plump and round, and full of mettle,

As rising from Medea's kettle,

With youth and beauty to inchant

Europa's counterfeit gallant.

Why, Stella, should you knit your brow,

If I compare you to the cow?

'Tis just the case; for you have fasted

So long, till all your flesh is wasted,

And must against the warmer days
Be sent to Quilca down to graze;
Where mirth, and exercise, and air,
Will soon your appetite repair:
The nutriment will from within,
Round all your body, plump your skin;
Will agitate the lazy flood,
And fill your veins with sprightly blood:
Nor flesh nor blood will be the same,
Nor aught of Stella but the name;
For what was ever understood,
By human kind, but flesh and blood?
And if your flesh and blood be new,
You'll be no more the former you;
But for a blooming nymph will pass,
Just fifteen, coming summer's grass,
Your jetty locks with garlands crown'd:
While all the 'squires for nine miles round,
Attended by a brace of curs,
With jocky boots and silver spurs,
No less than justices o' quorum,
Their cow-boys bearing cloaks before 'em,
Shall leave deciding broken pates,
To kiss your steps at Quilca's gates.
But, lest you should my skill disgrace,
Come back before you're out of case:
For if to Michaelmas you stay,
The new-born flesh will melt away;
The 'squire in scorn will fly the house
For better game, and look for grouse;
But here, before the frost can mar it,
We'll make it firm with beef and claret.

STELLA'S BIRTH-DAY. 1724-5.

As, when a beauteous nymph decays,
We say, she's past her dancing-days;
So poets lose their feet by time,
And can no longer dance in rhyme.
Your annual bard had rather chose
To celebrate your birth in prose:
Yet merry folks, who want by chance
A pair to make a country-dance,
Call the old house-keeper, and get her
To fill a place, for want of better:
While Sheridan is off the hooks,
And friend Delany at his books,
That Stella may avoid disgrace,
Once more the Dean supplies their place.
Beauty and wit, too sad a truth!
Have always been confin'd to youth;
The god of wit, and beauty's queen,
He twenty-one, and she fifteen.
No poet ever sweetly sung,
Unless he were, like Phœbus, young;
Nor ever nymph inspir'd to rhyme,
Unless, like Venus, in her prime.
At fifty-six, if this be true,
Am I a poet fit for you?
Or, at the age of forty-three,
Are you a subject fit for me?
Adieu! bright wit, and radiant eyes!
You must be grave, and I be wise.
Our fate in vain we would oppose:
But I'll be still your friend in prose:
Esteem and friendship to express,
Will not require poetic dress;

And, if the muse deny her aid
To have them sung, they may be said.

But, Stella, say, what evil tongue
Reports you are no longer young;
That Time sits, with his scythe, to mow
Where erst sat Cupid with his bow;
That half your locks are turn'd to gray?
I'll ne'er believe a word they say.
'Tis true, but let it not be known,
My eyes are somewhat dimmish grown:
For nature, always in the right,
To your decays adapts my sight;
And wrinkles undistinguish'd pass,
For I'm asham'd to use a glass;
And till I see them with these eyes,
Whoever says you have them, lies.

No length of time can make you quit
Honour and virtue, sense and wit:
Thus you may still be young to me,
While I can better bear than see.
Oh, ne'er may fortune show her spight,
To make me deaf, and mend my sight!

AN EPIGRAM ON WOOD'S BRASS MONEY.

CARTERET was welcomed to the shore
First with the brazen cannons roar;
To meet him next the soldier comes,
With brazen trumps and brazen drums;
Approaching near the town he hears
The brazen bells salute his ears:
But, when Wood's brass began to sound,
Guns, trumpets, drums, and bells, were drown'd.

A SIMILE,

ON OUR WANT OF SILVER:

And the only Way to Remedy it. 1725.

As when of old some forceress threw
O'er the moon's face a sable hue,
To drive unseen her magic chair,
At midnight, through the darken'd air;
Wise people, who believ'd with reason
That this eclipse was out of season,
Affirm'd the moon was sick, and fell
To cure her by a counter-spell.
Ten thousand cymbals now begin
To rend the skies with brazen din;
The cymbals' rattling sounds dispel
The cloud, and drive the hag to hell.
The moon deliver'd from her pain,
Displays her silver face again
(Note here, that in the chemic style,
The moon is silver all this while).
So (if my simile you minded,
Which I confess is too long-winded)
When late a feminine magician*,
Join'd with a brazen politician,
Expos'd, to blind the nation's eyes,
A parchment† of prodigious size;
Conceal'd behind that ample screen,
There was no silver to be seen.

* A great lady was said to have been bribed by Wood,

† The patent for coining halfpence.

But to this parchment let the Drapier
Oppose his counter-charm of paper,
And ring Wood's copper in our ears
So loud till all the nation hears;
That sound will make the parchment shrivel,
And drive the conjurers to the devil:
And, when the sky is grown serene,
Our silver will appear again.

WOOD AN INSECT. 1725.

By long observation I have understood,
That two little vermin are kin to Will Wood.
The first is an insect they call a wood-louse,
That folds up itself in itself for a house,
As round as a ball, without head, without tail,
Inclos'd cap-a-pe in a strong coat of mail.
And thus William Wood to my fancy appears
In fillets of brass roll'd up to his ears:
And over these fillets he wisely has thrown,
To keep out of danger, a doublet of stone*.
The louse of the wood for a medicine is us'd,
Or swallow'd alive, or skilfully bruise'd.
And, let but our mother Hibernia contrive
To swallow Will Wood either bruise'd or alive,
She need be no more with the jaundice posses'd,
Or sick of obstructions, and pains in her chest.

The next is an insect we call a wood-worm,
That lies in old wood like a hare in her form;
With teeth or with claws it will bite or will scratch;
And chambermaids christen this worm a dead-watch,
Because like a watch it always cries click:
Then woe be to those in the house who are sick;
For, as sure as a gun, they will give up the ghost,
If the maggot cries click when it scratches the post.
But a kettle of scalding hot water injected
Infallibly cures the timber affected:
The omen is broken, the danger is over;
The maggot will die, and the sick will recover.
Such a worm was Will Wood, when he scratch'd
at the door

Of a governing statesman or favourite whore:
The death of our nation he seem'd to foretell,
And the sound of his brass we took for our knell.
But now, since the Drapier hath heartily maul'd him,
I think the best thing we can do is to scald him.
For which operation there's nothing more proper
Than the liquor he deals in, his own melted copper;
Unless, like the Dutch, you rather would boil
This coiner of raps † in a cauldron of oil.
Then choose which you please, and let each bring a faggot, [maggot
For our fear's at an end with the death of the

ON WOOD THE IRONMONGER. 1725.

SALMONEUS, as the Grecian tale is,
Was a mad copper-smith of Elis;
Up at his forge by morning-peep,
No creature in the lane could sleep;
Among a crew of roystering fellows
Would sit whole evenings at the alehouse:

* He was in goal for debt.

† Counterfeit halfpence.

His wife and children wanted bread,
While he went always drunk to bed.
This vapouring scab must needs devise
To ape the thunder of the skies:
With brass two fiery steeds he shod,
To make a clattering as they trod.
Of polish'd brass his flaming car
Like lightning dazzled from afar;
And up he mounts into the box,
And he must thunder, with a pox.
Then furious he begins his march,
Drives rattling o'er a brazen arch;
With squibs and crackers arm'd, to throw
Among the trembling crowd below.
All ran to prayers, both priests and laity,
To pacify this angry deity:
When Jove, in pity to the town,
With real thunder knock'd him down.
Then what a huge delight were all in,
To see the wicked varlet sprawling;
They search'd his pockets on the place,
And found his copper all was base;
They laugh'd at such an Irish blunder,
To take the noise of brass for thunder.

The moral of this tale is proper,
Apply'd to Wood's adulter'd copper;
Which, as he scatter'd, we like bolts,
Mistook at first for thunder-bolts;
Before the Drapier shot a letter,
(Nor Jove himself could do it better)
Which, lighting on th' impostor's crown,
Like real thunder knock'd him down.

WILL WOOD'S PETITION

TO THE PEOPLE OF IRELAND;

Being an excellent New Song, supposed to be made and sung in the streets of Dublin, by William Wood, Ironmonger and Halfpenny-monger. 1725.

My dear Irish folks,
Come leave off your jokes,
And buy up my halfpence so fine;
So fair and so bright,
They'll give you delight;
Observe how they glisten and shine!

They'll sell, to my grief,
As cheap as neck-beef,
For counters at cards to your wife;
And every day
Your children may play
Span-farthing, or tofs on the knife.

Come hither, and try;
I'll teach you to buy
A pot of good ale for a farthing:
Come; three-pence a score,
I ask you no more,
And a fig for the Drapier and Hardinge*.

When tradesmen have gold,
The thief will be bold,
By night and by day for to rob him:
My copper is such,
No robber will touch,
And so you may daintily bob him.

* The Drapier's printer.

THE WORKS OF SWIFT.

The little blackguard,
Who gets very hard
His halfpence for cleaning your shoes;
When his pockets are cramm'd
With mine and be d—'d,
He may swear he has nothing to lose.
Here's halfpence in plenty,
For one you'll have twenty,
Though thousands are not worth a pudden:
Your neighbours will think,
When your pocket cries chink,
You are grown plaguy rich on a sudden.
You will be my thankers,
I'll make you my bankers,
As good as Ben Burton or Fade*:
For nothing shall pass
But my pretty brags,
And then you'll be all of a trade.
I'm a son of a whore
If I have a word more
To say in this wretched condition.
If my coin will not pass,
I must die like an ass;
And so I conclude my petition.

A NEW SONG

ON WOOD'S HALF-PENCE.

YE people of Ireland, both country and city,
Come listen with patience, and hear out my ditty:
At this time I'll choose to be wiser than witty.
Which nobody can deny.
The halfpence are coming, the nation's undoing.
There's an end of your ploughing, and baking,
and brewing:
In short, you must all go to rack and to ruin.
Which, &c.
Both high men and low men, and thick men and tall men, [thrall men,
And rich men and poor men, and free men and
Will suffer; and this man, and that man, and all men.
Which, &c.
The soldier is ruin'd, poor man! by his pay;
His five-pence will prove but a farthing a day,
For meat, or for drink; or he must run away.
Which, &c.
When he pulls out his two-pence, the tapster says not,
That ten times as much he must pay for his shot;
And thus the poor soldier must soon go to pot.
Which, &c.
If he goes to the baker, the baker will huff,
And twenty-pence have for a two-penny loaf,
Then, dog, rogue, and rascal, and so kick and cuff.
Which, &c.
Again, to the market whenever he goes,
The butcher and soldier must be mortal foes;
One cuts off an ear, and the other a nose.
Which, &c.

* Two famous bankers.

The butcher is stout, and he values no swagger;
A cleaver's a match any time for a dagger,
And a blue sleeve may give such a cuff as may stagger.
Which, &c.
The beggars themselves will be broke in a trice,
When thus their poor farthings are sunk in their price;
When nothing is left, they must live on their lice.
Which, &c.
The squire possess'd of twelve thousand a year,
O Lord! what a mountain his rents would appear!
Should he take them, he would not have house-
room, I fear.
Which, &c.
Though at present he lives in a very large house,
There would then not be room in it left for a mouse;
But the squire's too wise, he will not take a soufe
Which, &c.
The farmer, who comes with his rent in this cash,
For taking these counters, and being so rash,
Will be kick'd out of doors, both himself and his trash.
Which, &c.
For, in all the leases that ever we hold,
We must pay our rent in good silver and gold,
And not in brass tokens of such a base mold.
Which, &c.
The wisest of lawyers all swear, they will warrant
No money but silver and gold can be current;
And, since they will swear it, we all may be sure on't.
Which, &c.
And I think, after all, it would be very strange
To give current money for base in exchange,
Like a fine lady swapping her moles for the mange.
Which, &c.
But read the king's patent, and there you will find,
That no man need take them but who has a mind,
For which we must say that his Majesty's kind.
Which, &c.
Now God blest the Drapier who open'd our eyes!
I'm sure, by his book, that the writer is wise;
He shows us the cheat, from the end to the rise.
Which, &c.
Nay, farther, he shows it a very hard case,
That this fellow Wood, of a very bad race,
Should of all the fine gentry of Ireland take place.
Which, &c.
That he and his halfpence should come to weigh down
Our subjects so loyal and true to the crown;
But I hope, after all, that they will be his own.
Which, &c.
This book, I do tell you, is writ for your goods,
And a very good book against Mr. Wood's;
If you stand true together, he's left in the fuds.
Which, &c.
Ye shop-men, and trades-men, and farmers, go
read it;
For I think in my soul at this time that you need it;
Or egad, if you don't, there's an end of your credit.
Which nobody can deny.

A SERIOUS POEM

UPON WILLIAM WOOD,

Brasier, Tinker, Hardwareman, Coiner, Founder, and Esquire.

WHEN foes are o'ercome, we preserve them from slaughter,

To be beavers of wood, and drawers of water.

Now, although to draw water is not very good;

Yet we all should rejoice to be beavers of Wood.

I own, it has often provok'd me to mutter,

That a rogue so obscure should make such a clutter:

But ancient Philosophers wisely remark,

That old rotten Wood will shine in the dark.

The Heathens, we read, had Gods made of Wood,

Who could do them no harm, if they did them no

But this idol Wood may do us great evil; [good:

Their Gods were of Wood; but our Wood is the Devil.

To cut down fine Wood, is a very bad thing;

And yet we all know much gold it will bring.

Then, if cutting down Wood brings money good store,

Our money to keep, let us cut down one more.

Now hear an old tale. There anciently stood

(I forget in what church) an image of Wood.

Concerning this image there went a prediction,

It would burn a whole forest; nor was it a fiction.

'Twas cut into faggots and put to the flame,

To burn an old Friar, one Forest by name.

My tale is a wise one, if well understood:

Find you but the Friar; and I'll find the Wood.

I hear, among scholars there is a great doubt

From what kind of tree this Wood was hewn out.

Teague made a good pun by a brogue in his speech;

And said, By my soul, he's the son of a BEECH.

Some call him a Thorn, the curse of the nation,

As Thorns were design'd to be from the creation.

Some think him cut out from the poisonous Yew,

Beneath whose ill shade no plant ever grew.

Some say he's a Birch, a thought very odd;

For none but a dunce would come under his rod.

But I'll tell you the secret; but pray do not blab;

He is an old stump cut out of a Crab;

And England has put this Crab to a hard use,

To cudgel our bones, and for drink give us verjuice;

And therefore his witneses justly may boast,

That none are more properly knights of the Post.

I ne'er could endure my talent to smother;

I told you one tale, and I'll tell you another.

A joiner, to fasten a saint in a nitcb,

Bor'd a large auger-hole in the image's breech;

But, finding the statue to make no complaint,

He would ne'er be convinc'd it was a true saint.

When the true Wood arrives, as he soon will, no doubt,

(For that's but a sham Wood they carry about *)

What stuff he is made of you quickly may find,

If you make the same trial, and bore him behind.

I'll hold you a groat, when you wimble his bum,

He'll bellow as loud as the Devil in a drum.

From me, I declare, you shall have no denial;

And there can be no harm in making a trial:

And, when to the joy of your hearts he has roar'd,

You may show him about for a new groaning-board.

Hear one story more, and then I will stop.

I dreamt Wood was told he should die by a drop;

* He was frequently burnt in effigy.

So methought he resolved no liquor to taste,
For fear the first drop might as well be his last.
But dreams are like oracles; 'tis hard to explain 'em;
For it prov'd that he died of a drop at Kilmainham *.
I wak'd with delight; and not without hope,
Very soon to see Wood drop down from a rope.
How he! and how we, at each other should grin!
'Tis kindness to hold a friend up by the chin.
But soft! says the Herald; I cannot agree;
For metal on metal is false Heraldry.
Why, that may be true; yet Wood upon Wood,
I'll maintain with my life, is Heraldry good.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

SIR,

Dec. 14. 1719 †, 9 at night.

It is impossible to know by your letter whether the wine is to be bottled to-morrow, or no.

If it be, or be not, why did not you, in plain English, tell us so?

For my part, it was by mere chance I came to sit with the ladies ‡ this night:

And if they had not told me there was a letter from you; and your man Alexander had not gone,
and come back from the deanry; and the boy
here had not been sent to let Alexander know
I was here; I should have missed the letter outright.

Truly I don't know who's bound to be sending for corks to stop your bottles, with a vengeance.

Make a page of your own age, and send your man
Alexander to buy corks; for Saunders already has gone above ten jaunts.

Mrs. Dingley and Mrs. Johnson say, truly they don't care for your wife's company, though they like your wine; but they had rather have it at their own house to drink in quiet.

However, they own it is very civil in Mr. Sheridan to make the offer; and they cannot deny it.
I wish Alexander safe at St. Catharine's to-night, with all my heart and soul, upon my word and honour:

But I think it base in you to send a poor fellow out so late at this time of year, when one would not turn out a dog that one valued; I appeal to your friend Mr. Connor.

I would present my humble service to my lady Mountcashel; but truly I thought she would have made advances to have been acquainted with me, as she pretended.

But now I can write no more, for you see plainly my paper is ended.

I P. S.

I wish, when you prated, your letter you'd dated:
Much plague it created. I scolded and rated;
My soul is much grated; for your man I long waited.
I think you are fated, like a bear to be baited:
Your man is belated; the case I have stated;
And me you have cheated. My stable's unstated.
Come back t' us well freighted.
I remember my late head; and wish you translated,
For teasing me.

* Their place of execution.

† This is probably dated too early.

‡ Mrs. Dingley and Mrs. Johnson.

2 P. S.

Mrs. Dingley desires me singly [you ;
Her service to present you ; hopes that will content
But Johnson Madam is grown a sad dame,
For want of converse, and cannot send one verse.

3 P. S.

You keep such a twattling with you and your bottling ;

But I see the sum total, we shall ne'er have a bottle ;
The long and the short, we shall not have a quart.
I wish you would sign 't, that we have a pint.
For all your colloquing, I'd be glad of a knoggin :
But I doubt 'tis a sham ; you won't give us a dram.
'Tis of shine a month moon-full, you won't part with a spoonful ;

And I must be nimble, if I can fill my thimble.
You see I won't stop, till I come to a drop ;
But I doubt the oraculum is a poor supernaculum ;
Though perhaps you tell it for a grace, if we smell it.

STELLA.

TO QUILCA,

A COUNTRY-HOUSE OF DR. SHERIDAN,

In no very good Repair. 1725.

LET me thy properties explain :
A rotten cabbin dropping rain ;
Chimnies with scorn rejecting smoke ;
Stools, tables, chairs, and bedsteads broke.
Here elements have lost their uses,
Air ripens not, nor earth produces ;
In vain we make poor Sheelah * toil,
Fire will not roast, nor water boil.
'Through all the valleys, hills, and plains,
'The goddess Want in triumph reigns ;
And her chief officers of state,
Sloth, Dirt, and Theft, around her wait.

THE BLESSINGS OF A COUNTRY LIFE.

FAR from our debtors ; no Dublin letters ;
Not seen by our betters.

THE PLAGUES OF A COUNTRY LIFE.

A COMPANION with news ; a great want of shoes ;
Eat lean meat, or choose ; a church without pews.
Our horses astray ; no straw, oats, or hay ;
December in May ; our boys run away ; all servants at play.

DR. SHERIDAN TO DR. SWIFT.

I'd have you to know, as sure as you're Dean,
On Thursday my cask of Obrien I'll drain :
If my wife is not willing, I say she's a quean ;
And my right to the cellar, egad I'll maintain
As bravely as any that fought at Dunblain :
Go tell it her over and over again.
I hope, as I ride to the town, it won't rain ;
For, should it, I fear it will cool my hot brain,
Entirely extinguish my poetic vein ;
And then I should be as stupid as Kain.
Who preach'd on three heads, though he mention'd but twain.

* The name of an Irish servant.

Now Wardel's in haste, and begins to complain ;
Your most humble servant, Dear Sir, I remain,
T. S—N.

Get Hellsham, Walmsley, Delany,
And some Grattans, if there be any * :
Take care you do not bid too many.

DR. SWIFT'S ANSWER.

THE verses you sent on the bottling your wine
Were, in every one's judgment, exceedingly fine ;
And I must confess, as a dean and divine,
I think you inspir'd by the Muses all nine.
I nicely examin'd them every line, [shine.
And the worst of them all like a barn-door did Oh, that Jove would give me such a talent as thine !

With Delany or Dan I would scorn to combine.
I know they have many a wicked design ;
And, give Satan his due, Dan begins to refine.
However, I wish, honest comrade of mine,
You would really on Thursday leave St. Catharine†,
Where I hear you are cramm'd every day like a swine ;

With me you'll no more have a stomach to dine,
Nor after your victuals lie sleeping supine :
So I wish you were toothless, like Lord Masserine.
But, were you as wicked as lew'd Aretine,
I wish you would tell me which way you incline
If, when you return, your road you don't line,
On Thursday I'll pay my respects at your shrine,
Wherever you bend, wherever you twine,
In square, or in opposite circle, or trine.
Your beef will on Thursday be fatter than brine :
I hope you have swill'd, with new milk from the kine,

As much as the Liffey's outdone by the Rhine ;
And Dan shall be with us, with nose asquiline.
If you do not come back, we shall weep out our eyne ;

Or may your gown never be good Lutherine.
The beef you have got, I hear, is a chine :
But, if too many come, your madam will whine ;
And then you may kiss the low end of her spine.
But enough of this poetry Alexandrine :
I hope you will not think this a pasquine.

A PORTRAIT

FROM THE LIFE.

COME sit by my side, while this picture I draw :
In chattering a magpie, in pride a jackdaw ;
A temper the devil himself could not bridle ;
Impertinent mixture of busy and idle ;
As rude as a bear, no mule half so crabbed ;
She swills like a sow, and she breeds like a rabbit :
A housewife in bed, at table a flattern ;
For all an example, for no one a pattern.
Now tell me, friend Thomas‡, Ford§, Grattan||,
and merry Dan ¶,
Has this any likeness to good madam Sheridan ?

UPON STEALING A CROWN, WHEN THE DEAN WAS ASLEEP.

BY DR. SHERIDAN.

DEAR Dean, since you in sleepy wife
Have op'd your mouth and clos'd your eyes;
Like ghost, I glide along your floor,
And softly shut the parlour-door:
For, should I break your sweet repose,
Who knows what money you might lose;
Since oftentimes it has been found,
A dream has given ten thousand pound?
Then sleep, my friend; dear Dean, sleep on,
And all you get shall be your own;
Provided you to this agree,
That all you lose belongs to me.

THE DEAN'S ANSWER.

So, about twelve at night, the punk
Steals from the cully when he's drunk;
Nor is contented with a treat,
Without her privilege to cheat.
Nor can I the least difference find,
But that you left no clap behind.
But, jest apart, restore, you capon ye,
My twelve thirteens* and six-pence ha'penny.
To eat my meat, and drink my medlicot,
And then to give me such a deadly cut—
But 'tis observ'd, that men in gowns
Are most inclin'd to plunder crowns.
Could you but change a crown as easy
As you can steal one, how 'twould please ye!
I thought the lady † at St. Catharine's
Knew how to set you better patterns;
For this I will not dine with Agmondisham ‡,
And for his victuals let a ragman dish'em.

THE STORM:

MINERVA'S PETITION.

PALLAS, a goddess chaste and wise,
Descending lately from the skies,
To Neptune went, and begg'd in form
He'd give his orders for a storm;
A storm, to drown that rascal Horte,
And she would kindly thank him for't:
A wretch! whom English rogues, to spite her,
Had lately honour'd with a mitre,
The god, who favour'd her request,
Assur'd her he would do his best:
But Venus had been there before,
Pleaded the bishop lov'd a whore,
And had enlarg'd her empire wide;
He own'd no deity beside.
At sea or land, if e'er you found him
Without a mistress, hang or drown him.
Since Burnet's death, the bishop's bench,
Till Horte arriv'd, ne'er kept a wench:
If Horte must sink, she grieves to tell it,
She'll not have left one single prelate;

* A shilling passeth for thirteen pence in Ireland.

† Lady Mountcasel.

‡ Agmondisham Vesey, Esq. a very worthy gentleman, for whom the Dean had a great esteem.

For, to say truth, she did intend him;
Elect of Cyprus in commendam.

And, since her birth the ocean gave her,
She could not doubt her uncle's favour.

Then Proteus urg'd the same request,
But half in earnest, half in jest;
Said he—"Great sovereign of the main,
"To drown him all attempts are vain;
"Horte can assume more forms than I,
"A rake, a bully, pimp, or spy;
"Can creep or run, or fly or swim;
"All motions are alike to him:
"Turn him adrift, and you shall find
"He knows to sail with every wind;
"Or, throw him overboard, he'll ride
"As well against as with the tide.
"But, Pallas, you've apply'd too late;
"For 'tis decreed, by Jove and Fate,
"That Ireland must be soon destroy'd,
"And who but Horte can be employ'd?
"You need not then have been so pert,
"In sending Bolton* to Clonfert.
"I found you did it, by your grinning;
"Your business is, to mind your spinning.
"But how you came to interpose
"In making bishops, no one knows:
"Or who regarded your report;
"For never were you seen at court.
"And if you must have your petition,
"There's Berkeley† in the same condition:
"Look, there he stands, and 'tis but just,
"If one must drown the other must;
"But, if you'll leave us bishop Judas,
"We'll give you Berkeley for Bermudas.
"Now, if 'twill gratify your spight,
"To put him in a plaguy fright,
"Although 'tis hardly worth the cost,
"You soon shall see him soundly tost.
"You'll find him swear, blaspheme, and damn
"(And every moment take a dram)
"His ghastly visage with an air
"Of reprobation and despair:
"Or else some hiding-hole he seeks,
"For fear the rest should say he squeaks;
"Or, as Fitzpatrick‡ did before,
"Resolve to perish with his whore;
"Or else he raves, and roars, and swears,
"And, but for shame, would say his prayers.
"Or, would you see his spirits sink,
"Relaxing downwards in a stink?
"If such a sight as this can please ye,
"Good madam Pallas, pray be easy,
"To Neptune speak, and he'll consent;
"But he'll come back the knave he went."
The goddess, who conceiv'd an hope
That Horte was destin'd to a rope,
Believ'd it best to condescend
To spare a foe, to save a friend:
But, fearing Berkeley might be fear'd,
She left him virtue for a guard.

* Afterwards Archbishop of Cashell.

† Dr. George Berkeley, dean of Derry, and afterwards bishop of Cloyne.

‡ Brigadier Fitzpatrick was drowned in one of the packet-boats in the bay of Dublin, in a great storm.

Indulge the verdure of the woods;
With azure beauty gild the floods,
And flowery carpets lave;

For melancholy ever reigns
Delighted in the sylvan scenes
With scientific light;

Seeks lulling sounds and fanning gales,
Though wrapt from mortal sight.

With magic rites and heathen lore
Obstructed and depress'd;
Till Wisdom give the sacred Nine,
Untaught, not uninspir'd, to shine,
By Reason's power redress'd.

When Solon and Lycurgus taught
To moralize the human thought
Of mad opinion's maze,
To erring zeal they gave new laws.
Thy charms, O Liberty, the cause
That blends congenial rays.

Bid bright Astræa gild the morn,
Or bid a hundred suns be born,
To hecatomb the year;
Without thy aid, in vain the poles,
In vain the zodiac system rolls,
In vain the lunar sphere.

Come, fairest princess of the throng,
Bring swift Philosophy along
In metaphysic dreams;
While raptur'd bards no more behold
A vernal age of purer gold
In Heliconian streams.

Drive Thralldom with malignant hand,
To curse some other destin'd land
By Folly led astray:
Ierne bear on azure wing;
Energic let her soar and sing
Thy universal sway.

So, when Amphion bade the lyre
To more majestic sound aspire,
Behold the madding throng,
In wonder and oblivion drown'd,
To sculpture turn'd by magic sound
And petrifying song.

STELLA'S BIRTH-DAY.

March 13. 1726.

THIS day, whate'er the fates decree,
Shall still be kept with joy by me:
This day then let us not be told,
That you are sick, and I grown old;
Nor think on your approaching ills,
And talk of spectacles and pills:
To-morrow will be time enough
To hear such mortifying stuff.

Yet, since from reason may be brought
A better and more pleasing thought,
Which can, in spite of all decays,
Support a few remaining days;
From not the gravest of Divines
Accept for once some serious lines.

Although we now can form no more
Long schemes of life, as heretofore;
Yet you, while time is running fast,
Can look with joy on what is past.

Were future happiness and pain
A mere contrivance of the brain;
As atheists argue, to entice
And fit their proselytes for vice
(The only comfort they propose,
To have companions in their woes):
Grant this the case; yet sure 'tis hard
That virtue, styl'd its own reward,
And by all sages understood
To be the chief of human good,
Should acting die; nor leave behind
Some lasting pleasure in the mind,
Which by remembrance will assuage
Grief, sickness, poverty, and age,
And strongly shoot a radiant dart
To shine through life's declining part.

Say, Stella, feel you no content,
Reflecting on a life well spent;
Your skillful hand employ'd to save
Despairing wretches from the grave;
And then supporting with your store
Those whom you dragg'd from death before?
So Providence on mortals waits,
Preserving what it first creates.
Your generous boldness to defend
An innocent and absent friend;
That courage which can make you just
To merit humbled in the dust;
The detestation you express
For vice in all its glittering dress;
That patience under tottering pain,
Where stubborn stoics would complain;
Must these like empty shadows pass,
Or forms neglected from a glass?
Or mere chimeras in the mind,
That fly, and leave no mark behind?
Does not the body thrive and grow
By food of twenty years ago?
And, had it not been still supply'd,
It must a thousand times have died.
Then who with reason can maintain
That no effects of food remain?
And is not virtue in mankind
The nutriment that feeds the mind;
Upheld by each good action past,
And still continued by the last?
Then, who with reason can pretend
That all effects of virtue end?

Believe me, Stella, when you show
That true contempt for things below,
Nor prize your life for other ends
Than merely to oblige your friends;
Your former actions claim their part,
And join to fortify your heart.
For virtue, in her daily race,
Like Janus, bears a double face;
Looks back with joy where she has gone;
And therefore goes with courage on;

She at your sickly couch will wait,
And guide you to a better state.

O then, whatever Heaven intends,
Take pity on your pitying friends!
Nor let your ills affect your mind,
To fancy they can be unkind.
Me, surely me, you ought to spare,
Who gladly would your suffering share:
Or give my scrap of life to you,
And think it far beneath your due;
You to whose care so oft I owe
That I'm alive to tell you so.

HORACE, BOOK I. ODE XIV.

Paraphrased, and inscribed to Ireland. 1726.

THE INSCRIPTION.

Poor floating isle, tost on ill-fortune's waves,
Ordain'd by fate to be the land of slaves;
Shall moving Delos now deep-rooted stand;
Thou, fix'd of old, be now the moving land?
Although the metaphor be worn and stale,
Betwixt a state and vessel under sail;
Let me suppose thee for a ship a while,
And thus address thee in the sailor's style:

UNHAPPY ship, thou art return'd in vain:
New waves shall drive thee to the deep again.
Look to thyself, and be no more the sport
Of giddy winds, but make some friendly port.
Loft are thy oars, that us'd thy course to guide,
Like faithful counsellors, on either side.
Thy mast, which like some aged patriot stood
The single pillar for his country's good,
To lead thee, as a staff directs the blind,
Behold it cracks by yon rough eastern wind.
Your cable's burst, and you must quickly feel
The waves impetuous enter at your keel.
Thus commonwealths receive a foreign yoke,
When the strong cords of union once are broke.
Torn by a sudden tempest is thy sail,
Expanded to invite a milder gale.

As when some writer in the public cause
His pen, to save a sinking nation, draws.
While all is calm, his arguments prevail;
The people's voice expands his paper-sail;
Till power, discharging all her stormy bags,
Flutters the feeble pamphlet into rags.
The nation scar'd, the author doom'd to death,
Who fondly put his trust in poplar breath.

A larger sacrifice in vain you vow;
There's not a power above will help you now:
A nation thus, who oft' Heaven's call neglects,
In vain from injur'd Heaven relief expects.

'Twill not avail, when thy strong sides are broke,
That thy descent is from the British oak;
Or, when your name and family you boast,
From fleets triumphant o'er the Gallic coast.
Such was Ierne's claim, as just as thine,
Her sons descended from the British line;
Her matchless sons, whose valour still remains
On French records for twenty long campaigns:
Yet, from an empress now a captive grown,
She sav'd Britannia's rights and lost her own.

In ships decay'd no mariner confides,
Lur'd by the gilded stern and painted sides;

Yet at a ball unthinking fools delight
In the gay trappings of a birth-day night:
They on the gold brocades and satins rav'd,
And quite forgot their country was enslav'd.
Dear vessel, still be to thy steerage just,
Nor change thy course with every sudden gust;
Like supple patriots of the modern sort,
Who turn with every gale that blows from court.
Weary and sea-sick when in thee confin'd,
Now for thy safety cares distract my mind;
As those who long have stood the storms of state
Retire, yet still bemoan their country's fate.
Beware; and when you hear the surges roar,
Avoid the rocks on Britain's angry shore.
They lie, alas! too easy to be found;
For thee alone they lie the island round.

V E R S E S

ON THE SUDDEN DRYING UP OF ST. PATRICK'S WELL,

Near Trinity College, Dublin. 1726.

By holy zeal inspir'd, and led by fame,
To thee, once favourite isle, with joy I came;
What time the Goth, the Vandal, and the Hun,
Had my own native Italy * o'er-run.
Ierne, to the world's remotest parts,
Renown'd for valour, policy and arts.

Hither from Colchos †, with the fleecy ore,
Jason arriv'd two thousand years before.
Thee, happy island, Pallas call'd her own,
When haughty Britain was a land unknown ‡:
From thee, with pride, the Caledonians trace
The glorious founder of their kingly race:
Thy martial sons, whom now they dare despise,
Did once their land subdue and civilize:
Their dress, their language, and the Scottish name,
Confess the soil from whence the victors came §.
Well may they boast that ancient blood which runs

Within their veins, who are thy younger sons ||,

* Italy was not properly the native place of St. Patrick, but the place of his education, and where he received his mission; and because he had his new birth there, hence, by poetical licence, and by scripture figure, our author calls that country his native Italy. IRISH ED.

† Orpheus, or the ancient author of the Greek poem on the Argonautic expedition, whoever he be, says, that Jason, who manned the ship Argos at Theffaly, sailed to Ireland. IRISH ED.

‡ Tacitus, in the life of Julius Agricola, says, that the harbours of Ireland, on account of their commerce, were better known to the world than those of Britain. IRISH ED.

§ The argument here turns on, what the author of course took for granted, the present Scots being the descendants of Irish emigrants.

|| On the authority of Buchanan and his predecessors, the historical part of this poem seems founded, as well as the notes signed IRISH ED., some of which, it is supposed, were written by the Dean himself.

A conquest and a colony from thee.
The mother-kingdom left her children free;
From thee no mark of slavery they felt:
Not so with thee thy base invaders dealt;
Invited here to vengeful Morrough's aid *,
Those whom they could not conquer, they betray'd.

Britain, by thee we fell, ungrateful isle!
Not by thy valour, but superior guile:
Britain, with shame, confess this land of mine
First taught thee human knowledge and divine †;
My prelates and my students, sent from hence,
Made your sons converts both to God and sense:
Not like the pastors of thy ravenous breed,
Who come to fleece the flocks, and not to feed.

Wretched Ierne! with what grief I see
The fatal changes Time hath made on thee!
The Christian rites I introduc'd in vain:
Lo! infidelity return'd again!

Freedom and virtue in thy sons I found,
Who now in vice and slavery are drown'd.

By faith and prayer, this crosser in my hand,
I drove the venom'd serpent from thy land;
The shepherd in his bower might sleep or sing ‡,
Nor dread the adder's tooth, nor scorpion's sting.

With omens oft' I strove to warn thy swains,
Omens, the types of thy impending chains.
I sent the magpie from the British soil,
With restless beak thy blooming fruit to spoil,
To din thine ears with unharmonious clack,
And haunt thy holy walls in white and black.
What else are those thou seest in Bishops' geer,
Who crop the nurseries of learning here;
Aspiring, greedy, full of senseless prate,
Devour the church, and chatter to the state?

As you grew more degenerate and base,
I sent you millions of the croaking race;
Emblems of insects vile, who spread their spawn
Through all thy land, in armour, fur, and lawn;
A nauseous brood, that fills your senate walls,
And in the chambers of your viceroy crawls!

* In the reign of King Henry II. Dermot M'Morrough, king of Leinster, being deprived of his kingdom by Roderick O'Connor, king of Connaught, he invited the English over as auxiliaries, and promised Richard Strangbow, Earl of Pembroke, his daughter and all his dominions as a portion. By this assistance, M'Morrough recovered his crown, and Strangbow became possessed of all Leinster. IRISH ED.

† St. Patrick arrived in Ireland in the year 431, and completed the conversion of the natives, which had been begun by Palladius and others. And, as bishop Nicholson observes, Ireland soon became the fountain of learning, to which all the Western Christians, as well as the English, had recourse, not only for instructions in the principles of religion, but in all sorts of literature, viz. Legendi et scholasticæ eruditionis gratiâ. IRISH ED.

‡ There are no snakes, vipers, or toads, in Ireland; and even frogs were not known here until about the year 1700. The magpies came a short time before; and the Norway rats since. IRISH ED.

See, where that new-devouring vermin runs,
Sent in my anger from the land of Huns!
With harpy-claws it undermines the ground,
And sudden spreads a numerous offspring round.
Th' amphibious tyrant, with his ravenous band,
Drains all thy lakes of fish, of fruits thy land.

Where is the holy well that bore my name?
Fled to the fountain back, from whence it came!
Fair Freedom's emblem once, which smoothly
And blessings equally on all bestows. [flows,
Here, from the neighbouring * nursery of arts,
The students, drinking, rais'd their wit and parts;
Here, for an age and more, improv'd their vein,
Their Phœbus I, my spring their Hippocrene.
Discourag'd youths! now all their hopes must fail,
Condemn'd to country cottages and ale;
To foreign prelates make a slavish court,
And by their sweat procure a mean support;
Or, for the classics, read "Th' Attorney's Guide;"
Collect excise, or wait upon the tide.

Oh! that I had been apostle to the Swifs,
Or hardy Scot, or any land but this;
Combin'd in arms, they had their foes defied,
And kept their liberty, or bravely died.
Thou still with tyrants in succession curst,
The last invaders trampling on the first:
Now fondly hope for some reverse of fate,
Virtue herself would now return too late.
Not half thy course of misery is run,
Thy greatest evils yet are scarce begun.
Soon shall thy sons (the time is just at hand)
Be all made captives in their native land;
When, for the use of no Hibernian born,
Shall rise one blade of grass, one ear of corn;
When shells and leather shall for money pass,
Nor thy oppressing lords afford the brass †.
But all turn leasers to that ‡ mongrel breed,
Who, from thee sprung, yet on thy vitals feed;
Who to yon ravenous isle thy treasures bear,
And waste in luxury thy harvests there;
For pride and ignorance a proverb grown,
The jest of wits, and to the court unknown.

I scorn thy spurious and degenerate line,
And from this hour my patronage resign.

ON READING DR. YOUNG'S SATIRES

CALLED THE UNIVERSAL PASSION,

By which he means Pride. 1726.

If there be truth in what you sing,
Such godlike virtues in the king;
A minister § so fill'd with zeal
And wisdom for the common-weal:

* The University of Dublin, called Trinity College, was founded by Queen Elizabeth in 1591. IRISH ED.

† Wood's ruinous project in 1724. IRISH ED.

‡ The absentees, who spent the income of their Irish estates, places, and pensions, in England. IRISH ED.

§ Sir Robert Walpole, afterwards Earl of Orford.

If he * who in the chair presides
So steadily the senate guides:
If others, whom you make your theme,
Are seconds in the glorious scheme:
If every peer whom you commend,
To worth and learning be a friend:
If this be truth, as you attest,
What land was ever half so blest?
No falsehood now among the great,
And tradesmen now no longer cheat;
Now on the bench fair Justice shines,
Her scale to neither side inclines;
Now pride and cruelty are flown,
And mercy here exalts her throne:
For such is good example's power
It does its office every hour,
Where governors are good and wise;
Or else the truest maxim lies:
For so we find all ancient sages
Decree, that, ad exemplum regis,
Through all the realm his virtues run,
Ripening and kindling like the sun.
If this be true, then how much more
When you have nam'd at least a score
Of courtiers, each in their degree,
If possible, as good as he?

Or take it in a different view.
I ask (if what you say be true)
If you affirm the present age
Deserves your satire's keenest rage:
If that same universal passion
With every vice had fill'd the nation:
If virtue dares not venture down
A single step beneath the crown:
If clergymen, to show their wit,
Praise classics more than holy writ:
If bankrupts, when they are undone,
Into the senate-house can run,
And sell their votes at such a rate
As will retrieve a lost estate:
If law be such a partial whore,
To spare the rich, and plague the poor:
If these be of all crimes the worst,
What land was ever half so curst?

THE DOG AND THIEF. 1726.

Quoth the thief to the dog, let me into your door
And I'll give you these delicate bits.
Quoth the dog, I shall then be more villian than
And besides must be out of my wits. [you're,

Your delicate bits will not serve me a meal,
But my master each day gives me bread;
You'll fly, when you get what ye came here to
And I must be hang'd in your stead. [steal,

The stock-jobber thus from 'Change-alley goes
And tips you the freeman a wink; [down,
Let me have but your vote to serve for the town,
And here is a guinea to drink.

Says the freeman, your guinea to-night will be
Your offers of bribery cease: [spent!

I'll vote for my landlord, to whom I pay rent,
Or else I may forfeit my lease.

* Sir Spencer Compton, then speaker, afterwards Earl of Wilmington.

From London they come, silly people to choose,
Their lands and their faces unknown:
Who'd vote a rogue into the parliament-house,
That would turn a man out of his own!

A D V I C E

TO THE GRUB-STREET VERSE-WRITERS. 1726.

YE poets ragged and forlorn,
Down from your garrets haste;
Ye rhymers dead as soon as born,
Not yet consign'd to paste;

I know a trick to make you thrive;
O, 'tis a quaint device:
Your still-born poems shall revive.
And scorn to wrap up spice.

Get all your verses printed fair,
And let them well be dried;
And Curll must have a special care
To leave the margin wide.

Lend these to paper-sparing * Pope;
And when he sits to write,
No letter with an envelope
Could give him more delight.

When Pope has fill'd the margins round,
Why then recall your loan;
Sell them to Curll for fifty pound,
And swear they are your own.

T O A L A D Y,

WHO DESIRED THE AUTHOR TO WRITE SOME VERSES UPON HER IN THE HEROIC STYLE.

Written at London, in 1726.

AFTER venting all my spite,
Tell me, what have I to write?
Every error I could find
Through the mazes of your mind,
Have my busy Muse employ'd
Till the company was cloy'd.
Are you positive and fretful,
Heedless, ignorant, forgetful?
Those, and twenty follies more,
I have often told before.

Hearken what my lady says:
Have I nothing then to praise?
Ill it fits you to be witty,
Where a fault should move your pity.
If you think me too conceited,
Or to passion quickly heated;
If my wandering head be less
Set on reading than on dress;
If I always seem too dull t'ye;
I can solve the diffi---culty.
You would teach me to be wise;
Truth and honour how to prize;

* The original copy of Mr. Pope's celebrated translation of Homer (preserved in the British Museum) is almost entirely written on the covers of letters, and sometimes between the lines of the letters themselves.

How to shine in conversation,
And with credit fill my station;
How to relish notions high;
How to live, and how to die.

But it was decreed by fate---
Mr. Dean, you come too late.
Well I know, you can discern,
I am now too old to learn:
Follies, from my youth instill'd,
Have my soul entirely fill'd;
In my head and heart they centre,
Nor will let your lessons enter.

Bred a fondling and an heiress,
Drest like any Lady Mayorefs,
Cocker'd by the servants round,
Was too good to touch the ground;
Thought the life of every lady
Should be one continual play-day---
Balls, and masquerades, and shows,
Visits, plays, and powder'd beaux.

Thus you have my case at large,
And may now perform your charge.
Those materials I have furnish'd,
When by you refin'd and burnish'd,
Must, that all the world may know 'em,
Be reduc'd into a poem.

But, I beg, suspend a while
That same paltry, burlesque style;
Drop for once your constant rule,
Turning all to ridicule;
Teaching others how to ape you;
Court nor Parliament can 'scape you;
Treat the public and your friends
Both alike, while neither mends.

Sing my praise in strain sublime:
Treat me not with doggrel rhyme.
'Tis but just, you should produce,
With each fault, each fault's excuse;
Not to publish every trifle,
And my few perfections stifle,
With some gifts at least endow me,
Which my very foes allow me.
Am I spiteful, proud, unjust?
Did I ever break my trust?
Which of all our modern dames
Censures less, or less defames?
In good manners am I faulty?
Can you call me rude or haughty?
Did I e'er my mite withhold
From the impotent and old?
When did ever I omit
Due regard for men of wit?
When have I esteem express'd
For a coxcomb gaily dress'd?
Do I, like the female tribe,
Think it wit to flatter and gibe?
Who with less designing ends
Kindlier entertains their friends;
With good words, and countenance sprightly;
Strives to treat them more politely?

Think not cards my chief diversion:
'Tis a wrong, unjust aspersion:
Never knew I any good in 'em,
But to dose my head like laudanum.
We by play, as men by drinking,
Pass our nights, to drive out thinking.
From my ailments give me leisure,
I shall read and think with pleasure;

Conversation learn to relish,
And with books my mind embellish.

Now, methinks, I hear you cry,
Mr. Dean, you must reply.

Madam, I allow 'tis true:
All these praises are your due.
You, like some acute philosopher,
Every fault have drawn a gloss over;
Placing in the strongest light
All your virtues to my sight.

Though you lead a blameless life,
Are an humble prudent wife,
Answer all domestic ends;
What is this to us your friends?
Though your children by a nod
Stand in awe without a rod;
Though, by your obliging sway,
Servants love you, and obey;
Though you treat us with a smile;
Clear your looks, and smooth your style;
Load our plates from every dish;
This is not the thing we wish.
Colonel — may be your debtor;
We expect employment better.
You must learn, if you would gain us
With good sense to entertain us.

Scholars, when good sense describing,
Call it tasting and imbibing:
Metaphoric meat and drink
Is to understand and think:
We may carve for others thus;
And let others carve for us:
To discourse and to attend,
Is to help yourself and friend,
Conversation is but carving;
Carve for all, yourself is starving;
Give no more to every guest,
Than he's able to digest;
Give him always of the prime,
And but a little at a time.
Carve to all but just enough;
Let them neither starve nor stuff:
And, that you may have your due,
Let your neighbours carve for you.
This comparison will hold,
Could it well in rhyme be told
How conversing, listening, thinking,
Justly may resemble drinking;
For a friend a glass you fill,
What is this but to instill?

To conclude this long essay;
Pardon, if I disobey:
Nor, against my natural vein,
Treat you in heroic strain.
I, as all the parish knows,
Hardly can be grave in prose:
Still to lash, and lashing smile,
Ill befits a lofty style.
From the planet of my birth
I encounter vice with mirth.
Wicked ministers of state
I can easier scorn than hate:
And I find it answers right;
Scorn torments them more than spight.
All the vices of a court
Do but serve to make me sport.
Where I in some foreign realm,
Which all vices overwhelm;

Should a monkey wear a crown,
Must I tremble at his frown?
Could I not, through all his ermine?
Spy the strutting, chattering vermin?
Safely write a smart lampoon,
To expose the brisk baboon*?

When my Muse officious ventures
On the nation's representers:
Teaching by what golden rules
Into knaves they turn their fools:
How the helm is rul'd by Walpole,
At whose oars, like slaves, they all pull;
Let the vessel split on shelves;
With the freight enrich themselves:
Safe within my little wherry,
All their madness makes me merry:
Like the watermen of Thames,
I row by, and call them names;
Like the ever-laughing sage,
In a jest I spend my rage
(Though it must be understood,
I would hang them, if I could):
If I can but fill my nitch,
I attempt no higher pitch;
Leave to D'Anvers and his mate
Maxims wise to rule the state.
Pultney deep, accomplish'd St. Johns,
Scourge the villains with a vengeance:
Let me, though the smell be noisome,
Strip their bums; let † Caleb hoise 'em;
Then apply Alecta's whip,
Till they wriggle, howl, and skip.

Deuce is in you, Mr Dean:
What can all this passion mean?
Mention courts! you'll ne'er be quiet
On corruptions running riot.
End as it befits your station;
Come to use and application:
Nor with senates keep a fuss.
I submit; and answer thus:

If the machinations brewing,
To complete the public ruin,
Never once could have the power
To affect me half an hour;
Sooner would I write in buskins,
Mournful elegies on ‡ Blueskins.
If I laugh at Whig and Troy,
I conclude, a fortiori,
All your eloquence will scarce
Drive me from my favourite farce.
This I must insist on; for, as
It is well observ'd by § Horace,
Ridicule hath greater power
To reform the world, than frowns.
Horses thus, let jockies judge else,
Switches better guide than cudgels.

* This poem, for an obvious reason, has been mutilated in many editions.

† Caleb D'Anvers was the name assumed by Amburst, the ostensible writer of the Craftsman. This unfortunate man was neglected by his noble patrons, and died in want and obscurity.

‡ The famous thief, who, whilst on his trial at the Old Bailey, stabbed Jonathan Wild.

§ "Ridiculum acri, &c."

Bastings heavy, dry, obtuse,
Only dulness can produce;
While a little gentle jerking
Sets the spirits all a-working.

Thus, I find it by experiment,
Scolding moves you less than merriment.
I may storm and rage in vain;
It but stupifies your brain.
But with raillery to nettle,
Sets your thoughts upon their mettle;
Gives imagination scope;
Never lets the mind elope;
Drives out brangling and contention,
Brings in reason and invention.
For your sake as well as mine,
I the lofty style decline.

I should make a figure scurvy,
And your head turn topsy-turvy.

I, who love to have a fling
Both at senate-house and king;
That they might some better way tread,
To avoid the public hatred;
Thought no method more commodious,
Than to show their vices odious;
Which I chose to make appear,
Not by anger, but a sneer.
As my method of reforming
Is by laughing, not by storming
(For my friends have always thought Tenderness my greatest fault);
Would you have me change my style?
On your faults no longer smile;
But, to patch up all our quarrels,
Quote you texts from Plutarch's Morals;
Or from Solomon produce
Maxims teaching Wisdom's use?

If I treat you like a crown'd-head,
You have cheap enough compounded;
Can you put-in higher claims,
Than the owners of St. James?
You are not so great a grievance,
As the hirelings of St. Stephen's.
You are of a lower class
Than my friend Sir Robert Brags.
None of these have mercy found;
I have laugh'd, and lash'd them round.

Have you seen a rocket fly?
You would swear it pierc'd the sky:
It but reach'd the middle air,
Bursting into pieces there:
Thousand sparkles falling down
Light on many a coxcomb's crown:
See what mirth the sport creates;
Singes hair, but breaks no pates.
Thus, should I attempt to climb,
Treat you in a style sublime,
Such a rocket is my muse:
Should I lofty numbers choose,
Ere I reach'd Parnassus' top,
I should burst, and bursting drop;
All my fire would fall in scraps;
Give your head some gentle raps;
Only make it smart awhile:
Then could I forbear to smile,
When I found the tingling pain
Entering warm your frigid brain;
Make you able upon fight
To decide of wrong and right;

THE WORKS OF SWIFT.

Talk with sense whate'er you please on;
Learn to relish truth and reason?
Thus we both shall gain our prize:
I to laugh, and you grow wise.

A YOUNG LADY'S COMPLAINT,

For the Stay of the DEAN in ENGLAND. 1726.

BLOW, ye Zephyrs, gentle gales;
Gently fill the swelling sails,
Neptune, with thy trident long,
Trident three-fork'd, trident strong;
And ye Nereids fair and gay,
Fairer than the rose in May,
Nereids living in deep caves,
Gently wash'd with gentle waves;
Nereids, Neptune, lull asleep
Ruffling storms, and ruffled deep;
All around, in pompous state,
On this richer Argo wait:
Argo, bring my Golden Fleece;
Argo, bring him to his Greece.
Will Cadenus longer stay?
Come, Cadenus, come away;
Come with all the haste of love,
Come unto thy turtle-dove.
The ripen'd cherry on the tree
Hangs, and only hangs for thee;
Lucious peaches, mellow pears,
Ceres with her yellow ears,
And the grape, both red and white,
Grape inspiring just delight;
All are ripe, and courting sue
To be pluck'd and press'd by you.
Pinks have lost their blooming red,
Mourning hang their drooping head;
Every flower languid seems,
Wants the colour of thy beams,
Beams of wondrous force and power,
Beams reviving every flower.
Come, Cadenus, blest once more,
Blest again thy native shore;
Blest again this drooping isle,
Make its weeping beauties smile,
Beauties that thine absence mourn,
Beauties wishing thy return.
Come, Cadenus, come with haste,
Come before the winter's blast;
Swifter than the lightning fly;
Or I, like Vanessa, die.

A LETTER TO THE DEAN,

WHEN IN ENGLAND. 1726.

You will excuse me, I suppose,
For sending rhyme instead of prose,
Because hot weather makes me lazy,
To write in metre is more easy.
While you are trudging London town,
I'm strolling Dublin up and down;
While you converse with lords and dukes,
I have their betters here, my books:
Fix'd in an elbow-chair at ease,
I choose companions as I please.
I'd rather have one single shelf
Than all my friends, except yourself;
For, after all that can be said,
Our best acquaintance are the dead;

While you're in raptures with Faustina*;
I'm charm'd at home with our Sheelina.
While you are starving there in state,
I'm cramming here with butchers meat.
You say, when with those lords you dine,
They treat you with the best of wine,
Burgundy, Cyprus, and Tokay;
Why so can we, as well as they.
No reason then, my dear good Dean,
But you should travel home again.
What though you may n't in Ireland hope
To find such folk as Gay and Pope;
If you with rhymers here would share
But half the wit that you can spare,
I'd lay twelve eggs, that, in twelve days,
You'd make a dozen of Popes and Gays.

Our weather's good, our sky is clear;
We've every joy, if you were here;
So lofty and so bright a sky
Was never seen by Ireland's eye!
I think it fit to let you know,
This week I shall to Quilca go;
To see M'Fayden's horny brothers
First suck, and after bull their mothers;
To see, alas! my wither'd trees!
To see what all the country sees!
My stunted quicks, my famish'd beeves,
My servants such a pack of thieves;
My shatter'd firs, my blasted oaks,
My house in common to all folks;
No cabbage for a single snail,
My turnips, carrots, parsnips, fail;
My no green peas, my few green sprouts;
My mother always in the pouts;
My horses rid, or gone astray;
My fish all stol'n, or run away;
My mutton lean, my pullets old,
My poultry starv'd, the corn all sold.

A man, come now from Quilca, says,
"They've† stol'n the locks from all your keys:"
But, what must fret and vex me more,
He says, "They stole the keys before."
"They've stol'n the knives from all the forks;
"And half the cows from half the sturks."
Nay more, the fellow swears and vows,
"They've stol'n the sturks from half the cows:"
With many more accounts of woe.
Yet, though the devil be there, I'll go:
'Twixt you and me, the reason's clear,
Because I've more vexation here.

PALINODIA.

HORACE, BOOK I. ODE XVI.

GREAT Sir, than Phœbus more divine,
Whose verses far his rays out-shine,
Look down upon your quondam foe;
Oh! let me never write again,
If e'er I disoblige you, Dean,
Should you compassion show.
Take those Iambics which I wrote,
When anger made me piping hot,

* Signora Faustina, a famous Italian singer.

† They is the grand thief of the county of Cavan; for whatever is stolen, if you inquire of a servant about it, the answer is, "They have stolen it."

And give them to your cook,
To finge your fowl, or save your paste,
The next time when you have a feast;
They'll save you many a book.
To burn them, you are not content;
I give you then my free consent,
To sink them in the harbour:
If not, they'll serve to set off blocks,
To roll on pipes, and twist in locks;
So give them to your barber.
Or, when you next your phyfic take,
I must entreat you then to make
A proper application;
'Tis what I've done myself before,
With Dan's fine thoughts, and many more,
Who gave me provocation.
What cannot mighty anger do?
It makes the weak the strong pursue,
A goose attack a swan;
It makes a woman, tooth and nail,
Her husband's hands and face assail,
While he's no longer man.
Though some, we find, are more discreet,
Before the world are wondrous sweet,
And let their husbands hector:
But, when the world's asleep, they wake,
That is the time they choose to speak;
Witness the curtain-lecture.
Such was the case with you, I find:
All day you could conceal your mind;
But when St. Patrick's chimes
Awak'd your muse (my midnight curse,
When I engag'd for better for worse),
You scolded with your rhymes.
Have done! have done! I quit the field;
To you, as to my wife, I yield:
As she must wear the breeches;
So shall you wear the laurel-crown,
Win it, and wear it, 'tis your own;
The poet's only riches.

BEC'S BIRTH-DAY.

NOVEMBER 8. 1726.

THIS day, dear Bec, is thy nativity;
Had Fate a luckier one, she'd give it ye:
She chose a thread of greatest length,
And doubly twisted it for strength;
Nor will be able with her shears
To cut it off these forty years.
Then who says care will kill a cat?
Rebecca shows they're out in that.
For she, though over-run with care,
Continues healthy, fat, and fair.
As, if the gout should sieze the head,
Doctors pronounce the patient dead;
But, if they can, by all their arts,
Eject it to th' extremest parts,
They give the sick man joy, and praise
The gout, that will prolong his days;
Rebecca thus I gladly greet,
Who drives her cares to hands and feet:
For, though philosophers maintain
The limbs are guided by the brain,
Quite contrary Rebecca's led,
Her hands and feet conduct her head,

By arbitrary power convey her;
She ne'er considers why, or where:
Her hands may meddle, feet may wander,
Her head is but a mere by-stander;
And all her bustling but supplies
The part of wholesome exercise.
Thus nature hath resolv'd to pay her
The cat's nine lives, and eke the care.
Long may she live, and help her friends
Whene'er it suits her private ends;
Domestic business never mind
Till coffee has her stomach lin'd;
But, when her breakfast gives her courage,
Then think on Stella's chicken-porridge;
I mean when Tiger * has been serv'd,
Or else poor Stella may be starv'd.

May Bec have many an evening nap,
With Tiger slabbering in her lap;
But always take a special care
She does not overset the chair!
Still be she curious, never hearken
To any speech but Tiger's barking!
And when she's in another scene,
Stella long dead, but first the Dean,
May fortune and her coffee get her
Companions that may please her better!
Whole afternoons will sit beside her,
Nor for neglects or blunders chide her,
A goodly set as can be found
Of hearty gossips prating round;
Fresh from a wedding or a christening,
To teach her ears the art of listening.
And please her more to hear them tattle,
Than the Dean storm, or Stella rattle.
Late be her death, one gentle nod,
When Hermes waiting with his rod,
Shall to Elysian fields invite her,
Where there shall be no cares to fright her!

ON THE COLLAR OF TIGER,

MRS. DINGLEY'S LAP-DOG.

PRAY steal me not; I'm Mrs. Dingley's,
Whose heart in this four-footed thing lies,

EPIGRAMS ON WINDOWS.

Most of them written in 1726.

I. ON A WINDOW AT AN INN.

WE fly from luxury and wealth,
To hardships, in pursuit of health;
From generous wines and costly fare,
And dosing in an easy chair;
Pursue the Goddess Health in vain,
To find her in a country scene,
And every where her footsteps trace,
And see her marks in every face;
And still her favourites we meet,
Crowding the roads with naked feet.
But, oh! so faintly we pursue,
We ne'er can have her in full view.

* Mrs. Dingley's favourite lap-dog.

II. AT AN INN IN ENGLAND.

THE glass, by lovers nonsense blurr'd,
Dims and obscures our sight:
So when our passions Love hath stirr'd,
It darkens Reason's light.

III. ANOTHER.

THE church and clergy here no doubt,
Are very near a-kin;
Both weather-beaten are without,
And empty both within.

IV. AT CHESTER.

My landlord is civil,
But dear as the d---l:
Your pockets grow empty,
With nothing to tempt ye:
The wine is so sour,
I'll give you a scour;
The beer and the ale,
Are mingled with stale;
The veal is such carrion,
A dog would be weary on.
All this I've felt,
For I live on a smelt.

V. ANOTHER, IN CHESTER.

THE walls of this town
Are full of renown,
And strangers delight to walk round 'em:
But as for the dwellers,
Both buyers and sellers,
For me, you may hang 'em, or drown 'em.

VI. ANOTHER, AT HOLYHEAD*.

O NEPTUNE! Neptune! must I still
Be here detain'd against my will?
Is this your justice when I'm come
Above two hundred miles from home?
O'er mountains steep, o'er dusty plains,
Half chok'd with dust, half drown'd with rains;
Only your godship to implore,
To let me kiss your other shore?
A boon so small! but I may weep,
While you're, like Baal, fast asleep.

VII. ANOTHER, written upon a window where there was no writing before.

THANKS to my stars, I once can see
A window here from scribbling free;
Here no conceited coxcombs pass,
To scratch their paltry drabs on glass;
Nor party-fool is calling names,
Or dealing crowns to George and James.

VIII. On seeing verses written upon windows at inns.

THE sage who said he should be proud
Of windows in his breast,
Because he ne'er a thought allow'd
That might not be confest;

* These verses are signed J—K—, but written as it is presumed, in Dr. Swift's hand.

His window scrawl'd by every rake,
His breast again would cover;
And fairly bid the devil take
The diamond and the lover.

IX. ANOTHER.

By Satan taught, all conjurers know
Your mistress in a glass to show,
And you can do as much:
In this the devil and you agree:
None e'er made verses worse than he,
And thine I swear are such.

X. ANOTHER.

THAT love is the devil, I'll prove when requir'd
Those rhymers abundantly show it:
They swear that they all by love are inspir'd,
And the devil's a damnable poet.

TO JANUS, ON THE NEW-YEAR'S-DAY

Two-fac'd Janus, god of Time!
Be my Phœbus while I rhyme;
To oblige your crony Swift,
Bring our dame a new-year's-gift:
She has got but half a face:
Janus, since thou hast a brace,
To my lady once be kind;
Give her half thy face behind.

God of Time, if you be wise,
Look not with your future eyes;
What imports thy forward sight
Well, if you could lose it quite.
Can you take delight in viewing
This poor * isle's approaching ruin,
When thy retrospection vast
Sees the glorious ages past?
Happy nation, were we blind,
Or had only eyes behind!

Drown your morals, madam cries,
I'll have none but forward eyes;
Prudes decay'd about may tack,
Strain their necks with looking back.
Give me Time when coming on:
Who regards him when he's gone?
By the Dean though gravely told,
New-years help to make me old;
Yet I find a new-year's lace
Burnishes an old year's face:
Give me velvet and quadrille.
I'll have youth and beauty still.

A PASTORAL DIALOGUE.

WRITTEN AFTER THE NEWS OF THE † KING'S DEATH.

RICHMOND-LODGE is a house with a small park belonging to the crown. It was usually granted by the Crown for a lease of two years. The Duke of Ormond was the last who had it.
After his exile, it was given to the Prince of

* Ireland.

† George I. who died after a short sickness by eating a melon, at Osnaburg, in his way to Hanover, June 11. 1727.---The poem was carried to court, and read to King George II. and Queen Caroline.

of Wales by the King. The Prince and Princess usually passed their summer there. It is within a mile of Richmond.

MARBLE-HILL is a house built by Mrs. Howard, then of the bed-chamber, now Countess of Suffolk, and groom of the stole to the Queen. It is on the Middlesex side, near Twickenham, where Mr. Pope lived, and about two miles from Richmond-lodge. Mr. Pope was the contriver of the gardens, Lord Herbert the architect, the Dean of St. Patrick's chief butler and keeper of the Ice-house. Upon King George's death, these two houses met, and had the following Dialogue.

In spite of Pope, in spite of Gay,
And all that he or they can say,
Sing on I must, and sing I will
Of Richmond-lodge and Marble-hill.

Last Friday night, as neighbours use,
This couple met to talk of news:
For by old proverbs it appears,
That walls have tongues, and hedges ears.

MARBLE-HILL.

Quoth Marble-hill, right well I ween,
Your mistress now is grown a queen:
You'll find it soon by woeful proof;
She'll come no more beneath your roof.

RICHMOND-LODGE.

The kingly prophet well evinces,
That we should put no trust in princes:
My royal master promis'd me
To raise me to a high degree;
But he's now grown a king, God wot,
I fear I shall be soon forgot.
You see, when folks have got their ends,
How quickly they neglect their friends;
Yet I may say, 'twixt me and you,
Pray God, they now may find as true!

MARBLE-HILL.

My house was built but for a show,
My lady's empty pockets know;
And now she will not have a shilling,
To raise the stairs, or build the ceiling;
For all the courtly madams round
Now pay four shillings in the pound:
'Tis come to what I always thought:
My dame is hardly worth a groat.
Had you and I been courtiers born,
We should not thus have lain forlorn:
For those we dextrous courtiers call,
Can rise upon their master's fall;
But we, unlucky and unwise,
Must fall because our masters rise.

RICHMOND-LODGE.

My master, scarce a fortnight since,
Was grown as wealthy as a prince;
But now it will be no such thing,
For he'll be poor as any king;
And by his crown will nothing get,
But like a king to run in debt.

MARBLE-HILL.

No more the Dean, that grave divine,
Shall keep the key of my no--wine;
My ice-house rob, as heretofore,
And steal my artichokes no more;

Poor Patty Blount no more be seen
Bedraggled in my walks so green:
Plump Johnny Gay will now elope;
And here no more will dangle Pope.

RICHMOND-LODGE.

Here won't the Dean, when he's to seek,
To sponge a breakfast once a week;
To cry the bread was stale, and mutter
Complaints against the royal butter.
But now I fear it will be said,
No butter sticks upon his bread.
We soon shall find him full of spleen,
For want of tattling to the queen;
Stunning her royal ears with talking;
His reverence and her highness walking:
Whilst lady Charlotte*, like a stroller,
Sits mounted on the garden-roller,
A goodly sight to see her ride
With ancient Mirmont† at her side.
In velvet cap his head lies warm;
His hat for show beneath his arm.

MARBLE-HILL.

Some South Sea broker from the city
Will purchase me, the more's the pity;
Lay all my fine plantations waste,
To fit them to his vulgar taste:
Chang'd for the worse in every part,
My master Pope will break his heart.

RICHMOND-LODGE.

In my own Thames may I be drowned,
If e'er I stoop beneath a crown'd head:
Except her majesty prevails
To place me with the prince of Wales;
And then shall I be free from fears,
For he'll be prince these fifty years.
I then will turn a courtier too,
And serve the times, as others do.
Plain loyalty, not built on hope,
I leave to your contriver, Pope:
None loves his king and country better,
Yet none was ever less their debtor.

MARBLE-HILL.

Then let him come and take a nap
In summer on my verdant lap;
Prefer our villas, where the Thames is,
To Kensington, or hot St. James's:
Nor shall I dull in silence sit;
For 'tis to me he owes his wit;
My groves, my echoes, and my birds,
Have taught him his poetic words.
We gardens, and you wildernesses,
Assist all poets in distresses.
Him twice a week I here expect,
To rattle Moody‡ for neglect;
An idle rogue, who spends his quartridge
In tippling at the Dog and Partridge;
And I can hardly get him down
Three times a week to brush my gown.

RICHMOND-LODGE.

I pity you, dear Marble-hill;
But hope to see you flourish still.
All happiness---and so adieu.

* Lady Charlotte de Rouffy, a French lady.

† Marquis de Mirmont, a French man of quality.

‡ The gardener.

MARBLE-HILL.

Kind Richmond-lodge, the same to you.

DESIRE AND POSSESSION. 1727.

'Tis strange, what different thoughts inspire
In men, Possession and Desire;
Think what they wish so great a blessing;
So disappointed when possessing!

A moralist profoundly sage
(I know not in what book or page,
Or whether o'er a pot of ale)
Related thus the following tale.

Possession, and Desire his brother,
But still at variance with each other,
Were seen contending in a race;
And kept at first an equal pace:
'Tis said their course continued long;
For this was active, that was strong:
Till Envy, Slander, Sloth, and Doubt,
Misted them many a league about.
Seduc'd by some deceiving light,
They take the wrong way for the right;
Through slippery by-roads dark and deep,
They often climb, and often creep.

Desire, the swifter of the two,
Along the plain like lightning flew;
Till, entering on a broad highway,
Where power and titles scatter'd lay,
He strove to pick up all he found,
And by excursions lost his ground:
No sooner got, than with disdain
He threw them on the ground again;
And hasted forward to pursue
Fresh objects fairer to his view,
In hope to spring some nobler game;
But all he took was just the same:
Too scornful now to stop his pace,
He spurn'd them in his rival's face.

Possession kept the beaten road,
And gather'd all his brother strow'd;
But overcharg'd, and out of wind,
Though strong in limbs, he lagg'd behind.

Desire had now the goal in sight:
It was a tower of monstrous height,
Where on the summit Fortune stands,
A crown and sceptre in her hands;
Beneath, a chasm as deep as hell,
Where many a bold adventurer fell.
Desire in raptur^e gaz'd a while,
And saw the treacherous goddess smile;
But, as he climb'd to grasp the crown,
She knock'd him with the sceptre down.
He tumbled in the gulph profound,
There doom'd to whirl an endless round.

Possession's load was grown so great,
He sunk beneath the cumberous weight:
And, as he now expiring lay,
Flocks every ominous bird of prey;
The raven, vulture, owl, and kite,
At once upon his carcase light,
And strip his hide, and pick his bones,
Regardless of his dying groans.

ON CENSURE. 1727.

Ye wise, instruct me to endure
An evil which admits no cure;

Or how this evil can be borne,
Which breeds at once both hate and scorn.
Bare innocence is no support,
When you are try'd in Scandal's court.
Stand high in honour, wealth, or wit:
All others who inferior sit,
Conceive themselves in conscience bound
To join, and drag you to the ground.
Your altitude offends the eyes
Of those who want the power to rise.
The world, a willing stander-by,
Inclines to aid a specious lye;
Alas! they would not do you wrong;
But all appearances are strong!

Yet whence proceeds this weight we lay
On what detracting people say?
For let mankind discharge their tongues
In venom, till they burst their lungs,
Their utmost malice cannot make
Your head, or tooth, or finger ake;
Nor spoil your shape, distort your face,
Or put one feature out of place;
Nor will you find your fortune sink
By what they speak or what they think;
Nor can ten hundred thousand lies
Make you less virtuous, learn'd, or wise.

The most effectual way to baulk
Their malice, is---to let them talk.

THE FURNITURE OF A WOMAN'S MIND.

1727.

A SET of phrases learnt by rote;
A passion for a scarlet coat?
When at a play, to laugh, or cry,
Yet cannot tell the reason why;
Never to hold her tongue a minute
While all she prates has nothing in it;
Whole hours can with a coxcomb sit,
And take his nonsense all for it;
Her learning mounts to read a song,
But half the words pronouncing wrong;
Hath every repartee in store
She spoke ten thousand times before;
Can ready compliments supply
On all occasions, cut and dry;
Such hatred to a parson's gown,
The sight will put her in a swoon;
For conversation well endued,
She calls it witty to be rude;
And, placing raillery in railing,
Will tell aloud your greatest failing;
Nor make a scruple to expose
Your bandy leg, or crooked nose;
Can at her morning tea run o'er
The scandal of the day before;
Improving hourly in her skill
To cheat and wrangle at quadrille.

In choosing lace, a critic nice,
Knows to a groat the lowest price;
Can in her female clubs dispute,
What linen best the silk will suit,
What colours each complexion match,
And where with art to place a patch.

If chance a mouse creeps in her sight,
Can finely counterfeit a fright;

So sweetly screams, if it comes near her,
 She ravishes all hearts to hear her.
 Can dextrously her husband tease,
 By taking fits whene'er she please;
 By frequent practice learns the trick
 At proper seasons to be sick;
 Thinks nothing gives one airs so pretty,
 At once creating love and pity.
 If Molly happens to be careless,
 And but neglects to warm her hair lace,
 She gets a cold as sure as death,
 And vows she scarce can fetch her breath;
 Admires how modest women can
 Be so robustious, like a man.

In party, furious to her power;
 A bitter Whig, or Tory four;
 Her arguments directly tend
 Against the side she would defend;
 Will prove herself a Tory plain,
 From principles the Whigs maintains;
 And to defend the Whiggish cause,
 Her topics from the Tories draws.

O yes! if any man can find
 More virtues in a woman's mind,
 Let them be sent to Mrs Harding*;
 She'll pay the charges to a farthing;
 Take notice, she has my commission
 To add them in the next edition;
 They may out-sell a better thing:
 So, halloo, boys; God save the king!

CLEVER TOM CLINCH GOING TO BE HANGED. 1727.

As clever Tom Clinch, while the rabble was bawling, [calling,
 Rode stately through Holbourn to die in his
 He stopt at the George for a bottle of sack,
 And promis'd to pay for it when he came back.
 His waistcoat, and stockings, and breeches, were white;

His cap had a new cherry riband to tie't.
 The maids to the doors and the balconies ran,
 And said, "Lack-a-day! he's a proper young man!"

But, as from the windows the ladies he spy'd,
 Like a beau in the box, he bow'd low on each side; [cry,
 And when his last speech the loud hawkers did
 He swore from his cart, "It was all a damn'd
 "lie!"

The hangman for pardon fell down on his knee;
 Tom gave him a kick in the guts for his fee:
 Then said, I must speak to the people a little;
 But I'll see you all damn'd before I will whittle†.
 My honest friend Wild‡ may he long hold his place,
 He lengthen'd my life with a whole year of grace.
 Take courage, dear comrades, and be not afraid,
 Nor slip this occasion to follow your trade;

* Widow of John Harding, the Drapier's printer.

† A cant word for confessing at the gallows.

‡ The noted thief-catcher, under-keeper of Newgate, who was hanged for receiving stolen goods.

My conscience is clear, and my spirits are calm,
 And thus I go off without prayer-book or psalm;
 Then follow the practice of clever Tom Clinch,
 Who hung like a hero, and never would flinch.

DR. SWIFT TO MR. POPE,

WHILE HE WAS WRITING THE DUNCIAD.

POPE has the talent well to speak,
 But not to reach the ear;
 His loudest voice is low and weak,
 The Dean too deaf to hear.

Awhile they on each other look,
 Then different studies choose:
 The Dean sits plodding on a book;
 Pope walks, and courts the muse.

Now backs of letters*, though design'd
 For those who more will need 'em,
 Are fill'd with hints, and interlin'd,
 Himself can hardly read 'em.

Each atom by some other struck
 All turns and motions tries:
 Till, in a lump together stuck,
 Behold a Poem rise!

Yet to the Dean his share allot;
 He claims it by a canon;
That without which a thing is not,
Is, causa sine qua non.

Thus Pope, in vain you boast your wit;
 For, had our deaf Divine
 Been for your conversation fit,
 You had not writ a line.

Of Sherlock† thus, for preaching fam'd,
 The Sexton reason'd well;
 And justly half the merit claim'd,
 Because he rang the bell.

A LOVE POEM FROM A PHYSICIAN TO HIS MISTRESS.

WRITTEN AT LONDON IN THE YEAR 1727.

By poets we are well assur'd
 That love, alas! can ne'er be cur'd:
 A complicated heap of ills,
 Despising boluses and pills.
 Ah! Chloe, this I find is true,
 Since first I gave my heart to you.
 Now, by your cruelty hard bound,
 I strain my guts, my colon wound.
 Now jealousy my grumbling tripes
 Assaults with grating, grinding gripes.
 When pity in those eyes I view,
 My bowels wambling make me spew.
 When I an amorous kiss design'd,
 I belch'd a hurricane of wind.
 Once you a gentle sigh let fall;
 Remember how I suck'd it all:
 What colic pangs from thence I felt,
 Had you but known, your heart would melt,

* An allusion to the singularity mentioned in Advice to the Grub-street Verse Writers, 1726.

† The Dean of St. Paul's, father to the bishop.

Like ruffling winds in caverns pent,
Till Nature pointed out a vent.
How have you torn my heart to pieces
With maggots, humours, and caprices!
By which I got the hæmorrhoids;
And loathsome worms my anus voids.
Whene'er I hear a rival nam'd,
I feel my body all inflam'd;
Which, breaking out in boils and blanes,
With yellow filth my linen stains;
Or, parch'd with unextinguish'd thirst,
Small beer I guzzle till I burst:
And then I drag a bloated corpus,
Swell'd with a dropfy, like a porpoise;
When, if I cannot purge or stale,
I must be tapp'd to fill a pail.

DEAN SWIFT AT SIR ARTHUR ACHESON'S

IN THE NORTH OF IRELAND.

THE Dean would visit Market-hill;
Our invitation was but slight:
I said---Why let him, if he will;
And so I bade Sir Arthur write.
His manners would not let him wait,
Left we should think ourselves neglected;
And so we saw him at our gate
Three days before he was expected.
After a week, a month, a quarter,
And day succeeding after day,
Says not a word of his departure,
Though not a soul would have him stay.
I've said enough to make him blush,
Methinks, or else the devil's in't;
But he cares not for it a rush,
Nor for my life will take the hint.
But you, my dear, may let him know,
In civil language, if he stays,
How deep and foul the roads may grow,
And that he may command the chaise.
Or you may say---My wife intends,
Though I should be exceeding proud,
This winter to invite some friends;
And, Sir, I know, you hate a crowd.
Or, Mr. Dean---I should with joy
Beg you would here continue still;
But we must go to Aghnacloy*,
Or Mr. Moore will take it ill.
The house accounts are daily rising;
So much his stay doth swell the bills;
My dearest life, it is surprising
How much he eats, how much he swills.
His brace of puppies how they stuff!
And they must have three meals a day,
Yet never think they get enough;
His horses too eat all our hay.
Oh! if I could, how I would maul
His tallow face, and wainscot-paws,
His beetle-brows, and eyes of wall,
And make him soon give up the cause!

* The seat of Acheson Moore, Esq.

Must I be every moment chid
With * Skinny bonia, Snipe, and Lean?
Oh! that I could but once be rid
Of this insulting Tyrant Dean!

ON A VERY OLD GLASS AT MARKET-HILL.

FRAIL glass! thou bear'st that name as well as I;
Though none can tell, which of us first shall die.

ANSWERED EXTEMPORE BY DR. SWIFT.

ME only chance can kill; thou, frailer creature,
May'st die, like me, by chance; but must by nature.

ON CUTTING DOWN THE OLD THORN
AT MARKET-HILL †.

AT Market-Hill, as well appears,
By chronicle of ancient date,
There stood for many hundred years
A spacious thorn before the gate.
Hither came every village maid,
And on the boughs her garland hung;
And here, beneath the spreading shade,
Secure from satyrs sat and sung.
Sir Archibald‡, that valorous knight,
The lord of all the fruitful plain,
Would come and listen with delight;
For he was fond of rural strain.
(Sir Archibald, whose favourite name
Shall stand for ages on record,
By Scottish bards of highest fame,
Wife Hawthorden and Stirling's lord §.)
But time with iron teeth, I ween,
Has canker'd all its branches round;
No fruit or blossom to be seen,
Its head reclining towards the ground.
This aged, sickly, sapless thorn,
Which must, alas! no longer stand,
Behold the cruel Dean in scorn
Cuts down with sacrilegious hand.
Dame Nature, when she saw the blow,
Astonish'd, gave a dreadful shriek;
And mother Tellus trembled so,
She scarce recover'd in a week.

* The Dean used to call Lady Acheson by those names.

† A village near the seat of Sir Arthur Acheson, where the Dean sometimes made a long visit. The tree, which was a remarkable one, was much admired by the knight. Yet the Dean, in one of his unaccountable humours, gave directions for cutting it down in the absence of Sir Arthur, who was of course highly incensed, nor would see Swift for some time after. By way of making his peace, the Dean wrote this poem; which had the desired effect.

‡ Sir Archibald Acheson, secretary of state for Scotland.

§ Drummond of Hawthornden, and Sir William Alexander Earl of Stirling, who were both friends to Sir Archibald, and famous for their poetry.

The sylvan powers, with fear perplex'd,
In prudence and compassion, sent
(For none could tell whose turn was next)
Sad omens of the dire event.

The magpie, lighting on the stock,
Stood chattering with incessant din;
And with her beak gave many a knock,
To rouse and warn the nymph within.

The owl foresaw, in pensive mood,
The ruin of her ancient seat;
And fled in haste, with all her brood,
To seek a more secure retreat.

Last trolled forth the gentle swine,
To ease her itch against the stump,
And dismally was heard to whine,
All as she scrubb'd her measly rump.

The nymph who dwells in every tree,
(If all be true that poets chant)
Condemn'd by Fate's supreme decree,
Must die with her expiring plant.

Thus, when the gentle Spina found
The thorn committed to her care
Receiv'd its last and deadly wound,
She fled, and vanish'd into air.

But from the root a dismal groan
First issuing struck the murderer's ears;
And, in a shrill revengeful tone,
This prophecy he trembling hears:

"Thou chief contriver of my fall,
"Relentless Dean, to mischief born;
"My kindred oft' thine hide shall gall,
"Thy gown and cassock oft' be torn.

"And thy confederate dame, who brags
"That she condemn'd me to the fire,
"Shall rend her petticoats to rags,
"And wound her legs with every brier.

"Nor thou, lord Arthur*, shalt escape;
"To thee I often call'd in vain,
"Against that assassin in crape;
"Yet thou couldst tamely see me slain.

"Nor, when I felt the dreadful blow,
"Or chid the Dean, or pinch'd thy spouse;
"Since you could see me treated so
"(An old retainer to your house):

"May that fell Dean, by whose command
"Was form'd this Machiavilian plot,
"Not leave a thistle on thy land;
"Then who will own thee for a Scot?

"Pigs and fanatics, cows, and teagues,
"Through all thy empire I foresee,
"To tear thy hedges, join in leagues,
"Sworn to revenge my thorn and me.

"And now, the wretch ordain'd by fate,
"Neal Gahagan, Hibernian clown,
"With hatchet blunter than thy pate,
"To hack my hallow'd timber down;

"When thou, suspended high in air,
"Dy'st on a more ignoble tree
"(For thou shalt steal thy landlord's mare),
"Then, bloody caitif! think on me.

* Sir Arthur Acheson.
VOL. IX.

CANTATA*.

In harmony would you excel,
Suit your words to your music well;
For Pegasus runs every race
By galloping high, or level pace,
Or ambling, or sweet Canterbury,
Or with a down, a high down derry.
No victory he ever got
By joggling, joggling, joggling trot;
No Muse harmonious entertains
Rough, roistering, rustic, roaring strains.
Nor shall you twine the crackling bays
By sneaking, sniveling roundelays.
Now slowly move your fiddle-stick;
Now, tantan, tantantivi, quick;
Now trembling, shivering, quivering, quaking,
Set hoping hearts of lovers aching.
Fly, fly, above the sky,
Rambling, gambling, trolloping, lolloping, galloping.
Now sweep, sweep the deep.
See Celia, Celia dies,
While true lovers' eyes
Weeping sleep, Sleeping weep,
Weeping sleep, Bo peep, bo peep.

E P I T A P H

AT BERKELEY, GLOUCESTERSHIRE,

HERE lies the Earl of Suffolk's fool,
Men call'd him Dicky Pearce;
His folly serv'd to make folks laugh,
When wit and mirth were scarce.
Poor Dick, alas! is dead and gone,
What signifies to cry?
Dickys enough are still behind,
To laugh at by and by.

Buried June 18, 1728, aged 63.

MY LADY'S † LAMENTATION AND COM-PLAINT AGAINST THE DEAN.

July 28. 1728.

SURE never man did see
A wretch like poor Nancy,

* This Cantata is printed with the music in all the London editions of Swift. Dr. Beattie, after censuring the practice of what he calls "illicit imitation," observes, that "this abuse of a noble art did not escape the satire of Swift; who, though deaf to the charms of music, was not blind to the absurdity of musicians. He recommended it to Dr. Echlin, an ingenious gentleman of Ireland, to compose a Cantata in ridicule of this puerile mimicry. Here we have motions imitated, which are the most inharmonious, and sounds the most unmusical.—In a word, Swift's Cantata may convince any person, that music, if only imitative, would be ridiculous."

† Lady Acheson.

So teas'd day and night
By a Dean and a Knight.
To punish my sins,
Sir Arthur begins,
And gives me a wipe
With Skinny and Snipe;
His malice is plain,
Hallooing the Dean.
The Dean never stops
When he opens his chops;
I'm quite over-run
With rebus and pun.

Before he came here
To sponge for good cheer,
I sate with delight
From morning till night,
With two bony thumbs
Could rub my old gums,
Or scratching my nose,
And jogging my toes;
But at present, forsooth,
I must not rub a tooth.
When my elbows he sees
Held up by my knees,
My arms, like two props,
Supporting my chops,
And just as I handle 'em
Moving all like a pendulum;
He trips up my props,
And down my chin drops,
From my head to my heels,
Like a clock without wheels;
I sink in the spleen,
An useless machine.

If he had his will,
I should never sit still:
He comes with his whims,
I must move my limbs;
I cannot be sweet
Without using my feet;
To lengthen my breath,
He tires me to death.
By the worst of all squires,
Through bogs and through briers,
Where a cow would be startled,
I'm in spite of my heart led;
And, say what I will,
Haul'd up every hill;
Till, daggled and tatter'd,
My spirits quite shatter'd,
I return home at night,
And fast, out of spite:
For I'd rather be dead,
Than it e'er should be said,
I was better for him
In stomach or limb.

But now to my diet;
No eating in quiet,
He's still finding fault,
Too four or too salt:
The wing of a chick
I hardly can pick;
But trash without measure
I swallow with pleasure.

Next for his diversion
He rails at my person:
What court-breeding is this!
He takes me to pieces;

From shoulder to flank
I'm lean and am lank;
My nose, long and thin,
Grows down to my chin;
My chin will not stay,
But meets it half way;
My fingers, prolix,
Are ten crooked sticks:
He swears my el---bows
Are two iron crows,
Or sharp-pointed rocks,
And wear out my smocks:
To 'scape them, Sir Arthur
Is forc'd to lie farther,
Or his sides they would gore
Like the tusk of a boar.

Now, changing the scene,
But still to the Dean:
He loves to be bitter at
A lady illiterate;
If he sees her but once,
He'll swear she's a dunce;
Can tell by her looks
A hater of books;
Through each line of her face
Her folly can trace;
Which spoils every feature
Bestow'd her by nature;
But sense gives a grace
To the homeliest face:
Wife books and reflection
Will mend the complexion;
(A civil Divine!
I suppose, meaning mine)!
No lady who wants them
Can ever be handsome.

I guess well enough
What he means by this stuff;
He haws and he hums,
At last out it comes:
What, Madam! No walking,
No reading, nor talking?
You're now in your prime,
Make use of your time.

Consider, before
You come to threescore,
How the huffies will flee
Where'er you appear:
"That silly old pufs
Would fain be like us.
What a figure she made
In her tarnish'd brocade!"

And then he grows mild;
Come, be a good child:
If you are inclin'd
To polish your mind,
Be ador'd by the men
Till threescore and ten,
And kill with the spleen
The jades of sixteen;
I'll show you the way:
Read six hours a day.
The wits will frequent ye,
And think you but twenty.

Thus was I drawn in;
Forgive me my sin.
At breakfast he'll ask
An account of my talk.

Put a word out of joint,
Or miss but a point,
He rages and frets,
His manners forgets;
And, as I am serious,
Is very imperious.
No book for delight
Must come in my sight;
But, instead of new plays,
Dull Bacon's Essays,
And pore every day on
That nasty Pantheon.
If I be not a drudge,
Let all the world judge,
'Twere better be blind,
Than thus be confin'd.

But, while in an ill tone,
I murder poor Milton,
The Dean, you will swear,
Is at study or prayer.
He's all the day sauntering,
With labourers bantering,
Among his colleagues,
A parcel of Teagues,
(Whom he brings in among us,
And bribes with mundungus).
Hail fellow, well met,
All dirty and wet:
Find out, if you can,
Who's master, who's man;
Who makes the best figure,
The Dean or the digger;
And which is the best
At cracking a jest.
How proudly he talks
Of zigzags and walks;
And all the day raves
Of cradles and caves;
And boasts of his feats,
His grottos and seats;
Shows all his gew-gaws,
And gapes for applause;
A fine occupation
For one in his station!
A hole where a rabbit
Would scorn to inhabit,
Dug out in an hour;
He calls it a bower.

But, oh! how we laugh
To see a wild calf
Come, driven by heat,
And foul the green seat;
Or run helter-skelter
To his arbor, for shelter,
Where all goes to ruin
The Dean has been doing:
The girls of the village
Come flocking for pillage,
Pull down the fine briars
And thorns, to make fires;
But yet are so kind
To leave something behind:
No more need be said on 't,
I smell when I tread on 't.

Dear friend, doctor Jenny,
If I could but win ye,
Or Walmsley or Whaley,
To come hither daily,

Since Fortune, my foe,
Will needs have it so,
That I 'm, by her frowns,
Condemn'd to black gowns;
No squire to be found
The neighbourhood round
(For, under the rose,
I would rather choose those);
If your wives will permit ye,
Come here, out of pity,
To ease a poor lady,
And beg her a play-day.
So may you be seen
No more in the spleen!
May Walmsley give wine,
Like a hearty divine!
May Whaley disgrace
Dull Daniel's whey-face!
And may your three spouses
Let you lie at friends' houses!

A PASTORAL DIALOGUE. 1728.

DERMOT. SHEELAH.

A NYMPH and swain, Sheelah and Dermot hight,
Who went to weed the court of * Gosford Knight;
While each with stubbed knife remov'd the roots,
That rais'd between the stones their daily shoots;
As at their work they sat in counterview,
With mutual beauty smit, their passion grew.
Sing, heavenly Muse, in sweetly flowing strain
The soft endearments of the nymph and swain.

DERMOT.

My love to Sheelah is more firmly fixt,
Than strongest weeds that grow these stones betwixt:

My spud these nettles from the stones can part;
No knife so keen to weed thee from my heart.

SHEELAH.

My love for gentle Dermot faster grows,
Than yon tall dock that rises to thy nose.
Cut down the dock, 'twill sprout again: but oh!
Love rooted out, again will never grow.

DERMOT.

No more that brier thy tender leg shall rake
(I spare the thistles for Sir Arthur's † sake).
Sharp are the stones; take thou this rusty mat;
The hardest bum will bruise with sitting squat.

SHEELAH.

Thy breeches, torn behind, stand gaping wide;
This petticoat shall save thy dear backside:
Nor need I blush; although you feel it wet,
Dermot, I vow, 'tis nothing else but sweat.

DERMOT.

At an old stubborn root I chanc'd to tug,
When the Dean threw me this tobacco-plug:
A longer ha'porth never did I see;
This, dearest Sheelah, thou shalt share with me.

SHEELAH.

In at the pantry-door this morn I slipt,
And from the shelf a charming crust I whipt:
† Dennis was out, and I got hither safe;
And thou, my dear, shalt have the bigger half.

* Sir Arthur Acheson.

† Who was a great lover of Scotland.

‡ Sir Arthur's butler.

DERMOT.

When you saw Tady at long-bullets play,
You fate and lous'd him all a fun-shine day.
How could you, Sheelah, listen to his tales,
Or crack such lice as his betwixt your nails?

SHEELAH.

When you with Onah stood behind a ditch,
I peep'd, and saw you kifs the dirty bitch.
Dermot, how could you touch these nasty sluts?
I almost wish'd this spud were in your guts.

DERMOT.

If Onah once I kifs'd, forbear to chide;
Her aunt's my gossip by my father's side:
But, if I ever touch her lips again,
May I be doom'd for life to weed in rain!

SHEELAH.

Dermot, I swear, though Tady's locks could hold
Ten thousand lice, and every louse was gold;
Him on my lap you never more shall see;
Or may I lose my weeding knife---and thee!

DERMOT.

Oh, could I earn for thee, my lovely las,
A pair of * brogues to bear thee dry to mafs!
But see, where Norah with the sowins comes---
Then let us rise, and rest our weary bums.

ON THE FIVE LADIES AT SOT'S-HOLE †,

WITH THE DOCTOR ‡ AT THEIR HEAD.

N. B. The ladies treated the Doctor.

Sent as from an OFFICER in the ARMY.

FAIR ladies, number five,
Who, in your merry freaks,
With little Tom contrive
To feast on ale and steaks;
While he sits by a-grinning,
To see you safe in Sot's-hole,
Set up with greasy linen,
And neither mugs nor pots whole:
Alas! I never thought
A priest would please your palate;
Besides, I'll hold a goad,
He'll put you in a ballad;
Where I shall see your faces
On paper daub'd so foul,
They'll be no more like Graces,
Than Venus like an owl.
And we shall take you rather
To be a midnight pack
Of witches met together,
With Beelzebub in black.
It fills my heart with woe,
To think, such ladies fine
Shall be reduc'd so low
To treat a dull divine.

* Shoes with flat low heels.

† An alehouse in Dublin, famous for beef-steaks.

‡ Dr. Thomas Sheridan.

Be by a parson cheated!
Had you been cunning stagers,
You might yourselves be treated
By captains and by majors.

See how corruption grows,
While mothers, daughters, aunts,
Instead of powder'd beaux,
From pulpits choose gallants!

If we, who wear our wigs
With fan-tail and with snake,
Are bubbled thus by prigs;
Z---ds! who would be a rake?

Had I a heart to fight,
I'd knock the Doctor down;
Or could I read or write,
Egad! I'd wear a gown.

Then leave him to his birch *;
And at the Rose on Sunday,
The parson safe at church,
I'll treat you with burgundy.

THE FIVE LADIES' ANSWER TO THE BEAU.

WITH THE WIG AND WINGS AT HIS HEAD.

You little scribbling beau,
What dæmon made you write?
Because to write you know
As much as you can fight.

For compliment so scurvy,
I wish we had you here;
We'd turn you topsy-turvy
Into a mug of beer.

You thought to make a farce on
The man and place we chose;
We're sure a single parson
Is worth an hundred beaux.

And you would make us vassals,
Good Mr. Wig and Wings,
To silver-clocks and tassels;
You would, you Thing of Things!

Because around your cane
A ring of diamonds is set;
And you, in some bye-lane,
Have gain'd a paltry grizette;

Shall we, of sense refin'd,
Your trifling nonsense bear,
As noisy as the wind,
As empty as the air?

We hate your empty prattle;
And vow and swear 'tis true,
There's more in one child's rattle
Than twenty fops like you.

THE BEAU'S REPLY

TO THE FIVE LADIES' ANSWER.

WHY, how now, dapper Black!
I smell your gown and cassock,

* Dr. Sheridan was a school-master.

As strong upon your back,
As Tiddall * smells of a sock.

To write such scurvy stuff!
Fine ladies never do't;
I know you well enough,
And eke your cloven foot.

Fine ladies, when they write,
Nor scold, nor keep a splutter:
Their verses give delight,
As soft and sweet as butter.

But Satan never saw
Such haggard lines as these:
They stick athwart my maw,
As bad as Suffolk-cheese.

THE JOURNAL

OF A MODERN LADY.

In a Letter to a Person of Quality. 1728.

SIR,

It was a most unfriendly part
In you, who ought to know my heart,
Are well acquainted with my zeal
For all the female commonweal—
How could it come into your mind
To pitch on me, of all mankind,
Against the sex to write a satire,
And brand me for a woman-hater?
On me, who think them all so fair,
They rival Venus to a hair;
Their virtues never ceas'd to sing,
Since first I learn'd to tune a string?
Methinks I hear the ladies cry,
Will he his character belie?
Must never our misfortunes end?
And have we lost our only friend?
Ah, lovely nymphs, remove your fears,
No more let fall those precious tears.
Sooner shall, &c.

[Here several verses are omitted.]

The hound be hunted by the hare,
Than I turn rebel to the fair.

'Twas you engag'd me first to write;
Then gave the subject out of spite:
The journal of a modern dame
Is by my promise what you claim.
My word is past, I must submit;
And yet perhaps you may be bit.
I but transcribe; for not a line
Of all the satire shall be mine.
Compell'd by you to tag in rhymes
The common slanders of the times,
Of modern times, the guilt is yours,
And me my innocence secures.
Unwilling muse, begin thy lay,
The annals of a female day.

By nature turn'd to play the rake well
(As we shall show you in the sequel),
The modern dame is wak'd by noon
(Some authors say, not quite so soon),
Because, though sore against her will,
She sate all night up at quadrille.

* A clergyman in the north of England, who had made proposals of marriage to Stella.

She stretches, gapes, unglues her eyes,
And asks if it be time to rise;
Of head-ach and the spleen complains;
And then, to cool her heated brains,
Her night-gown and her slippers brought her,
Takes a large dram of citron-water.
Then to her glass; and, "Betty, pray
"Don't I look frightfully to-day?
"But was it not confounded hard?
"Well, if I ever touch a card!
"Four mattadores, and lose codille!
"Depend upon 't, I never will.
"But run to Tom, and bid him fix
"The ladies here to-night by six."
"Madam, the goldsmith waits below;
"He says, his business is to know
"If you'll redeem the silver cup
"He keeps in pawn?"—"First, show him up."
"Your dressing-plate he'll be content
"To take, for interest cent. per cent.
"And, Madam, there's my lady Spade
"Hath sent this letter by her maid."
"Well, I remember what she won;
"And hath she sent so soon to dun?
"Here, carry down those ten pistoles;
"My husband left to pay for coals:
"I thank my stars, they all are light;
"And I may have revenge to-night."
Now, loitering o'er her tea and cream,
She enters on her usual theme;
Her last night's ill success repeats,
Calls lady Spade a hundred cheats:
"She slipt spadillo in her breast,
"Then thought to turn it to a jest:
"There's Mrs. Cut and she combine;
"And to each other give the sign."
Through every game pursues her tale,
Like hunters o'er their evening ale.

Now to another scene give place:
Enter the folks with silks and lace:
Fresh matter for a world of chat,
Right Indian this, right Mechlin that:
"Observe this pattern; there's a stuff;
"I can have customers enough.
"Dear madam, you are grown so hard—
"This lace is worth twelve pounds a yard:
"Madam, if there be truth in man,
"I never sold so cheap a fan."
This business of importance o'er,
And madam almost dress'd by four;
The footman, in his usual phrase,
Comes up with, "Madam, dinner stays."
She answers, in her usual style,
"The cook must keep it back awhile:
"I never can have time to dress
"(No woman breathing takes up less)
"I'm hurried so, it makes me sick;
"I wish the dinner at Old Nick."
At table now she acts her part,
Has all the dinner cant by heart:
"I thought we were to dine alone;
"My dear; for sure, if I had known
"This company would come to day—
"But really 'tis my spouse's way!
"He's so unkind, he never sends
"To tell when he invites his friends:
"I wish ye may but have enough!"
And while with all this paltry stuff,

She sits tormenting every guest,
Nor gives her tongue one moment's rest,
In phrases batter'd, stale, and trite,
Which modern ladies call polite;
You see the booby husband sit
In admiration at her wit.

But let me now awhile survey
Our madam o'er her evening-tea;
Surrounded with her noisy clans
Of prudes, coquettes, and harridans;
When, frighted at the clamorous crew,
Away the God of Silence flew,
And fair discretion left the place,
And modesty with blushing face:
Now enters overweening pride,
And scandal ever gaping wide;
Hypocrisy with frown severe,
Scarrility with gibing air;
Rude laughter seeming like to burst,
And malice always judging worst;
And vanity with pocket-glass,
And impudence with front of bras;
And study'd affectation came,
Each limb and feature out of frame;
While ignorance, with brain of lead,
Flew hovering o'er each female head.

Why should I ask of thee, my Muse,
An hundred tongues, as poets use,
When, to give every dame her due,
An hundred thousand were too few?
Or how shall I, alas, relate
The sum of all their senseless prate,
Their innuendos, hints, and slanders,
Their meanings lewd, and double entendres?
Now comes the general scandal-charge;
What some invent, the rest enlarge;
And, "Madam, if it be a lie,
"You have the tale as cheap as I:
"I must conceal my author's name;
"But now 'tis known to common fame."
Say, foolish females, bold and blind,
Say, by what fatal turn of mind,
Are you on vices most severe,
Wherein yourselves have greatest share?
Thus every fool herself deludes;
The prudes condemn the absent prudes:
Mopsa, who stinks her spouse to death,
Accuses Chloe's tainted breath;
Hircina, rank with sweat, presumes
To censure Phyllis for perfumes;
While crooked Cynthia, sneering, says,
That Florimel wears iron stays:
Chloe, of every coxcomb jealous,
Admires how girls can talk with fellows;
And, full of indignation, frets,
That women should be such coquettes:
Iris, for scandal most notorious,
Cries, "Lord, the world is so censorious!"
And Rufa, with her combs of lead,
Whispers that Sappho's hair is red:
Aura, whose tongue you hear a mile hence,
Takes half a day in praise of silence:
And Sylvia full of inward guilt,
Calls Amoret an arrant jilt.

Now voices over voices rise,
While each to be the loudest vies:
They contradict, affirm, dispute,
No single tongue one moment mute;

All mad to speak, and none to hearken,
They set the very lap-dog barking;
Their chattering makes a louder din
Than fish-wives o'er a cup of gin:
Not school-boys at a barring-out
Rais'd ever such incessant rout:
The jumbling particles of matter
In chaos made not such a clatter;
Far less the rabble roar and rail,
When drunk with four election-ale.

Nor do they trust their tongues alone,
But speak a language of their own;
Can read a nod, a shrug, a look,
Far better than a printed book;
Convey a libel in a frown,
And wink a reputation down;
Or, by the tossing of the fan,
Describe the lady and the man.

But see, the female club disbands,
Each twenty visits on her hands.
Now all alone poor madam sits
In vapours and hysteric fits:

"And was not Tom this morning sent?
"I'd lay my life he never went:
"Past six, and not a living soul!
"I might by this have won a vole."
A dreadful interval of spleen!

How shall we pass the time between?
"Here, Betty, let me take my drops;
"And feel my pulse, I know it stops:
"This head of mine, Lord, how it swims!
"And such a pain in all my limbs!"
"Dear madam, try to take a nap."

But now they hear a footman's rap:
"Go, run and light the ladies up:
"It must be one before we sup."

The table, cards, and counters, set,
And all the gamester-ladies met,
Her spleen and fits recover'd quite,
Our madam can sit up all night:
"Whoever comes, I'm not within."
Quadrille's the word, and so begin.

How can the muse her aid impart,
Unskill'd in all the terms of art?
Or in harmonious numbers put
The deal, the shuffle, and the cut?
The superstitious whims relate,
That fill a female gamester's pate?
What agony of soul she feels
To see a knave's inverted heels!
She draws up card by card, to find
Good fortune peeping from behind;
With panting heart, and earnest eyes,
In hope to see spadillo rise:
In vain, alas! her hope is fed;
She draws an ace, and sees it red;
In ready counters never pays,
But pawns her snuff-box, rings, and keys;
Ever with some new fancy struck,
Tries twenty charms to mend her luck.
"This morning, when the parson came,
"I said I should not win a game.
"This odious chair, how came I stuck in't?
"I think I never had good luck in't.
"I'm so uneasy in my stays;
"Your fan a moment, if you please.
"Stand further, girl, or get you gone;
"I always lose when you look on."

Lord! madam, you have lost codille:
 I never saw you play so ill."
 Nay, madam, give me leave to say,
 'Twas you that threw the game away:
 When lady Tricksey play'd a four,
 You took it with a mattadore;
 "I saw you touch your wedding-ring
 "Before my lady call'd a king;
 "You spoke a word began with H,
 "And I know whom you meant to teach,
 "Because you held the king of hearts;
 "Fie, madam, leave these little arts."
 "That 's not so bad as one that rubs
 "Her chair, to call the king of clubs;
 "And makes her partner understand
 "A mattadore is in her hand."
 "Madam, you have no cause to flounce;
 "I swear I saw you thrice renounce."
 "And truly, madam, I know when,
 "Instead of five, you scor'd me ten.
 "Spadillo here has got a mark;
 "A child may know it in the dark:
 "I guess the hand: it seldom fails:
 "I wish some folks would pair their nails."
 While thus they rail, and scold, and storm,
 It passes but for common form:
 But, conscious that they all speak true,
 And give each other but their due,
 It never interrupts the game,
 Or makes them sensible of shame.
 The time too precious now to waste,
 The supper gobbled up in haste;
 Again afresh to cards they run,
 As if they had but just begun.
 But I shall not again repeat,
 How oft' they squabble, snarl, and cheat.
 At last they hear the watchmen knock,
 "A frosty morn—past four o'clock."
 The chairmen are not to be found,
 "Come, let us play the other round."
 Now all in haste they huddle on
 Their hoods, their cloaks, and get them gone;
 But, first, the winner must invite
 The company to-morrow night.
 Unlucky madam, left in tears
 (Who now again quadrille forswears),
 With empty purse, and aching head,
 Steals to her sleeping spouse to bed.

A D I A L O G U E

BETWEEN MAD MULLINIX* AND TIMOTHY.

1728.

M. I own, 'tis not my bread and butter;
 But prythee, Tim, why all this clutter?
 Why ever in these raging fits,
 Damning to hell the Jacobites?
 When, if you search the kingdom round,
 There's hardly twenty to be found;
 No, not among the priests and friars--
 T. 'Twixt you and me, G--- d---n the liars!
 M. The Tories are gone every man o'er
 To our illustrious house of Hanover;

* A fictitious name. See the history of this poem in the "Intelligencer," No. VIII.

From all their conduct this is plain;
 And then---
 T. G--- d---n the liars again!
 Did not an earl but lately vote,
 To bring in (I could cut his throat)
 Our whole accounts of public debts?
 M. Lord! how this frothy coxcomb frets!

[Aside.]

T. Did not an able statesman bishop
 This dangerous horrid motion dish-up
 As popish craft? did he not rail on't?
 Show fire and faggot in the tail on't?
 Proving the earl a great offender,
 And in a plot for the Pretender;
 Whose fleet, 'tis all our friends opinion,
 Was then embarking at Avignon?

[A few dull lines are here purposely omitted.]

M. These wrangling jars of Whig and Tory
 Are stale and worn as Troy-town story:
 The wrong, 'tis certain, you were both in,
 And now you find you fought for nothing.
 Your faction, when their game was new,
 Might want such noisy fools as you;
 But you, when all the show is past,
 Resolve to stand it out the last;
 Like Martin Marrall*, gaping on,
 Not minding when the song is done.
 When all the bees are gone to settle,
 You clatter still your brazen kettle.
 The leaders whom you listed under
 Have dropt their arms, and seiz'd the plunder;
 And when the war is past, you come
 To rattle in their ears your drum:
 And as that hateful hideous Grecian
 Therfites (he was your relation)
 Was more abhorr'd and scorn'd by those
 With whom he serv'd, than by his foes;
 So thou art grown the detestation
 Of all thy party through the nation:
 Thy peevish and perpetual teasing
 With plots, and Jacobites, and treason,
 Thy busy, never-meaning face,
 Thy screw'd-up front, thy state-grimace,
 Thy formal nods, important sneers,
 Thy whisperings foisted in all ears,
 (Which are, whatever you may think,
 But nonsense wrapt up in a stink),
 Have made thy presence, in a true sense,
 To thy own side so d---n'd a nuisance,
 That, when they have you in their eye,
 As if the devil drove, they fly.

T. My good friend Mullinix forbear;
 I vow to G---, you're too severe.
 If it could ever yet be known
 I took advice except my own,
 It should be yours: but, d---n my blood!
 I must pursue the public good.
 The faction (is it not notorious?)
 Keck at the memory of Glorious†:
 'Tis true; nor need I to be told,
 My quondam friends are grown so cold,
 That scarce a creature can be found
 To prance with me the statue round.

* A character in one of Dryden's comedies.
 † King William III.

The public safety, I foresee,
Henceforth depends alone on me;
And while this vital breath I blow,
Or from above, or from below,
I'll sputter, swagger, curse, and rail,
The Tories' terror, scourge, and flail.

M. Tim, you mistake the matter quite:
The Tories! you are their delight;
And should you act a different part,
Be grave and wise, 'twould break their heart.
Why, Tim, you have a taste I know,
And often see a puppet-show:
Observe, the audience is in pain;
While Punch is hid behind the scene;
But, when they hear his rusty voice,
With what impatience they rejoice!
And then they value not two straws,
How Solomon decides the cause,
Which the true mother, which pretender;
Nor listen to the witch of Endor.
Should Faustus, with the Devil behind him,
Enter the stage, they never mind him:
If Punch, to stir their fancy, shows
In at the door his monstrous nose,
Then sudden draws it back again;
O what a pleasure mix'd with pain!
You every moment think an age,
Till he appears upon the stage:
And first his bum you see him clap
Upon the queen of Sheba's lap:
The Duke of Lorraine drew his sword;
Punch roaring ran, and running roar'd;
Reviles all people in his jargon,
And sells the king of Spain a bargain;
St. George himself he plays the wag on,
And mounts astride upon the dragon;
He gets a thousand thumps and kicks,
Yet cannot leave his roguish tricks;
In every action thrusts his nose;
The reason why no mortal knows:
In doleful scenes that break our heart,
Punch comes, like you, and lets a fart.
There's not a puppet made of wood,
But what would hang him, if they could;
While, teasing all, by all he's teas'd,
How well are the spectators pleas'd!
Who in the motion have no share,
But purely come to hear and stare;
Have no concern for Sabra's sake,
Which gets the better, saint or snake,
Provided Punch (for there's the jest)
Be soundly maul'd, and plague the rest.

Thus, Tim, philosophers suppose,
The world consists of Puppet-shows;
Where petulant conceited fellows
Perform the part of Punchinelloes:
So at this booth, which we call Dublin,
Tim, thou'rt the Punch to stir up trouble in;
You riggle, fidge, and make a rout,
Put all your brother puppets out;
Run on in a perpetual round,
To teaze, perplex, disturb, confound;
Intrude with monkey-grin and clatter,
To interrupt all serious matter;
Are grown the nuisance of your clan,
Who hate and scorn you to a man:
But then the lookers on, the Tories,
You still divert with merry stories;

They would consent that all the crew
Were hang'd, before they'd part with you.

But tell me, Tim, upon the spot,
By all this toil what hast thou got?
If Tories must have all the sport,
I fear you'll be disgrac'd at court.

T. Got? D—m my blood! I frank my letters,
Walk to my place before my betters;
And, simple as I now stand here,
Expect in time to be a peer—
Got? D—m me! why I got my will!
Ne'er hold my peace, nor ne'er stand still!
I fart with twenty ladies by;
They call me beast, and what care I?
I bravely call the Tories Jacks,
And sons of whores—behind their backs.
But, could you bring me once to think,
That, when I strut, and stare, and stink,
Reville and slander, fume and storm,
Betray, make oath, impeach, inform,
With such a constant loyal zeal
To serve myself and commonweal,
And fret the Tories' soul to death,
I did but lose my precious breath;
And, when I damn my soul to plague 'em,
Am, as you tell me, but their may-game;
Consume my vitals! they shall know,
I am not to be treated so:
I'd rather hang myself by half,
Than give those rascals cause to laugh.

But how, my friend, can I endure,
Once so renowned, to live obscure?
No little boys and girls to cry,
“There's nimble Tim a-passing by?”
No more my dear delightful way tread
Of keeping up a party hatred.
Will none the Tory dogs pursue,
When through the streets I cry balloo?
Must all my d—m me's! bloods and wounds!
Pass only now for empty sounds?
Shall Tory rascals be elected,
Although I swear them disaffected?
And, when I roar, “A plot, a plot!”
Will our own party mind me not?
So qualify'd to swear and lie,
Will they not trust me for a spy?

Dear Mullinix, your good advice
I beg; you see the case is nice:
Oh! were I equal in renown,
Like thee to please this thankless town!
Or bless'd with such engaging parts
To win the truant school-boys' hearts!
Thy virtues meet their just reward,
Attended by the fable guard.
Charm'd by thy voice, the 'prentice drops
The snow-ball destin'd at thy chops:
Thy graceful steps, and colonel's air,
Allure the cinder-picking fair.

M. No more—in mark of true affection,
I take thee under my protection:
Your parts are good, 'tis not deny'd:
I wish they had been well apply'd.
But now observe my council, (viz.)
Adapt your habit to your phiz;
You must no longer thus equip ye,
As Horace says, optat ephippia;
(There's Latin too, that you may see
How much improved by Dr. —).

I have a coat at home, that you may try ;
 'Tis just like this, that hangs by geometry.
 My hat has much the nicer air ;
 Your block will fit it to a hair.
 That wig, I would not for the world
 Have it so formal and so curl'd ;
 'Twill be so oily and so sleek,
 When I have lain in it a week,
 You'll find it well prepar'd to take
 The figure of toupee and snake.
 Thus dress'd alike from top to toe,
 That which is which 'tis hard to know ;
 When first in public we appear,
 I'll lead the van, you keep the rear :
 Be careful as you walk behind ;
 Use all the talents of your mind ;
 Be studious well to imitate
 My portly motion, mien, and gait :
 Mark my address, and learn my style,
 When to look scornful, when to smile ;
 Nor sputter out your oaths so fast,
 But keep your swearing to the last.
 Then at our leisure we'll be witty,
 And in the streets divert the city ;
 The ladies from the windows gaping,
 The children all our motions aping.
 Your conversation to refine,
 I'll take you to some friends of mine ;
Choice spirits, who employ their parts
 To mend the world by useful arts ;
 Some cleansing hollow tubes, to spy
 Direct the zenith of the sky ;
 Some have the city in their care,
 From noxious steams to purge the air ;
 Some teach us, in these dangerous days
 How to walk upright in our ways ;
 Some whose reforming hands engage
 To lash the lewdness of the age ;
 Some for the public service go
 Perpetual envoys to and fro,
 Whose able heads support the weight
 Of twenty ministers of state.
 We scorn, for want of talk, to jabber
 Of parties o'er our bonny clabber :
 Nor are we studious to inquire,
 Who votes for manors, who for hire :
 Our care is, to improve the mind
 With what concerns all human kind ;
 The various scenes of mortal life ;
 Who beats her husband, who his wife ;
 Or how the bully at a stroke
 Knock'd down the boy, the lantern broke.
 One tells the rise of cheese and oatmeal ;
 Another when he got a hot meal ;
 One gives advice in proverbs old,
 Instructs us how to tame a scold ;
 One shows how bravely Audouin dy'd,
 And at the gallows all deny'd ;
 How by the almanack 'tis clear,
 That herrings will be cheap this year.

T. Dear Mullinix, I now lament
 My precious time so long mis-spent,
 By nature meant for nobler ends :
 Oh ! introduce me to your friends !
 For whom by birth I was design'd,
 Till politics debas'd my mind :
 I give myself entire to you ;
 G--d d---n the Whigs and Tories too !

TIM * AND THE FABLES.

*MY meaning will be best unravel'd,
 When I premise that Tim has travel'd.*
 In Lucas's by chance there lay
 The fables writ by Mr. Gay.
 Tim set the volume on a table,
 Read over here and there a fable ;
 And found, as he the pages twirl'd,
 The monkey who had seen the world :
 (For Tonson had, to help the sale,
 Prefix'd a cut to every tale.)
 The monkey was completely dress'd,
 The beau in all his airs exprest.
 Tim, with surprise and pleasure staring,
 Ran to the glass, and then comparing
 His own sweet figure with the print,
 Distinguish'd every feature in't,
 The twist, the squeeze, the rump, the sidge in all,
 Just as they look'd in the original.
 " By ———," says Tim, and let a fart,
 " This graver understood his art.
 " 'Tis a true copy I'll say that for't ;
 " I well remember when I sat for't.
 " My very face, as first I knew it ;
 " Just in this dress the painter drew it."
 Tim, with his likeness deeply smitten,
 Would read what underneath was written,
 The merry tale, with moral grave.
 He now began to storm and rave :
 " The curst villain ! now I see
 " This was a libel meant at me :
 " These scribblers grow so bold of late
 " Against us ministers of state !
 " Such Jacobites as he deserve---
 " D---n me ! I say, they ought to starve."

TOM MULLINIX AND DICK.

Tom and Dick had equal fame,
 And both had equal knowledge ;
 Tom could write and spell his name,
 But Dick had seen the college.
 Dick a coxcomb, Tom was mad,
 And both alike diverting ;
 Tom was held the merrier lad,
 But Dick the best at farting.
 Dick would cock his nose in scorn,
 But Tom was kind and loving ;
 Tom a foot-boy bred and born,
 But Dick was from an oven.
 Dick could neatly dance a jig,
 But Tom was best at botees :
 Tom would pray for every Whig,
 And Dick curse all the Tories.
 Dick would make a woeful noise,
 And scold at an election ;
 Tom huzza'd the blackguard boys,
 And held them in subjection.
 Tom could move with lordly grace,
 Dick nimbly skipt the gutter ;
 Tom could talk with solemn face,
 But Dick could better sputter.

* See an account of him in the "Intelligencer,"
 No. X.

Dick was come to high renown
Since he commenc'd physician;
Tom was held by all the town
The deeper politician.

Tom had the genteeler swing,
His hat could nicely put on;
Dick knew better how to swing
His cane upon a button.

Dick for repartee was fit,
And Tom for deep discerning;
Dick was thought the brighter wit,
But Tom had better learning.

Dick with zealous no's and ay's
Could roar as loud as Stentor,
In the house 'tis all he says;
But Tom is eloquenter.

DICK.

A MAGGOT.

As when, from rooting in a bin,
All powder'd o'er from tail to chin,
A lively maggot sallies out,
You know him by his hazel snout:
So when the grandson of his grandfire
Forth issues wriggling, Dick Drawcanfir,
With powder'd rump and back and side,
You cannot blanch his tawny hide;
For 'tis beyond the power of meal
The gipsy visage to conceal:
For, as he shakes his wainscot chops,
Down every mealy atom drops,
And leaves the tartar phiz, in show
Like a fresh t--d just dropt on snow.

GLAD ALL IN BROWN. TO DICK.

IMITATED FROM COWLEY.

FOULEST brute that stinks below,
Why in this brown dost thou appear?
For, wouldst thou make a fouler show,
Thou must go naked all the year.
Fresh from the mud a wallowing sow,
Would then be not so brown as thou.

'Tis not the coat that looks so dun,
His hide emits a foulness out;
Not one jot better looks the sun
Seen from behind a dirty clout:
So t--ds within a glass enclose,
The glass will seem as brown as those.

Thou now one heap of foulness art,
All outward and within is foul;
Condensed filth in every part,
Thy body's clothed like thy soul;
Thy soul, which through thy hide of buff
Scarce glimmers like a dying snuff.

Old carted bawds such garments wear
When pelted all with dirt they shine;
Such their exalted bodies are,
As shrivel'd and as black as thine.

If thou wert in a cart, I fear
Thou wouldst be pelted worse than they're.

Yet, when we see thee thus array'd,
The neighbours think it is but just,

That thou shouldst take an honest trade,
And weekly carry out the dust.
Of cleanly houses who will doubt,
When Dick cries, "Dust to carry out?"

DICK'S VARIETY.

DULL uniformity in fools
I hate, who gape and sneer by rules.
You, Mullinix, and slobbering C—,
Who every day and hour the same are;
That vulgar talent I despise
Of pissing in the rabble's eyes.
And when I listen to the noise
Of ideots roaring to the boys;
To better judgments still submitting,
I own I see but little wit in:
Such pastimes, when our taste is nice,
Can please at most but once or twice.
But then consider Dick, you'll find
His genius of superior kind;
He never muddles in the dirt,
Nor scowrs the streets without a shirt;
Though Dick, I dare presume to say,
Could do such feats as well as they.
Dick I could venture every where,
Let the boys pelt him if they dare;
He'd have them tried at the assizes
For priests and Jesuits in disguises;
Swear they were with the Swedes at Bender,
And lifting troops for the Pretender.

But Dick can fart, and dance, and frisk,
No other monkey half so brisk;
Now has the speaker by the ears,
Next moment in the House of Peers;
Now scolding at my lady Eustace,
Or thrashing Baby in her new stays.
Presto! be gone! with t'other hop
He's powdering in a barber's shop;
Now at the anti-chamber thrusting
His nose to get the circle just in,
And d—ns his blood, that in the rear
He sees one single Tory there:
Then, woe be to my Lord Lieutenant,
Again he'll tell him, and again on't.

AN EPITAPH

ON

GENERAL GORGES* AND LADY MEATH†.

UNDER this stone lie Dicky and Dolly.
Doll dying first, Dick grew melancholy;
For Dick without Doll thought living a folly.

Dick lost in Doll a wife tender and dear;
But Dick lost by Doll twelve hundred a year;
A loss that Dick thought no mortal could bear.

Dick sigh'd for his Doll, and his mournful arms
cross;
Thought much of his Doll, and the jointure he lost:
The first vex'd him much, the other vex'd most.

* Of Kilbrue, in the county of Meath.

† Dorothy dowager of Edward earl of Meath.
She was married to the General in 1716; and died April 10. 1728. Her husband survived but two days.

'Thus loaded with grief, Dick sigh'd and he
cry'd:
To live without both full three days he try'd;
But lik'd neither loss, and so quietly dy'd.

Dick left a pattern few will copy after:
Then, reader, pray shed some tears of salt-water;
For so sad a tale is no subject of laughter.

Meath smiles for the jointure, though gotten so late;
The son laughs, that got the hard-gotten estate;
And Cuffe* grins, for getting the Alicant plate.

Here quiet they lie, in hopes to rise one day,
Both solemnly put in this hole on a Sunday,
And here rest—fit transit gloria mundi!

VERSES ON I KNOW NOT WHAT.

My latest tribute here I send,
With this let your collection end.
Thus I consign you down to fame
A character to praise or blame:
And, if the whole may pass for true,
Contented rest, you have your due.
Give future times the satisfaction,
To leave one handle for detraction.

DR. SWIFT'S COMPLAINT ON HIS OWN DEAFNESS.

WITH AN ANSWER.

DOCTOR.

DEAF, giddy, helpless, left alone;

ANSWER.

Except the first, the fault's your own.

DOCTOR.

To all my friends a burthen grown:

ANSWER.

Because to few you will be shown.
Give them good wine, and meat to stuff,
You may have company enough.

DOCTOR.

No more I hear my church's bell,
Than if it rang out for my knell.

ANSWER.

Then write and read 'twill do as well.

DOCTOR.

At thunder now no more I start,
Than at the rumbling of a cart.

ANSWER.

Think then of thunder when you fart.

DOCTOR.

And, what's incredible, alack!
No more I hear a woman's clack.

ANSWER.

A woman's clack, if I have skill,
Sounds somewhat like a throwster's mill;
But louder than a bell, or thunder;
That does, I own, increase my wonder.

DR. SWIFT TO HIMSELF,

ON SAINT CECILIA'S DAY.

GRAVE Dean of St. Patrick's, how comes it to pass,

That you, who know music no more than an ass,
That you, who so lately were writing of Drapiers,
Should lend your cathedral to players and scrappers?

To act such an opera once in a year,
So offensive to every true Protestant ear, [ing,
With trumpets, and fiddles, and organs, and sing-
Will sure the Pretender and Popery bring in.
No Protestant Prelate, his Lordship or Grace,
Durst there show his Right or Most Reverend
face:

How would it pollute their crofiers and rockets
To listen to minims, and quavers, and crotchets!

[The rest is wanting.]

ON PADDY'S CHARACTER OF THE IN- TELLIGENCER*.

As a thorn bush, or oaken bough,
Stuck in an Irish cabin's brow,
Above the door, at country fair,
Betokens entertainment there;
So bays on poets' brows have been Set, for a sign of wit within.
And, as ill neighbours in the night
Pull down an ale-house bush for spite;
The laurel so, by poets worn,
Is by the teeth of envy torn;
Envy, a canker-worm, which tears
Those sacred leaves that lightning spares.

And now t' exemplify this moral:
Tom having earn'd a twig of laurel
(Which, measur'd on his head, was found
Not long enough to reach half round,
But, like a girl's cockade, was ty'd,
A trophy, on his temple side;) Paddy
repin'd to see him wear
This badge of honour in his hair;
And, thinking this cockade of wit
Would his own temples better fit,
Forming his Muse by Smedley's † model,
Lets drive at Tom's devoted noddle,
Pelts him by turns with verse and prose,
Hums like a hornet at his nose,
At length presumes to vent his satire on
The Dean, Tom's honour'd friend and patron;
The eagle in the tale, ye know,
Teaz'd by a buzzing wasp below,
Took wing to Jove, and hop'd to rest
Securely in the thunderer's breast:

* Dr. Sheridan was publisher of the "Intelligencer," a weekly paper, written principally by himself; but Dr. Swift occasionally supplied him with a letter. Dr. Delany, piqued at the approbation those papers received, attacked them violently both in conversation and print; but unfortunately stumbled on some of the numbers which the Dean had written, and all the world admired; which gave rise to these verses.

† Dean of Ferns.

* John Cuffe of Desart, Esq. married the General's eldest daughter.

In vain; even there, to spoil his nod,
The spiteful insect stung the god.

PARODY

ON A CHARACTER OF DEAN SMEDLEY *,

Written in Latin by himself.

THE very reverend Dean Smedley,
Of dullness, pride, conceit, a medley,
Was equally allow'd to shine,
As poet, scholar, and divine;
With godliness could well dispense;
Would be a rake, but wanted sense;
Would strictly after truth inquire,
Because he dreaded to come nigher.
For liberty no champion bolder,
He hated bailiffs at his shoulder.
To half the world a standing jest;
A perfect nuisance to the rest:
From many (and we may believe him)
Had the best wishes they could give him.
To all mankind a constant friend,
Provided they had cash to lend.
One thing he did before he went hence,
He left us a laconic sentence,
By cutting of his phrase, and trimming,
To prove that bishops were old women.
Poor envy durst not show her phiz,
She was so terrified at his.
He waded, without any shame,
Through thick and thin to get a name,
Tried every sharpening trick for bread,
And after all he seldom sped.
When fortune favour'd, he was nice;
He never once would cog the dice:
But, if she turn'd against his play,
He knew to stop a quatre trois,
Now sound in mind, and sound in corpus,
(Says he) though swell'd like any porpoise,
He heys from hence at forty-four
(But by his leave he sinks a score)
To the East Indies, there to cheat,
Till he can purchase an estate;
Where, after he has fill'd his chest,
He'll mount his tub, and preach his best,
And plainly prove, by dint of text,
This world is his, and their's the next.
Left that the reader should not know
The bank where last he set his toe,
'Twas Greenwich. There he took a ship,
And gave his creditors the slip.
But lest chronology should vary,
Upon the Ides of February;
In seventeen hundred eight and twenty,
To Fort St. George a pedlar went he.
Ye fates, when all he gets is spent,
RETURN HIM BEGGAR AS HE WENT!

PAULUS.

BY MR. LINDSAY †.

Dublin, Sept. 7. 1728.

"A SLAVE to crowds, scorch'd with the summer's "heats,
"In courts the wretched lawyer toils and sweats;

* The original is in the "Supplement to Swift."

† Mr. Lindsay, a polite and elegant scholar, at

"While smiling Nature, in her best attire,
"Regales each sense, and vernal joys inspire.
"Can he who knows that real good should please,
"Barter for gold his liberty and ease?"
Thus Paulus preach'd:—When, entering at the door,

Upon his board the client pours the ore:
He grasps the shining gift, pores o'er the cause,
Forgets the sun, and doseth on the laws.

THE ANSWER, BY DR. SWIFT.

LINDSAY mistakes the matter quite,
And honest Paulus judges right.
Then, why these quarrels to the sun,
Without whose aid you're all undone?
Did Paulus e'er complain of sweat?
Did Paulus e'er the sun forget;
The influence of whose golden beams
Soon licks up all unfavoury steams?
The sun, you say, his face hath kiss'd:
It has; but then it greas'd his fist.
True lawyers, for the wisest ends,
Have always been Apollo's friends.
Not for his superficial powers
Of ripening fruits, and gilding flowers;
Not for inspiring poets' brains
With pennyless and starveling strains;
Not for his boasted healing art;
Not for his skill to shoot the dart;
Nor yet because he sweetly fiddles;
Nor for his prophecies in riddles:
But for a more substantial cause—
Apollo's patron of the laws;
Whom Paulus ever must adore,
As parent of the golden ore,
By Phœbus, an incestuous birth,
Begot upon his grand-dame Earth;
By Phœbus first produc'd to light;
By Vulcan form'd so round and bright:
Then offer'd at the shrine of justice,
By clients to her priests and trustees,
Nor, when we see Astræa stand
With even balance in her hand,
Must we suppose she hath in view,
How to give every man his due;
Her scales you see her only hold,
To weigh her priests' the lawyers gold,
Now, should I own your case was grievous,
Poor sweaty Paulus, who'd believe us?
'Tis very true, and none denies,
At least, that such complaints are wise:
'Tis wise, no doubt, as clients fat you more,
To cry, like statesmen, Quanta patimur!
But, since the truth must needs be stretched,
To prove that lawyers are so wretched;
This paradox I'll undertake,
For Paulus' and for Lindsay's sake;
By topics, which, though I abomine 'em,
May serve as arguments ad hominem:
Yet I disdain to offer those
Made use of by detracting foes.
I own, the curses of mankind
Sit light upon a lawyer's mind:

that time an eminent pleader in Dublin, afterwards one of the justices of the court of common pleas.

The clamours of ten thousand tongues
Break not his rest, nor hurt his lungs.

I own, his conscious always free
(Provided he has got his fee);
Secure of constant peace within,
He knows no guilt, who knows no sin.

Yet well they merit to be pitied,
By clients always over-witted.
And though the gospel seems to say
What heavy burthens lawyers lay
Upon the shoulders of their neighbour,
Nor lend a finger to the labour,
Always for saving their own bacon;
No doubt, the text is here mistaken:
'The copy's false, and sense is rack'd:
To prove it, I appeal to fact;
And thus by demonstration show
What burthens lawyers undergo.

With early clients, at his door,
Though he was drunk the night before,
And crop-sick with unclubb'd-for wine,
The wretch must be at court by nine;
Half sunk beneath his briefs and bag,
As ridden by a midnight hag:
Then from the bar, harangues the bench,
In English vile, and viler French,
And Latin, vilest of the three;
And all for poor ten moidores fee!

Of paper how is he profuse,
With periods long, in terms abstruse!
What pains he takes to be prolix,
A thousand lines to stand for fix!
Of common sense without a word in!
And is not this a grievous burden?

The lawyer is a common drudge,
To fight our cause before the judge:
And, what is yet a greater curse,
Condemn'd to bear his client's purse;
While he, at ease, secure and light,
Walks boldly home at dead of night;
When term is ended, leaves the town,
Trots to his country-mansion down;
And, disencumber'd of his load,
No danger dreads upon the road;
Despiseeth rapparees, and rides
Safe through the Newry mountains' sides.

Lindsay, 'tis you have set me on,
To state this question pro and con.
My satire may offend, 'tis true;—
However, it concerns not you.
I own, there may, in every clan,
Perhaps, be found one honest man;
Yet link them close, in this they jump,
To be but rascals in the lump.

Imagine Lindsay at the bar,
He's much the same his brethren are;
Well taught by practice to imbibe
The fundamentals of his tribe:
And, in his client's just defence,
Must deviate oft' from common sense;
And make his ignorance discerned,
To get the name of Council Learned
(As lucus comes à non lucendo),
And wisely do as other men do:
But shift him to a better scene,
Among his crew of rogues in grain;
Surrounded with companions fit,
To taste his humour, sense, and wit;

You'd swear he never took a fee,
Nor knew in law his A, B, C.

'Tis hard, where dulness over-rules,
To keep good sense in crowds of fools.
And we admire the man who saves
His honesty in crowds of knaves;
Nor yields up virtue, at discretion,
To villains of his own profession.
Lindsay, you know what pains you take
In both, yet hardly save your stake;
And will you venture both anew,
To sit among that venal crew,
That pack of mimic legislators,
Abandon'd, stupid, slavish praters!
For, as the rabble daub and rifle
The fool who scrambles for a trifle;
Who for his pains is cuff'd and kick'd,
Drawn through the dirt, his pockets pick'd;
You must expect the like disgrace,
Scrambling with rogues to get a place;
Must lose the honour you have gain'd,
Your numerous virtues foully stain'd;
Disclaim for ever all pretence
To common honesty and sense;
And join in friendship with a strict tie,
To M---l, C---y, and Dick Tighe*.

A DIALOGUE

Between an eminent Lawyer † and Dr. Jonathan Swift, D. S. P. D.

IN ALLUSION TO HORACE, BOOK II. SAT. I.

" Sunt quibus in Satira, &c.

DR. SWIFT.

SINCE there are persons who complain
There's too much satire in my vein;
That I am often found exceeding
The rules of raillery and breeding;
With too much freedom treat my betters,
Not sparing even men of letters:
You, who are skill'd in lawyers' lore,
What's your advice? shall I give o'er?
Nor ever fools or knaves expose
Either in verse or humerous prose;
And, to avoid all future ill,
In my scrutoire lock up my quill?

LAWYER.

Since you are pleas'd to condescend
To ask the judgment of a friend,
Your case consider'd, I must think
You should withdraw from pen and ink,
Forbear your poetry and jokes,
And live like other Christian folks;
Or, if the Muses must inspire
Your fancy with their pleasing fire,
Take subjects safer for your wit
Than those on which you lately writ.
Commend the times, your thoughts correct,
And follow the prevailing sect;

For learning, probity, and truth ;
That noble genius, who unbinds
The chain which fetter free-born minds ;
Redeems us from the slavish fears
Which lasted near two thousand years ;
He can alone the priesthood humble,
Make gilded spires and altars tumble.

DR. SWIFT.

Must I commend against my conscience
Such stupid blasphemy and nonsense ?
To such a subject tune my lyre,
And sing like one of Milton's choir,
Where devils to a vale retreat,
And call the laws of wisdom fate,
Lament upon their hapless fall,
That force free virtue should enthrall ?
Or shall the charms of wealth and power
Make me pollute the muses' bower ?

LAWYER.

As from the tripod of Apollo,
Hear from my desk the words that follow :
" Some, by philosophers misled,
" Must honour you alive and dead ;
" And such as know what Greece hath writ
" Must taste your irony and wit ;
" Whilst most that are, or would be great,
" Must dread your pen, your person hate ;
" And you on Drapier's § hill must lie,
" And there without a mitre die."

ON BURNING A DULL POEM. 1729.

AN ass's hoof alone can hold
That poisonous juice which kills by cold.
Methought, when I this poem read,
No vessel but an ass's head
Such frigid fustian could contain ;
I mean, the head without the brain.
The cold conceits, the chilling thoughts,
Went down like stupifying draughts :
I found my head began to swim,
A numbness crept through every limb.
In haste, with imprecations dire,
I threw the volume in the fire :
When, (who could think ?) though cold as ice,
It burnt to ashes in a trice.

How could I more enhance its fame ?
Though born in snow, it dy'd in flame.

AN EPISTLE

To his Excellency John Lord Carteret.

BY DR. DELANY. 1729.

" Credis ob hoc, me, Pastor, opes fortasse rogare,
" Propter quod, vulgus, crassaque turba rogat."
MART. Epig. lib. ix.

THOU wise and learned ruler of our isle,
Whose guardian care can all her griefs beguile ;
When next your generous soul shall condescend
T' instruct or entertain your humble friend ;
Whether, retiring from your weighty charge,
On some high theme you learnedly enlarge ;
Of all the ways of wisdom reason well,
How Richelieu rose, and how Sejanus fell :
Or, when your brow less thoughtfully unbends,
Circled with Swift and some delighted friends ;
When, mixing mirth and wisdom with your wine,
Like that your wit shall flow, your genius shine ;
Nor with less praise the conversation guide,
Than in the public councils you decide :
Or when the Dean, long privileg'd to rail,
Asserts his friends with more impetuous zeal ;
You hear (whilst I sit by abash'd and mute),
With soft concessions shortening the dispute ;
Then close with kind inquiries of my state,
" How are your tithes, and have they rose of late ?
" Why Christ-Church is a pretty situation,
" There are not many better in the nation !
" This, with your other things, must yield you clear
" Some six---at least five hundred pounds a year."
Suppose, at such a time, I took the freedom
To speak these truths as plainly as you read 'em
(You shall rejoin, my lord, when I've replied,
And, if you please, my lady shall decide) :
" My lord, I'm satisfied you meant me well ;
" And that I'm thankful all the world can tell ;
" But you'll forgive me, if I own th' event
" Is short, is very short, of your intent ;
" At least, I feel some ills unfelt before,
" My income less, and my expences more."
" How, doctor ! double vicar ! double rector !
" A dignitary ! with a city lecture !
" What glebes---what dues---what tithes---what
" fines--- what rent !
" Why, doctor !---will you never be content ?"
" Would my good lord but cast up the account,
" And see to what my revenues amount,
" My titles ample ! but my gain so small,
" That one good vicarage is worth them all :
" And very wretched sure is he, that's double
" In nothing but his titles and his trouble.
" Add to this crying grievance, if you please,
" My horses founder'd on Fermanah ways ;
" Ways of well-polish'd and well-pointed stone,
" Where every step endangers every bone ;
" And more to raise your pity and your wonder,
" Two churches---twelve Hibernian miles asunder !
" With complicated cures, I labour hard in,
" Besides whole summers absent from my garden !---
" But that the world would think I play'd the

 "I hope, my lord, you'll call him to the helm."—
 "Doctor---a glorious scheme to ease your grief!
 "When cures are crofs, a school's a sure relief.
 "You cannot fail of being happy there,
 "The lake will be the Lethe of your care;
 "The scheme is for your honour and your ease;
 "And, doctor, I'll promote it when you please.
 "Mean while, allowing things below your merit,
 "Yet, doctor, you've a philosophic spirit;
 "Your wants are few, and, like your income,
 small,
 "And you've enough to gratify them all:
 You've trees and fruits, and roots enough, in store:
 "And what would a philosopher have more?
 "You cannot wish for coaches, kitchens, cooks---"
 "My lord I've not enough to buy me books---"
 "Or pray, suppose my wants were all supplied,
 "Are there no wants, I should regard beside?
 "Whose breast is so unmann'd, as not to grieve,
 "Compas'd with miseries he can't relieve?
 "Who can be happy---who should wish to live,
 "And want the godlike happiness to give?
 "(That I'm a judge of this, you must allow:
 "I had it once---and I'm debarr'd it now.)
 "Ask your own heart, my lord, if this be true,
 "Then how unblest am I! how blest are you!"
 "'Tis true---but, doctor, let us wave all that---"
 "Say, if you had your wish, what you'd be at."
 "Excuse me, good my lord---I won't be founded,
 "Nor shall your favour by my wants be bounded.
 "My lord, I challenge nothing as my due,
 "Nor is it fit I should prescribe to you.
 "Yet this might Symmachus himself avow
 "(Whose rigid rules are antiquated now)---
 "My lord, I'd wish to pay the debts I owe---
 "I'd wish besides---to build, and to bestow."

AN EPISTLE ON AN EPISTLE

From a certain Doctor to a certain great Lord.

BEING A CHRISTMAS-BOX FOR DR. DELANY.

As Jove will not attend on less,
 When things of more importance press;
 You can't grave Sir, believe it hard,
 That you, a low Hibernian bard,
 Should cool your heels awhile, and wait
 Unanswer'd at your patron's gate:
 And would my lord vouchsafe to grant
 This one, poor, humble boon I want,
 Free leave to play his Secretary,
 As Falstaff acted old King Harry;
 I'd tell of yours in rhyme and print:
 Folks shrug, and cry There's nothing in't.
 And, after several readings over,
 It shines most in the marble cover.

How could so fine a taste dispense,
 With mean degrees of wit and sense?

† Sir Ralph Gorr, who had a villa in the lake of Erin.

Nor will my lords so far beguile
 The wise and learned of our isle;
 To make it pass upon the nation,
 By dint of his sole approbation.
 The task is arduous, patrons find,
 To warp the sense of all mankind;
 Who think your muse must first aspire,
 Ere he advance the doctor higher.

You've cause to say he meant you well:
 That you are thankful, who can tell?
 For still you're short (which grieves your spirit)
 Of his intent; you mean, your merit.

Ah! quantum rebus, tu adeptus,
Qui nil moliris tam inepte?
 Smedley*, thou Jonathan of Clogher,
 "When thou thy humble lay dost offer
 "To Grafton's grace, with grateful heart,
 "Thy thanks and verse devoid of art:
 "Content with what his bounty gave,
 "No larger income dost thou crave."

But you must have cascades, and all
 Ierne's lake for your canal,
 Your vistas, barges, and (a pox on
 All pride!) our speaker for your coxon:
 It's pity that he can't bestow you
 Twelve commoners in caps to row you.
 Thus Edgar proud, in days of yore,
 Held monarchs labouring at the oar;
 And, as he pass'd, so swell'd the Dee,
 Enrag'd, as Ern would do at thee.

How different is this from Smedley!
 (His name is up, he may in bed lie)
 "Who only asks some pretty cure,
 "In wholesome soil and æther pure;
 "The garden stor'd with artless flowers,
 "In either angle shady bowers:
 "No gay parterre with costly green
 "Must in the ambient hedge be seen;
 "But Nature freely takes her course,
 "Nor fears from him ungrateful force:
 "No sheers to check her sprouting vigour,
 "Or shape the *yew*s to antic figure."

But you, forsooth, your all must squander
 On that poor spot, call'd Dell-ville yonder:
 And when you've been at vast expences
 In whims, parterres, canals, and fences,
 Your assets fail, and cash is wanting;
 Nor farther buildings, farther planting:
 No wonder, when you raise and level,
 Think this wall low, and that wall bevel.
 Here a convenient box you found,
 Which you demolish'd to the ground:
 Then built, then took up with your arbour,
 And set the house to Rupert Barber.
 You sprang an arch, which, in a scurvy
 Humour, you tumbled topsy-turvy.
 You change a circle to a square,
 Then to a circle as you were:
 Who can imagine whence the fund is,
 That you quadrata change rotundis?

To Fame a temple you erect,
 A Flora does the dome protect;
 Mounts, walks, on high: and in a hollow
 You place the Muses and Apollo;

* See the Petition to the Duke of Grafton.

There shining 'midst his train, to grace
Your whimsical poetic place.

These stories were of old design'd
As fables; but you have refin'd
The poets' mythologic dreams,
To real muses, gods, and streams.
Who would not swear when you contrive thus,
That you're Don Quixote Redivivus?

Beneath, a dry canal there lies,
Which only winter's rain supplies.
Oh! couldst thou, by some magic spell,
Hither convey St. Patrick's well!
Here may it re-assume its stream*,
And take a greater Patrick's name!
If your expences rise so high,
What income can your wants supply?
Yet still you fancy you inherit
A fund of such superior merit,
That you can't fail of more provision,
All by my lady's kind decision.
For, the more livings you can fish up,
You think you'll sooner be a bishop:
That could not be my lord's intent,
Nor can it answer the event.

Most think what has been heap'd on you,
To other sort of folk was due:
Rewards too great for your slim-flams,
Epistles, riddles, epigrams.

Though now your depth must not be founded,
The time was, when you'd have compounded
For less than Charley Grattan's school:
Five hundred pound a year's no fool!

Take this advice then from your friend:
To your ambition put an end.
Be frugal, Pat: pay what you owe,
Before you build and you bestow.
Be modest; nor address your betters
With begging, vain, familiar letters.

A passage may be found†, I've heard,
In some old Greek or Latian bard,
Which says, "Would crows in silence eat
" Their offals, or their better meat,
" Their generous feeders not provoking
" By loud and unharmonious croaking;
" They might, unhurt by envy's claws,
" Live on, and stuff to boot their maws."

A L I B E L

On the Reverend Dr. Delany and his Excellency

JOHN LORD CARTERET. 1729.

DELUDED mortals, whom the great
Choose for companions tête à tête;
Who at their dinners, en famille,
Get leave to sit whene'er you will;
Then boasting tell us where you din'd,
And how his lordship was so kind;
How many pleasant things he spoke,
And how you laugh'd at every joke:
Swear he's a most facetious man;
That you and he are cup and can:
You travel with a heavy load,
And quite mistake preferment's road.

* See Dr. Swift's verses on the sudden drying up of St. Patrick's well.

† Hor. Lib. I. Ep. xvii.

Suppose my lord and you alone;
Hint the least interest of your own,
His visage drops, he knits his brow,
He cannot talk of business now:
Or, mention but a vacant post,
He'll turn it off with, "Name your toast!"
Nor could the nicest artist paint
A countenance with more constraint.

For as, their appetites to quench,
Lords keep a pimp to bring a wench;
So men of wit are but a kind
Of pandors to a vicious mind;
Who proper objects must provide
To gratify their lust of pride,
When, wearied with intrigues of state,
They find an idle hour to prate.
Then, shall you dare to ask a place,
You forfeit all your patron's grace,
And disappoint the sole design
For which he summon'd you to dine.
Thus Congreve spent in writing plays,
And one poor office, half his days:
While Montague who claim'd the station
To be Mæcenes of the nation,
For poets open table kept,
But ne'er consider'd where they slept:
Himself as rich as fifty Jews,
Was easy, though they wanted shoes:
And crazy Congreve scarce could spare
A shilling to discharge his chair;
Till prudence taught him to appeal
From Pæan's fire to party zeal;
Not owing to his happy vein
The fortunes of his latter scene,
Took proper principles to thrive;
And so might every dunce alive.

Thus Steele, who own'd what others writ,
And flourish'd by imputed wit,
From perils of a hundred jails
Withdrew to starve, and die in Wales.

Thus Gay, the bare with many friends,
Twice seven long years the court attends:
Who, under tales conveying truth,
To virtue form'd a princely youth†:
Who paid his courtship with the crowd
As far as modest pride allow'd;
Rejects a servile usher's place,
And leaves St. James's in disgrace.

Thus Addison, by lords carest,
Was left in foreign lands distress;
Forgot at home, became for hire
A travelling tutor to a squire:
But wisely left the Muses' hill,
To business shap'd the poet's quill,
Let all his barren laurels fade,
Took up himself the courtier's trade,
And, grown a minister of state,
Saw poets at his levee wait.

Hail, happy Pope! whose generous mind
Detesting all the statesman kind,
Contemning courts, at courts unseen,
Refus'd the visits of a queen.
A soul with every virtue fraught,
By sages, priests, or poets taught;

† William Duke of Cumberland, son to George II.

Whose filial piety excels
 Whatever Grecian story tells;
 A genius for all stations fit,
 Whose meanest talent is his wit;
 His heart too great, though fortune little,
 To lick a rascal statesman's spittle;
 Appealing to the nation's taste,
 Above the reach of want is plac'd:
 By Homer dead was taught to thrive,
 Which Homer never could alive;
 And sits aloft on Pindus' head,
 Despising slaves that cringe for bread.

True politicians only pay
 For solid work, but not for play;
 Nor ever choose to work with tools
 Forg'd up in colleges and schools.
 Consider how much more is due
 To all their journeymen than you:
 At table you can Horace quote;
 They at a pinch can bribe a vote:
 You show your skill in Grecian story;
 But they can manage Whig and Tory:
 You, as a critic, are so curious
 To find a verse in Virgil spurious;
 But they can smoke the deep designs,
 When Bolingbroke with Pulteney dines.

Besides, your patron may upbraid ye,
 That you have got a place already;
 An office for your talents fit,
 To flatter, carve, and show your wit;
 To snuff the lights, and stir the fire,
 And get a dinner for your hire.
 What claim have you to place or pension?
 He overpays in condescension.

But, reverend doctor, you, we know,
 Could never condescend so low:
 The vice-roy, whom you now attend,
 Would, if he durst, be more your friend;
 Nor will in you those gifts despise,
 By which himself was taught to rise:
 When he has virtue to retire,
 He'll grieve he did not raise you higher,
 And place you in a better station,
 Although it might have pleas'd the nation.

This may be true---submitting still
 To Walpole's more than royal will;
 And what condition can be worse?
 He comes to drain a beggar's purse;
 He comes to tie our chains on faster,
 And show us, England is our master:
 Careless knaves, and dunces wooing,
 To make them work their own undoing.
 What has he else to bait his traps,
 Or bring his vermin in, but scraps?
 The offals of a church distress;
 A hungry vicarage at best;
 Or some remote inferior post,
 With forty pounds a year at most?

But here again you interpose—
 Your favourite lord is none of those
 Who owe their virtues to their stations,
 And characters to dedications:
 For keep him in, or turn him out,
 His learning none will call in doubt;
 His learning, though a poet said it
 Before a play, would lose no credit;
 Nor Pope would dare deny him wit,
 Although to praise it Phillips writ,

VOL. IX.

I own, he hates an action base,
 His virtues battling with his place;
 Nor wants a nice discerning spirit
 Betwixt a true and spurious merit;
 Can sometimes drop a voter's claim,
 And give up party to his fame.

I do the most that friendship can;
 I hate the vice-roy, love the man.

But you who, till your fortune's made,
 Must be a sweetener by your trade,
 Should swear he never meant us ill;
 We suffer sore against his will;
 That, if we could but see his heart,
 He would have chose a milder part:
 We rather should lament his case,
 Who must obey, or lose his place.

Since this reflection slip your pen,
 Insert it when you write again:
 And, to illustrate it produce
 This simile for his excuse:

"So to destroy a guilty land
 "An angel sent by heaven's command,
 "While he obeys almighty will,
 "Perhaps may feel compassion still;
 "And wish the task had been assign'd
 "To spirits of less gentle kind."

But I, in politicks grown old,
 Whose thoughts are of a different mould,
 Who from my soul sincerely hate
 Both kings and ministers of state,
 Who look on courts with stricter eyes
 To see the seeds of vice arise,
 Can lend you an illusion fitter,
 Though flattering knaves may call it bitter;
 Which, if you durst but give it place,
 Would show you many a statesman's face:
 Fresh from the tripod of Apollo
 I had it in the words that follow
 (Take notice, to avoid offence,
 I here except his excellence).

"So, to effect his monarch's ends,
 "From hell a vice-roy devil ascends;
 "His budget with corruptions cramm'd,
 "The contributions of the damn'd;
 "Which with unsparing hand he strows
 "Through courts and senates as he goes;
 "And then at Beelzebub's black ball
 "Complains his budget was too small."

Your simile may better shine
 In verse; but there is truth in mine.
 For no imaginable things
 Can differ more than gods and kings:
 And statesmen by ten thousand odds
 Are angels just as kings are gods.

 ADDISON'S Campaign,

H

When at a skirmish first he hears
The bullets whistling round his ears,
Will duck his head aside, will start,
And feel a trembling at his heart,
Till 'scaping oft' without a wound;
Lessens the terror of the sound;
Fly bullets now as thick as hops,
He runs into a cannon's chops:
An author thus, who pants for fame,
Begins the world with fear and shame;
When first in print, you see him dread
Each pop-gun level'd at his head:
The lead yon critic's quill contains,
Is destin'd to beat out his brains;
As if he heard loud thunders roll,
Cries, Lord, have mercy on his soul!
Concluding, that another shot
Will strike him dead upon the spot.
But, when with squibbing, flashing, popping,
He cannot see one creature dropping;
That, missing fire, or missing aim,
His life is safe, I mean his fame;
The danger past, takes heart of grace,
And looks a critic in the face.

Though splendour gives the fairest mark
To poison'd arrows from the dark,
Yet, in yourself when smooth and round,
They glance aside without a wound.

'Tis said, the gods try'd all their art,
How pain they might from pleasure part:
But little could their strength avail;
Both still are fasten'd by the tail.
Thus fame and censure with a tether
By fate are always link'd together.

Why will you aim to be prefer'd
In wit before the common herd:
And yet grow mortify'd and vex'd
To pay the penalty annexed?

'Tis eminence makes envy rise:
As fairest fruits attract the flies.
Should stupid libels grieve your mind,
You soon a remedy may find:
Lie down obscure like other folks
Below the lash of snarler's jokes,
Their faction is five hundred odds;
For every coxcomb lends them rods,
And sneers as learnedly as they,
Like females o'er their morning tea.

You say, the Muse will not contain,
And write you must, or break a vein.
Then, if you find the terms too hard,
No longer my advice regard:
But raise your fancy on the wing;
The Irish senate's praises sing:
How jealous of the nations freedom,
And for corruptions how they weed 'em;
How each the public good pursues,
How far their hearts from private views;
Make all true patriots up to shoe-boys,
Huzza their brethren at the Blue-boys;
Thus grown a member of the club,
No longer dread the rage of Grub.

How oft' am I for rhyme to seek!
To dress a thought, may toil a week:
And then how thankful to the town,
If all my pains will earn a crown!
Whilst every critic can devour
My work and me in half an hour.

Would men of genius cease to write,
The rogues must die for want and spite;
Must die for want of food and raiment,
If scandal did not find them payment.
How cheerfully the hawkers cry
A satire, and the gentry buy!
While my hard-labour'd poem pines
Unfold upon the printer's lines.

A genius in the reverend gown
Must ever keep its owner down;
'Tis an unnatural conjunction,
And spoils the credit of the function.
Round all your brethren cast your eyes;
Point out the surest men to rise:
That club of candidates in black,
The least deserving of the pack,
Aspiring, factious, fierce, and loud,
With grace and learning unendow'd,
Can turn their hands to every job,
The fittest tools to work for Bob;
Will sooner coin a thousand lies,
Than suffer men of parts to rise;
They crowd about preferment's gate,
And press you down with all their weight,
For as, of old, mathematicians
Were by the vulgar thought magicians;
So academic dull ale-drinkers
Pronounce all men of wit free-thinkers.

Wit, as the chief of virtue's friends,
Disdains to serve ignoble ends.
Observe what loads of stupid rhymes
Oppress us in corrupted times:
What pamphlets in a court's defence
Show reason, grammar, truth, or sense?
For though the Muse delights in fiction,
She ne'er inspires against conviction.
Then keep your virtue still unmixt,
And let not faction come betwixt:
By party-steps no grandeur climb at,
Though it would make you England's primate:
First learn the science to be dull,
You then may soothe your conscience lull;
If not, however seated high,
Your genius in your face will fly.

When Jove was from his teeming head
Of Wit's fair goddess brought to bed,
There follow'd at his lying-in
For after-birth a Sooterkin;
Which, as the nurse pursu'd to kill,
Attain'd by flight the Muses' hill,
There in the soil began to root,
And litter'd at Parnassus' foot.
From hence the critic vermin sprung,
With harpy claws and poisonous tongue,
Who fatten on poetic scraps,
Too cunning to be caught in traps.
Dame Nature, as the learned show,
Provides each animal its foe:
Hounds hunt the hare; the wily fox
Devours your geese, the wolf your flocks.
Thus envy pleads a natural claim
To persecute the Muses' fame;
On poets in all times abusive,
From Homer down to Pope inclusive.

Yet what avails it to complain?
You try to take revenge in vain.
A rat your utmost rage defies,
That safe behind the wainscot lies.

Say, did you ever know by fight
In cheese an individual mite?
Show me the same numeric flea,
That bit your neck but yesterday:
You then may boldly go in quest
To find the Grub-street poet's nest;
What spunging-house, in dread of jail,
Receives them, while they wait for bail;
What alley they are nestled in,
To flourish o'er a cup of gin;
Find the last garret where they lay,
Or cellar where they starve to-day.
Suppose you had them all trepann'd,
With each a libel in his hand,
What punishment would you inflict?
Or call them rogues, or get them kickt?
These they have often try'd before;
You but oblige them so much more:
Themselves would be the first to tell,
To make their trash the better sell.

You have been libell'd---Let us know,
What fool officious told you so?
Will you regard the hawker's cries,
Who in his titles always lies?
Whate'er the noisy scoundrel says,
It might be something in your praise:
And praise bestow'd on Grub-street rhymes
Would vex one more a thousand times.
Till critics blame, and judges praise,
The poet cannot claim his bays.
On me when dunces are satiric,
I take it for a panegyric.
Hated by fools, and fools to hate,
Be that my motto, and my fate.

DIRECTIONS FOR MAKING A BIRTH-DAY SONG. 1729.

To form a just and finish'd piece,
Take twenty gods of Rome or Greece,
Whose godships are in chief request,
And fit your present subject best:
And, should it be your hero's case,
To have both male and female race,
Your business must be to provide
A score of goddesses beside.

Some call their monarchs, sons of Saturn.
For which they bring a modern pattern;
Because they might have heard of one,
Who often long'd to eat his son:
But this, I think, will not go down,
For here the father kept his crown.

Why, then, appoint him son of Jove,
Who met his mother in a grove:
To this we freely shall consent,
Well knowing what the poets meant;
And in their sense, 'twixt me and you,
It may be literally true.

Next, as the laws of verse require,
He must be greater than his fire;
For Jove, as every school-boy knows,
Was able Saturn to depose:
And sure no Christian poet breathing
Would be more scrupulous than a heathen!
Or, if to blasphemy it tends,
That's but a trifle among friends.

Your Hero now another Mars is,
Makes mighty armies turn their a--s.

Behold his glittering falchion now
Whole squadrons at a single blow;
While victory, with wings outspread,
Flies, like an eagle, o'er his head;
His milk-white steed upon its haunches,
Or pawing into dead men's paunches:
As Overton has drawn his fire,
Still seen o'er many an ale-house fire.
Then from his arms hoarse thunder rolls,
As loud as fifty mustard-bowls;
For thunder still his arm supplies,
And lightning always in his eyes:
They both are cheap enough in conscience,
And serve to echo rattling nonsense.
The rumbling words march fierce along,
Made trebly dreadful in your song.

Sweet poet, hir'd for birth-day rhymes,
To sing of wars, choose peaceful times.
What though, for fifteen years and more,
Janus had lock'd his temple-door;
Though not a coffee-house we read in
Hath mention'd arms on this side Sweden;
Nor London Journals, nor the Postmen,
Though fond of warlike lies as most men;
Thou still with battles stuff thy head full:
For, must thy hero not be dreadful?

Dismissing Mars, it next must follow
Your conqueror is become Apollo:
That he's Apollo is as plain as
That Robin Walpole is Mæcenus;
But that he struts, and that he squints,
You'd know him by Apollo's prints.
Old Phœbus is but half as bright,
For yours can shine both day and night.
The first, perhaps, may once an age
Inspire you with poetic rage;
Your Phœbus Royal, every day,
Not only can inspire, but pay.

Then make this new Apollo fit
Sole patron, judge, and god of wit.
"How from his altitude he stoops
"To raise up virtue when she droops;
"On learning how his bounty flows,
"And with what justice he bestows:
"Fair Isis, and ye banks of Cam!
"Be witness if I tell a flam.
"What prodigies in arts we drain,
"From both your streams, in George's reign.
"As from the flowery bed of Nile"—

But here's enough to show your style.
Broad innuendos, such as this,
If well applied, can hardly miss:
For, when you bring your song in print,
He'll get it read, and take the hint,
(It must be read before 'tis warbled,
The paper gilt, and cover marbled)
And will be so much more your debtor,
Because he never knew a letter,
And, as he hears his wit and sense
(To which he never made pretence)
Set out in hyperbolic strains,
A guinea shall reward your pains:
For patrons never pay so well,
As when they scarce have learn'd to spell.

Next call him Neptune: with his trident
He rules the sea; you see him ride in't:
And, if provok'd, he soundly firsks his
Rebellions waves with rods, like Xerxes.

He would have seiz'd the Spanish plate,
Had not the fleet gone out too late;
And in their very ports besiege them,
But that he would not disoblige them;
And make the rascals pay him dearly
For those affronts they give him yearly.
'Tis not deny'd, that, when we write,
Our ink is black, our paper white;
And, when we scrawl our paper o'er,
We blacken what was white before;
I think this practice only fit

For dealers in satiric wit.
But you some white-lead ink must get,
And write on paper black as jet;
Your interest lies to learn the knack
Of whitening what before was black.

Thus your encomium, to be strong,
Must be applied directly wrong,
A tyrant for his mercy praise,
And crown a royal dunce with bays:
A squinting monkey load with charms,
And paint a coward fierce in arms.
Is he to avarice inclin'd?
Extol him for his generous mind:
And, when we starve for want of corn,
Come out with Amalthea's horn.
For all experience this evinces
The only art of pleasing princes:
For princes' love you should descant
On virtues which they know they want.
One compliment I had forgot,
But songsters must omit it not;
I freely grant the thought is old:
Why, then, your hero must be told,
In him such virtues lie inherent,
'To qualify him God's vicegerent;
That, with no title to inherit,
He must have been a king by merit.
Yet, be the fancy old or new,
'Tis partly false and partly true:

And, take it right, it means no more
Than George and William claim'd before.
Should some obscure inferior fellow,
Like Julius, or the Youth of Pella,
When all your list of gods is out,
Presume to show his mortal snout,
And as a deity intrude,
Because he had the world subdued;
Oh, let him not debase your thoughts,
Or name him but to tell his faults.

Of gods I only quote the best,
But you may hook in all the rest.

Now, birth-day bard, with joy proceed
To praise your empress and her breed.
First of the first, to vouch your lies,
Bring all the females of the skies;
The graces, and their mistress Venus,
Must venture down to entertain us:
With bended knees when they adore her,
What dowdies they appear before her!
Nor shall we think you talk at random,
For Venus might be her great grandam:
Six thousand years has liv'd the goddess,
Your heroine hardly fifty odd is.
Besides, your songsters oft have shown
That she hath graces of her own;
Three graces by Lucina brought her,
Just three; and every grace a daughter.

Here many a king his heart and crown
Shall at their snowy feet lay down;
In royal robes, they come by dozens
To court their English German cousins:
Besides a pair of princely babies,
That, five years hence, will both be Hebes.

Now see her seated in her throne

With genuine lustre, all her own:
Poor Cynthia never shone so bright,
Her splendour is but borrow'd light:
And only with her brother linkt
Can shine, without him is extinct.

But Carolina shines the clearer
With neither spouse nor brother near her;
And darts her beams o'er both our isles,
Though George is gone a thousand miles.
Thus Berecynthia takes her place,
Attended by her heavenly race;
And sees a son in every god,
Unaw'd by Jove's all-shaking nod.

Now sing his little Highness Freddy,
Who struts like any king already:
With so much beauty, show me any maid
That could resist this charming Ganymede!
Where majesty with sweetness vies,
And, like his father, early wife.
Then cut him out a world of work,
To conquer Spain, and quell the Turk:
Foretel his empire crown'd with bays,
And golden times, and halcyon days;
And swear his line shall rule the nation
For ever---till the conflagration.

But, now it runs into my mind,
We left a little Duke behind;
A Cupid in his face and size,
And only wants to want his eyes.
Make some provision for the younker,
Find him a kingdom out to conquer:
Prepare a fleet to waft him o'er,
Make Gulliver his commodore;
Into whose pocket valiant Willy put,
Will soon subdue the realm of Lilliput.

A skilful critic justly blames
Hard, tough, crank, guttural, harsh, stiff names.
The sense can ne'er be too jejune,
But smooth your words to fit the tune.
Hanover may do well enough,
But George and Brunswick are too rough:
Hesse-Darmstadt make a rugged sound,
And Guelph the strongest ear will wound.
In vain are all attempts from Germany
To find out proper words for harmony:
And yet I must except the Rhine,
Because it clicks to Caroline.

Hail! Queen of Britain, Queen of rhymes!
Be sung ten hundred thousand times!
Too happy were the poets' crew,
If their own happiness they knew:
Three syllables did never meet
So soft, so sliding, and so sweet:
Nine other tuneful words like that
Would prove ev'n Homer's numbers flat.
Behold three beauteous vowels stand,
With bridegroom liquids, hand in hand;
In concord here for ever fixt,
No jarring consonant betwixt.

May Caroline continue long,
For ever fair and young!--in song.

What though the royal carcase must,
Squeez'd in a coffin, turn'd to dust?
Those elements her name compose,
Like atoms are exempt from blows.

Though Caroline may fill your gaps,
Yet still you must consult your maps;
Find rivers with harmonious names,
Sebrina, Medway, and the Thames.
Britannia long will wear like steel,
But Albion's cliffs are out at heel;
And patience can endure no more
To hear the Belgic lion roar.

Give up the phrase of haughty Gaul,
But proud Iberia soundly maul:
Restore the ships by Philip taken,
And make him crouch to save his bacon.
Nassau, who got the name of Glorious
Because he never was victorious,
A hanger-on has always been;
For old acquaintance bring him in.

To Walpole you might lend a line,
But much I fear he's in decline;
And, if you chance to come too late,
When he goes out, you share his fate,
And bear the new successor's frown;
Or, whom you once sang up, sing down.

Reject with scorn that stupid notion,
To praise your hero for devotion;
Nor entertain a thought so odd,
That princes should believe in God;
But follow the securest rule,
And turn it all to ridicule:

'Tis grown the choicest wit at court,
And gives the maids of honour sport.
For, since they talk'd with Doctor Clarke,
They now can venture in the dark:
That sound Divine the truth hath spoke all,
And pawn'd his word, hell is not local.
This will not give them half the trouble
Of bargains sold, or meanings double.

Supposing now your song is done,
To Mynheer Handel next you run,
Who artfully will pare and prune
Your words to some Italian tune:
Then print it in the largest letter,
With capitals, the more the better.
Present it boldly on your knee,
And take a guinea for your fee.

BOUTS RIMES.

ON SIGNORA DOMITILLA.

Our school-master may rave i' th' fit
Of classic beauty hæc et illa,
Not all his birch inspires such wit.
As th' ogling beams of Domitilla.

Let nobles toast, in bright champain,
Nymphs higher born than Domitilla;
I'll drink her health, again, again,
In Berkeley's tar, or fars-parilla.

At Goodman's-Fields I've much admir'd
The postures strange of Monsieur Brilla;
But what are they to the soft step,
'The gliding air, of Domitilla?

Virgil has eterniz'd in song
The flying footsteps of Camilla:
Sure, as a prophet, he was wrong;
He might have dreamt of Domitilla.

Great Theodose condemn'd a town
For thinking ill of his Placilla;
And deuce take London, if some knight
O' th' city wed not Domitilla!

Wheeler, Sir George, in travels wise,
Gives us a medal of Plantilla;
But, oh! the empress has not eyes,
Nor lips, nor breast, like Domitilla.

Nor all the wealth of plunder'd Italy,
Pil'd on the mules of king At-tila,
Is worth one glove (I'll not tell a bit a lie)
Or garter, snatch'd from Domitilla.

Five years a nymph at certain hamlet,
Y-cleped Harrow of the Hill, a—
—bus'd much my heart, and was a dam'nd let
To verse—but now for Domitilla.

Dan Pope consigns Belinda's watch
To the fair Sylphid Momentilla,
And thus I offer up my catch
To th' snow-white hands of Domitilla.

HELTER SKELTER;

OR, THE HUE AND CRY AFTER THE ATTORNIES,
UPON THEIR RIDING THE CIRCUIT.

Now the active young attornies
Briskly travel on their journies,
Looking big as any giants,
On the horses of their clients;
Like so many little Mars's,
With their tilts at their a—s,
Brazen-hilted, lately burnish'd;
And with harness-buckles furnish'd,
And with whips and spurs so neat,
And with jockey-coats complete,
And with boots so very greasy.
And with saddles eke so easy;
And with bridles fine and gay,
Bridles borrow'd for a day;
Bridles destin'd far to roam,
Ah! never, never to come home.
And with hats so very big Sir;
And with powder'd caps and wigs, Sir;
And with ruffles to be shown,
Cambrick ruffles not their own;
And with Holland shirts so white,
Shirts becoming to the sight,
Shirts be-wrought with different letters,
As belonging to their betters;
With their pretty tinsel'd boxes,
Gotten from their dainty doxies;
And with rings so very trim,
Lately taken out of lim—
And with very little pence,
And as very little sense;
With some law, but little justice,
Having stolen from my hostess,
From the barber and the cutler,
Like the soldier from the sutler;

From the vintner and the tailor,
 Like the felon from the jailor;
 Into this and t' other county,
 Living on the public bounty;
 Thorough town and thorough village,
 All to plunder all to pillage;
 Thorough mountains, thorough valleys,
 Thorough stinking lanes and alleys;
 Some to—kiss with farmers' spouses,
 And make merry in their houses;
 Some to—tumble country wenches
 On their rushy-beds and benches,
 And, if they begin a fray,
 Draw their swords, and—run away;
 All to murder equity,
 And to take a double fee;
 Till the people all are quiet,
 And forget to broil and riot:
 Low in pocket, cow'd in courage,
 Safely glad to sup their porridge;
 And vacation's over—then,
 Hey, for London town again.

THE LOGICIANS REFUTED.

LOGICIANS have but ill defin'd,
 As rational, the human-kind.
 "Reason," they say, "belongs to man;"
 But let them prove it if they can.
 Wife Aristotle and Smigleſius,
 By ratiocinations specious,
 Have strove to prove with great precision,
 With definition and division,
Homo est ratione præditum:
 But, for my soul, I cannot credit 'em,
 And must, in spite of them maintain,
 That man and all his ways are vain;
 And that this boasted lord of nature
 Is both a weak and erring creature;
 That instinct is a surer guide
 Than reason-boasting mortals' pride;
 And that brute beasts are far before 'em,
Deus est anima brutorum.
 Who ever knew an honest brute
 At law his neighbour prosecute;
 Bring action for assault and battery,
 Or friend beguile with lies and flattery?
 O'er plains they ramble unconfin'd,
 No politics disturb their mind;
 They eat their meals, and take their sport,
 Nor know who's in or out at court.
 They never to the levee go,
 To treat as dearest friend, a foe:
 They never importune his grace,
 Nor ever cringe to men in place;
 Nor undertake a dirty job,
 Nor draw the quill to write for Bob:
 Fraught with invective they ne'er go
 To folks at Pater-noster-row.
 No judges, fiddlers, dancing-masters,
 No pick-pockets, or poetasters,
 Are known to honest quadrupeds:
 No single brute his fellows leads.
 Brutes never meet in bloody fray,
 Nor cut each other's throats for pay.
 Of beasts, it is confess'd, the ape
 Comes nearest us in human shape;

Like man, he imitates each fashion,
 And malice is his ruling passion:
 But, both in malice and grimaces,
 A courtier any ape surpasses:
 Behold him humbly cringing wait
 Upon the minister of state;
 View him soon after to inferiors
 Aping the conduct of superiors:
 He promises with equal air,
 And to perform takes equal care.
 He in his turn finds imitators:
 At court, the porters, lacquey's waiters,
 Their masters' manners still contract;
 And footmen lords and dukes can act.
 Thus, at the court, both great and small
 Behave alike; for all ape all.

THE PUPPET-SHOW.

THE life of man to represent,
 And turn it all to ridicule,
 Wit did a puppet-show invent,
 Where the chief actor is a fool.

The gods of old were logs of wood,
 And worship was to puppets paid;
 In antic dress the idol stood,
 And priest and people bow'd the head.

No wonder then, if art began
 The simple votaries to frame,
 To shape in timber foolish man,
 And consecrate the block to fame.

From hence poetic fancy learn'd
 That trees might rise from human forms,
 The body to a trunk be turn'd,
 And branches issue from the arms.

Thus Dædalus and Ovid too,
 That man's a blockhead, have confess'd;
 Powel and Stretch * the hint pursue;
 Life is a farce, the world a jest.

The same great truth South-Sea hath prov'd
 On that fam'd theatre, the alley;
 Where thousands, by directors mov'd,
 Are now sad monuments of folly.

What Momus was of old to Jove,
 The same a Harlequin is now;
 The former was buffoon above,
 The latter is a Punch below.

This fleeting scene is but a stage,
 Where various images appear;
 In different parts of youth and age
 Alike the prince and peasant share.

Some draw our eyes by being great,
 False pomp conceals mere wood within;
 And legislators rang'd in state
 Are oft' but wisdom in machine.

A stock may chance to wear a crown,
 And timber as a lord take place;
 A statue may put on a frown,
 And cheat us with a thinking face.

* Two famous puppet-show men.

Others are blindly led away,
 And made to act for ends unknown;
 By the mere spring of wires they play,
 And speak in language not their own.
 Too oft', alas! a scolding wife
 Ufurps a jolly fellow's throne;
 And many drink the cup of life,
 Mix'd and embitter'd by a Joan.
 In short, whatever men pursue,
 Of pleasure, folly, war, or love;
 This mimic race brings all to view:
 Alike they dress, they talk, they move.
 Go on, great Stretch, with artful hand,
 Mortals to please and to deride;
 And, when death breaks thy vital band,
 Thou shalt put on a puppet's pride.
 Thou shalt in puny wood be shown,
 Thy image shall preserve thy fame;
 Ages to come thy worth shall own,
 Point at thy limbs, and tell thy name.
 Tell Tom, he draws a farce in vain,
 Before he looks in nature's glass;
Puns cannot form a witty scene,
 Nor pedantry for humour pass.
 To make men act as senseless wood,
 And chatter in a mystic strain,
 Is a mere force on flesh and blood,
 And shows some error in the brain.
 He that would thus refine on thee,
 And turn thy stage into a school,
 The jest of Punch will ever be,
 And stand confest the greater fool.

THE GRAND QUESTION DEBATED:

Whether Hamilton's Bawn should be turned into a Barrack or a Malt-House. 1729.

Thus spoke to my lady the knight * full of care:
 " Let me have your advice in a weighty affair.
 " This Hamilton's bawn †, whilst it sticks on my
 " hand,
 " I lose by the house what I get by the land;
 " But how to dispose of it to the best bidder,
 " For a barrack ‡ or malt-house, we now must " consider.
 " First, let me suppose I make it a malt-house,
 " Here I have computed the profit will fall t' us;
 " There's nine hundred pounds for labour and
 " grain,
 " I increase it to twelve, so three hundred remain;
 " A handsome addition for wine and good cheer,
 " Three dishes a day, and three hogheads a year:
 " With a dozen large vessels my vault shall be
 " stor'd;
 " No little scrub joint shall come on my board;
 " And you and the Dean no more shall combine
 " To stint me at night to one bottle of wine;

* Sir Arthur Acheson, at whose seat this was written.

† A large old house, two miles from Sir Arthur's seat.

‡ The army in Ireland is lodged in strong buildings, over the whole kingdom, called barracks.

" Nor shall I, for his humour, permit you to pur-
 " loin
 " A stone and a quarter of beef from my furloin.
 " If I make it a barrack, the crown is my tenant;
 " My dear, I have ponder'd again and again on't:
 " In poundage and drawbacks I lose half my rent;
 " Whatever they give me, I must be content,
 " Or join with the court in every debate;
 " And rather than that, I would lose my estate."
 Thus ended the knight: thus began his meek
 " It must, and it shall be a barrack, my life. [wife:
 " I'm grown a mere mopus; no company comes,
 " But a rabble of tenants, and rusty dull * rums.
 " With parsons what lady can keep herself clean?
 " I'm all over daub'd when I sit by the Dean.
 " But if you will give us a barrack, my dear,
 " The captain, I'm sure, will always come here;
 " I then shall not value his Deanship a straw,
 " For the captain, I warrant, will keep him in " awe;
 " Or, should he pretend to be brisk and alert,
 " Will tell him that chaplains should not be so
 " pert;
 " That men of his coat should be minding their " prayers,
 " And not among ladies to give themselves airs."
 Thus argued my lady, but argued in vain;
 The knight his opinion resolv'd to maintain.
 But Hannah †, who listen'd to all that was past,
 And could not endure so vulgar a taste,
 As soon as her ladyship call'd to be dress'd,
 Cry'd, " Madam, why surely my master's posses't.
 " Sir Arthur the maltster! how fine it will sound!
 " I'd rather the bawn were sunk under ground.
 " But madam, I guess'd there would never come
 " good,
 " When I saw him so often with ‡ Darby and " Wood.
 " And now my dream's out; for I was a-dream'd
 " That I saw a huge rat—O dear, how I scream'd!
 " And after, methought, I had lost my new shoes;
 " And Molly, she said, I should hear some ill
 " news.
 " Dear madam, had you but the spirit to tease,
 " You might have a barrack whenever you please;
 " And, madam, I always believ'd you so stout,
 " That for twenty denials you would not give out.
 " If I had a husband like him, I purtest,
 " Till he gave me my will, I would give him
 " no rest;
 " And rather than come in the same pair of sheets
 " With such a cross man, I would lie in the streets;
 " But, madam, I beg you contrive and invent,
 " And worry him out, till he gives his consent.
 " Dear madam, whene'er of a barrack I think,
 " An I were to be hang'd, I can't sleep a wink:
 " For if a new crotchet comes into my brain,
 " I can't get it out, though I'd never so fain.
 " I fancy already a barrack contriv'd
 " At Hamilton's bawn, and the troop is arriv'd;

* A cant word in Ireland for a poor clergyman.

† My lady's waiting-woman.

‡ Two of Sir Arthur's managers.

" Of this to be sure Sir Arthur has warning,
 " And waits on the captain betimes the next
 " morning.
 " Now see, when they meet, how their honours
 " behave:
 " Noble captain, your servant"—" Sir Arthur,
 " your slave;
 " You honour me much"—" The honour is mine."
 " 'Tas a sad rainy night"—" But the morning
 " is fine."
 " Pray how does my lady?"—" My wife's at
 " your service."
 " I think I have seen her picture by Jervas."
 " Good morrow, good captain. I'll wait on you
 " down."
 " You shan't stir a foot."—" You'll think me a
 " clown:
 " For all the world, captain—" " Not half an
 " inch farther."
 " You must be obey'd!"—" Your servant, Sir
 " Arthur!
 " My humble respects to my lady unknown."
 " I hope you will use my house as your own."
 " Go bring me my smock, and leave off your
 " prate,
 " Thou hast certainly gotten a cup in thy pate."
 " Pray, madam, be quiet; what was it I said?
 " You had like to have put it quite out of my head.
 " Next day, to be sure, the captain will come,
 " At the head of his troops, with trumpet and
 " drum.
 " Now, madam, observe how he marches in state:
 " The man with the kettle-drum enters the gate:
 " Dub, dub, adub, dub. The trumpeters follow,
 " Tantara, tantara; while all the boys hollow.
 " See how comes the captain all daub'd with " gold lace:
 " O la! the sweet gentleman! look in his face;
 " And see how he rides like a lord of the land,
 " With the fine flaming sword that he holds in
 " his hand;
 " And his horse, the dear creter, it prances and
 " rears;
 " With ribbons in knots at its tail and its ears:
 " At last comes the troop, by the word of command,
 " Drawn up in the court; when the captain cries,
 " STAND!
 " Your ladyship lifts up the sash to be seen
 " (For sure I had dixen'd you out like a queen).
 " The captain, to show he is proud of the favour,
 " Looks up to your window, and cocks up his
 " beaver
 " (His beaver is cock'd; pray, madam, mark that,
 " For a captain of horse never takes off his hat,
 " Because he has never a hand that is idle;
 " For the right holds the sword, and the left
 " holds the bridle).
 " Then flourishes thrice his sword in the air.
 " As a compliment due to a lady so fair;
 " (How I tremble to think of the blood it hath
 " spilt!) [the hilt.
 " Then he lowers down the point, and kisses
 " Your ladyship smiles, and thus you begin;
 " Pray, captain, be pleas'd to alight and walk in."
 " The captain salutes you with congee profound,
 " And your ladyship curtsies half way to the
 " ground.

" Kit, run to your master, and bid him come
 " to us;
 " I'm sure he'll be proud of the honour you do us.
 " And, captain, you'll do us the favour to stay,
 " And take a short dinner here with us to-day:
 " You're heartily welcome; but as for good cheer;
 " You come in the very worst time of the year:
 " If I had expected so worthy a guest—"
 " Lord, madam! your ladyship sure is in jest:
 " You banter me, madam; the kingdom must
 " grant—"
 " You officers, captain, are so complaisant!"
 " Hift, huffy, I think I hear somebody coming."
 " No, madam; 'tis only Sir Arthur a-humming.
 " To shorten my tale (for I hate a long story),
 " The captain at dinner appears in his glory;
 " The dean and the * doctor have humbled their
 " pride,
 " For the captain's entreated to sit by your side;
 " And, because he's their betters, you carve for
 " him first;
 " The parsons for envy are ready to burst.
 " The servants amaz'd are scarce ever able " To keep off their eyes, as they wait at the " table,
 " And Molly and I have thrust in our nose
 " To peep at the captain in all his fine clo'es.
 " Dear madam, be sure he's a fine-spoken man,
 " Do but here on the clergy how glib his tongue
 " ran;
 " And, madam, says he, if such dinners you give,
 " You'll ne'er want for parsons as long as you
 " live.
 " I ne'er knew a parson without a good nose;
 " But the devil's as welcome wherever he goes:
 " G—d—n me! they bid us reform and repent,
 " But, z—ds! by their looks they never keep Lent.
 " Mister Curate, for all your grave looks, I'm " afraid
 " You cast a sheep's eye on her ladyship's maid:
 " I wish she would lend you her pretty white hand
 " In mending your cassock, and smoothing your " band
 " (For the Dean was so shabby, and look'd like
 " a ninny,
 " That the captain suppos'd he was curate to " Jinny).
 " Whenever you see a cassock and gown,
 " A hundred to one but it covers a clown.
 " Observe how a parson comes into a room;
 " G—d—n me! he hobbles as bad as my groom;
 " A scholard, when just from his college broke
 " loose,
 " Can hardly tell how to cry bo to a goose;
 " Your † Novels, and Bluturcks, and Omnus,
 " and stuff,
 " By G—, they don't signify this pinch of snuff.
 " To give a young gentleman right education,
 " The army's the only good school in the nation;
 " My school-master call'd me a dunce and a fool,
 " But at cuffs I was always the cock of the " school:

* Doctor Jinny, a clergyman in the neighbourhood.

† Ovids, Plutarchs, Homers.

" I never could take to my book for the blood
 " o' me,
 " And the puppy confess'd he expected no good
 " o' me.
 " He caught me one morning coquetting his wife ;
 " But he maul'd me, I ne'er was so maul'd in
 " my life :
 " So I took to the road, and, what's very odd,
 " The first man I robb'd was a parson, by G---.
 " Now, madam, you'll think it a strange thing
 " to say,
 " But the sight of a book makes me sick to this " day."
 " Never since I was born did I hear so much wit,
 " And, madam, I laugh'd till I thought I should " split.
 " So then you look'd scornful, and snift at the Dean,
 " As who should say, Now am I † skinny and lean ?
 " But he durst not so much as once open his lips,
 " And the doctor was plaguily down in the hips.
 Thus merciless Hannah ran on in her talk,
 Till she heard the Dean call, " Will your lady-
 " ship walk ?"
 Her ladyship answers, " I'm just coming down :"
 Then, turning to Hannah, and forcing a frown,
 Although it was plain in her heart she was glad,
 Cry'd, " Huffy, why sure the wench is gone mad !
 " How could these chimeras get into your brains?--
 " Come hither, and take this old gown for your " pains,
 " But the Dean, if this secret should come to
 " his ears,
 " Will never have done with his gibes and his
 " jeers :
 " For your life, not a word of the matter, I
 " charge ye :
 " Give me but a barrack, a fig for the Clergy."

TO DEAN SWIFT.

BY SIR ARTHUR ACHESON.

Good cause have I to sing and vapour,
 For I am landlord to the Drapier :
 He that of every ear's the charmer,
 Now condescends to be my farmer,
 And grace my villa with his strains.
 Lives such a bard on British plains ?
 No ; not in all the British court ;
 For none but wittings there resort,
 Whose names and works (though dead) are made
 Immortal by the Dunciad ;
 And, sure as monument of brass,
 Their fame to future times shall pass,
 How, with a weakly warbling tongue,
 Of brazen knight they vainly sung :
 A subject for their genius fit ;
 He dares defy both sense and wit.
 What dares he not ? He can, we know it,
 A laureat make that is no poet ;
 A judge, without the least pretence
 To common law, or common sense ;
 A bishop that is no divine ;
 And coxcombs in red ribbons shine :

† Nick-names for my lady.

Nay, he can make, what's greater far,
 A middle state 'twixt peace and war ;
 And say, there shall, for years together,
 Be peace and war, and both, and neither.
 Happy, O Market-hill ! at least,
 That court and courtiers have no taste :
 You never else had known the Dean,
 But, as of old, obscurely lain ;
 All things gone on the same dull track,
 And Drapier's-hill * been still Drumlack ;
 But now your name with Penshurst vies,
 And wing'd with fame shall reach the skies.

DRAPIER'S-HILL.

We give the world to understand,
 Our thriving Dean has purchas'd land ;
 A purchase which will bring him clear
 Above his rent four pounds a year ;
 Provided, to improve the ground,
 He will but add two hundred pound ;
 And, from his endless hoarded store,
 To build a house, five hundred more.
 Sir Arthur too shall have his will,
 And call the mansion Drapier's-hill :
 That, when a nation, long enslav'd,
 Forgets by whom it once was sav'd ;
 When none the Drapier's praise shall sing ;
 His signs aloft no longer swing ;
 His medals and his prints forgotten ;
 And all his † handkerchiefs are rotten ;
 His famous letters made waste-paper ;
 This hill may keep the name of Drapier ;
 In spite of envy, flourish still,
 And Drapier's vie with Cooper's hill.

THE DEAN'S REASONS

FOR NOT BUILDING AT DRAPIER'S-HILL.

I WILL not build on yonder mount :
 And, should you call me to account,
 Consulting with myself, I find
 It was no levity of mind.
 Whate'er I promis'd or intended,
 No fault of mine, the scheme is ended :
 Nor can you tax me as unsteady,
 I have a hundred causes ready ;
 All risen since that flattering time,
 When Drapier's-hill appear'd in rhyme.
 I am, as now too late I find,
 The greatest cully of mankind :
 The lowest boy in Martin's school
 May turn and wind me like a fool.
 How could I form so wild a vision,
 To seek, in deserts, Fields Elysian ?
 To live in fear, suspicion, variance,
 With thieves, fanatics, and barbarians ?

* The Dean gave this name to a farm called Drumlack, which he rented of Sir Arthur Acheson, whose seat lay between that and Market-hill ; and intended to build an house upon it, but afterwards changed his mind.

† Medals were cast, many signs hung up, and handkerchiefs made with devices, in honour of the Dean, under the name of M. B. Drapier.

THE WORKS OF SWIFT.

But here my Lady will object :
Your Deanship ought to recollect,
That, near the Knight of Gosford plac'd,
Whom you allow a man of taste,
Your intervals of time to spend
With so conversable a friend,
It would not signify a pin
Whatever climate you were in.
'Tis true, but what advantage comes
To me from all a usurer's plumbs;
Though I should see him twice a day,
And am his neighbour cross the way;
If all my rhetoric must fail
To strike him for a pot of ale?

Thus, when the learned and the wise
Conceal their talents from our eyes,
And from deserving friends withhold
Their gifts, as misers do their gold;
Their knowledge to themselves confin'd
Is the same avarice of mind;
Nor makes their conversation better,
Than if they never knew a letter.
Such is the fate of Gosford's Knight,
Who keeps his wisdom out of sight;
Whose uncommunicative heart
Will scarce one precious word impart:
Still rapt in speculations deep,
His outward senses fast asleep;
Who, while I talk, a song will hum,
Or, with his fingers, beat the drum;
Beyond the skies transports his mind,
And leaves a lifeless corpse behind.

But, as for me, who ne'er could clamber high,
To understand Malebranche or Cambray;
Who send my mind (as I believe) less
Than others do, on errands sleeveless;
Can listen to a tale humdrum,
And with attention read Tom Thumb;
My spirits with my body propping,
Both hand in hand together jogging;
Sunk over head and ears in matter,
Nor can of metaphysics smatter;
Am more diverted with a quibble,
Than dream of worlds intelligible;
And think all notions too abstracted
Are like the ravings of a crackt head;
What intercourse of minds can be
Betwixt the knight sublime and me,
If when I talk, as talk I must,
It is but prating to a bust?

Where friendship is by Fate design'd,
It forms an union in the mind:
But here I differ from the Knight
In every point, like black and white:
For none can say that ever yet
We both in one opinion met;
Not in philosophy, or ale;
In state affairs, or planting cale;
In rhetoric, or picking straws;
In roasting larks, or making laws;
In public schemes, or catching flies;
In parliaments, or pudding-pies.

The neighbours wonder why the Knight
Should in a country life delight,
Who not one pleasure entertains
To cheer the solitary scenes:
His guests are few, his visits rare;
Nor uses time, nor time will spare;

Nor rides, nor walks, nor hunts, nor fowls,
Nor plays at cards, or dice, or bowls;
But, seated in an easy chair,
Despises exercise and air.
His rural walks he ne'er adorns:
Here poor Pomona sits on thorns;
And there neglected Flora settles
Her bum upon a bed of nettles.

Those thankless and officious cares
I us'd to take in friends' affairs,
From which I never could refrain,
And have been often chid in vain;
From these I am recover'd quite,
At least in what regards the knight.
Preserve his health, his store increase;
May nothing interrupt his peace!
But now let all his tenants round
First milk his cows, and after, pound:
Let every cottager conspire
To cut his hedges down for fire:
The naughty boys about the village
His crabs and sloes may freely pillage:
He still may keep a pack of knaves
To spoil his work, and work by halves:
His meadows may be dug by swine,
It shall be no concern of mine.
For why should I continue still
To serve a friend against his will?

A PANEGYRIC ON THE DEAN,

IN THE PERSON OF A LADY IN THE NORTH.

1730.

RESOLV'D my gratitude to show,
Thrice reverend Dean, for all I owe,
Too long I have my thanks delay'd,
Your favours left too long unpaid;
But now, in all our sex's name,
My artless muse shall sing your fame.

Indulgent you to female kind,
To all their weaker sides are blind;
Nine more such champions as the Dean
Would soon restore our ancient reign.
How well, to win the ladies' hearts,
You celebrate their wit and parts!
How have I felt my spirits rais'd,
By you so oft, so highly prais'd!
Transform'd by your convincing tongue
To witty, beautiful, and young,
I hope to quit that awkward shame,
Affected by each vulgar dame,
To modesty a weak pretence;
And soon grow pert on men of sense;
To show my face with scornful air;
Let others match it, if they dare.

Impatient to be out of debt,
Oh, may I never once forget
The bard who humbly deigns to choose
Me for the subject of his Muse!
Behind my back, before my nose,
He sounds my praise in verse and prose.

My heart with emulation burns
To make you suitable returns:
My gratitude the world shall know;
And see, the printer's boy below;

* The lady of Sir Arthur Acheson.

Ye hawkers all, your voices lift;
 "A Panegyric on Dean Swift!"
 And then, to mend the matter still,
 "By Lady Anne of Market-hill."

I thus begin: My grateful Muse
 Salutes the Dean in different views;
 Dean, butler, usher, jester, tutor;
 * Robert and Darby's coadjutor:
 And, as you in commission sit,
 To rule the dairy next to † Kit.

In each capacity I mean
 To sing your praise. And first as Dean:
 Envy must own, you understand your
 Precedence, and support your grandeur;
 Nor of your rank will bate an ace,
 Except to give Dean Daniel place.
 In you such dignity appears;
 So suited to your state and years!
 With ladies what a strict decorum!
 With what devotion you adore 'em!
 Treat me with so much complaisance,
 As fits a princess in romance!
 By your example and assistance,
 The fellows learn to know their distance.
 Sir Arthur, since you set the pattern,
 No longer calls me snipe and flattern;
 Nor dares he, though he were a duke,
 Offend me with the least rebuke.

Proceed we to your ‡ preaching next:
 How nice you split the hardest text!
 How your superior learning shines
 Above our neighbouring dull divines!
 At Beggars' Opera not so full pit
 Is seen, as when you mount our pulpit.

Consider now your conversation:
 Regardful of your age and station,
 You ne'er was known, by passion stirr'd,
 To give the least offensive word;
 But still, whene'er you silence break,
 Watch every syllable you speak:
 Your style so clear, and so concise,
 We never ask to hear you twice.
 But then, a parson, so genteel,
 So nicely clad from head to heel;
 So fine a gown, a band so clean,
 As well become St. Patrick's Dean,
 Such reverential awe expresses,
 That cow-boys know you by your dress!
 Then, if our neighbouring friends come here,
 How proud are we when you appear,
 With such address and graceful port,
 As clearly shows you bred at court!

Now raise your spirits, Mr. Dean,
 I lead you to a nobler scene.
 When to the vault you walk in state,
 In quality of butler's-mate;
 You next to § Dennis bear the sway:
 To you we often trust the key:
 Nor can he judge with all his art
 So well, what bottle holds a quart;

* The names of two overseers.

† My lady's footman.

‡ The author preached but once while he was there.

§ The Butler.

What pints may best for bottles pass,
 Just to give every man his glass;
 When proper to produce the best,
 And what may serve a common guest.
 With Dennis you did ne'er combine,
 Not you, to steal your master's wine;
 Except a bottle now and then,
 To welcome brother serving-men:
 But that is with a good design,
 To drink Sir Arthur's health and mine;
 Your master's honour to maintain,
 And get the like returns again.

Your * usher's post must next be handled
 How blest'd am I by such a man led!
 Under whose wise and careful guardship
 I now despise fatigue and hardship:
 Familiar grown to dirt and wet,
 Though daggled round, I scorn to fret:
 From you my chamber-damsels learn
 My broken hose to patch and dearn.

Now as a jester I accost you;
 Which never yet one friend has lost you.
 You judge so nicely to a hair,
 How far to go, and when to spare;
 By long experience grown so wise,
 Of every taste to know the size;
 There 's none so ignorant or weak
 † To take offence at what you speak.
 Whene'er you joke, 'tis all a case
 Whether with Dermot, or His Grace;
 With Teague O'Murphey, or an earl;
 A duchess, or a kitchen-girl.
 With such dexterity you fit
 Their several talents with your wit,
 That Moll the chamber-maid can smoke,
 And Gahagan ‡ take every joke.

I now become your humble suitor
 To let you praise you as my § tutor.
 Poor I, a savage bred and born,
 By you instructed every morn,
 Already have improv'd so well,
 That I have almost learnt to spell:
 The neighbours who come here to dine,
 Admire to hear me speak so fine.
 How enviously the ladies look,
 When they surprise me at my book!
 And sure as they're alive at night,
 As soon as gone will show their spight:
 Good lord! what can my lady mean,
 Conversing with that rusty Dean!
 She 's grown so nice, and so penurious,
 With Socrates and Epicurius.
 How could she sit the live-long day,
 Yet never ask us once to play?

But I admire your patience most;
 That when I 'm duller than a post,
 Nor can the plainest word pronounce,
 You neither fume, nor fret, nor flounce;

* He sometimes used to walk with the lady.

† The neighbouring ladies were no great understanders of raillery.

‡ The clown that cut down the old thorn at Market-hill.

§ In bad weather the author used to direct my lady in her reading.

Are so indulgent, and so mild,
As if I were a darling child.
So gentle is your whole proceeding,
That I could spend my life in reading.
You merit new employments daily:
Our thatcher, ditcher, gardener, baily.
And to a genius so extensive
No work is grievous or offensive;
Whether your fruitful fancy lies
To make for pigs convenient styes;
Or ponder long with anxious thought
To banish rats that haunt our vault:
Nor have you grumbled, reverend Dean,
To keep our poultry sweet and clean;
To sweep the mansion-house they dwell in,
And cure the rank unsavory smelling.

Now enter as the dairy hand-maid;
Such charming * butter never man made.
Let others with fanatic face
Talk of their milk for babes of grace;
From tubs their snuffling nonsense utter:
Thy milk shall make us tubs of butter.
The bishop with his foot may burn it †.
But with his hand the Dean can churn it.
How are the servants overjoy'd
To see thy Deanship thus employ'd!
Instead of poring on a book,
Providing butter for the cook!
Three morning hours you tofs and shake
The bottle till your fingers ake:
Hard is the toil, nor small the art,
The butter from the whey to part:
Behold a frothy substance rise;
Be cautious, or your bottle flies.
The butter comes, our fears are ceas'd;
And out you squeeze an ounce at least.

Your reverence thus, with like success
(Nor is your skill or labour less),
When bent upon some smart lampoon,
Will tofs and turn your brain till noon;
Which, in its jumbings round the skull,
Dilates and makes the vessel full:
While nothing comes but froth at first,
You think your giddy head will burst;
But, squeezing out four lines in rhyme,
Are largely paid for all your time.

But you have rais'd your generous mind
To works of more exalted kind.
Palladio was not half so skill'd in
The grandeur or the art of building.
Two temples of magnific size
Attract the curious traveller's eyes,
That might be envy'd by the Greeks;
Rais'd up by you in twenty weeks:
Here gentle goddess Cloacine
Receives all offerings at her shrine.
In separate cells the he's and she's
Here pay their vows with bended knees;
For 'tis profane when sexes mingle,
And every nymph must enter single,

* A way of making butter for breakfast, by filling a bottle with cream, and shaking it till the butter comes.

† It is a common saying, when the milk burns-so, that the devil or the bishop has set his foot in it, the devil having been called bishop of hell.

And when she feels an inward motion,
Come fill'd with reverence and devotion.
The bashful maid, to hide our blush,
Shall creep no more behind a bush;
Here unobserv'd she boldly goes,
As who should say, to pluck a rose.

Ye who frequent this hallow'd scene;
Be not ungrateful to the Dean;
But duly, ere you leave your station,
Offer to him a pure libation
Or of his own or Smedley's lay,
Or billet-doux, or lock of hay:
And, oh! may all who hither come,
Return with unpolluted thumb!

Yet, when your lofty domes I praise,
I sigh to think of ancient days.
Permit me then to raise my style,
And sweetly moralize a while.

Thee, bounteous goddess Cloacine,
To temples why do we confine?
Forbid in open air to breathe,
Why are thine altars fixt beneath?

When Saturn rul'd the skies alone
(That golden age to gold unknown),
This earthly globe, to thee assign'd,
Receiv'd the gifts of all mankind.
Ten thousand altars smoking round
Were built to thee with offerings crown'd:
And here they daily votaries plac'd
Their sacrifice with zeal and haste:
The margin of a purling stream
Sent up to thee a grateful steam
(Though sometimes thou wert pleas'd to wink,
If Naiads swept them from the brink).
Or where appointing lovers rove,
The shelter of a shady grove;
Or, offer'd in some flowery vale,
Were wafted by a gentle gale:
There many a flower absterfve grew,
The favourite flowers of yellow hue;
The crocus, and the daffodil,
The cowslip soft, and sweet jonquil.

But when at last usurping Jove
Old Saturn from his empire drove;
Then gluttony with greasy paws
Her napkin pinn'd up to her jaws,
With watery chaps, and wagging chin,
Brac'd like a drum her oily skin;
Wedg'd in a spacious elbow-chair,
And on her plate a treble share,
As if she ne'er could have enough,
Taught harmless man to cram and stuff.
She sent her priest in wooden shoes
From haughty Gaul to make ragoos;
Instead of wholesome bread and cheese,
To dress their soups and fricassees;
And, for our home-bred British cheer,
Botargo, catsup, and caveer.

This bloated harpy, sprung from hell,
Confin'd thee, goddess, to a cell:
Sprung from her womb that impious line,
Contemners of thy rights divine.
First, lolling sloth in woollen cap
Taking her after-dinner nap:
Pale dropsy with a fallow face,
Her belly burst, and slow her pace;
And lordly gout, wrapt up in fur;
And wheezing asthma, loth to stir:

Voluptuous ease, the child of wealth,
 Infecting this our hearts by stealth.
 None seek thee now in open air,
 To thee no verdant altars rear;
 But in their cells and vaults obscene
 Present a sacrifice unclean;
 From whence unfavoury vapours rose,
 Offensive to thy nicer nose.
 Ah! who, in our degenerate days,
 As nature prompts, his offering pays?
 Here nature never difference made
 Between the sceptre and the spade.

Ye great ones, why will ye disdain
 To pay your tribute on the plain?
 Why will you place, in lazy pride,
 Your altars near your coaches' side;
 When from the homeliest earthen ware
 Are sent up offerings more sincere,
 Than where the haughty dukes locks
 Her silver vase in cedar box?

Yet some devotion still remains
 Among our harmless northern swains,
 Whose offerings, plac'd in golden ranks,
 Adorn our crystal rivers' banks;
 Nor seldom grace the flowery downs,
 With spiry tops and copple-crowns;
 Or gilding in a sunny morn
 The humble branches of a thorn.
 So, poets sing, with golden bough
 The Trojan hero paid his vow.

Hither, by luckless error led,
 The crude consistence oft' I tread:
 Here, when my shoes are out of case,
 Unweeting gild the tarnish'd lace;
 Here by the sacred bramble ting'd,
 My petticoat is doubly fring'd.

Be witness for me, nymph divine,
 I never robb'd thee with design:
 Nor will the zealous Hannah pout
 To wash thy injur'd offering out.

But stop, ambitious Muse, in time,
 Nor dwell on subjects too sublime.
 In vain on lofty heels I tread,
 Aspiring to exalt my head;
 With hoop expanded wide and light,
 In vain I tempt too high a flight.

Me Phœbus in a midnight dream
 Accosting said, "Go shake your cream."
 Be humbly minded, know your post;
 Sweeten your tea, and watch your toast.
 Thee best befits a lowly style:
 Teach Dennis how to stir the † guile:
 With ‡ Peggy Dixon thoughtful sit,
 Contriving for the pot and spit.
 Take down thy proudly swelling sails,
 And rub thy teeth, and pare thy nails:
 At nicely carving show thy wit;
 But ne'er presume to eat a bit:
 Turn every way thy watchful eye;
 And every guest be sure to ply:
 Let never at your board be known
 An empty plate, except your own.
 Be these thy arts; nor higher aim
 Than what befits a rural dame.

* In the bottle, to make butter.

† The quantity of ale or beer brewed at one time.

‡ Mrs. Dixon, the housekeeper.

But Cloacina, goddess bright,
 Sleek ——— claims her as his right:
 And Smedley, flower of all divines,
 Shall sing the Dean in Smedley's lines.

TWELVE ARTICLES.

- I. LEST it may more quarrels breed,
 I will never hear you read.
- II. By disputing, I will never,
 To convince you, once endeavour.
- III. When a paradox you stick to,
 I will ne'er contradict you.
- IV. When I talk, and you are heedless,
 I will show no anger needful.
- V. When your speeches are absurd,
 I will ne'er object a word.
- VI. When you furious argue wrong,
 I will grieve, and hold my tongue.
- VII. Not a jest or humorous story
 Will I ever tell before ye:
 To be chidden for explaining,
 When you quite mistake the meaning.
- VIII. Never more will I suppose,
 You can taste my verse or prose.
- IX. You no more at me shall fret,
 While I teach, and you forget.
- X. You shall never hear me thunder,
 When you blunder on, and blunder.
- XI. Show your poverty of spirit,
 And in dress place all your merit;
 Give yourself ten thousand airs;
 That with me shall break no squares.
- XII. Never will I give advice,
 Till you please to ask me thrice:
 Which if you in scorn reject,
 'Twill be just as I expect.

Thus we both shall have our ends,
 And continue special friends.

THE REVOLUTION.

AT MARKET-HILL, 1730.

FROM distant regions Fortune sends
 An odd triumvirate of friends;
 Where Phœbus pays a scanty stipend,
 Where never yet a codlin ripen'd:
 Hither the frantic goddess draws
 Three sufferers in a ruin'd cause:
 By faction banish'd, here unite,
 A Dean*, a Spaniard†, and a Knight‡;
 Unite, but on conditions cruel:
 The Dean and Spaniard find it too well,
 Condemn'd to live in service hard;
 On either side his honour's guard:
 The Dean, to guard his honour's back,
 Must build a castle at Drumlack;
 The Spaniard, fore against his will,
 Must raise a fort at Market-hill.

* Dr. Swift.

† Col. Harry Leslie, who served and lived long in Spain.

‡ Sir Arthur Acheson.

And thus the pair of humble gentry
At north and south are posted centry;
While, in his lordly castle fixt,
The Knight triumphant reigns betwixt:
And, what the wretches most resent,
To be his slaves, must pay him rent;
Attend him daily as their chief,
Decant his wine, and carve his beef.
Oh, Fortune! 'tis a scandal for thee
To smile on those who are least worthy:
Weigh but the merits of the three,
His slaves have ten times more than he.

Proud Baronet of Nova Scotia!
The Dean and Spaniard must reproach ye:
Of their two fames the world enough rings:
Where are thy services and sufferings?
What if for nothing once you kist,
Against the grain, a monarch's fist?
What if, among the courtly tribe,
You lost a place, and sav'd a bribe?
And then in surly mood came here
To fifteen hundred pounds a year,
And fierce against the Whigs harangu'd?
You never ventur'd to be hang'd.
How dare you treat your betters thus?
Are you to be compar'd with us?

Come, Spaniard, let us from our farms
Call forth our cottagers to arms;
Our forces let us both unite,
Attack the foe at left and right;
From Market-hill's exalted head,
Full northward let your troops be led;
While I from Drapier's mount descend,
And to the south my squadrons bend.
New-river-walk with friendly shade
Shall keep my host in ambushade;
While you, from where the bason stands,
Shall scale the rampart with your hands.
Nor need we doubt the fort to win;
I hold intelligence within.
True, Lady Anne no danger fears,
Brave as the Upton fan she wears;
Then, left upon our first attack
Her valiant arm should force us back,
And we of all our hopes depriv'd;
I have a stratagem contriv'd.
By these embroider'd high-heel'd shoes
She shall be caught as in a noose;
So well contriv'd her toes to pinch,
She'll not have power to stir an inch.
These gaudy shoes must Hannah place
Direct before her lady's face;
The shoes put on, our faithful portress
Admits us in, to storm the fortress;
While tortur'd Madam bound remains,
Like Montezume, in golden chains;
Or like a cat with walnuts shod,
Stumbling at every step she trod.
My hunters thus, in Borneo's isle,
To catch a monkey by a wile,
The mimic animal amuse;
They place before him gloves and shoes;
Which when the brute puts awkward on,
All his agility is gone:
In vain to frisk or climb he tries;
The huntsmen seize the grinning prize.

But let us on our first assault
Secure the larder and the vault:

The valiant Dennis * you must fix on,
And I'll engage with Peggy Dixon†:
Then, if we once can seize the key
And chest that keeps my lady's tea,
They must surrender at discretion;
And, soon as we have gain'd possession,
We'll act as other conquerors do,
Divide the realm between us two:
Then (let me see) we'll make the knight
Our clerk, for he can read and write;
But must not think, I tell him that,
Like Lorimer‡ to wear his hat:
Yet, when we dine without a friend,
We'll place him at the lower end.
Madam, whose skill does all in dress lie,
May serve to wait on Mrs. Leslie;
But, lest it might not be so proper
That her own maid should over-top her,
To mortify the creature more,
We'll take her heels five inches lower.

For Hannah, when we have no need of her,
'Twill be our interest to get rid of her:
And, when we execute our plot,
'Tis best to hang her on the spot;
As all your politicians wise
Dispatch the rogues by whom they rise.

TR A U L U S.

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN TOM AND ROBIN. 1730.

The First Part.

Tom. SAY, Robin, what can Traulus || mean
By bellowing thus against the Dean?
Why does he call him paltry scribbler,
Papist, Jacobite, and Libeller;
Yet cannot prove a single fact?

Robin. Forgive him, Tom; his head is crackt.

T. What mischief can the Dean have done him,
That Traulus calls for vengeance on him?
Why must he sputter, spawl, and flaver it
In vain against the people's favourite?
Revile that nation-saving paper,
Which gave the Dean the name of Drapier?

R. Why, Tom, I think the case is plain;
Party and spleen have turn'd his brain.

T. Such friendship never man profess,
The Dean was never so carest;
For Traulus long his rancour nurs'd,
Till, God knows why, at last it burst.
That clumsy outside of a porter,
How could it thus conceal a courtier?

R. I own, appearances are bad;
Yet still insist the man is mad.

T. Yet many a wretch in Bedlam knows
How to distinguish friends from foes;
And, though perhaps among the rout
He wildly flings his filth about,
He still has gratitude and sap'ence,
To spare the folks that give him ha'pence;
Nor in their eyes at random pisses,
But turns aside like mad Ulysses:

* The Butler.

† The housekeeper.

|| Lord Allen.

‡ The agent.

While Traulus all his ordure scatters
To foul the man he chiefly flatters.
Whence come these inconsistent fits?

R. Why, Tom, the man has lost his wits.

T. Agreed: and yet, when Towzer snaps
At people's heels with frothy chaps,
Hangs down his head, and drops his tail,
To say he's mad, will not avail;
The neighbours all cry, "Shoot him dead,
"Hang, drown, or knock him on the head."
So Traulus when he first harangu'd,
I wonder why he was not hang'd:
For of the two, without dispute,
Towzer's the less offensive brute.

R. Tom, you mistake the matter quite;
Your barking curs will seldom bite;
And though you hear him stut-tut-tut-ter,
He barks as fast as he can utter.
He prates in spite of all impediment,
While none believes that what he said he meant;
Puts in his finger and his thumb
To grope for words, and out they come.
He calls you rogue; there's nothing in it,
He fawns upon you in a minute:
"Begg leave to rail, but d—n his blood!"
"He only meant it for your good:"
"His friendship was exactly tim'd,"
"He shot before your foes were prim'd."
"By this contrivance, Mr. Dean,
"By G—t I'll bring you off as clean—"
Then let him use you e'er so rough,
"Twas all for love," and that's enough.
But, though he sputter through a session,
It never makes the least impression:
Whate'er he speaks for madness goes,
With no effect on friends or foes.

T. The scrubbiest cur in all the pack
Can set the mastiff on your back.
I own, his madness is a jest,
If that were all. But he's possest,
Incarnate with a thousand imps,
To work whose ends his madness pimps;
Who o'er each string and wire preside,
Fill every pipe, each motion guide;
Directing every vice we find
In Scripture, to the devil assign'd;
Sent from the dark infernal region,
In him they lodge, and make him legion.
Of brethren he's a false accuser;
A slanderer, traitor, and seducer;
A fawning, base, trepanning liar;
The marks peculiar of his fire.
Or, grant him but a drone at best,
A drone can raise a hornet's nest.
The Dean had felt their stings before;
And must their malice ne'er give o'er?
Still swarm and buzz about his nose?
But Ireland's friends ne'er wanted foes.
A patriot is a dangerous post,
When wanted by his country most;
Perversely comes in evil times,
Where virtues are imputed crimes.
His guilt is clear, the proofs are pregnant;
A traitor to the vices regnant.

* This is the usual excuse of Traulus, when he abuses you to others without provocation.

What spirit, since the world began,
Could always bear to strive with man?
Which God pronounc'd, he never would,
And soon convinc'd them by a flood.
Yet still the Dean on freedom raves;
His spirit always strives with slaves.
'Tis time at last to spare his ink,
And let them rot, or hang, or sink.

TRAULUS.

The Second Part.

TRAULUS, of amphibious breed,
Motely fruit of mungrel seed;
By the dam from lordlings sprung,
By the fire exhal'd from dung:
Think on every vice in both;
Look on him, and see their growth.

View him on the mother's side,
Fill'd with falsehood, spleen, and pride;
Positive and overbearing,
Changing still, and still adhering;
Spiteful, peevish, rude, untoward,
Fierce in tongue, in heart a coward;
When his friends he most is hard on,
Cringing comes to beg their pardon;
Reputation ever tearing,
Ever dearest friendship swearing;
Judgment weak, and passion strong,
Always various, always wrong;
Provocation never waits,
Where he loves, or where he hates;
Talks whate'er comes in his head;
Wishes it were all unsaid.

Let me now the vices trace,
From the father's scoundrel race.
Who could give the booby such airs?
Were they masons, were they butchers?
Herald, lend the muse an answer
From his atawus and grandfire:
This was dextrous at his trowel,
That was bred to kill a cow well:
Hence the greasy clumsy mien
In his dress and figure seen;
Hence the mean and sordid soul,
Like his body, rank and foul;
Hence that wild suspicious peep,
Like a rogue that steals a sheep;
Hence he learnt the butcher's guile,
How to cut your throat and smile;
Like a butcher, doom'd for life
In his mouth to wear his knife;
Hence he draws his daily food
From his tenants' vital blood.

Lastly, let his gifts be try'd,
Borrow'd from the mason's side:
Some perhaps may think him able
In the state to build a Babel;
Could we place him in a station
To destroy the old foundation.
True indeed, I should be gladder,
Could he learn to mount a ladder.
May he at his latter end
Mount alive, and dead descend!

In him tell me which prevail,
Female vices most, or male?

What produc'd him, can you tell?
Human race, or imps of hell?

ROBIN AND HARRY *

ROBIN to beggars, with a curse,
Throws the last shilling in his purse;
And, when the coachman comes for pay,
The rogue must call another day.

Grave Harry, when the poor are pressing,
Gives them a penny, and God's blessing;
But, always careful of the main,
With two-pence left, walks home in rain.

Robin, from noon to night will prate,
Runs out in tongue, as in estate:
And, ere a twelvemonth and a day,
Will not have one new thing to say.
Much talking is not Harry's vice;
He need not tell a story twice:
And, if he always be so thrifty,
His fund may last to five and fifty.

It so fell out, that cautious Harry,
As soldiers use, for love must marry,
And, with his dame, the ocean crost;
(All for love, or the World well Lost!)
Repairs a cabin gone to ruin,
Just big enough to shelter two in;
And in his house, if any body come,
Will make them welcome to his modicum;
Where Goody Julia milks the cows,
And boils potatoes for her spouse;
Or dearns his hose, or mends his breeches,
While Harry's fencing up his ditches.

Robin, who ne'er his mind could fix,
To live without a coach and fix,
To patch his broken fortunes, found
A mistress worth five thousand pound;
Swears he could get her in an hour,
If Gaffer Harry would endow her;
And sell, to pacify his wrath,
A birth-right for a mess of broth.

Young Harry, as all Europe knows,
Was long the quintessence of beaux;
But, when espous'd, he ran the fate
That must attend the marry'd state;
From gold brocade and shining armour,
Was metamorphos'd to a farmer;
His grazier's coat with dirt besmear'd;
Nor twice a week will shave his beard.

Old Robin, all his youth a sloven,
At fifty-two, when he grew loving,
Clad in a coat of paduasoy,
A flaxen wig and waistcoat gay,
Powder'd from shoulder down to flank,
In courtly style addresses Frank;
Twice ten years older than his wife,
Is doom'd to be a beau for life;
Supplying those defects by dress,
Which I must leave the world to guess.

TO BETTY THE GRIZETE. 1730.

QUEEN of wit and beauty, Betty!
Never may the muse forget ye:

* Sons of Dr. Leslie. Harry was a colonel in the Spanish service.

How thy face charms every shepherd,
Spotted over like a leopard!
And thy freckled neck, display'd,
Envy breeds in every maid,
Like a fly-blown cake of tallow,
Or on parchment ink turn'd yellow;
Or a tawny speckled pippin,
Shrivell'd with a winter's keeping.

And, thy beauty thus dispatch'd,
Let me praise thy wit unmatch'd.

Sets of phrases, cut and dry,
Evermore thy tongue supply.
And thy memory is loaded
With old scraps from plays exploded:
Stock'd with repartees and jokes,
Suited to all Christian folks;
Shreds of wit, and senseless rhymes,
Blunder'd out a thousand times.

Nor wilt thou of gifts be sparing,
Which can ne'er be worse for wearing:

Picking wit among collegians,
In the playhouse upper regions;
Where, in the eighteen-penny gallery,
Irish nymphs learn Irish raillery:
But thy merit is thy failing,
And thy raillery is railing.

Thus with talents well endu'd
To be scurrilous and rude;
When you pertly raise your snout,
Flee, and gibe, and laugh, and flout;
This among Hibernian asses
For sheer wit and humour passes.
Thus indulgent Chloe, bit,
Swears you have a world of wit.

DEATH AND DAPHNE.

TO AN AGREEABLE YOUNG LADY, BUT EXTREMELY LEAN, 1730.

DEATH went upon a solemn day
At Pluto's hall his court to pay:
The phantom, having humbly kist
His grisly monarch's sooty fist,
Presented him the weekly bills
Of doctors, fevers, plagues, and pills.
Pluto, observing, since the peace
The burial-article decrease,
And, vex'd to see affairs miscarry,
Declar'd in council, Death must marry;
Vow'd he no longer could support
Old bachelors about his court;
The interest of his realm had need
That death should get a numerous breed;
Young deathlings, who, by practice made
Proficient in their father's trade,
With colonies might stock around
His large dominions under ground.

A consult of coquettes below
Was call'd, to rig him out a beau:
From her own head Megæra takes
A periwig of twisted snakes;
Which in the nicest fashion curl'd
(Like toupets of this upper world),
With flour of sulphur powder'd well,
That graceful on his shoulders fell;
An adder of the fable kind,
In line direct hung down behind;

The owl, the raven, and the bat,
 Clubb'd for a feather in his hat;
 His coat an usurer's velvet pall,
 Bequeath'd to Pluto, corpse and all.
 But, loth his person to expose
 Bare like a carcase pickt by crows,
 A lawyer o'er his hands and face
 Stuck artfully a parchment case.
 No new-fluxt rake show'd fairer skin;
 Nor Phyllis after lying-in.
 With snuff was fill'd his ebon box
 Of shin-bones rotted by the pox.
 Nine spirits of blaspheming fops
 With aconite anoint his chops;
 And give him words of dreadful sounds,
 G—d d—n his blood! and b—d and w—ds!

Thus furnish'd out, he sent his train
 To take a house in Warwick-lane:
 The faculty, his humble friends,
 A complimentary message sends:
 Their president in scarlet gown
 Harrangu'd, and welcom'd him to town.

But death had business to dispatch;
 His mind was running on his match.
 And, hearing much of Daphne's fame,
 His majesty of terrors came,
 Fine as a colonel of the guards,
 To visit where she sat at cards:
 She, as he came into the room,
 Thought him Adonis in his bloom.
 And now her heart with pleasure jumps;
 She scarce remembers what is trumps;
 For such a shape of skin and bone
 Was never seen, except her own:
 Charm'd with his eyes, and chin, and snout,
 Her pocket-glass drew slyly out;
 And grew enamour'd with her phiz,
 As just the counterpart of his.
 She darted many a private glance,
 And freely made the first advance;
 Was of her beauty grown so vain,
 She doubted not to win the swain.
 Nothing she thought could sooner gain him,
 Than with her wit to entertain him.
 She ask'd about her friends below;
 This meagre fop, that batter'd beau;
 Whether some late departed toasts
 Had got gallants among the ghosts?
 If Chloe were a sharper still,
 As great as ever at quadrille?
 (The ladies there must needs be rooks;
 For cards, we know, are Pluto's books!)
 If Florimel had found her love,
 For whom she hang'd herself above?
 How oft' a week was kept a ball
 By Proserpine at Pluto's hall?
 She fancied those Elysian shades
 The sweetest place for masquerades:
 How pleasant, on the banks of Styx,
 To troll it in a coach and six!
 What pride a female heart inflames!
 How endless are ambition's aims!
 Cease, haughty nymph; the fates decree
 Death must not be a spouse for thee:
 For, when by chance the meagre shade
 Upon thy hand his finger laid,
 Thy hand as dry and cold as lead,
 His matrimonial spirit fled;

VOL. IX.

He felt about his heart a damp,
 That quite extinguish'd Cupid's lamp:
 Away the frighted sceptre scuds,
 And leaves my lady in the fuds.

DAPHNE.

DAPHNE knows, with equal ease,
 How to vex, and how to please;
 But the folly of her sex
 Makes her sole delight to vex.
 Never woman more devis'd
 Surer ways to be despis'd:
 Paradoxes weakly wielding,
 Always conquer'd, never yielding.
 To dispute, her chief delight,
 With not one opinion right:
 Thick her arguments she lays on,
 And with cavils combats reason;
 Answers in decisive way,
 Never hears what you can say:
 Still her old perverseness shows,
 Chiefly where she nothing knows;
 And, where she is most familiar,
 Always peevisher and sillier:
 All her spirits in a flame,
 When she knows she's most to blame.

Send me hence ten thousand miles,
 From a face that always smiles:
 None could ever act that part,
 But a fury in her heart,
 Ye who hate such inconsistency,
 To be easy, keep your distance;
 Or in folly still befriend her,
 But have no concern to mend her.
 Lose no time to contradict her,
 Nor endeavour to convict her.
 Never take it in your thought,
 That she'll own, or cure a fault!
 Into contradiction warm her;
 Then, perhaps, you may reform her:
 Only take this rule along,
 Always to advise her wrong;
 And reprove her when she's right;
 She may then grow wise for spight.
 No—that scheme will ne'er succeed,
 She has better learnt her creed:
 She's too cunning and too skilful,
 When to yield, and when be wilful.
 Nature holds her forth two mirrors,
 One for truth, and one for errors:
 That looks, hideous, fierce, and frightful;
 This is flattering and delightful:
 That she throws away as foul;
 Sits by this, to dress her soul.

Thus you have the case in view,
 Daphne, 'twixt the Dean and you.
 Heaven forbid he should despise thee!
 But will never more advise thee.

THE PHEASANT AND THE LARK.

A FABLE. BY DR. DELANY, 1730.

“ —Quis iniquæ

“ Tam patiens urbis, tam ferreus, ut teneat se!”

Juv.

In ancient times as bards indite,
 (If clerks have conn'd the records right)

A peacock reign'd, whose glorious sway
His subjects with delight obey:
His tail was beauteous to behold,
Replete with goodly eyes and gold
(Fair emblem of that monarch's guise,
Whose train at once is rich and wise).
And princely rul'd he many regions,
And statesmen wise, and valiant legions.

A pheasant Lord *, above the rest,
With every grace and talent blest,
Was sent to sway, with all his skill,
The sceptre of a neighbouring hill †.
No science was to him unknown,
For all the arts were all his own:
In all the living learned read,
Though more delighted with the dead:
For birds, if ancient tales be true,
Had then their Popes and Homers too,
Could read and write in prose and verse,
And speak like , and build like Pearce ‡.
He knew their voices, and their wings;
Who smoothest soars, who sweetest sings;
Who toils with ill-fledg'd pens to climb,
And who attain'd the true sublime:
Their merits he could well descry,
He had so exquisite an eye;
And when that fail'd, to show them clear,
He had as exquisite an ear.
It chanc'd, as on a day he stray'd,
Beneath an academic shade,
He lik'd, amidst a thousand throats,
The wildness of a woodlark's § notes,
And search'd, and spy'd, and seiz'd his game,
And took him home, and made him tame;
Found him on trial true and able,
So cheer'd and fed him at his table.

Here some shrewd critic finds I'm caught,
And cries out, "Better fed than taught."—
Then jests on game and tame, and reads
And jests; and so my tale proceeds.
Long had he study'd in the wood,
Conversing with the wise and good;
His soul with harmony inspir'd,
With love of truth and virtue fir'd:
His brethren's good and Maker's praise
Were all the study of his lays;
Were all his study in retreat,
And now employ'd him with the great.
His friendship was the sure resort
Of all the wretched at the court;
But chiefly merit in distress
His greatest blessing was to bless.—

This fix'd him in his patron's breast,
But fir'd with envy all the rest:
I mean that noisy craving crew,
Who round the court incessant flew,
And prey'd like rooks, by pairs and dozens,
To fill the maws of sons and cousins:
"Unmov'd their heart, and chill'd their blood,
"To every thought of common good,
"Confining every hope and care,"
To their own low contracted sphere.

These ran him down with ceaseless cry,
But found it hard to tell you why,
Till his own worth and wit supply'd
Sufficient matter to deride:
" 'Tis envy's safest, surest rule,
"To hide her rage in ridicule:
"The vulgar eye she best beguiles,
"When all her snakes are deck'd with smiles;"
Sardonic smiles, by rancour rais'd!
"Tormented most when seeming pleas'd!"
Their spight had more than half expir'd,
Had he not wrote what all admir'd;
What morsels had their malice wanted,
But that he built, and plann'd, and planted!
How had his sense and learning griev'd them,
But that his charity reliev'd them:

"At highest worth dull malice reaches,
"As slugs pollute the fairest peaches:
"Envy defames, as harpies vile
"Devour the food they first defile."
Now ask the fruit of all his favour—
"He was not hitherto a faver"—

What then could make their rage run mad?
"Why what he hop'd, not what he had.
"What tyrant e'er invented ropes,
"Or racks, or rods, to punish hopes?
"Th' inheritance of hope and fame
"Is seldom earthly wisdom's aim;
"Or, if it were, is not so small,
"But there is room enough for all."

If he but chance to breathe a song
(He seldom, fang, and never long);
The noisy, rude, malignant crowd,
Where it was high, pronounc'd it loud:
Plain truth was pride; and what was sillier,
Easy and friendly was familiar.

Or, if he tun'd his lofty lays,
With solemn air to virtue's praise,
Alike abusive and erroneous,
They call'd it hoarse and unharmonious:
Yet so it was to souls like theirs,
Tuneless as Abel to the bears!

A rook * with harsh malignant caw
Began, was follow'd by a daw †
(Though some, who would be thought to know,
Are positive it was a crow);
Jack Daw was seconded by Tit,
Tom Tit ‡ could write, and so he writ;
A tribe of tuneless praters follow,
The jay, the magpie, and the swallow;
And twenty more their throats let loose,
Down to the witless waddling goose.

Some pick'd at him, some flew, some flutter'd,
Some hiss'd, some scream'd, and others mutter'd:
The crow, on carrion wont to feast,
The carrion crow condemn'd his taste:
The rook in earnest too, not joking,
Swore all his fingering was but croaking.

Some thought they meant to show their wit,
Might think so still—"but that they writ"—
Could it be spight or envy?—"No—"
"Who did no ill, could have no foe."—
So wise simplicity esteem'd,
Quite otherwise true wisdom deem'd;

* Lord Carteret, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

* Dr. T——r. † Right Hon. Richard Tighe.
‡ Dr. Sheridan.

This question rightly understood,
 "What more provokes than doing good?"
 "A soul ennobled and refin'd
 Reproaches every baser mind:
 "As strains exalted and melodious
 "Make every meaner music odious."
 At length the nightingale * was heard,
 For voice and wisdom long rever'd,
 Esteem'd by all the wise and good,
 The guardian genius of the wood:
 He long in discontent retir'd,
 Yet not obscur'd, but more admir'd;
 His brethren's servile souls disdain'd,
 He liv'd indignant and complaining:
 They now afresh provoke his choler
 (It seems the lark had been his scholar,
 A favourite scholar always near him,
 And oft' had wak'd whole nights to hear him):
 Enrag'd he canvasses the matter,
 Exposés all their senseless chatter,
 Shows him and them in such a light,
 As more enflames, yet quells their spite.
 They hear his voice, and frighted fly,
 For rage had rais'd it very high:
 Sham'd by the wisdom of his notes,
 They hide their heads, and hush their throats.

ANSWER TO DR. DELANY'S FABLE OF THE PHEASANT AND THE LARK.

In ancient times, the wise were able
 In proper terms to write a fable:
 Their tales would always justly suit
 The character of every brute.
 The ass was dull, the lion brave,
 The stag was swift, the fox a knave;
 The daw a thief, the ape a droll;
 The hound would scent, the wolf would prole;
 A pigeon would, if shown by Æsop,
 Fly from the hawk, or pick his pease up.
 Far otherwise a great divine
 Has learnt his fables to refine:
 He jumbles men and birds together,
 As if they all were of a feather:
 You see him first the peacock bring,
 Against all rules, to be a king;
 That in his tail he wore his eyes,
 By which he grew both rich and wise.
 Now, pray, observe the doctor's choice,
 A peacock chose for flight and voice:
 Did ever mortal see a peacock
 Attempt a flight above a haycock?
 And for his singing, doctor, you know,
 Himself complain'd of it to Juno.
 He squalls in such a hellish noise,
 It frightens all the village boys.
 This peacock kept a standing force,
 In regiments of foot and horse;
 Had statesmen too of every kind,
 Who waited on his eyes behind
 (And this was thought the highest post;
 For, rule the rump, you rule the roast.)
 The doctor names but one at present,
 And he of all birds was a pheasant.

This pheasant was a man of wit,
 Could read all books were ever writ;
 And, when among companions privy,
 Could quote you Cicero and Livy.
 Birds, as he says, and I allow,
 Were scholars then, as we are now;
 Could read all volumes up to folios,
 And feed on fricassees and olives.
 This pheasant, by the peacock's will,
 Was viceroy of a neighbouring hill;
 And, as he wander'd in his park,
 He chanc'd to spy a clergy lark;
 Was taken with his person outward,
 So prettily he pickt a cow-t—d:
 Then in a net the pheasant caught him,
 And in his palace fed and taught him.
 The moral of the tale is pleasant,
 Himself the lark, my Lord the pheasant:
 A lark he is, and such a lark
 As never came from Noah's ark:
 And though he had no other notion,
 But building, planning, and devotion;
 Though 'tis a maxim you must know,
 Who does no ill, can have no foe;
 Yet how shall I express in words
 The strange stupidity of birds?
 This lark was hated in the wood,
 Because he did his brethren good.
 At last the nightingale comes in,
 To hold the doctor by the chin:
 We all can find out what he means,
 The worst of disaffected deans;
 Whose wit at best was next to none,
 And now that little next is gone.
 Against the court is always blabbing,
 And calls the senate-house a cabin;
 So dull, that, but for spleen and spite,
 We ne'er should know that he could write;
 Who thinks the nation always err'd,
 Because himself is not prefer'd:
 His heart is through his libel seen,
 Nor could his malice spare the queen;
 Who, had she known his vile behaviour,
 Would ne'er have shown him so much favour;
 A noble lord * hath told his pranks,
 And well deserves the nation's thanks.
 Oh! would the senate deign to show
 Resentment on this public foe;
 Our nightingale might fit a cage,
 There let him starve, and vent his rage;
 Or, would they but in fetters bind
 This enemy of human kind!
 Harmonious Coffee †, show thy zeal,
 Thy champion for the common-weal,
 Nor on a theme like this repine,
 For once to wet thy pen divine:
 Bestow that libeller a lash,
 Who daily vends seditious trash;
 Who dares revile the nation's wisdom,
 But in the praise of virtue is dumb:
 That scribbler lash, who neither knows
 The turn of verse, nor style of prose;
 Whose malice, for the worst of ends,
 Would have us lose our English friends;

So, Nightingale and Lark, adieu;
I see the greatest owls in you
That ever screecht, or ever flew.

ON THE IRISH CLUB.

Ye paltry underlings of state;
Ye senators, who love to prate;
Ye rascals of inferior note,
Who for a dinner sell a vote:
Ye pack of pensionary peers,
Whose fingers itch for poets' ears;
Ye bishops far remov'd from fairs;
Why all this rage? Why these complaints?
Why against printers all this noise?
This summoning of blackguard boys?
Why so sagacious in your guesses?
Your effs, and tees, and arrs, and esses?
Take my advice; to make you safe,
I know a shorter way by half.
The point is plain: remove the cause;
Defend your liberties and laws.
Be sometimes to your country true,
Have once the public good in view:
Bravely despise champagne at court,
And choose to dine at home with port:
Let Prelates, by their good behaviour,
Convince us they believe a Saviour;
Nor sell what they so dearly bought,
This country, now their own, for nought.
Ne'er did a true satiric muse
Virtue or innocence abuse;
And 'tis against poetic rules
To rail at men by nature fools:
But * * * * *

THE PROGRESS OF MARRIAGE *.

AETATIS SUÆ fifty-two,
A rich divine * began to woo
A handsome, young, imperious girl,
Nearly related to an earl.
Her parents and her friends consent,
The couple to the temple went:
They first invite the Cyprian queen;
'Twas answer'd, "She would not be seen:"
The Graces next, and all the Muses,
Were bid in form, but sent excuses.
Juno attended at the porch,
With farthing-candle for a torch;
While Mrs. Iris held her train,
The faded bow distilling rain.
Then Hebe came, and took her place,
But show'd no more than half her face.
Whate'er those dire forebodings meant,
In mirth the wedding day was spent;

* The date and hero of this poem are unknown.

The wedding day, you take me right,
I promise nothing for the night.
The bridegroom, drest to make a figure,
Assumes an artificial vigour;
A flourish'd night-cap on, to grace
His ruddy, wrinkled, smiling face;
Like the faint red upon a pipkin,
Half wither'd by a winter's keeping.
And thus set out this happy pair,
The swain is rich, the nymph is fair:
But, what I gladly would forget,
The swain is old, the nymph coquette.
Both from the goal together start,
Scarce run a step before they part;
No common ligament that binds
The various textures of their minds;
Their thoughts and actions, hopes and fears,
Less corresponding than their years.
Her spouse desires his coffee soon,
She rises to her tea at noon.
While he goes out to cheapen books,
She at her glass consults her looks;
While Betty's buzzing in her ear,
Lord, what a dress these parsons wear!
So odd a choice how could she make!
Wish'd him a colonel for her sake.
Then, on her fingers' ends, she counts,
Exact, to what his age amounts.
The Dean, she heard her uncle say,
Is sixty, if he be a day;
His ruddy cheeks are no disguise;
You see the crows-feet round his eyes.
At one she rambles to the shops,
To cheapen tea, and talk with fops;
Or calls a council of her maids,
And tradesmen, to compare brocades.
Her weighty morning-busines o'er,
Sits down to dinner just at four;
Minds nothing that is done or said,
Her evening-work so fills her head.
The Dean, who us'd to dine at one,
Is maukish, and his stomach gone;
In thread-bare gown, would scarce a louse hold,
Looks like the chaplain of his household;
Beholds her, from the chaplain's place,
In French brocades, and Flanders lace:
He wonders what employs her brain,
But never asks, or asks in vain;
His mind is full of other cares,
And, in the sneaking parson's airs,
Computes, that half a parish dues
Will hardly find his wife in shoes.
Canst thou imagine, dull divine,
'Twill gain her love, to make her fine?
Hath she no other wants beside?
You raise desire, as well as pride,
Enticing coxcombs to adore,
And teach her to despise thee more.
If in her coach she'll condescend
To place him at the hinder end,
Her hoop is hoist above his nose,
His odious gown would soil her clothes;
And drops him at the church, to pray,
While she drives on to see the play.
He, like an orderly divine,
Comes home a quarter after nine,
And meets her hasting to the ball:
Her chairmen push him from the wall.

He enters in, and walks up stairs,
And calls the family to prayers;
Then goes alone to take his rest
In bed, where he can spare her best.
At five the footmen make a din,
Her ladyship is just come in;
The masquerade began at two,
She stole away with much ado;
And shall be chid this afternoon,
For leaving company so soon:
She'll say, and she may truly say't,
She can't abide to stay out late.

But now, though scarce a twelvemonth marry'd,
Poor Lady Jane has thrice miscarry'd:
The cause, alas, is quickly guest;
The town has whisper'd round the jest.
Think on some remedy in time,
You find his reverence past his prime,
Already dwindled to a lath;
No other way but try the Bath.

For Venus, rising from the ocean,
Infus'd a strong prolific potion,
That mix'd with Acheloüs' spring,
The borned flood, as poets sing,
Who, with an English beauty smitten,
Ran under-ground from Greece to Britain;
The genial virtue with him brought,
And gave the nymph a plenteous draught;
Then fled, and left his horn behind,
For husbands past their youth to find:
The nymph, who still with passion burn'd,
Was to a boiling fountain turn'd,
Where childless wives crowd every morn,
To drink in Acheloüs' horn.

And here the father often gains
That title by another's pains.

Hither, though much against the grain,
The Dean has carry'd Lady Jane.
He, for a while, would not consent,
But vow'd his money all was spent:
His money spent! a clownish reason!
And must my lady slip her season?
The doctor, with a double fee,
Was brib'd to make the Dean agree.

Here all diversions of the place
Are proper in my lady's case:
With which she patiently complies,
Merely because her friends advise;
His money and her time employs
In music, raffling-rooms, and toys;
Or in the Cross-bath seeks an heir,
Since others oft' have found one there:
Where if the Dean by chance appears,
It shames his cassock and his years.
He keeps his distance in the gallery,
Till banish'd by some coxcomb's raillery;
For 'twould his character expose,
To bathe among the belles and beaux.

So have I seen, within a pen,
Young ducklings foster'd by a hen;
But, when let out, they run and muddle,
As instinct leads them, in a puddle:
The sober hen, not born to swim,
With mournful note clucks round the brim.

The Dean, with all his best endeavour,
Gets not an heir, but gets a fever.
A victim to the last essays
Of vigour in declining days,

He dies, and leaves his mourning mate
(What could he less?) his whole estate.

The widow goes through all her forms:
New lovers now will come in swarms.
Oh, may I see her soon dispensing
Her favours to some broken ensign!
Him let her marry, for his face,
And only coat of tarnish'd lace;
To turn her naked out of doors,
And spend her jointure on his whores;
But, for a parting present, leave her
A rooted pox to last for ever!

AN EXCELLENT NEW BALLAD;

OR, THE TRUE ENGLISH DEAN * TO BE HANGED
FOR A RAPE. 1730.

OUR brethren of England, who love us so dear,
And in all they do for us so kindly do mean,
(A blessing upon them!) have sent us this year,
For the good of our church, a true English Dean.
A holier priest ne'er was wrapt up in crape;
The worst you can say, he committed a rape.

In his journey to Dublin, he lighted at Chester,
And there he grew fond of another man's wife;
Burst into her chamber, and would have caress'd her;
But she valued her honour much more than her life.
She bustled and struggled, and made her escape
To a room full of guests, for fear of a rape.

The Dean he pursued, to recover his game;
And now to attack her again he prepares:
But the company stood in defence of the dame,
They cudgel'd, and cuff'd him, and kick'd him down stairs.

His Deanship was now in a damnable scrape,
And this was no time for committing a rape.

To Dublin he comes, to the bagnio he goes,
And orders the landlord to bring him a whore;
No scruple came on him, his gown to expose,
'Twas what all his life he had practis'd before.
He had made himself drunk with the juice of the grape,
And got a good clap, but committed no rape.

The Dean, and his landlord a jolly comrade,
Resolv'd for a fortnight to swim in delight;
For why, they had both been brought up to the trade
Of drinking all day, and of whoring all night.
His landlord was ready his Deanship to ape
In every debauch but committing a rape.

This Protestant zealot, this English divine,
In church and in state was of principles found;
Was truer than Steele to the Hanover line,
And griev'd that a Tory should live above ground.
Shall a subject so loyal be hang'd by the nape,
For no other crime but committing a rape?

By old Popish canons, as wise men have penn'd 'em,
Each priest had a concubine, jure ecclesiae;
Who'd be Dean of Fernes without a commendam?
And precedents we can produce, if it please ye;
Then why should the Dean, when whores are so
Be put to the peril and toil of a rape? [cheap,

* Sawbridge, Dean of Fernes.
I iij

If fortune should please but to take such a crotchet
(To thee I apply, great Smedley's successor)
To give thee lawn sleeves, a mitre, and rochet, Whom wouldst thou resemble? I leave thee a guesser.

But I only behold thee in Atherton's * shape,
For sodomy hang'd; as thou for a rape.

Ah! dost thou not envy the brave Colonel Chartres,
Condemn'd for thy crime at threescore-and-ten?
To hang him, all England would lend him their garters;

Yet he lives, and is ready to ravish again.
Then throttle thyself with an ell of strong tape,
For thou hast not a groat to atone for a rape.

The Dean he was vex'd that his whores were so willing: [squal;

He long'd for a girl that would struggle and
He ravish'd her fairly, and sav'd a good shilling;
But here was to pay the devil and all.

His trouble and sorrows now come in a heap,
And hang'd he must be for committing a rape.

If maidens are ravish'd, it is their own choice:

Why are they so wilful to struggle with men?
If they would but lie quiet, and stifle their voice,

No Devil or Dean could ravish them then:
Nor would there be need of a strong hempen cape
Ty'd round the Dean's neck for committing a rape.

Our Church and our State dear England maintains,
For which all true Protestant hearts should be glad:
She sends us our Bishops, and Judges, and Deans;
And better would give us, if better she had.

But, Lord! how the rabble will stare, and will gape,
When the good English Dean is hang'd up for a rape!

ON STEPHEN DUCK,

THE THRESHER AND FAVOURITE POET.

A Quibbling Epigram. 1730.

THE thrasher Duck could o'er the Queen prevail;
The proverb says, no fence against a snail.
From threshing corn he turns to thresh his brains;
For which her Majesty allows him grains.

Though 'tis confess'd, that those who ever saw
His poems, think them all not worth a straw!
Thrice happy Duck, employ'd in threshing stubble!
Thy toil is lessen'd, and thy profits double.

THE LADY'S DRESSING-ROOM. 1730.

FIVE hours (and who can do it less in?)
By haughty Cælia spent in dressing;
The goddess from her chamber issues,
Array'd in lace, brocades, and tissues.
Strephon who found the room was void,
And Betty otherwise employ'd,
Stole in, and took a strict survey
Of all the litter as it lay:
Whereof, to make the matter clear,
An inventory follows here.

And, first, a dirty smoke appear'd,
Beneath the arm-pits well besmear'd;

* A bishop of Waterford, of infamous character.

Strephon, the rogue, display'd it wide,
And turn'd it round on every side:
In such a case, few words are best,
And Strephon bids us guess the rest;
But swears, how damnably the men lie
In calling Cælia sweet and cleanly.

Now listen, while he next produces
The various combs for various uses;
Fill'd up with dirt so closely fixt,
No brush could force a way betwixt;
A paste of composition rare,
Sweat, dandriff, powder, lead, and hair.
A forehead-cloth with oil upon't,
To smooth the wrinkles on her front:
Here alum-flower, to stop the steams
Exhal'd from four unfavoury streams;
There night-gloves made of Tripsey's hide,
Bequeath'd by Tripsey when she died;
With puppy-water, beauty's help,
Distill'd from Tripsey's darling whelp.
Here gallipots and vials plac'd,
Some fill'd with washes, some with paste;
Some with pomatums, paints, and slops,
And ointments good for scabby chops.
Hard by a filthy basin stands,
Foul'd with the scouring of her hands:
The basin takes whatever comes,
The scrapings from her teeth and gums,
A nasty compound of all hues,
For here she spits, and here she spues.

But, oh! it turn'd poor Strephon's bowels,
When he beheld and smelt the towels,
Begumm'd, bematter'd, and beslim'd,
With dirt, and sweat, and ear-wax grim'd.
No object Strephon's eye escapes;
Here petticoats in frowzy heaps;
Nor be the handkerchiefs forgot,
All varnish'd o'er with snuff and snot.
The stockings why should I expose,
Stain'd with the moisture of her toes;
Or greasy coifs, or pinnars reeking,
Which Cælia slept at least a week in?
A pair of tweezers next he found,
To pluck her brows in arches round;
Or hairs that sink the forehead low,
Or on her chin like bristles grow.

The virtues we must not let pass
Of Cælia's magnifying-glass;
When frighted Strephon cast his eye on't,
It show'd the visage of a giant:
A glass that can to sight disclose
The smallest worm in Cælia's nose,
And faithfully direct her nail
To squeeze it out from head to tail;
For, catch it nicely by the head,
It must come out, alive or dead.

Why, Strephon, will you tell the rest?
And must you needs describe the chest?
That careless wench! no creature warn her
To move it out from yonder corner!
But leave it standing full in sight,
For you to exercise your spite?
In vain the workman show'd his wit,
With rings and hinges counterfeit,
To make it seem in this disguise
A cabinet to vulgar eyes,
Which Strephon ventur'd to look in,
Resolv'd to go through thick and thin.

He lifts the lid: there needs no more,
He smelt it all the time before.

As, from within Pandora's box,
When Epimetheus op'd the locks,
A sudden universal crew
Of human evils upward flew,
He still was comforted to find
That hope at last remain'd behind;
So Strephon lifting up the lid,
To view what in the chest was hid,
The vapours flew from out the vent:
But Strephon, cautious, never meant
The bottom of the pan to grope,
And foul his hands in search of hope.

Oh! ne'er may such a vile machine
Be once in Cælia's chamber seen!
Oh! may she better learn to keep
Those secrets of the boary deep!

As mutton-cutlets †, prime of meat,
Which though with art you salt and beat,
As laws of cookery require,
And roast them at the clearest fire;
If from adown the hopeful chops
The fat upon a cinder drops,
To stinking smoke it turns the flame,
Poisoning the flesh from whence it came,
And up exhales a greasy stench,
For which you curse the careless wench:
So things which must not be exprest,
When plumpt into the reeking chest,
Send up an excremental smell
To taint the parts from whence they fell;
The petticoats and gown perfume,
And waft a stink round every room.

Thus finishing his grand survey,
The swain disgusted slunk away;
Repeating in his amorous fits,
"Oh! Cælia, Cælia, Cælia sh—!"
But vengeance, goddesses never sleeping,
Soon punish'd Strephon for his peeping:
His foul imagination links
Each dame he sees with all her stinks;
And, if unfavoury odours fly,
Conceives a lady standing by.
All women his description fits,
And both ideas jump like wits;
By vicious fancy coupled fast,
And still appearing in contrast.

I pity wretched Strephon, blind
To all the charms of woman-kind.
Should I the Queen of Love refuse,
Because she rose from stinking ooze?
To him that looks behind the scene,
Statira's but some pocky quean.

When Cælia all her glory shows,
If Strephon would but stop his nose,
Who now so impiously blasphemes
Her ointments, daubs, and paints, and creams,
Her washes, sops, and every clout,
With which he makes so foul a rout;
He soon would learn to think like me,
And bless his ravish'd eyes to see
Such order from confusion sprung,
Such gaudy tulips rais'd from dung.

* Milton.

† Prima virorum.

THE POWER OF TIME. 1730.

If neither brags nor marble can withstand
The mortal force of Time's destructive hand;
If mountains sink to vales, if cities die,
And lessening rivers mourn their fountains dry:
When my old cassock (said a Welsh divine)
Is out at elbows; why should I repine?

ON
MR. PULTNEY'S
BEING PUT OUT OF THE COUNCIL. 1731.

SIR ROBERT, weary'd by Will Pultney's teasings,
Who interrupted him in all his leafings,
Resolv'd that Will and he should meet no more:
Full in his face Bob shuts the council door;
Nor lets him sit as justice on the bench,
To punish thieves, or lash a suburb-wench.
Yet still St. Stephen's chapel open lies
For Will to enter.—What shall I advise?
Ev'n quit the HOUSE, for thou too long has sat in't;
Produce at last thy dormont ducal patent;
There, near thy master's throne in shelter plac'd,
Let Will unheard by thee his thunder waste.
Yet still I fear your work is done but half;
For, while he keeps his pen, you are not safe.

Hear an old fable, and a dull one too;
It bears a moral, when apply'd to you.

A hare had long escap'd pursuing hounds,
By often shifting into distant grounds;
Till, finding all his artifices vain,
To save his life he leap'd into the main.
But there, alas! he could no safety find,
A pack of dog-fish had him in the wind.
He scours away; and, to avoid the foe,
Descends for shelter to the shades below:
There Cerberus lay watching in his den,
(He had not seen a hare the Lord knows when),
Out bounc'd the mastiff of the triple head;
Away the hare with double swiftness fled;
Hunted from earth, and sea, and hell, he flies
(Fear lent him wings) for safety to the skies.
How was the fearful animal distress'd!
Behold a foe more fierce than all the rest!
Sirius, the swiftest of the heavenly pack,
Fail'd but an inch to seize him by the back.
He fled to earth, but first it cost him dear:
He left his scut behind, and half an ear.

Thus was the hare pursu'd, though free from guilt;
Thus, Bob, shalt thou be maul'd, fly where thou wilt.

Then, honest Robin, of thy corpse beware;
Thou art not half so nimble as a hare:
Too ponderous is thy bulk to mount the sky;
Nor can you go to hell, before you die.
So keen thy bunters, and thy scent so strong,
Thy turns and doublings cannot save thee long*.

* This hunting ended in the promotion both of Will and Bob. Bob was no longer first minister, but Earl of Orford; and Will was no longer his opponent, but Earl of Bath.

CASSINUS AND PETER.

A TRAGICAL ELEGY. 1731.

Two college sophs of Cambridge growth,
Both special wits, and lovers both,
Conferring, as they us'd to meet,
On love, and books, in rapture sweet
(Muse, find me names to fit my metre, Cassinus this, and t'other Peter) ;
Friend Peter to Cassinus goes,
To chat a while, and warm his nose :
But such a fight was never seen,
The lady lay swallow'd up in spleen.
He seem'd as just crept out of bed ;
One greasy stocking round his head,
The other he sat down to dearn
With threads of different-colour'd yarn ;
His breeches torn exposing wide
A ragged shirt and tawny hide.
Scorch'd were his shins, his legs were bare,
But well embrown'd with dirt and hair.
A rug was o'er his shoulders thrown
(A rug ; for night-gown he had none).
His jordon stood in manner fitting
Between his legs to spew or spit in ;
His ancient pipe, in fable dy'd,
And half unsmok'd, lay by his side.
Him thus accoutr'd Peter found,
With eyes in smoke and weeping drown'd ;
The leavings of his last night's pot
On embers plac'd, to drink it hot.
Why, Cassy, thou wilt doze thy pate :
What makes thee lie a-bed so late ?
The finch, the linnæ, and the thrush,
Their mattins chant in every bush :

* The Duke was unhappily killed, in crossing the river Boyne, July 1. 1690, and was buried in St. Patrick's cathedral; where the dean and chapter erected a small monument to his honour, at their own expence.

† The words that Dr. Swift first concluded the epitaph with, were “ Saltem ut sciat viator indignabundus, “ quali in cellula tanti ductoris cineres delitescunt.”

And I have heard thee oft' salute
Aurora with thy early flute.
Heaven send thou hast not got the hypos !
How ! not a word come from thy lips ?
Then gave him some familiar thumps ;
A college-joke, to cure the dumps.
The swain at last, with grief oppress'd,
Cry'd, Cælia ! thrice, and sigh'd the rest.
Dear Cassy, though to ask I dread,
Yet ask I must. Is Cælia dead ?
How happy I, were that the worst !
But I was fated to be curst.
Come, tell us, has she play'd the whore ?
Oh, Peter, would it were no more !
Why, plague confound her sandy locks !
Say, has the small or greater pox
Sunk down her nose, or seam'd her face ?
Be easy, 'tis a common case.
Oh, Peter ! beauty's but a varnish,
Which time and accidents will tarnish ;
But Cælia has contriv'd to blast
Those beauties that might ever last.
Nor can imagination guess,
Nor eloquence divine express,
How that ungrateful charming maid
My purest passion has betray'd.
Conceive the most envenom'd dart
To pierce an injur'd lovers heart.
Why, hang her ; though she seems so coy,
I know she loves the barber's boy.
Friend Peter, this I could excuse ;
For every nymph has leave to choose ;
Nor have I reason to complain,
She loves a more deserving swain.
But, oh ! how ill hast thou divin'd
A crime that shocks all human-kind ;
A deed unknown to female race,
At which the sun should hide his face !
Advice in vain you would apply—
Then leave me to despair and die.
Ye kind Arcadians, on my urn
These elegies and sonnets burn ;
And on the marble grave these rhymes,
A monument to after-times :
“ Here Cassy lies, by Cælia slain,
“ And dying never told his pain.”
Vain empty world, farewell. But hark,
The loud Cerberian triple bark.
And there—behold Alecto stand,
A whip of scorpions in her hand.
Lo, Charon from his leaky wherry
Beckoning to waft me o'er the ferry.
I come, I come, Medusa ! see,
Her serpents hiss direct at me.
Begone ; unhand me, hellish fry :
“ * Avaunt—ye cannot say 'tis I.”
Dear Cassy, thou must purge and bleed ;
I fear thou wilt be mad indeed.
But now, by friendship's sacred laws,
I here conjure thee, tell the cause ;
And Cælia's horrid fact relate :
Thy friend would gladly share thy fate.
To force it out, my heart must rend ;
Yet when conjur'd by such a friend—
Think, Peter, how my soul is rackt !
These eyes, these eyes, beheld the fact,

* See Macbeth.

Now bend thine ear, since out it must;
 But when thou see'st me laid in dust,
 The secret thou shalt ne'er impart,
 Not to the nymph that keeps thy heart;
 (How would her virgin soul bemoan
 A crime to all her sex unknown!)
 Nor whisper to the tattling reeds
 The blackest of all female deeds;
 Nor blab it on the lonely rocks,
 Where Echo sits, and listening mocks;
 Nor let the Zephyrs' treacherous gale
 Through Cambridge waft the direful tale;
 Nor to the chattering feather'd race
 Discover Cælia's foul disgrace.
 But, if you fail, my spectre dread,
 Attending nightly round your bed:
 And yet I dare confide in you:
 So take my secret, and adieu.
 Nor wonder how I lost my wits:
 Oh! Cælia, Cælia, Cælia sh—!

A BEAUTIFUL YOUNG NYMPH

GOING TO BED.

Written for the honour of the Fair Sex.

CORINNA, pride of Drury-lane,
 For whom no shepherd sighs in vain;
 Never did Covent-garden boast
 So bright a batter'd strolling toast!
 No drunken rake to pick her up;
 No cellar, where on tick to sup;
 Returning at the midnight hour,
 Four stories climbing to her bower;
 Then seated on a three-legg'd chair,
 Takes off her artificial hair.
 Now picking out a crystal eye,
 She wipes it clean, and lays it by;
 Her eye-brows, from a mouse's hide,
 Stuck on with art on either side,
 Pulls off with care, and first displays 'em,
 Then in a play-book smoothly lays 'em:
 Now dextrously her plumpers draws,
 That serve to fill her hollow jaws:
 Untwists a wire, and from her gums
 A set of teeth completely comes:
 Pulls out the rags contriv'd to prop
 Her flabby dugs, and down they drop.
 Proceeding on, the lovely goddess
 Unlaces next her steel-ribb'd bodice,
 Which, by the operator's skill,
 Press down the lumps, the hollows fill.
 Up goes her hand, and off she slips
 The bolsters that supply her hips.
 With gentlest touch she next explores
 Her shankres, issues, running sores,
 Effects of many a sad disaster;
 And then to each applies a plaster:
 But must, before she goes to bed,
 Rub off the daubs of white and red,
 And smooth the furrows in her front
 With greasy paper stuck upon't.
 She takes a bolus ere she sleeps;
 And then between two blankets creeps:
 With pains of love tormented lies;
 Or, if she chance to close her eyes,
 Of Bridewell and the Compter dreams,
 And feels the lash, and faintly screams;

Or, by a faithless bully drawn,
 At some hedge-tavern lies in pawn;
 Or to Jamaica seems transported
 Alone, and by no planter courted;
 Or, near Fleet-ditch's oozy brinks,
 Surrounded with a hundred stinks,
 Belated, seems on watch to lie,
 And snap some cully passing by;
 Or, struck with fear, her fancy runs
 On watchmen, constables, and duns,
 From whom she meets with frequent rubs;
 But never from religious clubs,
 Whose favour she is sure to find,
 Because she pays them all in kind.
 Corinna awakes. A dreadful sight!
 Behold the ruins of the night!
 A wicked rat her plaster stole,
 Half eat, and dragg'd it to his hole.
 The crystal eye, alas! was miss'd;
 And puffs had on her plumpers p—s'd.
 A pigeon pick'd her issue-peas:
 And Shock her tresses fill'd with fleas.
 The nymph, though in this mangled plight,
 Must every morn her limbs unite.
 But how shall I describe her arts
 To recollect the scatter'd parts?
 Or show the anguish, toil, and pain,
 Of gathering up herself again?
 The bashful muse will never bear
 In such a scene to interfere.
 Corinna, in the morning dizen'd,
 Who sees, will spue; who smells, be poison'd.

STREPHON AND CHLOE. 1731.

OF Chloe all the town has rung,
 By every size of poets sung:
 So beautiful a nymph appears
 But once in twenty thousand years;
 By Nature form'd with nicest care,
 And faultless to a single hair.
 Her graceful mien, her shape, and face,
 Confess'd her of no mortal race:
 And then so nice, and so genteel;
 Such cleanliness from head to heel:
 No humours gross, or frowzy steams,
 No noisome whiffs, or sweaty streams,
 Before, behind, above, below,
 Could from her taintless body flow:
 Would so discreetly things dispose,
 None ever saw her pluck a rose.
 Her dearest comrades never caught her
 Squat on her hams, to make maid's water.
 You'd swear that so divine a creature
 Felt no necessities of nature.
 In summer had she walk'd the town,
 Her arm-pits would not stain her gown:
 At country-dances not a nose
 Could in the dog-days smell her toes.
 Her milk-white hands, both palms and backs,
 Like ivory dry, and soft as wax,
 Her hands, the softest ever felt,
 Though cold would burn, though dry would melt:
 Dear Venus, hide this wondrous maid,
 Nor let her loose to spoil your trade.
 While she engrosses every swain,
 You but o'er half the world can reign.

Think what a case all men are now in,
 What ogling, sighing, toasting, vowing!
 What powder'd wigs! what flames and darts!
 What hampers full of bleeding hearts!
 What sword-knots! what poetic strains!
 What billet-doux, and clouded canes!

But Strephon sigh'd so loud and strong,
 He blew a settlement along;
 And bravely drove his rivals down
 With coach and six, and house in town.
 The bashful nymph no more withstands,
 Because her dear papa commands.
 The charming couple now unites:
 Proceed we to the marriage-rites.

Imprimis, at the temple-porch
 Stood Hymen with a flaming torch:
 The smiling Cyprian goddess brings
 Her infant-loves with purple wings;
 And pigeons billing, sparrows treading,
 Fair emblems of a fruitful wedding.
 The muses next in order follow,
 Conducted by their squire, Apollo:
 Then Mercury with silver tongue;
 And Hebe, goddess ever young.
 Behold, the bridegroom and his bride
 Walk hand in hand, and side by side;
 She by the tender Graces dress'd,
 But he by Mars, in scarlet vest.
 The nymph was cover'd with her flammeum,
 And Phœbus sung th' epithalamium.
 And last, to make the matter sure,
 Dame Juno brought a priest demure.
 Luna was absent, on pretence
 Her time was not till nine months hence.

The rites perform'd, the parson paid,
 In state return'd the grand parade;
 With loud huzza's from all the boys,
 That now the pair must crown their joys.

But still the hardest part remains:
 Strephon had long perplex'd his brains,
 How with so high a nymph he might
 Demean himself the wedding-night:
 For, as he view'd his person round,
 Mere mortal flesh was all he found:
 His hand, his neck, his mouth, his feet,
 Were duly wash'd, to keep them sweet
 (With other parts that shall be nameless,
 The ladies else might think me shameless).
 The weather and his love were hot;
 And, should he struggle, I know what—
 Why, let it go, if I must tell it—
 He'll sweat, and then the nymph may smell it;
 While she, a goddess dy'd in grain,
 Was unsusceptible of stain,
 And, Venus-like, her fragrant skin
 Exhal'd ambrosia from within.
 Can such a deity endure
 A mortal human touch impure!
 How did the humbled swain detest
 His prickly beard, and hairy breast!
 His night-cap, border'd round with lace,
 Could give no softness to his face.

Yet, if the goddess could be kind,
 What endless raptures must he find!
 And goddesses have now and then
 Come down to visit mortal men;
 To visit, and to court them too:
 A certain goddess, God knows who,

(As in a book he heard it read)
 Took Colonel Peleus to her bed.
 But what if he should lose his life
 By venturing on his heavenly wife?
 (For Strephon could remember well,
 That once he heard a school-boy tell,
 How Semele of mortal race
 By thunder died in Jove's embrace.)
 And what if daring Strephon dies
 By lightning shot from Chloe's eyes?

While these reflections fill'd his head,
 The bride was put in form to bed:
 He follow'd, stript, and in he crept,
 But awfully his distance kept.

Now ponder well ye parents dear;
 Forbid your daughters guzzling beer;
 And make them every afternoon
 Forbear their tea, or drink it soon;
 That, ere to bed they venture up,
 They may discharge it every sup:
 If not, they must in evil plight
 Be often forc'd to rise at night.
 Keep them to wholesome food confin'd,
 Nor let them taste what causes wind:
 ('Tis this the sage of Samos means,
 Forbidding his disciples beans.)
 Oh! think what evils must ensue;
 Miss Moll the jade will burn it blue:
 And, when she once has got the art,
 She cannot help it for her heart;
 But out it flies, ev'n when she meets
 Her bridegroom in the wedding-sheets.

Carminative and diuretic
 Will damp all passion sympathetic:
 And love such nicety requires,
 One blast will put out all his fires.
 Since husbands get behind the scene,
 The wife should study to be clean;
 Nor give the smallest room to guess
 The time when wants of nature press;
 But after marriage practise more
 Decorum than she did before;
 To keep her spouse deluded still,
 And make him fancy what she will.

In bed we left the married pair:
 'Tis time to show how things went there.
 Strephon, who had been often told
 That fortune still assists the bold,
 Resolv'd to make the first attack;
 But Chloe drove him fiercely back.
 How could a nymph so chaste as Chloe,
 With constitution cold and snowy,
 Permit a brutish man to touch her?
 Ev'n lambs by instinct fly the butcher.
 Resistance on the wedding-night
 Is what our maidens claim by right:
 And Chloe, 'tis by all agreed,
 Was maid in thought, and word, and deed.
 Yet some assign a different reason;
 That Strephon chose no proper season.

Say, fair-ones, must I make a pause,
 Or freely tell the secret cause?
 Twelve cups of tea (with grief I speak)
 Had now constrain'd the nymph to leak.
 This point must needs be settled first:
 The bride must either void or burst.
 Then see the dire effects of pease;
 Think what can give the colic ease.

The nymph, oppress'd before, behind,
As ships are toss'd by waves and wind,
Steals out her hand, by nature led,
And brings a vessel into bed;
Fair utensil, as smooth and white
As Chloe's skin, almost as bright.

Strephon, who heard the fuming rill
As from a mossy cliff distil,
Cry'd out, Ye gods! what found is this?
Can Chloe, heavenly Chloe, —?
But when he smelt a noisome steam,
Which oft' attends that luke-warm stream;
(Salerno both together joins
As sovereign medicines for the loins;)
And though contriv'd, we may suppose,
To slip his ears, yet struck his nose;
He found her, while the scent increas'd,
As mortal as himself at least.
But soon, with like occasions prest,
He boldly sent his hand in quest
(Inspir'd with courage from his bride)
To reach the pot on t'other side;
And, as he fill'd the reeking vase,
Let fly a rouser in her face.

The little Cupids hovering round,
(As pictures prove, with garlands crown'd)
Abash'd at what they saw and heard,
Flew off, nor ever more appear'd.

Adieu to ravishing delights,
High raptures, and romantic flights;
To goddesses so heavenly sweet,
Expiring shepherds at their feet;
To silver meads and shady bowers,
Dress'd up with amaranthine flowers.

How great a change! how quickly made!
They learn to call a spade a spade.
They soon from all constraints are freed;
Can see each other do their need.
On box of cedar sits the wife,
And makes it warm for dearest life;
And, by the beastly way of thinking,
Finds great society in stinking.
Now Strephon daily entertains
His Chloe in the homeliest strains;
And Chloe, more experienc'd grown,
With interest pays him back his own.
No maid at Court is less ashamed,
Howe'er for selling bargains fam'd,
Than she to name her parts behind,
Or when a-bed to let out wind.

Fair Decency, celestial maid!
Descend from heaven to beauty's aid!
Though beauty may beget desire,
'Tis thou must fan the lover's fire:
For beauty, like supreme dominion,
Is best supported by opinion:
If decency brings no supplies,
Opinion falls, and beauty dies.

To see some radiant nymph appear
In all her glittering birth-day gear,
You think some goddess from the sky
Descended, ready cut and dry:
But, ere you sell yourself to laughter,
Consider well what may come after;
For fine ideas vanish fast,
While all the gross and filthy last.

O Strephon, ere that fatal day
When Chloe stole your heart away,

Had you but through a cranny spy'd
On house of ease your future bride,
In all the postures of her face
Which nature gives in such a case;
Distortions, groanings, strainings, heavings;
'Twere better you had lick'd her leavings,
Than from experience find too late
Your goddess grown a filthy mate.
Your fancy then had always dwelt
On what you saw, and what you smelt;
Would still the same ideas give ye,
As when you spy'd her on the privy;
And, spite of Chloe's charms divine,
Your heart had been as whole as mine.

Authorities, both old and recent,
Direct that women must be decent;
And from the spouse each blemish hide,
More than from all the world beside.

Unjustly all our nymphs complain
Their empire holds so short a reign;
Is after marriage lost so soon,
It hardly holds the honey-moon:
For, if they keep not what they caught,
It is entirely their own fault.

They take possession of the crown,
And then throw all their weapons down:
Though, by the politician's scheme,
Whoe'er arrives at power supreme,
Those arts by which at first they gain it,
They still must practise to maintain it.

What various ways our females take
To pass for wits before a rake!
And in the fruitless search pursue
All other methods but the true!

Some try to learn polite behaviour
By reading books against their Saviour;
Some call it witty to reflect
On every natural defect;
Some show they never want explaining,
To comprehend a double meaning.
But sure a tell-tale out of school
Is of all wits the greatest fool;
Whose rank imagination fills
Her heart, and from her lips distils:
You'd think she utter'd from behind,
Or at her mouth was breaking wind.
Why is a handsome wife ador'd
By every coxcomb but her lord?
From yonder puppet-man inquire,
Who wisely hides his wood and wire;
Shows Sheba's queen completely dress'd,
And Solomon in royal vest:
But view them litter'd on the floor,
Or strung on pegs behind the door;
Punch is exactly of a piece
With Lorrain's duke, and prince of Greece.

A prudent builder should forecast
How long the stuff is like to last;
And carefully observe the ground,
To build on some foundation sound.
What house, when its materials crumble,
Must not inevitably tumble?
What edifice can long endure,
Rais'd on a basis unsecure?
Rash mortals, ere you take a wife,
Contrive your pile to last for life:
Since beauty scarce endures a day,
And youth so swiftly glides away;

Why will you make yourself a bubble,
To build on sand with hay and stubble?

On sense and wit your passion found,
By decency cemented round;
Let prudence with good-nature strive
To keep esteem and love alive.

Then, come old age whene'er it will,
Your friendship shall continue still:

And thus a mutual gentle fire
Shall never but with life expire.

A P O L L O;

OR, A PROBLEM SOLVED. 1731.

APOLLO, god of light and wit,
Could verse inspire, but seldom writ;
Refin'd all metals with his looks,
As well as chemists by their books:
As handsome as my lady's page;
Sweet five-and-twenty was his age.
His wig was made of sunny rays,
He crown'd his youthful head with bays;
Not all the court of Heaven could show
So niece and so complete a beau.
No heir upon his first appearance,
With twenty thousand pounds a-year rents,
E'er drove, before he sold his land,
So fine a coach along the strand;
The spokes, we are by Ovid told,
Were silver, and the axle gold:
(I own, 'twas but a coach and four;
For Jupiter allows no more!)

Yet, with his beauty, wealth, and parts,
Enough to win ten thousand hearts,
No vulgar deity above
Was so unfortunate in love.

Three weighty causes were assign'd,
That mov'd the nymphs to be unkind.
Nine muses always waiting round him,
He left them virgins as he found them.
His singing was another fault;
For he could reach to B in alt:
And, by the sentiments of Pliny,
Such fingers are like Nicolini.
At last, the point was fully clear'd;
In short, Apollo had no beard.

THE PLACE OF THE DAMNED. 1731.

ALL folks who pretend to religion and grace,
Allow there's a hell, but dispute of the place:
But, if hell may by logical rules be defin'd
The place of the damn'd—I'll tell you my mind,
Wherever the damn'd do chiefly abound,
Most certainly there is hell to be found.
Damn'd poets, damn'd critics, damn'd blockheads,
damn'd knaves,
Damn'd senators brib'd, damn'd prostitute slaves;
Damn'd lawyers and judges, damn'd lords and damn'd
squires; [damn'd liars;
Damn'd spies and informers, damn'd friends and
Damn'd villains, corrupted in every station;
Damn'd time-serving priests all over the nation;
And into the bargain I'll readily give you
Damn'd ignorant prelates and counsellors privy.

Then let us no longer by parsons be flamm'd,
For we know by these marks the place of the damn'd:
And hell to be sure is at Paris or Rome.
How happy for us that it is not at home!

J U D A S. 1731.

By the just vengeance of incens'd skies,
Poor Bishop Judas late repenting dies.
The Jews engag'd him with a paltry bribe,
Amounting hardly to a crown a tribe;
Which though his conscience forc'd him to restore
(And, parsons tell us, no man could do more);
Yet, through despair, of God and man accurst,
He lost his bishopric, and hang'd or burst.
Those former ages differ'd much from this;
Judas betray'd his master with a kiss:
But some have kiss'd the gospel fifty times,
Whose perjury's the least of all their crimes;
Some who can perjure through a two-inch board,
Yet keep their bishoprics, and 'scape the cord:
Like hemp, which, by a skilful spinster drawn
To slender threads, may sometimes pass for lawn.

As ancient Judas by transgression fell,
And burst afunder ere he went to hell;
So could we see a set of new Isariots [riots;
Come headlong tumbling from their mitred cha-
Each modern Judas perish like the first;
Drop from the tree, with all his bowels burst;
Who could forbear, that view'd each guilty face,
To cry, "Lo! Judas gone to his old place;
" His habitation let all men forsake,
" And let his bishopric another take!"

AN EPISTLE TO MR. GAY *. 1731.

How could you, Gay, disgrace the muses' train,
To serve a tasteless court twelve years in vain!
Fain would I think our female friend† sincere,
Till Bob, the poet's foe, possess'd her ear.
Did female virtue e'er so high ascend,
To lose an inch of favour for a friend?

Say, had the court no better place to choose
For thee than make a dry-nurse of thy muse?
How cheaply had thy liberty been sold,
To squire a royal girl of two years old;
In leading strings her infant-steps to guide,
Or with her go-cart amble side by side!

But princely Douglas and his glorious dame
Advanc'd thy fortune, and preserv'd thy fame.
Nor will your nobler gifts be misapply'd,
When o'er your patron's treasure you preside:
The world shall own, his choice was wise and just,
For sons of Phœbus never break their trust.

Not love of beauty less the heart inflames
Of guardian eunuchs to the Sultan's dames:
Their passions not more impotent and cold,
Than those of poets to the lust of gold.
With Pæan's purest fire his favourites glow,
The dregs will serve to ripen ore below;

* The Dean, having been told by an intimate friend, that the Duke of Queensberry had employed Gay to inspect the accounts and management of his Grace's receivers and stewards (which however proved to be a mistake), wrote this epistle to his friend.

† The Countess of Suffolk.

His meanest work: for, had he thought it fit
That wealth should be the appennage of wit,
The god of light could ne'er have been so blind
To deal it to the worst of human-kind.

But let me now, for I can do it well,
Your conduct in this new employ foretel.

And first: to make my observation right,
I place a statesman full before my sight,
A bloated minister in all his geer,
With shameless visage and perfidious leer;
Two rows of teeth arm each devouring jaw,
And ostrich-like his all-digesting maw.
My fancy drags this monster to my view,
To show the world his chief reverse in you.
Of loud unmeaning sounds a rapid flood
Rolls from his mouth in plenteous streams of mud;
With these the court and senate-house he plies,
Made up of noise, and impudence, and lies.

Now let me show how Bob and you agree:
You serve a potent prince, as well as he.

The ducal coffers, trusted to your charge,
Your honest care may fill, perhaps enlarge:
His vassals easy, and the owner blest;
They pay a trifle, and enjoy the rest.

Not so a nation's revenues are paid:
The servant's faults are on the master laid.
The people with a sigh their taxes bring;
And, cursing Bob, forget to bless the king.

Next hearken, Gay, to what thy charge requires,

With servants, tenants, and the neighbouring squires,
Let all domestics feel your gentle sway;
Nor bribe, insult, nor flatter, nor betray.
Let due reward to merit be allow'd;
Nor with your kindred half the palace crowd;
Nor think yourself secure in doing wrong,
By telling noses with a party strong.

Be rich; but of your wealth make no parade;

At least, before your master's debts are paid:

Nor in a palace, built with charge immense,

Presume to treat him at his own expence.

Each farmer in the neighbourhood can count
To what your lawful perquisites amount.

The tenants poor, the hardness of the times,
Are ill excuses for a servant's crimes.

With interest, and a premium paid beside,

The master's pressing wants must be supply'd;

With hasty zeal behold the steward come

By his own credit to advance the sum;

Who, while th' unrighteous mammon is his friend,

May well conclude his power will never end.

A faithful treasurer! what could he do more?

He lends my Lord what was my Lord's before.

The law so strictly guards the monarch's health,

That no physician dares prescribe by stealth:

The council sit; approve the doctor's skill;

And give advice, before he gives the pill.

But the state empiric acts a safer part;

And, while he poisons, wins the royal heart.

But how can I describe the ravenous breed?

Then let me now by negatives proceed.

Suppose your Lord a trusty servant send

On weighty business to some neighbouring friend:

Presume not Gay, unless you serve a drone,

To countermand his orders by your own.

Should some imperious neighbour sink the boats,

And drain the fish-ponds, while your master dotes;

Shall he upon the ducal rights intrench,
Because he brib'd you with a brace of tench?

Nor from your Lord his bad condition hide,

To feed his luxury, or soothe his pride.

Nor at an under-rate his timber sell,

And with an oath assure him, all is well;

Or swear it rotten, and with bumble airs

Request it of him to complete your stairs:

Nor, when a mortgage lies on half his lands,

Come with a purse of guineas in your hands.

Have Peter Waters always in your mind:

That rogue of genuine ministerial kind,

Can half the peerage by his arts bewitch,

Starve twenty lords to make one scoundrel rich;

And, when he gravely has undone a score,

Is humbly pray'd to ruin twenty more.

A dextrous steward, when his tricks are found,

Hush-money sends to all the neighbours round;

His master, unsuspecting of his pranks,

Pays all the cost, and gives the villain thanks.

And, should a friend attempt to set him right,

His Lordship would impute it all to spight;

Would love his favourite better than before,

And trust his honesty just so much more.

Thus families, like realms, with equal fate,

Are sunk by premier ministers of state.

Some, when an heir succeeds, go boldly on,

And, as they robb'd the father, rob the son.

A knave, who deep embroils his lord's affairs,

Will soon grow necessary to his heirs.

His policy consists in setting traps,

In finding ways and means, and stopping gaps;

He knows a thousand tricks whene'er he pleases,

Though not to cure, yet palliate each disease.

In either case, an equal chance is run;

For, keep or turn him out, my Lord's undone.

You want a hand to clear a filthy sink;

No cleanly workman can endure the stink.

A strong dilemma in a desperate case!

To act with infamy, or quit the place.

A bungler thus, who scarce the nail can hit,

With driving wrong will make the pannel split:

Nor dares an abler workman undertake

To drive a second, lest the whole should break.

In every court the parallel will hold;

And kings, like private folks, are bought and sold.

The ruling rogue, who dreads to be cashier'd,

Contrives, as he is bated, to be fear'd;

Confounds accounts, perplexes all affairs;

For vengeance more embroils, than skill repairs.

So robbers (and their ends are just the same),

To 'scape inquiries, leave the house in flame.

I knew a brazen minister of state,

Who bore for twice ten years the public hate.

In every mouth the question most in vogue

Was, When will they turn out this odious rogue?

A juncture happen'd in his highest pride:

While he went robbing on, old master dy'd.

We thought there now remain'd no room to doubt;

His work is done, the minister must out.

The court invited more than one or two;

Will you, Sir Spencer? or, Will you, or you?

But not a soul his office durst accept;

The subtle knave had all the plunder swept:

And, such was then the temper of the times,

He ow'd his preservation to his crimes.

The candidates observ'd his dirty paws,

Nor found it difficult to guess the cause:

But, when they smelt such foul corruptions round him,

Away they fled, and left him as they found him.

Thus, when a greedy flover once has thrown His snout into the mess, 'tis all his own.

ON THE IRISH BISHOPS *. 1731.

OLD Latimer preaching did fairly describe
A bishop, who rul'd all the rest of his tribe:
And who is this bishop? and where does he dwell?
Why truly 'tis Satan, archbishop of hell.

And He was a primate, and He wore a mitre
Surrounded with jewels of sulphur and nitre.
How nearly this bishop our bishops resembles!
But he has the odds, who believes and who trembles.
Could you see his grim grace, for a pound to a penny,
You'd swear it must be the baboon of Kilkenny:
Poor Satan will think the comparison odious;
I wish I could find him out one more commodious.
But this I am sure, the most reverend old dragon
Has got on the bench many bishops suffragan;
And all men believe he resides there incog.
To give them by turns an invisible jog.

Our bishops, puff'd up with wealth and with pride,
'To hell on the backs of the clergy would ride.
'They mounted and labour'd with whip and with spur,
In vain—for the devil a parson would stir. [doom,
So the Commons unhors'd them; and this was their
On their crosiers to ride, like a witch on a broom.
'Though they gallop'd so fast, on the road you may find 'em,

And have left us but three out of twenty behind 'em,
Lord Bolton's good grace, Lord Car, and Lord
Howard,

In spite of the devil, would still be untoward:
'They came of good kindred, and could not endure
'Their former companions should beg at their door.

When Christ was betray'd to Pilate the prætor,
Of a dozen apostles but one prov'd a traitor:
One traitor alone, and faithful eleven;
But we can afford you six traitors in seven.

What a clutter with clippings, dividings, and cleavings! [leavings.

And the clergy forsooth must take up with their
If making divisions was all their intent, [meant;
'They've done it, we thank them, but not as they
And so may such bishops for ever divide,
'That no honest heathen would be on their side.
How should we rejoice, if, like Judas the first,
'Those splitters of parsons in sunder should burst!

Now hear an allusion:—A mitre, you know,
Is divided above, but united below.

If this you consider, our emblem is right;
'The bishops divide, but the clergy unite.

Should the bottom be split, our bishops would dread
'That the mitre would never stick fast on their head:
And yet they have learnt the chief art of a sovereign,
As Machiavel taught them; divide, and ye govern.
But courage, my lords; though it cannot be said
'That one cloven tongue ever sat on your head;
I'll hold you a groat (and I wish I could see't),
If your stockings were off, you could show cloven feet.

* Occasioned by their endeavouring to get an act to divide the church-livings: which bill was rejected by the Irish House of Commons.

But hold, cry the bishops; and give us fair play;
Before you condemn us, hear what we can say.

What truer affections could ever be shown,
Than saving your souls by damning our own?
And have we not practis'd all methods to gain you;
With the tithe of the tithe of the tithe to maintain
Provided a fund for building your spittals? [you;
You are only to live four years without *vi*tuals.

Content, my good lords; but let us change hands;
First take you our tithes, and give us your lands.
So God blest the church and three of our mitres;
And God blest the Commons, for biting the biters.

ON THE DEATH OF DR. SWIFT *.

Occasioned by reading the following MAXIM in ROCHÉ-FOUCAULT, " Dans l'adversité de nos meilleurs amis, nous trouvons toujours quelque chose qui ne nous déplaît pas."

" In the adversity of our best friends, we always find something that doth not displease us."

As Rochefoucault his maxims drew
From nature, I believe them true:
They argue no corrupted mind
In him; the fault is in mankind.

This maxim more than all the rest
Is thought too base for human breast:

" In all distresses of our friends,
" We first consult our private ends;
" While nature, kindly bent to ease us,
" Points out some circumstance to please us."

If this perhaps your patience move,
Let reason and experience prove.

We all behold with envious eyes
Our equals rais'd above our size.
Who would not at a crowded show
Stand high himself, keep others low?
I love my friend as well as you:
But why should he obstruct my view?
Then let me have the higher post;
Suppose it but an inch at most.
If in a battle you should find
One, whom you love of all mankind,
Had some heroic action done,
A champion kill'd, or trophy won;
Rather than thus be over-topt,
Would you not wish his laurels cropt?
Dear honest Ned is in the gout,
Lies rack'd with pain, and you without:
How patiently you hear him groan!
How glad the case is not your own!

What poet would not grieve to see
His brother write as well as he?
But, rather than they should excel,
Would wish his rivals all in hell?

Her end when emulation misses,
She turns to envy, stings, and hisses:
The strongest friendship yields to pride,
Unless the odds be on our side.
Vain human-kind! fantastic race!
Thy various follies who can trace?

* Written in November 1731.—There are two distinct poems on this subject, one of them containing many spurious lines. In what is here printed, the genuine parts of both are preserved.

Self-love, ambition, envy, pride,
 Their empire in our hearts divide.
 Give others riches, power, and station,
 'Tis all to me an usurpation.
 I have no title to aspire;
 Yet, when you sink, I seem the higher.
 In Pope I cannot read a line,
 But with a sigh I wist it mine:
 When he can in one couplet fix
 More sense than I can do in six;
 It gives me such a jealous fit,
 I cry, "Pox take him and his wit!"
 I grieve to be outdone by Gay
 In my own humorous biting way.
 Arbuthnot is no more my friend,
 Who dares to irony pretend,
 Which I was born to introduce,
 Refin'd at first, and show'd its use.
 St. John, as well as Pulteney, knows
 That I had some repute for prose;
 And, till they drove me out of date,
 Could maul a minister of state.
 If they have mortified my pride,
 And made me throw my pen aside;
 If with such talents heaven hath bless'd 'em,
 Have I not reason to detest 'em?

To all my foes, dear Fortune, send
 Thy gifts; but never to my friend:
 I tamely can endure the first;
 But this with envy makes me burst.

Thus much may serve by way of proem;
 Proceed we therefore to our poem.

The time is not remote when I
 Must by the course of nature die;
 When, I foresee, my special friends
 Will try to find their private ends:
 And, though 'tis hardly understood
 Which way my death can do them good,
 Yet thus, methinks, I hear them speak:
 "See how the Dean begins to break!"
 "Poor gentleman, he droops apace!"
 "You plainly find it in his face."
 "That old vertigo in his head
 Will never leave him, till he's dead."
 "Besides, his memory decays:
 He recollects not what he says;
 He cannot call his friends to mind;
 Forgets the place where last he din'd;
 Plies you with stories o'er and o'er;
 He told them fifty times before.
 How does he fancy, we can sit
 To hear his out-of-fashion wit?
 But he takes up with younger folks,
 Who for his wine will bear his jokes.
 Faith! he must make his stories shorter,
 Or change his comrades once a quarter:
 In half the time he talks them round,
 There must another set be found.
 For poetry, he's past his prime:
 He takes an hour to find a rhyme;
 His fire is out, his wit decay'd,
 His fancy funk, his muse a jade.
 I'd have him throw away his pen;—
 But there's no talking to some men!"

And then their tenderness appears
 By adding largely to my years:
 "He's older than he would be reckon'd,
 And well remembers Charles the Second."

"He hardly drinks a pint of wine;
 And that, I doubt, is no good sign.
 His stomach too begins to fail:
 Last year we thought him strong and hale;
 But now he's quite another thing:
 I wish he may hold out till spring!"
 They hug themselves, and reason thus:
 "It is not yet so bad with us!"

In such a case, they talk in tropes,
 And by their fears express their hopes.
 Some great misfortune to portend,
 No enemy can match a friend.
 With all the kindness they profess,
 The merit of a lucky guess
 (When daily how-d'ye's come of course,
 And servants answer, "Worse and worse!")
 Would please them better, than to tell,
 That, "God be prais'd, the Dean is well."
 Then he who prophesy'd the best,
 Approves his foresight to the rest:
 "You know I always fear'd the worst,
 And often told you so at first."
 He'd rather choose that I should die,
 Than his predictions prove a lie.
 Not one foretells I shall recover;
 But all agree to give me over.

Yet, should some neighbour feel a pain
 Just in the parts where I complain;
 How many a message would he send!
 What hearty prayers that I should mend!
 Inquire what regimen I kept;
 What gave me ease, and how I slept?
 And more lament when I was dead,
 Than all the snivelers round my bed.

My good companions, never fear;
 For, though you may mistake a year,
 Though your prognostics run too fast,
 They must be verify'd at last.

Behold the fatal day arrive!
 "How is the Dean?"—"He's just alive."
 Now the departing prayer is read;
 He hardly breathes—The Dean is dead.

Before the passing-bell begun,
 The news through half the town is run.
 "Oh! may we all for death prepare!"
 "What has he left? and who's his heir?"
 "I know no more than what the news is;
 'Tis all bequeath'd to public uses.
 To public uses! there's a whim!
 What had the public done for him?
 Mere envy, avarice, and pride:
 He gave it all—but first he dy'd.
 And had the Dean, in all the nation,
 No worthy friend, no poor relation?
 So ready to do strangers good,
 Forgetting his own flesh and blood!"

Now Grub-street wits are all employ'd;
 With elegies the town is cloy'd:
 Some paragraph in every paper,
 To curse the Dean, or bless the Drapier.

The doctors, tender of their fame,
 Wisely on me lay all the blame.
 "We must confess, his case was nice;
 But he would never take advice.
 Had he been rul'd, for aught appears,
 He might have liv'd these twenty years:
 For, when we open'd him, we found
 That all his vital parts were found."

From Dublin soon to London spread,
 'Tis told at court, "The Dean is dead."
 And Lady Suffolk*, in the spleen,
 Runs laughing up to tell the queen.
 The queen, so gracious, mild, and good,
 Cries, "Is he gone! 'tis time he should."
 "He's dead, you say; then let him rot."
 "I'm glad the medals† were forgot."
 "I promis'd him, I own; but when?"
 "I only was the princess then,"
 "But now, as consort of the king,"
 "You know, 'tis quite another thing."

Now Chartres, at Sir Robert's levee,
 Tells with a sneer the tidings heavy:
 "Why, if he dy'd without his shoes,"
 Cries Bob, "I'm sorry for the news:
 "Oh, were the wretch but living still,
 "And in his place my good friend Will!
 "Or had a mitre on his head,
 "Provided Bolingbroke were dead!"

Now Curll his shop from rubbish drains:
 Three genuine tomes of Swift's remains!
 And then, to make them pass the glibber,
 Revis'd by Tibbald's, Moore, and Cibber.
 He'll treat me as he does my betters,
 Publish my will, my life, my letters;
 Revive the libels born to die;
 Which Pope must bear, as well as I.

Here shift the scene, to represent
 How those I love my death lament.
 Poor Pope will grieve a month, and Gay
 A week, and Arbuthnot a day.

St. John himself will scarce forbear
 To bite his pen, and drop a tear.
 The rest will give a shrug, and cry,
 "I'm sorry—but we all must die!"

Indifference, clad in Wisdom's guise,
 All fortitude of mind supplies:
 For how can stony bowels melt
 In those who never pity felt!
 When we are lash'd, they kiss the rod,
 Resigning to the will of God.

The fools, my juniors by a year,
 Are tortur'd with suspense and fear;
 Who wisely thought my age a screen,
 When death approach'd, to stand between:
 The screen remov'd, their hearts are trembling;
 They mourn for me without dissembling.

My female friends, whose tender hearts
 Have better learn'd to act their parts,
 Receive the news in doleful dumps:
 "The Dean is dead: (Pray what is trumps?)
 "Then, Lord have mercy on his soul!
 "(Ladies, I'll venture for the vole.)
 "Six Deans, they say, must bear the pall:
 "(I wish I knew what king to call.)
 "Madam, your husband will attend
 "The funeral of so good a friend.
 "No, madam, 'tis a shocking sight;
 "And he's engag'd to-morrow night:
 "My Lady Club will take it ill,
 "If he should fail her at quadrille.
 "He lov'd the Dean—(I lead a heart.)
 "But dearest friends, they say, must part.

* Mrs. Howard, at one time a favourite with the Dean.

† Which the Dean in vain expected, in return for a small present he had sent to the princess.

"His time was come; he ran his race;

"We hope he's in a better place."

Why do we grieve that friends should die?
 No loss more easy to supply.

One year is past; a different scene!

No farther mention of the Dean,

Who now, alas! no more is miss'd,

Than if he never did exist.

Where's now the favourite of Apollo?

Departed:—and his works must follow;

Must undergo the common fate;

His kind of wit is out of date.

Some country squire to Lintot goes,

Inquires for Swift in verse and prose.

Says Lintot, "I have heard the name;

"He dy'd a year ago."—"The fame."

He searches all the shop in vain.

"Sir, you may find them in Duck-lane:

"I sent them, with a load of books,

"Last Monday, to the pastry-cook's.

"To fancy they could live a year!

"I find you're but a stranger here.

"The Dean was famous in his time,

"And had a kind of knack at rhyme.

"His way of writing now is past:

"The town has got a better taste.

"I keep no antiquated stuff;

"But spick and span I have enough.

"Pray, do but give me leave to show 'em:

"Here's Colley Cibber's birth-day poem.

"This ode you never yet have seen,

"By Stephen Duck, upon the queen.

"Then here's a letter finely penn'd

"Against the Craftsman and his friend:

"It clearly shows that all reflection

"On ministers is disaffection.

"Next, here's Sir Robert's vindication,

"And Mr. Henley's last oration.

"The hawkers have not got them yet

"Your honour please to buy a set?

"Here's Wolston's tracts, the twelfth edition;

"'Tis read by every politician:

"The country-members, when in town,

"To all their boroughs send them down:

"You never met a thing so smart;

"The courtiers have them all by heart:

"Those maids of honour who can read,

"Are taught to use them for their creed.

"The reverend author's good intention

"Hath been rewarded with a pension*:

"He doth an honour to his gown,

"By bravely running priest-craft down:

"He shows, as sure as God's in Gloucester,

"That Moses was a grand impostor;

"That all his miracles were cheats,

"Perform'd as jugglers do their feats:

"The church had never such a writer;

"A shame he hath not got a mitre!"

Suppose me dead; and then suppose

A club assembled at the Rose;

Where, from discourse of this and that,

I grow the subject of their chat.

And while they toss my name about,

With favour some, and some without;

One, quite indifferent in the cause,

My character impartial draws.

* Wolston is here confounded with Woolaston.

" The Dean, if we believe report,
 " Was never ill receiv'd at court,
 " Although, ironically grave,
 " He sham'd the fool, and lash'd the knave;
 " To steal a hint was never known,
 " But what he writ was all his own."
 " Sir, I have heard another story;
 " He was a most confounded Tory,
 " And grew, or he is much bely'd,
 " Extremely dull, before he dy'd."
 " Can we the Drapier then forget?
 " Is not our nation in his debt?
 " 'Twas he that writ the Drapier's letters!"—
 " He should have left them for his betters;
 " We had a hundred abler men,
 " Nor need depend upon his pen.—
 " Say what you will about his reading,
 " You never can defend his breeding;
 " Who, in his satires running riot,
 " Could never leave the world in quiet;
 " Attacking, when he took the whim,
 " Court, city, camp—all one to him.—
 " But why would he, except he slobber'd,
 " Offend our patriot great Sir Robert,
 " Whose counsels aid the sovereign power
 " To save the nation every hour!
 " What scenes of evil he unravels
 " In satires, libels, lying travels,
 " Not sparing his own clergy cloth,
 " But eats into it, like a moth!"
 " Perhaps I may allow the Dean
 " Had too much satire in his vein,
 " And seem'd determin'd not to starve it,
 " Because no age could more deserye it.
 " Yet malice never was his aim;
 " He lash'd the vice, but spar'd the name.
 " No individual could resent,
 " Where thousands equally were meant:
 " His satire points at no defect,
 " But what all mortals may correct;
 " For he abhor'd the senseless tribe
 " Who call it humour when they gibe:
 " He spar'd a hump or crooked nose,
 " Whose owners set not up for beaux.
 " True genuine dullness mov'd his pity,
 " Unless it offer'd to be witty.
 " Those who their ignorance confess,
 " He ne'er offended with a jest;
 " But laugh'd to hear an idiot quote
 " A verse from Horace learn'd by rote.
 " Vice, if it e'er can be abash'd,
 " Must be or ridicul'd, or lash'd.
 " If you resent it, who's to blame?
 " He neither knows you, nor your name.
 " Should vice expect to 'scape rebuke,
 " Because its owner is a duke?
 " His friendships, still to few confin'd,
 " Were always of the middling kind;
 " No fools of rank, or mungrel breed,
 " Who fain would pass for lords indeed:
 " Where titles give no right or power,
 " And peerage is a wither'd flower;
 " He would have deem'd it a disgrace,
 " If such a wretch had known his face.
 " On rural squires, that kingdom's bane,
 " He vented oft' his wrath in vain:
 "  squires to market brought,
 " Who sell their souls and  for nought.

VOL. IX.

" The  go joyful back,
 " To rob the church, their tenants rack;
 " Go snacks with  justices,
 " And keep the peace to pick up fees;
 " In every jobb to have a share,
 " A gaol or turnpike to repair;
 " And turn  to public roads
 " Commodious to their own abodes.
 " He never thought an honour done him,
 " Because a peer was proud to own him;
 " Would rather slip aside, and choose
 " To talk with wits in dirty shoes;
 " And scorn the tools with stars and garters,
 " So often seen carelling Chartres.
 " He never courted men in station,
 " Nor persons held in admiration,
 " Of no man's greatness was afraid,
 " Because he sought for no man's aid.
 " Though trusted long in great affairs,
 " He gave himself no haughty airs:
 " Without regarding private ends,
 " Spent all his credit for his friends;
 " And only chose the wise and good;
 " No flatterers; no allies in blood.
 " But succour'd virtue in distress,
 " And seldom fail'd of good success;
 " As numbers in their hearts must own,
 " Who, but for him, had been unknown.
 " He kept with princes due decorum;
 " Yet never stood in awe before 'em.
 " He follow'd David's lesson just;
 " In princes never put his trust:
 " And, would you make him truly sour,
 " Provoke him with a slave in power.
 " The Irish senate if you nam'd,
 " With what impatience he declaim'd!
 " Fair LIBERTY was all his cry;
 " For her he stood prepar'd to die;
 " For her he boldly stood alone;
 " For her he oft' expos'd his own.
 " Two kingdoms, just as faction led,
 " Had set a price upon his head;
 " But not a traitor could be found,
 " To sell him for six hundred pound.
 " Had he but spar'd his tongue and pen,
 " He might have rose like other men:
 " But power was never in his thought,
 " And wealth he valued not a groat:
 " Ingratitude he often found,
 " And pity'd those who meant the wound;
 " But kept the tenor of his mind,
 " To merit well of human-kind;
 " Nor made a sacrifice of those
 " Who still were true, to please his foes.
 " He labour'd many a fruitless hour,
 " To reconcile his friends in power;
 " Saw mischief by a faction brewing,
 " While they pursued each other's ruin.
 " But, finding vain was all his care,
 " He left the court in mere despair.
 " And, oh! how short are human schemes!
 " Here ended all our golden dreams.
 " What St. John's skill in state affairs,
 " What Ormond's valour, Oxford's cares,
 " To save their sinking country lent,
 " Was all destroy'd by one event.
 " Too soon that precious life was ended,
 " On which alone our weal depended.

K

" When up a dangerous faction starts,
 " With wrath and vengeance in their hearts;
 " By solemn league and covenant bound,
 " To ruin, slaughter, and confound;
 " To turn religion to a fable,
 " And make the government a Babel;
 " Pervert the laws, disgrace the gown,
 " Corrupt the senate, rob the crown;
 " To sacrifice old England's glory,
 " And make her infamous in story:
 " When such a tempest shook the land,
 " How could unguarded virtue stand!
 " With horror, grief, despair, the Dean
 " Beheld the dire destructive scene:
 " His friends in exile, or the Tower,
 " Himself within the frown of power;
 " Pursued by base invenom'd pens,
 " Far to the land of f— and fens;
 " A servile race in folly nurs'd,
 " Who truckle most, when treated worst.
 " By innocence and resolution,
 " He bore continual persecution;
 " While numbers to preferment rose,
 " Whose merit was to be his foes;
 " When ev'n his own familiar friends,
 " Intent upon their private ends,
 " Like renegadoes now he feels,
 " Against him lifting up their beels.
 " The Dean did, by his pen, defeat
 " An infamous destructive cheat;
 " Taught fools their interest how to know,
 " And gave them arms to ward the blow.
 " Envy hath own'd it was his doing,
 " To save that hapless land from ruin;
 " While they who at the steerage stood,
 " And reap'd the profit, sought his blood.
 " To save them from their evil fate,
 " In him was held a crime of state.
 " A wicked monster on the bench,
 " Whose fury blood could never quench;
 " As vile and profligate a villain,
 " As modern Scroggs, or old Tressilian;
 " Who long all justice had discarded,
 " Nor fear'd be God, nor man regarded;
 " Vow'd on the Dean his rage to vent,
 " And make him of his zeal repent:
 " But heaven his innocence defends,
 " The grateful people stand his friends;
 " Not strains of law, nor judges' frown,
 " Nor topics brought to please the crown,
 " Nor witness hir'd, nor jury pick'd,
 " Prevail to bring him in convict.
 " In exile, with a steady heart,
 " He spent his life's declining part;
 " Where folly, pride, and faction sway,
 " Remote from St. John, Pope, and Gay."
 " Alas, poor Dean! his only scope
 " Was to be held a misanthrope.
 " This into general odium drew him,
 " Which if he lik'd, much good may't do him.
 " His zeal was not to lash our crimes,
 " But discontent against the times:
 " For, had we made him timely offers
 " To raise his post, or fill his coffers,
 " Perhaps he might have truckled down,
 " Like other brethren of his gown;
 " For party he would scarce have bled:—
 " I say no more—because he's dead.—

" What writings has he left behind?"
 " I hear they're of a different kind:
 " A few in verse; but most in prose—
 " Some high-flown pamphlets, I suppose:—
 " All scribbled in the worst of times,
 " To palliate his friend Oxford's crimes;
 " To praise queen Anne, nay more, defend her,
 " As never favouring the Pretender:
 " Or libels yet conceal'd from sight,
 " Against the court to show his spite:
 " Perhaps his travels, part the third;
 " A lie at every second word—
 " Offensive to a loyal ear:—
 " But—not one sermon, you may swear."
 " He knew an hundred pleasing stories,
 " With all the turns of Whigs and Tories:
 " Was cheerful to his dying-day;
 " And friends would let him have his way.
 " As for his works in verse or prose,
 " I own myself no judge of those.
 " Nor can I tell what critics thought them;
 " But this I know, all people bought them,
 " As with a moral view design'd,
 " To please and to reform mankind:
 " And, if he often miss'd his aim,
 " The world must own it to their shame,
 " The praise is his, and theirs the blame.
 " He gave the little wealth he had " To build a house for fools and mad;
 " To show, by one satiric touch,
 " No nation wanted it so much.
 " That kingdom he hath left his debtor,
 " I wish it soon may have a better.
 " And, since you dread no further lashes,
 " Methinks you may forgive his ashes."

AN EPISTLE TO TWO FRIENDS*.

TO DR. HELSHAM.

SIR, Nov. 23, at night, 1731.

WHEN I left you, I found myself of the grape's juice
 I'm so full of pity, I never abuse sick; [sick;
 And the patientest patient that ever you knew sick,
 Both when I am purge-sick, and when I am spew-sick.
 I pitied my cat, whom I knew by her mew sick;
 She mended at first, but now she's a-new sick.
 Captain Butler made some in the church black and blue sick; [all pew-sick.
 Dean Cross, had he preach'd, would have made us
 Are not you, in a crowd when you sweat and stew,
 sick? [sick,
 Lady Santry got out of the church when she grew
 And, as fast as she could, to the deanry flew sick.
 Miss Morice was (I can assure you 'tis true) sick:
 For, who would not be in that numerous crew sick?
 Such music would make a fanatic or Jew sick,
 Yet, ladies are seldom at ombre or lue sick: [sick.
 Nor is old Nanny Shales, when'er she does brew,
 My footman came home from the church of a bruise
 sick, [sick;
 And look'd like a rake, who was made in the stews

* This medley (for it cannot be called a poem) is given as a specimen of those bagatelles for which the Dean hath perhaps been too severely censured. Some, which were still more exceptionable, are suppressed.

But you learned doctors can make whom you choofe
sick :

And poor I myself was, when I withdrew, sick ;
For the smell of them made me like garlic and rue sick, [clue, sick.

And I got through the crowd, though not let by a
You hop'd to find many (for that was your cue) sick ;
But there was not a dozen (to give them their due)
sick,

And those, to be sure, stuck together like glew, sick.
So are ladies in crowds, when they squeeze and they screw, sick. [hue, sick ;

You may find they are all, by their yellow pale
So am I, when tobacco, like Robin, I chew, sick.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

If I write any more, it will make my poor muse sick.
This night I came home with a very cold dew sick,
And I wish I may soon be not of an ague sick ;
But I hope I shall ne'er be, like you, of a shrew sick,
Who often has made me, by looking askew, sick.

DR. HELSHAM'S ANSWER.

THE doctor's first rhyme would make any Jew sick :
I know it has made a fine lady in blue sick,
For which she is gone in a coach to Killbrew sick,
Like a hen I once had, from a fox when she flew sick.
Last Monday a lady at St. Patrick's did spew sick,
And made all the rest of the folks in the pew sick ;
The surgeon who bled her, his lancet out drew sick,
And stopt the distemper, as being but new sick.
The yacht, the last storm, had all her whole crew
sick ; [and you sick :
Had we two been there, it would have made me
A lady that long'd, is by eating of glew sick :
Did you ever know one in a very good Q sick ?
I'm told that my wife is by winding a clue sick ;
The doctors have made her by rhyme and by rue sick. [threw sick,

There's a gamester in town, for a throw that he
And yet the old trade of his dice he'll pursue sick ;
I've known an old miser for paying his due sick ;
At present I'm grown by a pinch of my shoe sick,
And what would you have me with verses to do sick ?
Send rhymes, and I'll send you some others in lieu
Of rhymes I've a plenty, [sick.
And therefore send twenty.

Answered the same day when sent, Nov. 23.

I desire you will carry both these to the doctor, together with his own ; and let him know we are not persons to be insulted.

" Can you match with me,
" Who send thirty-three ?
" You must get fourteen more,
" To make up thirty-four :
" But, if me you can conquer,
" I'll own you a strong cur *."

This morning I'm growing by smelling of yew
sick ;

My brother's come over with gold from Peru sick ;

* The lines " thus mark'd," were written by Dr. Swift, at the bottom of Dr. Hesham's twenty lines ; and the following fourteen were afterwards added on the same paper.

Last night I came home in a storm that then blew sick ;
This moment my dog at a cat I halloo sick ;
I hear, from good hands, that my poor cousin Hugh's
By quaffing a bottle, and pulling a screw sick : [sick,
And now there's no more I can write (you'll excuse)
You see that I scorn to mention word music. [sick ;

I'll do my best,

To send the rest ;

Without a jest,

I'll stand the test. [sick ;

These lines that I send you, I hope you'll peruse
I'll make you with writing a little more news sick :
Last night I came home with drinking of booze sick ;
My carpenter swears that he'll hack and he'll hew
An officer's lady, I'm told, is tattoo sick : [sick ;
I'm afraid that the line thirty-four you will view

Lord ! I could write a dozen more ; [sick.

You see, I've mounted thirty-four.

EPIGRAM,

ON THE BUSTS * IN RICHMOND HERMITAGE. 1732.

" Sic sibi lætantur docti."

WITH honour thus by Carolina plac'd,
How are these venerable bustoes grac'd !
O Queen, with more than regal title crown'd,
For love of arts and piety renown'd !
How do the friends of virtue joy to see
Her darling sons exalted thus by thee !
Nought to their fame can now be added more,
Rever'd by her whom all mankind adore.

ANOTHER.

LEWIS the living learned fed,
And rais'd the scientific head :
Our frugal Queen, to save her meat,
Exalts the head that cannot eat.

A CONCLUSION

Drawn from the above Epigrams, and sent to the Drapier.

SINCE Anna, whose bounty thy merits had fed,
Ere her own was laid low, had exalted thy head ;
And since our good Queen to the wise is so just,
To raise heads for such as are humbled in dust ;
I wonder, good man, that you are not envaulted ;
Pr'ythee, go and be dead, and be doubly exalted.

Dr. Swift's Answer.

HER majesty never shall be my exalter ;
And yet she would raise me, I know, by a halter !

TO THE REVEREND DR. SWIFT,

With a present of a Paper-Book, finely bound, on his birth-day, November 30. 1732.

BY JOHN EARL OF ORRERY.

To thee, Dear Swift, these spotless leaves I send,
Small is the present, but sincere the friend.

* Newton, Locke, Clarke, and Woolaston.

K ij

Think not so poor a book below thy care;
 Who knows the price that thou canst make it bear?
 Though taudry now, and like Tyrilla's face,
 The specious front shines out with borrow'd grace;
 Though paste-boards, glittering like a tinsel'd coat,
 A rasa tabula within denote:
 Yet, if a venal and corrupted age,
 And modern vices, should provoke thy rage;
 If, warn'd once more by their impending fate,
 A sinking country and an injur'd state
 Thy great assistance should again demand,
 And call forth reason to defend the land;
 Then shall we view these sheets with glad surprise
 Inspir'd with thought, and speaking to our eyes:
 Each vacant space shall then, enrich'd, dispense
 True force of eloquence, and nervous sense;
 Inform the judgment, animate the heart,
 And sacred rules of policy impart.
 The spangled covering, bright with splendid ore,
 Shall cheat the sight with empty show no more;
 But lead us inward to those golden mines,
 Where all thy soul in native lustre shines.
 So when the eye surveys some lovely fair,
 With bloom of beauty grac'd, with shape and air;
 How is the rapture heighten'd, when we find
 Her form excell'd by her celestial mind!

VERSES LEFT WITH A SILVER STANDISH
 ON THE
 DEAN OF ST. PATRICK'S DESK,
 ON HIS BIRTH-DAY.

BY DR. DELANY.

HITHER from Mexico I came,
 To serve a proud Iernian dame:
 Was long submitted to her will;
 At length she lost me at quadrille.
 Through various shapes I often pass'd,
 Still hoping to have rest at last;
 And still ambitious to obtain
 Admittance to the patriot dean;
 And sometimes got within his door,
 But soon turn'd out to serve the poor*;
 Not strolling idleness to aid,
 But honest industry decay'd.
 At length an artist purchas'd me,
 And wrought me to the shape you see.
 This done, to Hermes I apply'd:
 "O Hermes! gratify my pride;
 "Be it my fate to serve a sage,
 "The greatest genius of his age;
 "That matchless pen let me supply,
 "Whose living lines will never die!"
 I grant your suit, the God reply'd;
 And here he left me to reside.

V E R S E S
 OCCASIONED BY THE FOREGOING PRESENTS.

A PAPER book is sent by Boyle,
 Too neatly gilt for me to soil.

* Alluding to 500*l.* a-year lent by the Dean, without interest, to poor tradesmen.

Delany sends a silver standish,
 When I no more a pen can brandish.
 Let both around my tomb be plac'd,
 As trophies of a muse deceas'd:
 And let the friendly lines they writ,
 In praise of long-departed wit,
 Be grav'd on either side in columns,
 More to my praise than all my volumes,
 To burst with envy, spite, and rage,
 The Vandals of the present age.

T H E
 BEASTS CONFESSION TO THE PRIEST,
 On observing how most men mistake their own talents,
 1732.

WHEN beasts could speak (the learned say,
 They still can do so every day),
 It seems, they had religion then,
 As much as now we find in men.
 It happen'd, when a plague broke out
 (Which therefore made them more devout),
 The king of brutes (to make it plain,
 Of quadrupeds I only mean)
 By proclamation gave command,
 That every subject in the land
 Should to the priest confess their sins;
 And thus the pious wolf begins:
 Good father, I must own with shame,
 That often I have been to blame:
 I must confess, on Friday last,
 Wretch that I was! I broke my fast:
 But I defy the basest tongue
 To prove I did my neighbour wrong;
 Or ever went to seek my food
 By rapine, theft, or thirst of blood.
 The ass, approaching next, confess'd,
 That in his heart he lov'd a jest:
 A wag he was, he needs must own,
 And could not let a dunce alone;
 Sometimes his friend he would not spare,
 And might perhaps be too severe:
 But yet, the worst that could be said,
 He was a wit both born and bred;
 And, if it be a sin or shame,
 Nature alone must bear the blame:
 One fault he hath, is sorry for't,
 His ears are half a foot too short;
 Which could he to the standard bring,
 He'd show his face before the king:
 Then for his voice, there's none disputes
 That he's the nightingale of brutes.
 The swine with contrite heart allow'd,
 His shape and beauty made him proud:
 In diet was perhaps too nice,
 But gluttony was ne'er his vice:
 In every turn of life content.
 And meekly took what fortune sent:
 Inquire through all the parish round,
 A better neighbour ne'er was found:
 His vigilance might some displease;
 'Tis true, he hated sloth like pease.
 The mimic ape began his chatter,
 How evil tongues his life bespatter:
 Much of the censuring world complain'd,
 Who said, his gravity was feign'd:

Indeed the strictness of his morals
Engag'd him in a hundred quarrels:
He saw, and he was griev'd to see't,
His zeal was sometimes indiscreet:
He found his virtues too severe
For our corrupted times to bear:
Yet such a lewd licentious age
Might well excuse a Stoic's rage.

The goat advanc'd with decent pace,
And first excus'd his youthful face;
Forgiveness begg'd, that he appear'd
('Twas nature's fault) without a beard.
'Tis true, he was not much inclin'd
To fondness for the female kind;
Not, as his enemies object,
From chance, or natural defect;
Not by his frigid constitution;
But through a pious resolution:
For he had made a holy vow
Of chastity, as monks do now;
Which he resolv'd to keep for ever hence,
And strictly too, as doth his  Reverence*.

Apply the tale, and you shall find
How just it suits with human-kind.
Some faults we own: but, can you guess?
—Why, virtues carried to excess,
Wherewith our vanity endows us,
Though neither foe nor friend allows us.

The lawyer swears (you may rely on't)
He never squeez'd a needy client;
And this he makes his constant rule;
For which his brethren call him fool:
His conscience always was so nice,
He freely gave the poor advice;
By which he lost, he may affirm,
A hundred fees last Easter-term.
While others of the learned robe
Would break the patience of a Job.
No pleader at the bar could match
His diligence and quick dispatch;
Ne'er kept a cause, he well may boast,
Above a term, or two at most.

The cringing knave who seeks a place
Without success, thus tells his case:
Why should he longer mince the matter?
He fail'd, because he could not flatter;
He had not learn'd to turn his coat,
Nor for a party give his vote:
His crime he quickly understood;
Too zealous for the nation's good:
He found the ministers resent it,
Yet could not for his heart repent it.

The chaplain vows he cannot fawn,
Though it would raise him to the lawn;
He pass'd his hours among his books;
You find it in his meagre looks:
He might, if he were worldly wise,
Preferment get, and spare his eyes;
But own'd he had a stubborn spirit,
That made him trust alone to merit:
Would rise by merit to promotion;
Alas! a mere chimeric notion.

The doctor, if you will believe him,
Confess'd a sin; and, (God forgive him!)
Call'd up at midnight, ran to save
A blind old beggar from the grave:

 The priest his confessor.*

But see how Satan spreads his snares;
He quite forgot to say his prayers.
He cannot help it for his heart
Sometimes to act the parson's part:
Quotes from the Bible many a sentence,
That moves his patients to repentance:
And, when his medicines do no good,
Supports their minds with heavenly food,
At which, however well intended,
He hears the clergy are offended,
And grown so bold behind his back,
To call him hypocrite and quack.
In his own church he keeps a seat;
Says grace before and after meat;
And calls, without affecting airs,
His household twice a day to prayers.
He shuns apothecaries' shops,
And hates to cram the sick with slops:
He scorns to make his art a trade,
Nor bribes my lady's favourite maid:
Old nurse-keepers would never hire,
To recommend him to the squire;
Which others, whom he will not name,
Have often practis'd to their shame.

The statesman tells you, with a sneer,
His fault is to be too sincere;
And, having no sinister ends,
Is apt to disoblige his friends.
The nation's good, his master's glory,
Without regard to Whig or Tory,
Were all the schemes he had in view;
Yet he was seconded by few:
Though some had spread a thousand lies,
'Twas he defeated the excise.
'Twas known, though he had borne aspersions,
That standing troops were his aversion:
His practice was, in every station,
To serve the king, and please the nation;
Though hard to find in every case
The fittest man to fill a place:
His promises he ne'er forgot,
But took memorials on the spot:
His enemies, for want of charity,
Said, he affected popularity:
'Tis true, the people understood,
That all he did was for their good;
Their kind affections he has try'd;
No love is lost on either side.
He came to court with fortune clear,
Which now he runs out every year:
Must, at the rate that he goes on,
Inevitably be undone:
Oh! if his Majesty would please
To give him but a writ of ease,
Would grant him licence to retire,
As it hath long been his desire,
By fair accounts it would be found,
He's poorer by ten thousand pound.
He owns, and hopes it is no sin,
He ne'er was partial to his kin;
He thought it base for men in stations
To crowd the court with their relations:
His country was his dearest mother,
And every virtuous man his brother;
Through modesty or awkward shame
(For which he owns himself to blame),
He found the wisest man he could,
Without respect to friends or blood;

Nor never acts on private views,
When he hath liberty to choose.

The sharper swore he hated play,
Except to pass an hour away:
And well he might; for, to his cost,
By want of skill he always lost:
He heard there was a club of cheats,
Who had contriv'd a thousand feats;
Could change the stock, or cog a die,
And thus deceive the sharpest eye.
Nor wonder how his fortune sunk;
His brothers fleece him when he's drunk.

I own the moral not exact.
Besides, the tale is false in fact;
And so absurd, that, could I raise up
From fields Elysian, fabling Æsop,
I would accuse him to his face
For libelling the four-foot race.
Creatures of every kind but ours
Well comprehend their natural powers;
While we, whom reason ought to sway,
Mistake our talents every day.
The ass was never known so stupid
To act the part of Tray or Cupid;
Nor leaps upon his master's lap,
There to be stroak'd, and fed with pap,
As Æsop would the world persuade;
He better understands his trade:
Nor comes, whene'er his lady whistles;
But carries loads, and feeds on thistles.
Our author's meaning, I presume, is
A creature bipes et implumis;
Wherein the moralist design'd
A compliment on human-kind:
For here he owns, that now and then
Beasts may degenerate into men.

ADVICE TO A PARSON. 1732.

Would you rise in the church? be stupid and dull;
Be empty of learning, of insolence full;
Though lewd and immoral, be formal and grave,
In flattery an artist, in fawning a slave:
No merit, no science, no virtue, is wanting
In him that's accomplish'd in cringing and canting.
Be studious to practise true meanness of spirit;
For who but Lord Bolton * was mitred for merit?
Would you wish to be wrapt in a rochet? in short,
Be pox'd and profane as F—n or Horte †.

THE PARSON'S CASE.

THAT you, friend Marcus, like a Stoic,
Can wish to die in strains heroic,
No real fortitude implies:
Yet, all must own, thy wish is wise.
Thy curate's place, thy fruitful wife,
Thy busy, drudging scene of life,
Thy insolent, illiterate vicar,
Thy want of all-consoling liquor,
Thy thread-bare gown, thy cassock rent,
Thy credit sunk, thy money spent,
Thy week made up of fasting days,
Thy grate unconscious of a blaze,

* Then archbishop of Cashel.

† At that time bishop of Kilmore.

And, to complete thy other curses,
The quarterly demands of nurses.
Are ills you wisely wish to leave,
And fly for refuge to the grave:
And, oh, what virtues you express,
In wishing such affliction less!

But now, should fortune shift the scene,
And make thy curateship a dean;
Or some rich benefice provide,
To pamper luxury and pride;
With labour small, and income great;
With chariot less for use than state;
With swelling scarf and glossy gown,
And licence to reside in town;
To shine, where all the gay resort,
At concerts, coffeehouse, or court,
And weekly persecute his grace
With visits, or to beg a place;
With underlings they flock to teach,
With no desire to pray or preach;
With haughty spouse in vesture fine,
With plenteous meals and generous wine;
Wouldst thou not wish, in so much ease,
Thy years as numerous as thy days?

THE HARDSHIP UPON THE LADIES. 1733.

Poor ladies! though their business be to play,
'Tis hard they must be busy night and day:
Why should they want the privilege of men,
Nor take some small diversions now and then?
Had women been the makers of our laws
(And why they were not, I can see no cause),
The men should slave at cards from morn to night,
And female pleasures be to read and write.

A LOVE SONG,

IN THE MODERN TASTE. 1733.

FLUTTERING spread thy purple pinions,
Gentle Cupid, o'er my heart;
I a slave in thy dominions;
Nature must give way to art.

Mild Arcadians, ever blooming,
Nightly nodding o'er your flocks,
See my weary days consuming
All beneath yon flowery rocks.

Thus the Cyprian goddess weeping
Mourn'd Adonis, darling youth:
Him the boar, in silence creeping,
Gor'd with unrelenting tooth.

Cynthia, tune harmonious numbers;
Fair discretion, string the lyre;
Soothe my ever-waking slumbers;
Bright Apollo, lend thy choir.

Gloomy Pluto, king of terrors,
Arm'd in adamantine chains,
Lead me to the crystal mirrors,
Watering soft Elysian plains.

Mournful cypress, verdant willow,
Gilding my Aurelia's brows,
Morpheus, hovering o'er my pillow,
Hear me pay my dying vows.

Melancholy smooth Meander,
Swiftly purling in a round,
On thy margin lovers wander,
With thy flowery chaplets crown'd.

Thus when Philomela drooping
Softly seeks her silent mate,
See the bird of Juno stooping:
Melody resigns to fate.

ON THE WORDS BROTHER PROTEST-ANTS, AND FELLOW CHRISTIANS,

So familiarly used by the Advocates for the Repeal of the Test-Act in Ireland. 1733.

AN inundation, says the fable,
O'erflow'd a farmer's barn and stable;
Whole ricks of hay, and stacks of corn,
Were down the sudden current borne;
While things of heterogeneous kind
Together float with tide and wind.
The generous wheat forgot its pride,
And sail'd with litter side by side;
Uniting all, to show their amity,
As in a general calamity.
A ball of new dropt horse's dung,
Mingling with apples in the throng,
Said to the pippin plump and prim,
"See, brother, how we appleswim."
Thus Lamb, renown'd for cutting corns,
An offer'd fee of Radcliff scorns:
"Not for the world—we doctors, brother,
Must take no fees of one another."
Thus to a dean some curate sloven
Subscribes, "Dear Sir, your brother loving."
Thus all the footmen, shoe-boys, porters,
About St. James's, cry, "We courtiers."
Thus H—e in the house will prate,
"Sir, we the ministers of state."
Thus at the bar the blockhead Bettesworth,
Though half a crown o'er pays his sweat's worth,
Who knows in law nor text nor margent,
Calls Singleton his brother serjeant.
And thus fanatic saints, though neither in
Doctrine nor discipline our brethren,
Are Brother Protestants and Christians,
As much as Hebrews and Philistines:
But in no other sense, than nature
Has made a rat our fellow creature.
Lice from your body suck their food;
But is a louse your flesh and blood?
Though born of human filth and sweat, it
May as well be said man did beget it:
But maggots in your nose and chin
As well may claim you for their kin.
Yet critics may object, Why not?
Since lice are brethren to a Scot:
Which made our swarm of sects determine
Employments for their brother vermin.
But be they English, Irish, Scottish,
What Protestant can be so sottish,
While o'er the church these clouds are gathering,
To call a swarm of lice his brethren?
As Moses, by divine advice,
In Egypt turn'd the dust to lice;
And as our sects, by all descriptions,
Have hearts more harden'd than Egyptians;

As from the trodden dust they spring,
And, turn'd to lice, infest the king:
For pity's sake, it would be just,
A rod should turn them back to dust.
Let folks in high or holy stations
Be proud of owning such relations;
Let courtiers hug them in their bosom,
As if they were afraid to lose'em:
While I, with humble Job, had rather
Say to corruption—"Thou art my father."
For he that has so little wit
To nourish vermin, may be bit.

THE YAHOO'S OVERTHROW;

OR, THE KEVAN BAYL'S NEW BALLAD,

Upon Serjeant Kite's insulting the Dean.

To the Tune of "Derry down."

JOLLY boys of St. Kevan's, St. Patrick's, Donore,
And Smithfield, I'll tell you, if not told before,
How Bettessworth, that booby, and scoundrel in
Hath insulted us all by insulting the Dean. [grain,
Knock him down, down, down, knock him down.

The Dean and his merits we every one know;
But this skip of a lawyer, where the de'il did he grow?

How greater his merit at Four Courts or House,
Than the barking of Towzer, or leap of a louse?

Knock him down, &c.

That he came from the Temple, his morals do show;

But where his deep law is, few mortals yet know:
His rhetoric, bombast, silly jests, are by far
More like to lampooning, than pleading at bar.

Knock him down, &c.

This pedlar, at speaking and making of laws,
Hath met with returns of all sorts but applause;
Has, with noise and odd gestures, been prattling
some years,
What honest folk never durst for their ears.

Knock him down, &c.

Of all fizes and sorts, the fanatical crew
Are his brother Protestants, good men and true;
Red hat, and blue bonnet, and turban's the same:
What the de'il is't to him whence the devil they came?

Knock him down, &c.

Hobbes, Tindal, and Woolston, and Collins,
and Nayler,
And Muggleton, Toland, and Bradley the tailor,
Are Christians alike; and it may be averr'd,
He's a Christian as good as the rest of the herd.

Knock him down, &c.

He only the rights of the clergy debates,
Their rights! their importance! We'll set on new rates; [less:
On their tithes at half-nothing, their priesthood at
What's next to be voted, with ease you may guess.

Knock him down, &c.

At length his old master (I need not him name)
To this damnable speaker had long ow'd a shame;

K iiij

When his speech came abroad, he paid him off
clean,
By leaving him under the pen of the Dean.

Knock him down, &c.

He kindled, as if the whole satire had been
The oppression of virtue, not wages of sin:
He began, as he bragg'd, with a rant and a roar;
He bragg'd how he bounc'd, and he swore how he swore.

Knock him down, &c.

Though he cring'd to his Deanship in very low
strains,
To others he boasted of knocking out brains,
And flitting of noses, and cropping of ears,
While his own ass's zaggs were more fit for the shears.

Knock him down, &c.

On this warrior of deans whene'er we can hit,
We'll show him the way how to crop and to slit;
We'll teach him some better address to afford
To the Dean of all Deans, though he wears not a sword.

Knock him down, &c.

We'll colt him through Kevan, St. Patrick's,
Donore,
And Smithfield, as Rap was ne'er colted before;
We'll oil him with kennel, and powder him with
A modus right fit for insulters of deans. [grains,

Knock him down, &c.

And, when this is over, we'll make him amends:
To the Dean he shall go; they shall kiss and be friends:

But how? Why, the Dean shall to him disclose
A face for to kiss, without eyes, ears, or nose.

Knock him down, &c.

If you say this is hard on a man that is reckon'd
That serjeant at law whom we call Kite the second,
You mistake; for a slave, who will coax his superiors,

May be proud to be licking a great man's poste-
riors. [riors.

Knock him down, &c.

What care we how high runs his passion or pride?

Though his soul he despises, he values his hide;
Then fear not his tongue, or his sword, or his knife;
He'll take his revenge on his innocent wife.

Knock him down, down, down, keep him down.

ON THE

ARCHBISHOP OF CASHEL, AND BET- TESWORTH.

DEAR Dick, pr'ythee tell by what passion you
move?

The world is in doubt, whether hatred or love;
And while at good Cashel you rail with such spite,
They shrewdly suspect it is all but a bite.

You certainly know, though so loudly you vapour,
His spite cannot wound, who attempted the Dra-
pier,

Then, pr'ythee, reflect, take a word of advice;
And, as your old wont is, change sides in a trice:

On his virtues hold forth; 'tis the very best way;
And say of the man what all honest men say.

But if, still obdurate, your anger remains;
If still your foul bosom more rancour contains;
Say then more than they; nay, lavishly flatter,
'Tis your gross panegyrics alone can bespatter:
For thine, my dear Dick, give me leave to speak
plain,

Like a very foul mop, dirty more than they clean.

ON POETRY:

A RHAPSODY, 1733.

ALL human race would fain be wits,
And millions miss for one that hits.
Young's universal passion, pride,
Was never known to spread so wide,
Say, Britain, could you ever boast
Three poets in an age at most?
Our chilling climate hardly bears
A spring of bays in fifty years;
While every fool his claim alleges,
As if it grew in common hedges.
What reason can there be assign'd
For this perverseness in the mind?
Brutes find out where their talents lie:
A bear will not attempt to fly;
A founder'd horse will oft' debate
Before he tries a five-barr'd gate;
A dog by instinct turns aside,
Who sees the ditch too deep and wide.
But man we find the only creature,
Who, led by folly, combats Nature;
Who, when she loudly cries, Forbear,
With obstinacy fixes there;
And, where his genius least inclines,
Absurdly bends his whole designs.

Not empire to the rising sun
By valour, conduct, fortune won;
Not highest wisdom in debates
For framing laws to govern states;
Not skill in sciences profound,
So large to grasp the circle round;
Such heavenly influence require,
As how to strike the Muse's yre.
Not beggar's brat on bulk begot;
Not bastard of a pedlar Scot;
Not boy brought up to cleaning shoes,
The spawn of bridewell or the stews;
Not infants dropt, the spurious pledges
Of gipsies littering under hedges;
Are so disqualify'd by fate
To rise in church, or law, or state,
As he whom Phæbus in his ire
Hath blasted with poetic fire.
What hope of custom in the fair,
While not a soul demands your ware?
Where you have nothing to produce
For private life, or public use?
Court, city, country, want you not;
You cannot bribe, betray, or plot.
For poets, law makes no provision;
The wealthy have you in derision:
Of state affairs you cannot smatter;
Are awkward when you try to flatter

Your portion, taking Britain round,
Was just one annual hundred pound;
Now not so much as in remainder,
Since Cibber brought in an attainer;
For ever fix'd by right divine
(A monarch's right) on Grub-street line.

Poor starveling bard, how small thy gains!
How unproportion'd to thy pains!

And here a simile comes pat in:
Though chickens take a month to fatten,
The guests in less than half an hour
Will more than half a score devour.

So, after toiling twenty days
To earn a stock of pence and praise,
Thy labours, grown the critics prey,
Are swallow'd o'er a dish of tea;

Gone to be never heard of more,
Gone where the chickens went before.

How shall a new attempter learn
Of different spirits to discern,
And how distinguish which is which,
The poet's vein, or scribbling itch?
Then hear an old experienc'd sinner,
Instructing thus a young beginner.
Consult yourself; and if you find
A powerful impulse urge your mind,
Impartial judge within your breast
What subject you can manage best;
Whether your genius most inclines
To satire, praise, or humorous lines,
To elegies in mournful tone,
Or prologues sent from hand unknown,
Then, rising with Aurora's light,
The muse invoc'd, sit down to write;
Blot out, correct, insert, refine,
Enlarge, diminish, interline;
Be mindful, when invention fails,
To scratch your head, and bite your nails,

Your poem finish'd, next your care
Is needful to transcribe it fair.
In modern wit all printed trash is
Set off with numerous breaks and dashes.

To statesmen would you give a wipe,
You print it in Italic type.
When letters are in vulgar shapes,
'Tis ten to one the wit escapes:
But, when in capitals express'd,
The dullest reader smokes the jest;
Or else perhaps he may invent
A better than the poet meant;
As learned commentators view
In Homer, more than Homer knew,

Your poem in its modish dress,
Correctly fitted for the press,
Convey by penny-post to Lintot,
But let no friend alive look into 't.
If Lintot thinks 'twill quit the cost,
You need not fear your labour lost;
And how agreeably surpris'd
Are you to see it advertis'd!

The hawker shows you one in print,
As fresh as farthings from the mint:
The product of your toil and sweating;
A bastard of your own begetting.

Be sure at Will's, the following day,
Lie snug, and hear what critics say;
And, if you find the general vogue
Pronounces you a stupid rogue,

Damns all your thoughts as low and little,
Sit still, and swallow down your spittle.
Be silent as a politician,
For talking may beget suspicion:
Or praise the judgment of the town,
And help yourself to run it down.
Give up your fond paternal pride,
Nor argue on the weaker side:
For poems read without a name
We justly praise, or justly blame;
And critics have no partial views,
Except they know whom they abuse:
And, since you ne'er provoke their spite,
Depend upon 't their judgment's right.
But if you blab, you are undone:
Consider what a risk you run:
You lose your credit all at once;
The town will mark you for a dunce;
The vilest doggrel, Grub-street sends,
Will pass for yours with foes and friends;
And you must bear the whole disgrace,
Till some fresh blockhead takes your place.

Your secret kept, your poem sunk,
And sent in quires to line a trunk,
If still you be dispos'd to rhyme,
Go try your hand a second time.
Again you fail: yet Safe 's the word;
Take courage, and attempt a third.
But first with care employ your thoughts
Where critics mark'd your former faults;
The trivial turns, the borrow'd wit,
The similes that nothing fit;
The cant which every fool repeats,
Town jests and coffee-house conceits;
Descriptions tedious, flat, and dry,
And introduc'd the Lord knows why:
Or where we find your fury set
Against the harmless alphabet;
And A's and B's your malice vent,
While readers wonder whom you meant;
A public or a private robber,
A statesman, or a South-sea jobber;
A prelate who no God believes;
A parliament, or den of thieves;
A pick-purse at the bar or bench;
A duchess, or a suburb wench:
Or oft', when epithets you link
In gaping lines to fill a chink;
Like stepping-stones to save a stride,
In streets where kennels are too wide;
Or like a heel-piece, to support
A cripple with one foot too short;
Or like a bridge, that joins a marish
To moorland of a different parish.
So have I seen ill-coupled hounds
Drag different ways in miry grounds,
So geographers in Afric maps
With savage pictures fill their gaps,
And o'er unhabitable downs
Place elephants for want of towns.

But, though you miss your third essay,
You need not throw your pen away.
Lay now aside all thoughts of fame,
To spring more profitable game.
From party-merit seek support;
The vilest verse thrives best at court.
A pamphlet in Sir Bob's defence
Will never fail to bring in pence;

When his speech came abroad, he paid him off
clean,
By leaving him under the pen of the Dean.

Knock him down, &c.

He kindled, as if the whole satire had been
The oppression of virtue, not wages of sin:
He began, as he bragg'd, with a rant and a roar;

Knock him down, down, down, keep him down.

ON THE

ARCHBISHOP OF CASHEL, AND BET- TESWORTH.

DEAR Dick, pr'ythee tell by what passion you
move?

The world is in doubt, whether hatred or love;
And while at good Cashel you rail with such spite,
They shrewdly suspect it is all but a bite.

You certainly know, though so loudly you vapour,
His spite cannot wound, who attempted the Dra-
pier,

Then, pr'ythee, reflect, take a word of advice;
And, as your old wont is, change sides in a trice:

On his virtues hold forth; 'tis the very best way;
And say of the man what all honest men say.

But if, still obdurate, your anger remains;
If still your foul bosom more rancour contains;
Say then more than they; nay, lavishly flatter,
'Tis your gross panegyrics alone can bespatter:
For thine, my dear Dick, give me leave to speak
plain,

Like a very foul mop, dirty more than they clean,

ON POETRY:

A RHAPSODY, 1733.

ALL human race would fain be wits,
And millions miss for one that hits.
Young's universal passion, pride,
Was never known to spread so wide,
Say, Britain, could you ever boast
Three poets in an age at most?
Our chilling climate hardly bears
A spring of bays in fifty years;
While every fool his claim alleges,
As if it grew in common hedges.
What reason can there be assign'd
For this perverseness in the mind?
Brutes find out where their talents lie:
A bear will not attempt to fly;
A founder'd horse will oft' debate
Before he tries a five-barr'd gate;
A dog by instinct turns aside,
Who sees the ditch too deep and wide.
But man we find the only creature,
Who, led by folly, combats Nature;
Who, when she loudly cries, Forbear,
With obstinacy fixes there;
And, where his genius least inclines,
Absurdly bends his whole designs.

Not empire to the rising sun
By valour, conduct, fortune won;
Not highest wisdom in debates
For framing laws to govern states;
Not skill in sciences profound,
So large to grasp the circle round;
Such heavenly influence require,
As how to strike the Muse's lyre.

Not beggar's brat on bulk begot;
Not bastard of a pedlar Scot;
Not boy brought up to cleaning shoes,
The spawn of bridewell or the stews;
Not infants dropt, the spurious pledges
Of gipsies littering under hedges;
Are so disqualify'd by fate
To rise in church, or law, or state,
As he whom Phœbus in his ire
Hath blasted with poetic fire.

What hope of custom in the fair,
While not a soul demands your ware?
Where you have nothing to produce
For private life, or public use?
Court, city, country, want you not;
You cannot bribe, betray, or plot.
For poets, law makes no provision;
The wealthy have you in derision:
Of state affairs you cannot smatter;
Are awkward when you try to flatter

Your portion, taking Britain round,
Was just one annual hundred pound;
Now not so much as in remainder,
Since Cibber brought in an attainder;
For ever fix'd by right divine
(A monarch's right) on Grub-street line.

Poor starveling bard, how small thy gains!
How unproportion'd to thy pains!

And here a simile comes pat in:
Though chickens take a month to fatten,
The guests in less than half an hour
Will more than half a score devour.

So, after toiling twenty days
To earn a stock of pence and praise,
Thy labours, grown the critics prey,
Are swallow'd o'er a dish of tea;
Gone to be never heard of more,
Gone where the chickens went before.

How shall a new attempter learn
Of different spirits to discern,
And how distinguish which is which,
The poet's vein, or scribbling itch?
Then hear an old experienc'd sinner,
Instructing thus a young beginner.
Consult yourself; and if you find
A powerful impulse urge your mind,
Impartial judge within your breast
What subject you can manage best;
Whether your genius most inclines
To satire, praise, or humorous lines,
To elegies in mournful tone,
Or prologues sent from hand unknown.
Then, rising with Aurora's light,
The muse invok'd, sit down to write;
Blot out, correct, insert, refine,
Enlarge, diminish, interline;
Be mindful, when invention fails,
To scratch your head, and bite your nails.

Your poem finish'd, next your care
Is needful to transcribe it fair.
In modern wit all printed trash is
Set off with numerous breaks and *dash*es.

To statesmen would you give a wiper,
You print it in Italic type.

When letters are in vulgar shapes,
'Tis ten to one the wit escapes:

But, when in capitals express'd,
The dullest reader smokes the jest;
Or else perhaps he may invent
A better than the poet meant;
As learned commentators view

In Homer, more than Homer knew,

Your poem in its modish dress,
Correctly fitted for the press,
Convey by penny-post to Lintot,
But let no friend alive look into 't.
If Lintot thinks 'twill quit the cost,
You need not fear your labour lost;
And how agreeably surpris'd
Are you to see it advertis'd!
The hawker shows you one in print,
As fresh as farthings from the mint:
The product of your toil and sweating;
A bastard of your own begetting.

Be sure at Will's, the following day,
Lie snug, and hear what critics say;
And, if you find the general vogue
Pronounces you a stupid rogue,

Damns all your thoughts as low and little,
Sit still, and swallow down your spittle.
Be silent as a politician,
For talking may beget suspicion:
Or praise the judgment of the town,
And help yourself to run it down.
Give up your fond paternal pride,
Nor argue on the weaker side:
For poems read without a name
We justly praise, or justly blame;
And critics have no partial views,
Except they know whom they abuse:
And, since you ne'er provoke their spite,
Depend upon 't their judgment's right.
But if you blab, you are undone:
Consider what a risk you run:
You lose your credit all at once;
The town will mark you for a dunce;
The vilest doggrel, Grub-street sends,
Will pass for yours with foes and friends;
And you must bear the whole disgrace,
Till some fresh blockhead takes your place.

Your secret kept, your poem sunk,
And sent in quires to line a trunk,
If still you be dispos'd to rhyme,
Go try your hand a second time.
Again you fail: yet Safe 's the word;
Take courage, and attempt a third.
But first with care employ your thoughts
Where critics mark'd your former faults;
The trivial turns, the borrow'd wit,
The smiles that nothing fit;
The cant which every fool repeats,
Town jests and coffee-house conceits;
Descriptions tedious, flat, and dry,
And introduc'd the Lord knows why:
Or where we find your fury set
Against the harmless alphabet;
And A's and B's your malice vent,
While readers wonder whom you meant;
A public or a private robber,
A statesman, or a South-sea jobber;
A prelate who no God believes;
A parliament, or den of thieves;
A pick-purse at the bar or bench;
A duchess, or a suburb wench:
Or oft', when epithets you link
In gaping lines to fill a chink;
Like stepping-stones to save a stride,
In streets where kennels are too wide;
Or like a heel-piece, to support
A cripple with one foot too short;
Or like a bridge, that joins a marish
To moorland of a different parish.
So have I seen ill-coupled hounds
Drag different ways in miry grounds,
So geographers in Afric maps
With savage pictures fill their gaps,
And o'er unhabitable downs
Place elephants for want of towns.

But, though you miss your third essay,
You need not throw your pen away.
Lay now aside all thoughts of fame,
To spring more profitable game.
From party-merit seek support;
The vilest verse thrives best at court.
A pamphlet in Sir Bob's defence
Will never fail to bring in pence;

Nor be concern'd about the sale,
He pays his workmen on the nail.

A prince, the moment he is crown'd,
Inherits every virtue round,
As emblems of the sovereign power,
Like other baubles in the Tower;
Is generous, valiant, just, and wise,
And so continues till he dies:
His humble senate this professes,
In all their speeches, votes, addresses.
But once you fix him in a tomb,
His virtues fade, his vices bloom;
And each perfection, wrong imputed,
Is fully at his death confuted.
The loads of poems in his praise,
Ascending, make one funeral blaze:
As soon as you can hear his knell,
This god on earth turns devil in hell:
And lo! his ministers of state,
Transform'd to imps, his levee wait;
Where, in the scenes of endless woe,
They ply their former arts below;
And, as they sail in Charon's boat,
Contrive to bribe the judge's vote;
To Cerberus they give a sop,
His triple-barking mouth to stop;
Or in the ivory gate of dreams
Project excise and South-sea schemes;
Or hire their party pamphleteers
To set Elysium by the ears.

Then, poet, if you mean to thrive,
Employ your muse on kings alive;
With prudence gathering up a cluster
Of all the virtues you can muster,
Which, form'd into a garland sweet,
Lay humbly at your monarch's feet;
Who, as the odours reach his throne,
Will smile, and think them all his own;
For law and gospel both determine
All virtues lodge in royal ermine:
(I mean the oracles of both,
Who shall depose it upon oath.)
Your garland in the following reign,
Change but the names, will do again.

But, if you think this trade too base,
(Which seldom is the dunce's case)
Put on the critic's brow, and sit
At Will's the puny judge of wit.
A nod, a shrug, a scornful smile,
With caution us'd, may serve a while.
Proceed no further in your part,
Before you learn the terms of art;
For you can never be too far gone
In all our modern critics' jargon:
Then talk with more authentic face
Of unities, in time and place;
Get scraps of Horace from your friends,
And have them at your fingers' ends;
Learn Aristotle's rules by rote,
And at all hazards boldly quote;
Judicious Rymer oft' review,
Wise Dennis, and profound Bosfu;
Read all the prefaces of Dryden,
For these our critics much confide in (Though merely writ at first for filling,
To raise the volume's price a shilling.)

A forward critic often dupes us
With sham quotations perì buffous;

And if we have not read Longinus,
Will magisterially outshine us.
Then, lest with Greek he over-run ye,
Procure the book for love or money,
Translated from Boileau's translation,
And quote quotation on quotation.

At Will's you hear a poem read,
Where Battus from the table-head,
Reclining on his elbow-chair,
Gives judgment with decisive air;
To whom the tribe of circling wits
As to an oracle submits.
He gives directions to the town,
To cry it up, or run it down;
Like courtier, when they send a note,
Instructing members how to vote.
He sets the stamp of bad and good,
Though not a word be understood.
Your lesson learn'd, you'll be secure
To get the name of connoisseur:
And, when your merits once are known,
Procure disciples of your own.
For poets (you can never want 'em)
Spread through Augusta Trinobantum,
Computing by their pecks of coals,
Amount to just nine thousand souls:
These o'er their proper districts govern,
Of wit and humour judges sovereign.
In every street a city-bard
Rules, like an alderman, his ward;
His undisputed rights extend
Through all the lane, from end to end;
The neighbours round admire his sbreadness
For songs of loyalty and lewfulness;
Outdone by none in rhyming well,
Although he never learn'd to spell.

Two bordering wits contend for glory;
And one is Whig, and one is Tory:
And this for epics claims the bays,
And that for elegiac lays:
Some fam'd for numbers soft and smooth,
By lovers spoke in Punch's booth;
And some as justly fame extols
For lofty lines in Smithfield drolls.
Bavius in Wapping gains renown,
And Mævius reigns o'er Kentish-town:
Tigellius, plac'd in Phœbus' car,
From Ludgate shines to Temple-bar:
Harmonious Cibber entertains
The court with annual birth-day strains;
Whence Gay was banish'd in disgrace;
Where Pope will never show his face;
Where Young must torture his invention
To flatter knaves, or lose his pension.

But these are not a thousandth part
Of jobbers in the poet's art,
Attending each his proper station,
And all in due subordination,
Through every alley to be found,
In garrets high, or under ground;
And when they join their pericranies,
Out skips a book of miscellanies.
Hobbes clearly proves that every creature
Lives in a state of war by nature.
The greater for the smallest watch,
But meddle seldom with their match.
A whale of moderate size will draw
A shoal of herrings down his maw;

A fox with geese his belly crams;
 A wolf destroys a thousand lambs:
 But search among the rhyming race,
 The brave are worry'd by the base.
 If on Parnassus' top you sit,
 You rarely bite, are always bit.
 Each poet of inferior size
 On you shall rail and criticise,
 And strive to tear you limb from limb;
 While others do as much for him.

The vermin only tease and pinch
 Their foes superior by an inch.
 So, naturalists observe, a flea
 Hath smaller fleas that on him prey;
 And these have smaller still to bite 'em,
 And so proceed ad infinitum.
 Thus every poet in his kind
 Is bit by him that comes behind:
 Who, though too little to be seen,
 Can tease, and gall, and give the spleen;
 Call dunces fools and sons of whores,
 Lay Grub-street at each other's doors;
 Extol the Greek and Roman masters,
 And curse our modern poetasters;
 Complain, as many an ancient bard did,
 How genius is no more rewarded;
 How wrong a taste prevails among us;
 How much our ancestors outsung us;
 Can personate an awkward scorn
 For those who are not poets born;
 And all their brother-dunces lash,
 Who crowd the press with hourly trash.

O Grub-street! how do I bemoan thee,
 Whose graceless children scorn to own thee!
 Their filial piety forgot,
 Deny their country, like a Scot;
 Though, by their idiom and grimace,
 They soon betray their native place:
 Yet thou hast greater cause to be
 Asham'd of them, than they of thee,
 Degenerate from their ancient brood,
 Since first the court allow'd them food.

Remains a difficulty still,
 To purchase fame by writing ill.
 From Flecknoe down to Howard's time,
 How few have reach'd the low sublime!
 For when our high-born Howard dy'd,
 Blackmore alone his place supply'd:
 And, lest a chasm should intervene,
 When death had finish'd Blackmore's reign,
 The lead crown devolv'd to thee,
 Great poet of the the hollow tree.
 But ah! how unsecure thy throne!
 A thousand bards thy right disown;
 They plot to turn, in factious zeal,
 Duncenia to a common weal;
 And with rebellious arms pretend
 An equal privilege to descend.

In bulk there are not more degrees
 From elephants to mites in cheese,
 Than what a curious eye may trace
 In creatures of the rhyming race.
 From bad to worse, and worse, they fall;
 But who can reach the worst of all?
 For though, in nature, depth, and height
 Are equally held infinite;
 In poetry, the height we know;
 'Tis only infinite below.

For instance, when you rashly think,
 No rhymers can like Welsted sink,
 His merits balanc'd, you shall find
 The laureat leaves him far behind.
 Concannon, more aspiring bard,
 Soars downwards deeper by a yard.
 Smart Jemmy Moor with vigour drops:
 The rest pursue as thick as hops.
 With heads to points the gulf they enter,
 Link'd perpendicular to the centre;
 And, as their heels elated rise,
 Their heads attempt the nether skies.

Oh, what indignity and shame,
 To prostitute the muse's name!
 By flattering kings, whom Heaven design'd
 The plagues and scourges of mankind;
 Bred up in ignorance and sloth,
 And every vice that nurses both.

Fair Britain, in thy monarch blest,
 Whose virtues bear the strictest test;
 Whom never faction could bespatter,
 Nor minister nor poet flatter;
 What justice in rewarding merit!
 What magnanimity of spirit!
 What lineaments divine we trace
 Through all his figure, mien, and face!
 Though peace with olive bind his hands,
 Confess'd the conquering hero stands.
 Hydaspes, Indus, and the Ganges,
 Dread from his hand impending changes,
 From him the Tartar and Chinese,
 Short by the knees, entreat for peace.
 The consort of his throne and bed,
 A perfect goddess born and bred,
 Appointed sovereign judge to sit
 On learning, eloquence, and wit.
 Our eldest hope, divine Iulus,
 (Late, very late, oh may he rule us!)
 What early manhood has he shown,
 Before his downy beard was grown!
 Then think, what wonders will be done,
 By going on as he begun,
 An heir for Britain to secure
 As long as sun and moon endure.

The remnant of the royal blood
 Comes pouring on me like a flood;
 Bright goddesses, in number five;
 Duke William, sweetest prince alive.
 Now sing the minister of state,
 Who shines alone without a mate.
 Observe with what majestic port
 This Atlas stands to prop the court
 Intent the public debts to pay,
 Like prudent Fabius, by delay.
 Thou great vicegerent of the king,
 Thy praises every muse shall sing!
 In all affairs thou sole director,
 Of wit and learning chief protector;
 Though small the time thou hast to spare,
 The church is thy peculiar care.
 Of pious prelates what a stock
 You choose, to rule the sable flock!
 You raise the honour of your peerage,
 Proud to attend you at the steerage.
 You dignify the noble race,
 Content yourself with humbler place.
 Now, learning, valour, virtue, sense,
 To titles give the sole pretence.

St. George beheld thee with delight
Vouchsafe to be an azure knight,
When on thy breasts and sides Herculean
He fix'd the star and string cerulean.

Say, poet, in what other nation
Shone ever such a constellation!
Attend, ye Popes, and Youngs, and Gays,
And tune your harps, and strow your bays:
Your panegyrics here provide;
You cannot err on flattery's side.
Above the stars exalt your style,
You still are low ten thousand mile.
On Lewis all his bards bestow'd
Of incense many a thousand load;
But Europe mortify'd his pride,
And swore the fawning rascals ly'd.
Yet what the world refus'd to Lewis,
Apply'd to George, exactly true is.
Exactly true! invidious poet!
'Tis fifty thousand times below it.

Translate me now some lines, if you can,
From Virgil, Martial, Ovid, Lucan.
They could all power in heaven divide,
And do no wrong on either side;
They teach you how to split a hair,
Give George and Jove an equal share.
Yet why should we be lac'd so strait?
I'll give my monarch butter weight.
And reason good; for many a year
Jove never intermeddled here:
Nor, though his priests be duly paid,
Did ever we desire his aid:
We now can better do without him,
Since Woolston gave us arms to rout him.

Cætera desiderantur.

HORACE, BOOK IV. ODE XIX. IMITATED.

TO HUMPHRY FRENCH, ESQ^r. 1733.

PATRON of the tuneful throng,
Oh! too nice, and too severe!
Think not that my country song
Shall displease thy honest ear.
Chosen strains I proudly bring;
Which the muse's sacred choir,
When they gods and heroes sing,
Dictate to th' harmonious lyre.
Ancient Homer, princely bard!
Just precedence still maintains;
With sacred raptures still are heard
Theban Pindar's lofty strains.
Still the old triumphant song,
Which, when hated tyrants fell,
Great Alcæus boldly sung,
Warns, instructs, and pleases well.
Nor has time's all-darkening shade
In obscure oblivion press'd
What Anacreon laugh'd and play'd;
Gay Anacreon, drunken priest!

* Lord Mayor of Dublin.

Gentle Sappho, love-sick muse,
Warms the heart with amorous fire;
Still her tenderest notes infuse
Melting rapture, soft desire.

Beauteous Helen, young and gay,
By a painted soplion won,
Went not first, fair nymph, astray,
Fondly pleas'd to be undone.

Nor young Teucer's slaughtering bow,
Nor bold Hector's dreadful sword.
Alone the terrors of the foe,
Sow'd the field with hostile blood.

Many valiant chiefs of old
Greatly liv'd and died, before
Agamemnon, Grecian bold,
Wag'd the ten years famous war.

But their names, unsung, unwept,
Unrecorded, lost and gone,
Long in endless night have slept,
And shall now no more be known.

Virtue, which the poet's care
Has not well consign'd to fame,
Lies, as in the sepulchre
Some old king without a name.

But, O Humphry, great and free,
While my tuneful songs are read,
Old forgetful time on thee
Dark oblivion ne'er shall spread.

When the deep-cut notes shall fade
On the mouldring Parian stone,
On the brass no more be read
The perishing inscription;

Forgotten all the enemies,
Envious G——n's cursed spite,
And P——l's derogating lies,
Lost and sunk in Stygian night;

Still thy labour and thy care,
What for Dublin thou hast done,
In full lustre shall appear,
And outshine th' unclouded sun.

Large thy mind, and not untried,
For Hibernia now doth stand;
Through the calm, or raging tide,
Safe conducts the ship to land.

Falsely we call the rich man great;
He is only so that knows
His plentiful or small estate
Wisely to enjoy and use.

He, in wealth or poverty,
Fortune's power alike defies;
And falsehood and dishonesty
More than death abhors and flies:

Flies from death!—No, meets it brave,
When the suffering so severe
May from dreadful bondage save
Clients, friends, or country dear.

This the sovereign man, complete;
Hero; patriot; glorious; free;
Rich and wise; and good and great;
Generous Humphry, thou art he.

A NEW SIMILE FOR THE LADIES.

BY DR. SHERIDAN. 1733.

"To make a writer miss his end,
"You've nothing else to do but mend."

I OFTEN try'd in vain to find
A simile for woman-kind,
A simile I mean to fit 'em,
In every circumstance to hit 'em.
Through every bird and beast I went,
I ransack'd every element;
And, after peeping through all nature,
To find so whimsical a creature,
A cloud presented to my view,
And strait this parallel I drew:
Clouds turn with every wind about;
They keep us in suspense and doubt;
Yet oft perverse, like woman-kind,
Are seen to scud against the wind:
And are not women just the same?
For, who can tell at what they aim?
Clouds keep the stoutest mortals under,
When bellowing they discharge their thunder:
So when th' alarm-bell is rung
Of Xanti's everlasting tongue,
The husband dreads its loudness more
Than lightning's flash, or thunder's roar.
Clouds weep, as they do, without pain;
And what are tears but women's rain;
The clouds about the welkin roam;
And ladies never stay at home.
The clouds build castles in the air,
A thing peculiar to the fair;
For all the schemes of their forecasting
Are not more solid, nor more lasting.
A cloud is light by turns, and dark;
Such is a lady with her spark:
Now with a sudden pouting gloom
She seems to darken all the room;
Again she's pleas'd, his fears beguil'd,
And all is clear when she has smil'd.
In this they're wondrously alike
(I hope the simile will strike);
Though in the darkest dumps you view them,
Stay but a moment, you'll see through them.
The clouds are apt to make reflection,
And frequently produce infection;
So Cælia, with small provocation,
Blasts every neighbour's reputation.
The clouds delight in gaudy show
(For they, like ladies, have their bow);
The gravest matron will confess,
That she herself is fond of dress.
Observe the clouds in pomp array'd,
What various colours are display'd;
The pink, the rose, the violet's dye,
In that great drawing-room the sky;
How do these differ from our graces,
In garden-silks, brocades and laces?
Are they not such another sight,
When met upon a birth-day night?
The clouds delight to change their fashion:
(Dear ladies, be not in a passion!)
Nor let this whim to you seem strange,
Who every hour delight in change.

In them and you alike are seen
The fullen symptoms of the spleen;
The moment that your vapours rise,
We see them dropping from your eyes.
In evening fair you may behold
The clouds are fring'd with borrow'd gold;
And this is many a lady's case,
Who flaunts about in borrow'd lace.
Grave matrons are like clouds of snow.
Their words fall thick, and soft and slow;
While brisk coquettes, like rattling hail,
Our ears on every side assail.
Clouds, when they intercept our sight,
Deprive us of celestial light:
So when my Chloe I pursue,
No heaven besides I have in view.
Thus, on comparison, you see,
In every instance they agree,
So like, so very much the same,
That one may go by t'other's name.
Let me proclaim it then aloud,
That every woman is a cloud.

ANSWER BY DR. SWIFT.

PRESUMPTUOUS bard! how could you dare
A woman with a cloud compare?
Strange pride and insolence you show
Inferior mortals there below.
And is our thunder in your ears
So frequent or so loud as theirs?
Alas! our thunder soon goes out;
And only makes you more devout,
Then is not female clatter worse,
That drives you not to pray but curse?
We hardly thunder thrice a-year;
The bolt discharg'd, the sky grows clear:
But every sublunary dowdy,
The more she scolds, the more she's cloudy.
Some critic may object, perhaps,
That clouds are blam'd for giving claps;
But what, alas! are claps ætherial,
Compar'd for mischief to venereal?
Can clouds give buboes, ulcers, blotches,
Or from your noses dig out notches?
We leave the body sweet and sound;
We kill, 'tis true, but never wound.
You know a cloudy sky bespeaks
Fair weather when the morning breaks;
But women in a cloudy plight
Foretel a storm to last till night.
A cloud in proper seasons pours
His blessings down in fruitful showers;
But woman was by fate design'd
To pour down curses on mankind.
When Sirius o'er the welkin rages,
Our kindly help his fire assuages;
But woman is a curst inflamer,
No parish ducking-stool can tame her:
To kindle strife, dame nature taught her;
Like fire-works, she can burn in water.
For fickleness how durst you blame us,
Who for our constancy are famous?
You'll see a cloud in gentle weather
Keep the same face an hour together;
While women, if it could be reckon'd,
Change every feature every second.

Observe our figure in a morning,
Of foul or fair we give you warning;
But can you guess from woman's air
One minute, whether foul or fair?

Go read in ancient books inroll'd
What honours we possess'd of old.

To disappoint Ixion's rape,
Jove drest a cloud in Juno's shape;
Which when he had enjoy'd, he swore,
No goddess could have pleas'd him more;
No difference could he find between
His cloud and Jove's imperial queen:
His cloud produc'd a race of Centaurs,
Fam'd for a thousand bold adventures;
From us descended ab origine,
By learned authors call'd nubigenæ.
But say, what earthly nymph do you know,
So beautiful to pass for Juno?

Before Æneas durst aspire
To court her majesty of Tyre,
His mother begg'd of us to dress him,
That Dido might the more carefs him:
A coat we gave him, dy'd in grain,
A flaxen wig and clouded cane
(The wig was powder'd round with fleet,
Which fell in clouds beneath his feet),
With which he made a tearing show;
And Dido quickly smok'd the beau.

Among your females make inquiries,
What nymph on earth so fair as Iris?
With heavenly beauty so endow'd?
And yet her father is a cloud.
We drest her in a gold brocade,
Befitting Juno's favourite maid.

'Tis known, that Socrates the wise
Ador'd us clouds as deities:
To us he made his daily prayers,
As Aristophanes declares;
From Jupiter took all dominion,
And dy'd defending his opinion.
By his authority 'tis plain
You worship other gods in vain,
And from your own experience know
We govern all things there below.
You follow where we please to guide;
O'er all your passions we preside,
Can raise them up, or sink them down,
As we think fit to smile or frown:
And, just as we dispose your brain,
Are witty, dull, rejoice, complain.

Compare us then to female race!
We, to whom all the gods give place!
Who better challenge your allegiance,
Because we dwell in higher regions!
You find the gods in Homer dwell
In seas and streams, or low as hell:
Ev'n Jove, and Mercury his pimp,
No higher climb than mount Olymp
(Who makes you think the clouds he pierces?
He pierce the clouds! he kifs their a—es);
While we, o'er Teneriffa plac'd,
Are loftier by a mile at least:
And, when Apollo struts on Pindus,
We see him from our kitchen-windows;
Or, to Parnassus looking down,
Can piss upon his laurel crown.

Fate never form'd the gods to fly vehicles they mount the sky:

When Jove would some fair nymph inveigle,
He comes full gallop on his eagle.
Though Venus be as light as air,
She must have doves to draw her chair.
Apollo stirs not out of door
Without his lacker'd coach and four.
And jealous Juno, ever snarling,
Is drawn by peacocks in her berlin.
But we can fly where'er we please,
O'er cities, rivers, hills, and seas:
From east to west the world we roam,
And in all climates are at home;
With care provide you, as we go,
With sun-shine, rain, and hail, or snow.
You, when it rains, like fools, believe
Jove pisses on you through a sieve:
An idle tale, 'tis no such matter;
We only dip a sponge in water;
Then squeeze it close between our thumbs,
And shake it well, and down it comes.
As you shall to your sorrow know,
We'll watch your steps where'er you go;
And, since we find you walk a-foot,
We'll soundly fouce your frize-furtout.

'Tis but by our peculiar grace,
That Phœbus ever shows his face:
For, when we please, we open wide
Our curtains blue from side to side:
And then how saucily he shows
His brazen face and fiery nose;
And gives himself a haughty air,
As if he made the weather fair!

'Tis sung, wherever Cælia treads,
The violets ope their purple heads;
The roses blow, the cowslip springs:
'Tis sung; but we know better things.
'Tis true, a woman on her mettle
Will often piss upon a nettle;
But, though we own she makes it wetter,
The nettle never thrives the better;
While we, by soft prolific showers,
Can every spring produce you flowers.

Your poets, Chloe's beauty heightening,
Compare her radiant eyes to lightning;
And yet I hope 'twill be allow'd,
That lightning comes but from a cloud.

But gods like us have too much sense
At poet's flights to take offence:
Nor can hyperboles demean us;
Each drab has been compar'd to Venus.

We own your verses are melodious;
But such comparisons are odious.

A VINDICATION OF THE LIBEL:

Or, a New Ballad, written by a Shoe-boy, on an Attorney who was formerly a Shoe-boy.

"Qui color ater erat, nunc est contrarius atro."

With finging of ballads, and crying of news,
With whitening of buckles, and blacking of shoes,
Did Hartley * set out, both shoeless and shirtless,
And moneyless too, but not very dirtless;

* See the next poem.

Twopence he had gotten by begging, that's all;
 One bought him a brush, and one a black ball;
 For clouts at a loss he could not be much,
 The clothes on his back as being but such;
 Thus vamp'd and accoutred, with clouts, ball, and
 He gallantly ventur'd his fortune to push: [brush,
Vespasian thus, being bespatter'd with dirt,
Was amen'd to be Rome's emperor for't.
 But as a wife fiddler is noted, you know,
 To have a good couple of strings to one bow;
 So Hartley judiciously thought it too little,
 To live by the sweat of his hands and his spittle:
 He finds out another profession as fit,
 And straight he becomes a retailer of wit.
 One day he cried—"Murders and songs, and great news!"

Another as loudly—"Here blacken your shoes!"
 At Domville's* full often he fed upon bits.
 For winding of jacks up, and turning of spits;
 Lick'd all the plates round, had many a grubbing,
 And now and then got from the cook-maid a
 drubbing:

Such bastings effect upon him could have none;
 The dog will be patient that's struck with a bone.
 Sir Thomas, observing this Hartley withal
 So expert and so active at brushes and ball,
 Was mov'd with compassion, and thought it a pity
 A youth should be lost, that had been so witty:
 Without more ado, he vamps up my spark,
 And now we'll suppose him an eminent clerk;
 Suppose him an adept in all the degrees
 Of scribbling cum dasbo, and hooking of fees;
 Suppose him a miser, attorney per bill;
 Suppose him a courtier—suppose what you will—
 Yet would you believe, though I swore by the Bible,
 That he took up two news-boys for crying the libel?

A FRIENDLY APOLOGY FOR A CERTAIN JUSTICE OF PEACE.

By Way of Defence of Hartley Hutchinson, Esq.

"But he by bawling news about,
 "And aptly using brush and clout,
 "A justice of the peace became,
 "To punish rogues who do the same."

BY JAMES BLACK-WELL, OPERATOR FOR THE FEET.

I SING the man of courage try'd,
 O'er-run with ignorance and pride,
 Who boldly hunted out disgrace
 With canker'd mind and hideous face;
 The first who made (let none deny it)
 The libel-vending rogues be quiet.

The fact was glorious, we must own,
 For Hartley was before unknown,
 Contemn'd I mean:—for who would choose
 So vile a subject for the muse?

"Twas once the noblest of his wishes
 To fill his paunch with scraps from dishes,
 For which he'd parch before the grate,
 Or wind the jack's slow-rising weight
 (Such toils as best his talents fit),
 Or polish shoes, or turn the spit:

† Sir T. Domville, patentee of the Hanaper-office.

But, unexpectedly grown rich in
 'Squire Domville's family and kitchen,
 He pants to eternize his name,
 And takes the dirty road to fame;
 Believes that persecuting wit
 Will prove the surest way to it;
 So, with a Colonel* at his back,
 The libel feels his first attack;
 He calls it a seditious paper,
 Writ by another Patriot Drapier;
 Then raves and blunders nonsense thicker
 Than aldermen o'ercharg'd with liquor;
 And all this with design, no doubt,
 To hear his praises hawk'd about;
 To send his name through every street,
 Which erst he roam'd with dirty feet;
 Well pleas'd to live to future times,
 Though but in keen satiric rhymes.

So Ajax, who, for aught we know,
 Was justice many years ago,
 And minding then no earthly things,
 But killing libellers of kings;
 Or, if he wanted work to do,
 To run a bawling news-boy through;
 Yet he, when wrapp'd up in a cloud,
 Entreated Father Jove aloud,
 Only in light to show his face,
 Though it might tend to his disgrace.

And so th' Ephesian villain fir'd
 The temple which the world admir'd,
 Contemning death, despising shame,
 To gain an ever odious name.

DR. SHERIDAN'S BALLAD ON BALLY- SPELLIN*.

ALL you that would refine your blood,
 As pure as fam'd Llewellyn,
 By waters clear, come every year,
 To drink at Ballyspellin.

Though pox or itch your skins enrich
 With rubies past the telling,
 'Twill clear your skin before you've been
 A month at Ballyspellin.

If lady's cheek be green as leek
 When she comes from her dwelling,
 The kindling rose within it glows
 When she's at Ballyspellin.

The footy brown, who comes from town,
 Grows here as fair as Helen;
 Then back she goes to kill the beaux
 By dint of Ballyspellin.

Our ladies are as fresh and fair
 As Rose, or Bright Dunkelling;
 And Mars might make a fair mistake,
 Were he at Ballyspellin.

We men submit as they think fit,
 And here is no rebelling:

 to Lord Harrington's regiment of dragoons, who made a news-boy evidence against the printer. IRISH ED.

† A famous spa in the county of Kilkenny, where the Doctor had been to drink the waters with a favourite
 Lady.

The reason's plain; the ladies reign,
They're queens at Ballyspellin.

By matchless charms, unconquer'd arms,
They have the way of quelling
Such desperate foes as dare oppose
Their power at Ballyspellin.

Cold water turns to fire, and burns,
I know, because I fell in
A stream which came from one bright dame
Who drank at Ballyspellin.

Fine beaux advance, equipt for dance,
To bring their Anne or Nell in
With so much grace, I'm sure no place
Can vie with Ballyspellin.

No politics, no subtle tricks,
No man his country selling:
We eat, we drink; we never think
Of these at Ballyspellin.

The troubled mind, the puff'd with wind,
Do all come here pell-mell in;
And they are sure to work their cure
By drinking Ballyspellin.

Though dropsy fills you to the gills,
From chin to toe though swelling;
Pour in, pour out, you cannot doubt
A cure at Ballyspellin.

Death throws no darts through all these parts,
No sextons here are knelling:
Come, judge and try, you'll never die,
But live at Ballyspellin;

Except you feel darts tipt with steel,
Which here are every belle in:
When from their eyes sweet ruin flies,
We die at Ballyspellin.

Good cheer, sweet air, much joy, no care,
Your sight, your taste, your smelling,
Your ears, your touch, transported much
Each day at Ballyspellin.

Within this ground we all sleep found,
No noisy dogs a-yelling;
Except you wake, for Cælia's sake,
All night at Ballyspellin.

There all you see, both he and she,
No lady keeps her cell in;
But all partake the mirth we make,
Who drink at Ballyspellin.

My rhymes are gone; I think I've none,
Unless I should bring hell in;
But, since I'm here, to heaven so near,
I can't at Ballyspellin!

ANSWER.

BY DR. SWIFT*.

DARE you dispute, you fancy brute,
And think there's no refelling

* This answer was resent by Dr. Sheridan, as an affront on himself and the lady he attended to the spa.

Your scurvy lays, and senseless praise
You give to Ballyspellin?

Howe'er you bounce, I here pronounce,
Your medicine is repelling;
Your water's mud, and four's the blood,
When drunk at Ballyspellin.

Those pocky drabs, to cure their scabs,
You thither are compelling,
Will back be sent, worse than they went,
From nasty Ballyspellin.

Llewellyn why? As well may I
Name honest doctor Pellin;
So hard sometimes you tug for rhymes,
To bring in Ballyspellin.

No subject fit to try your wit,
When you went colonelling,
But dull intrigues 'twixt jades and teagues
That met at Ballyspellin.

Our lasses fair, say what you dare,
Who sowing make with shelling,
At Market-hill more beaux can kill,
Than yours at Ballyspellin.

Would I was whipt, when Sheelah stript
To wash herself our well in;
A bum so white ne'er came in sight,
At paltry Ballyspellin.

Your mawkins there smocks hempen wear,
Of Holland not an ell in;
No, not a rag, whate'er you brag,
Is found at Ballyspellin.

But Tom will prate at any rate,
All other nymphs expelling;
Because he gets a few grisettes
At lousy Ballyspellin.

There's bonny Jane, in yonder lane,
Just o'er against The Bell-inn;
Where can you meet a lass so sweet,
Round all your Ballyspellin?

We have a girl deserves an earl;
She came from Enniskillin:
So fair, so young, no such among
The belles at Ballyspellin.

How would you stare to see her there,
The foggy mist dispelling.
That clouds the brows of every blowse
Who lives at Ballyspellin!

Now as I live, I would not give
A stiver for a skellin,
To towse and kiss the fairest miss
That leaks at Ballyspellin.

Whoe'er will raise such lies as these
Deserves a good cudgelling;
Who falsely boasts of belles and toasts,
At dirty Ballyspellin.

My rhymes are gone, to all but one,
Which is, our trees are felling;
As proper quite as those you write,
To force in Ballyspellin.

ON A PRINTER'S BEING SENT TO NEW-GATE.

BETTER we all were in our graves
 Than live in slavery to slaves,
 Worse than the anarchy at sea,
 Where fishes on each other prey;
 Where every trout can make as high rants
 O'er his inferiors as our tyrants,
 And swagger while the coast is clear:
 But, should a lordly pike appear,
 Away you see the varlet scud,
 Or hide his coward snout in mud.
 Thus, if a gudgeon meet a roach,
 He dare not venture to approach;
 Yet still has impudence to rise,
 And, like Domitian, leap at flies.

'THE DAY OF JUDGMENT'.

WITH a whirl of thought oppress'd,
 I sunk from reverie to rest.
 An horrid vision seiz'd my head,
 I saw the graves give up their dead!
 Jove, arm'd with terrors, burst the skies,
 And thunder roars, and lightning flies!
 Amaz'd, confus'd, its fate unknown,
 The world stands trembling at his throne!
 While each pale sinner hung his head,
 Jove, nodding, shook the heavens, and said:
 "Offending race of human kind,
 "By nature, reason, learning, blind;
 "You who, through frailty, stepp'd aside;
 "And you who never fell, through pride;
 "You who in different sects were sham'm'd,
 "And come to see each other damn'd
 "(So some folk told you, but they knew
 "No more of Jove's designs than you);
 "—The world's mad business now is o'er,
 "And I resent these pranks no more.
 "—I to such blockheads set my wit!
 "I damn such fools!—Go, go, you're bit."

VERSES SENT TO THE DEAN ON HIS BIRTH-DAY,

WITH PINE'S HORACE, FINELY BOUND, BY DR. J. SICAN †.

—[Horace speaking.]

You've read, Sir, in poetic strain,
 How Varus and the Mantuan swain
 Have on my birth-day been invited
 (But I was forc'd in verse to write it)
 Upon a plain repast to dine,
 And taste my old Campanian wine;
 But I, who all punctilios hate,
 Though long familiar with the great,
 Nor glory in my reputation,
 Am come without an invitation;
 And, though I'm us'd to right Falernian,
 I'll deign for once to taste Iernian;
 But fearing that you might dispute
 (Had I put on my common suit)
 My breeding and my politesse,
 I visit in a birth-day dress;
 My coat of purest Turkey red,
 With gold embroidery richly spread;
 To which I've sure as good pretensions
 As Irish lords who starve on pensions.
 What though proud ministers of state
 Did at your anti-chamber wait;
 What though your Oxfords and your St. Johns
 Have at your levee paid attendance;
 And Peterborough and great Ormond,
 With many chiefs who now are dormant,
 Have laid aside the general's staff
 And public cares, with you to laugh;

* That this poem is the genuine production of the Dean Lord Chesterfield bears ample testimony in his letter to M. Voltaire, Aug. 27. 1752.

† This ingenious young gentleman was unfortunately murdered in Italy.

L

Yet I some friends as good can name,
Nor less the darling sons of Fame;
For sure my Pollio and Mæcenæ
Were as good statesmen, Mr. Dean, as Either your Bolingbroke or Harley,
Though they made Lewis beg a parley;
And as for Mordaunt, your lov'd hero,
I'll match him with my Drusus Nero.
You'll boast, perhaps, your favourite Pope;
But Virgil is as good, I hope.
I own indeed I can't get any
To equal Hellham and Delany;
Since Athens brought forth Socrates,
A Grecian isle Hippocrates:
Since Tully liv'd before my time,
And Galen blest'd another clime.
You'll plead perhaps, at my request,
To be admitted as a guest,
"Your hearing's bad!"—But why such fears?
I speak to eyes, and not to ears;
And for that reason wisely took
The form you see me in, a book.
Attack'd by slow-devouring moths,
By rage of barbarous Huns and Goths;
By Bentley's notes, my deadliest foes,
By Creech's rhymes and Dunster's prose;
I found my boasted wit and fire
In their rude hands almost expire:
Yet still they but in vain assail'd;
For, had their violence prevail'd,
And in a blast destroy'd my fame,
They would have partly miss'd their aim;
Since all my spirit in thy page
Defies the Vandals of this age.
'Tis yours to save these small remains
From future pedants' muddy brains,
And fix my long-uncertain fate,
You best know how—which way?—TRANSLATE.

ON PSYCHE.

At two afternoon for our Psyche inquire,
Her tea-kettle's on, and her smock at the fire:
So loitering, so active; so busy, so idle;
Which hath she most need of, a spur or a bridle?
Thus a greyhound out-runs the whole pack in a race,
Yet would rather be hang'd than he'd leave a warm
place.
She gives you such plenty, it puts you in pain;
But ever with prudence takes care of the main.
To please you, she knows how to choose a nice bit;
For her taste is almost as refin'd as her wit.
To oblige a good friend, she will trace every market. [cark it.
It would do your heart good, to see how she will
Yet beware of her arts; for it plainly appears,
She saves half her victuals by feeding your ears.

THE DEAN AND DUKE. 1734.

JAMES BRYDGES and the Dean had long been
friends;
James is beduk'd; of course their friendship ends:
But sure the Dean deserves a sharp rebuke,
From knowing James, to boast he knows the Duke,

* Mrs. Sican, a very ingenious well-bred lady, mother to the author of the preceding poem.

Yet, since just heaven the Duke's ambition mocks,
Since all he got by fraud is lost by stocks,
His wings are clipp'd: he tries no more in vain
With bands of fiddlers to extend his train.
Since he no more can build, and plant and revel,
The Duke and Dean seem near upon a level.
Oh! wert thou not a Duke, my good duke Humphry,
From bailiff's claws thou scarce couldst keep thy
A Duke to know a Dean! go, smooth thy crown:
Thy brother (far thy betters) wore a gown.
Well, but a Duke thou art; so pleas'd the king:
Oh! would his Majesty but add a string!

ON DR. RUNDLE, BISHOP OF DERRY.

MAKE Rundle bishop! sic for shame!
An Arian to usurp the name!
A bishop in the isle of Saints!
How will his brethren make complaints!
Dare any of the mitred host
Confer on him the Holy Ghost;
In mother church to breed a variance,
By coupling Orthodox with Arians?
Yet, were he Heathen, Turk, or Jew,
What is there in it strange or new?
For, let us hear the weak pretence
His brethren find to take offence;
Of whom there are but four at most,
Who know there is an Holy Ghost:
The rest, who boast they have conferr'd it,
Like Paul's Ephesians, never heard it;
And, when they gave it, well 'tis known,
They gave what never was their own.
Rundle a bishop! well he may;
He's still a Christian more than they.
We know the subject of their quarrels;
The man has learning, sense, and morals.
There is a reason still more weighty;
'Tis granted he believes a Deity;
Has every circumstance to please us,
Though fools may doubt his faith in Jesus.
But why should he with that be loaded,
Now twenty years from court exploded?
And is not this objection odd
From rogues who ne'er believ'd a God?
For liberty a champion stout,
Though not so gospel-ward devout;
While others, hither sent to save us,
Came but to plunder and enslave us;
Nor ever own'd a power divine,
But Mammon and the German line.
Say, how did Rundle undermine 'em?
Who show'd a better jus divinum?
From ancient canons would not vary,
But thrice refus'd episcopari.
Our bishop's predecessor, Magus,
Would offer all the sands of Tagus,
Or sell his children, house, and lands,
For that one gift, to lay-on hands:
But all his gold could not avail
To have the spirit set to sale.
Said surly Peter, "Magus, pr'ythee,
"Be gone: thy money perish with thee."
Were Peter now alive, perhaps
He might have found a score of chaps,

* Promoted to that see, in February 1734-5.

Could he but make his gift appear
In rents three thousand pounds a year.

Some fancy this promotion odd,
As not the handy-work of God;
Though e'en the bishops disappointed
Must own it made by God's anointed,
And, well we know, the congé regal
Is more secure as well as legal;
Because our lawyers all agree,
That bishoprics are held in fee.

Dear Baldwin chaste, and witty Crosse,
How sorely I lament your loss!
That such a pair of wealthy ninnies
Should slip your time of dropping guineas;
For, had you made the king your debtor,
Your title had been so much better.

EPIGRAM.

Friend Rundle fell, with grievous bump,
Upon his reverential rump.
Poor rump! thou hadst been better sped,
Hadst thou been join'd to Boulter's head:
A head, so weighty and profound,
Would needs have kept thee from the ground.

A CHARACTER, PANEGYRIC, AND DESCRIPTION OF THE LEGION-CLUB.

1736.

As I stroll the city, oft I
See a building large and lofty,
Not a bow-shot from the college;
Half the globe from sense and knowledge:
By the prudent architect,
Plac'd against the church direct,
Making good thy grand-dame's jest,
"Near the church"—you know the rest.

Tell us, what the pile contains?
Many a head that holds no brains.
These demoniacs let me dub
With the name of Legion-club.
Such assemblies, you might swear,
Meet when butchers bait a bear;
Such a noise, and such harranguing,
When a brother thief is hanging:
Such a rout and such a rabble
Run to hear Jack-pudden gabble;
Such a crowd their ordure throws
On a far less villain's nose.

Could I from the building's top
Hear the rattling thunder drop,
While the devil upon the roof
(If the devil be thunder-proof)
Should with poker fiery red
Crack the stones, and melt the lead;
Drive them down on every skull,
While the den of thieves is full;
Quite destroy the harpies' nest;
How might then our isle be blest!
For divines allow that God
Sometimes makes the devil his rod;
And the gospel will inform us,
He can punish sins enormous.

Yet should Swift endow the schools,
For his lunatics and fools,

With a rood or two of land,
I allow the pile may stand.
You perhaps will ask me, Why so?
But it is with this proviso:
Since the house is like to last,
Let the royal grant be pass'd,
That the club have right to dwell
Each within his proper cell,
With a passage left to creep in,
And a hole above for peeping.
Let them, when they once get in,
Sell the nation for a pin;
While they sit a-picking straws,
Let them rave at making laws;
While they never hold their tongue.
Let them dabble in their dung:
Let them form a grand committee,
How to plague and starve the city;
Let them stare, and storm, and frown,
When they see a clergy gown;
Let them, ere they crack a louse,
Call for th' orders of the house;
Let them, with their gosling quills,
Scribble senseless heads of bills.
We may, while they strain their throats,
Wipe our a—s with their votes.

Let Sir Tom*, that rampant ass,
Stuff his guts with flax and grass;
But, before the priest he fleeces,
Tear the bible all to pieces:
At the parsons, Tom, halloo, boy,
Worthy offspring of a shoe-boy,
Footman, traitor, vile seducer,
Perjur'd rebel, brib'd accuser,
Lay thy paltry privilege aside,
Sprung from papists, and a regicide;
Fall a-working like a mole,
Raife the dirt about your hole.

Come, assist me, muse obedient!
Let us try some new expedient;
Shift the scene for half an hour,
Time and place are in thy power.
Thither, gentle muse, conduct me;
I shall ask, and you instruct me.

See, the muse unbars the gate!
Hark, the monkeys, how they prate!
All ye gods who rule the soul!
Styx, through hell, whose waters roll!
Let me be allow'd to tell
What I heard in yonder hell.

Near the door an entrance gapes,
Crowded round with antic shapes,
Proverty, and grief, and care,
Causeless joy, and true despair;
Discord periwigg'd with snakes,
See the dreadful strides she takes!

By this odious crew beset,
I began to rage and fret,
And resolv'd to break their pates,
Ere we enter'd at the gates;
Had not Clie in the nick
Whisper'd me, "Lay down your stick."
What, said I, is this the mal-hausse?
These, she answer'd, are but shadows,
Phantoms bodiless and vain,
Empty visions of the brain.

* Sir Thomas Pendergrass, a privy councillor.

In the porch Briareus stands,
Shows a bribe in all his hands;
Briareus the secretary,
But we mortals call him Gargy.
When the rogues their country fleece,
They may hope for pence a-piece.

Clio, who had been so wise
To put on a fool's disguise,
To bespeak some approbation,
And be thought a near relation,
When she saw three hundred brutes
All involv'd in wild disputes,
Roaring till their lungs were spent,
Privilege of Parliament.

Now a new misfortune feels,
Dreading to be laid by th' heels.
Never durst she muse before
Enter that infernal door;
Clio, stifled with the smell,
Into spleen and vapours fell,
By the Stygian steams that flew
From the dire infectious crew.
Not the stench of Lake Avernus
Could have more offended her nose;
Had she flown but o'er the top,
She had felt her pinions drop,
And by exhalations dire,
Though a goddess, must expire.
In a fright she crept away;
Bravely I resolv'd to stay.

When I saw the keeper frown,
Tipping him with half a crown,
Now, said I, we are alone,
Name your heroes one by one.

Who is that hell-featur'd brawler?
Is it Satan? No, 'tis Waller.
In what figure can a bard dress
Jack the grandson of Sir Hardress?
Honest keeper, drive him further,
In his looks are hell and murder;
See the scowling visage drop,
Just as when he murder'd T—p.
Keeper, show me where to fix
On the puppy pair of Dicks;
By their lantern jaws and leathern,
You might swear they both are brethren:
Dick Fitzbaker, Dick the player,
Old acquaintance, are you there?
Dear companions, hug and kiss,
Toast Old Glorious in your piss:
Tie them, keeper, in a tether,
Let them starve and stink together;
Both are apt to be unruly,
Lash them daily, lash them duly;
Though 'tis hopeless to reclaim them,
Scorpion rods perhaps may tame them.

Keeper, yon old dotard smoke,
Sweetly snoring in his cloak;
Who is he? 'tis humdrum Wynne,
Half encompass'd by his kin:
There observe the tribe of Bingham,
For he never fails to bring 'em;
While he sleeps the whole debate,
They submissive round him wait;
Yet would gladly see the hunk
In his grave, and search his trunks.
See, they gently twitch his coat,
Just to yawn and give his vote,

Always firm in his vocation,
For the court, against the nation.

Those are A—s Jack and Bob,
First in every wicked job,
Son and brother to a queer
Brain-sick brute, they call a peer.
We must give them better quarter,
For their ancestor trod mortar,
And H—th, to boast his fame,
On a chimney cut his name.

There sit Clements, D—ks, and Harrison;
How they swagger from their garrison!
Such a triplet could you tell
Where to find on this side hell?
Harrison, D—ks, and Clements,
Keeper, see they have their payments;
Every mischief's in their hearts;
If they fail, 'tis want of parts.

Bless us, Morgan! art thou there, man!
Bless mine eyes! art thou the chairman!
Chairman to your damn'd committee!
Yet I look on thee with pity.
Dreadful sight! what! leas'd Morgan
Metamorphos'd to a Gorgon?
For thy horrid looks, I own,
Half convert me to a stone.
Hast thou been so long at school,
Now to turn a factious tool?
Alma Mater was thy mother,
Every young divine thy brother.
Thou, a disobedient varlet,
Treat thy mother like a harlot!
Thou ungrateful to thy teachers,
Who are all grown reverend preachers!
Morgan, would it not surprise one!
Turn thy nourishment to poison!
When you walk among your books,
They reproach you with their looks:
Bind them fast, or from their shelves
They will come and right themselves;
Homer, Plutarch, Virgil, Flaccus,
All in arms prepare to back us.
Soon repent, or put to slaughter
Every Greek and Roman author.
Will you, in your faction's phrase,
Send the clergy all to graze,
And, to make your project pass,
Leave them not a blade of grass?

How I want thee, humorous Hogarth!
Thou, I hear, a pleasing rogue art.
Were but you and I acquainted,
Every monster should be painted:
You should try your graving-tools
On this odious group of fools:
Draw the beasts as I describe them
From their features, while I gibe them;
Draw them like; for I assure you,
You will need no car'atura;
Draw them so, that we may trace
All the soul in every face.

Keeper, I must not retire,
You have done what I desire:
But I feel my spirits spent
With the noise, the sight, the scent.
"Pray be patient; you shall find
"Half the best are still behind;
"You have hardly seen a score;
"I can show two hundred more."

Keeper, I have seen enough.—
Taking then a pinch of snuff,
I concluded, looking round them,
“ May their god, the devil, confound them ! ”

AN APOLOGY, &c.

A LADY, wise as well as fair,
Whose conscience always was her care,
Thoughtful upon a point of moment,
Would have the text as well as comment :
So hearing of a grave divine,
She sent to bid him come and dine.
But, you must know, he was not quite
So grave as to be unpolite ;
Thought human learning would not lessen
The dignity of his profession :
And, if you'd heard the man discourse,
Or preach, you'd like him scarce the worse.
He long had bid the court farewell,
Retreating silent to his cell ;
Suspected for the love he bore
To one who sway'd some time before ;
Which made it more surprising how
He should be sent for thither now.

The message told, he gapes, and stares,
And scarce believes his eyes or ears :
Could not conceive what it should mean,
And fain would hear it told again.
But then the 'squire so trim and nice,
'Twere rude to make him tell it twice :
So bow'd, was thankful for the honour ;
And would not fail to wait upon her.
His beaver brush'd, his shoes, and gown,
Away he trudges into town ;
Passes the lower castle-yard ;
And now advancing to the guard,
He trembles at the thoughts of state ;
For, conscious of his sheepish gait,
His spirits of a sudden fail'd him ;
He stopt, and could not tell what ail'd him.

What was the message I receiv'd ?
Why certainly the captain rav'd !
To dine with her ! and come at three !
Impossible ! it can't be me.
Or may be I mistook the word ;
My Lady—it must be my Lord.
My Lords abroad ; my Lady too :
What must th' unhappy Doctor do ?
“ Is Captain Cracherode here, pray ? ” — “ No.”
“ Nay, then 'tis time for me to go.”
Am I awake, or do I dream ?
I'm sure he call'd me by my name ;
Nam'd me as plain as he could speak ;
And yet there must be some mistake.
Why, what a jest should I have been,
Had now my Lady been within !
What could I've said ? I'm mighty glad
She went abroad—she'd thought me mad.
The hour of dining now is past :
Well then, I'll e'en go home and fast ;
And, since I 'scap'd being made a scoff,
I think I'm very fairly off.
My Lady now returning home,
Calls. “ Cracherode, is the Doctor come ? ”
He had not heard of him—“ Pray see,
“ 'Tis now a quarter after three.”

The captain walks about, and searches
Through all the rooms, and courts, and arches ;
Examines all the servants round,
In vain—no Doctor's to be found.
My Lady could not choose but wonder :
“ Captain, I fear you've made some blunder :
“ But pray, to-morrow go at ten,
“ I'll try his manners once again ;
“ If rudeness be the effect of knowledge,
“ My son shall never see a college.”
The captain was a man of reading,
And much good sense, as well as breeding,
Who, loath to blame, or to incense,
Said little in his own defence.
Next day another message brought :
The Doctor, frighten'd at his fault,
Is dress'd, and stealing through the crowd,
Now pale as death, then blush'd and bow'd,
Panting—and faltering—hum'd and ha'd,
“ Her Ladyship was gone abroad ;
“ The captain too—he did not know
“ Whether he ought to stay or go ; ”
Begg'd she'd forgive him. In conclusion,
My Lady, pitying his confusion,
Call'd her good-nature to relieve him ;
Told him, she thought she might believe him ;
And would not only grant his suit,
But visit him, and eat some fruit ;
Provided, at a proper time,
He told the real truth in rhyme.
'Twas to no purpose to oppose,
She'd hear of no excuse in prose.
The Doctor stood not to debate,
Glad to compound at any rate ;
So, bowing, seemingly comply'd ;
Though, if he durst, he had deny'd.
But first, resolv'd to show his taste,
Was too refin'd to give a feast :
He'd treat with nothing that was rare,
But winding walks and purer air ;
Would entertain without expence,
Or pride, or vain magnificence :
For well he knew, to such a guest
The plainest meals must be the best.
To stomachs clogg'd with costly fare
Simplicity alone is rare ;
Whilst high, and nice, and curious meats,
Are really but vulgar treats.
Instead of spoils of Persian looms,
The costly boasts of regal rooms,
Thought it more courtly and discreet
To scatter roses at her feet ;
Roses of richest dye, that shone
With native lustre, like her own :
Beauty that needs no aid of art
Through every sense to reach the heart.
The gracious dame, though well she knew
All this was much beneath her due,
Lik'd every thing—at least thought fit
To praise it par maniere d'acquit.
Yet she, though seeming pleas'd, can't bear
The scorching sun, or chilling air ;
Disturb'd alike at both extremes,
Whether he shows or hides the beams :
Though seeming pleas'd at all she sees,
Starts at the rustling of the trees,
And scarce can speak for want of breath,
In half a walk fatigu'd to death.

The Doctor takes his hint from hence,
T' apologize his late offence :

" Madam, the mighty power of use
" Now strangely pleads in my excuse :
" If you unus'd have scarcely strength
" To gain this walk's untoward length ;
" If, frighten'd at a scene so rude,
" Through long disuse of solitude ;
" If, long confin'd to fires and screens,
" You dread the waving of these greens ;
" If you, who long have breath'd the fumes
" Of city-fogs and crowded rooms,
" Do now solicitously shun
" The cooler air and dazzling sun ;
" If his majestic eye you flee,
" Learn hence t' excuse and pity me.
" Consider what it is to bear
" The powder'd courtier's witty sneer ;
" To see th' important man of dress
" Scoffing my college awkwardness ;
" To be the strutting cornet's sport,
" To run the gauntlet of the court,
" Winning my way by flow approaches,
" Through crowds of cockcombs and of coaches,
" From the first fierce cockaded centry,
" Quite through the tribe of waiting-gentry ;
" To pass so many crowded stages,
" And stand the staring of your pages ;
" And, after all, to crown my spleen,
" Be told—" You are not to be seen :"
" Or, if you are, be forc'd to bear
" The awe of your majestic air.
" And can I then be faulty found,
" In dreading this vexatious round ?
" Can it be strange, if I eschew
" A scene so glorious and so new ?
" Or is he criminal that flies
" The living lustre of your eyes ?"

THE DEAN'S MANNER OF LIVING.

ON rainy days alone I dine
Upon a chick and pint of wine.
On rainy days I dine alone,
And pick my chicken to the bone :
But this my servants much enrages,
No scraps remain to save board-wages.
In weather fine I nothing spend,
But often sponge upon a friend :
Yet, where he's not so rich as I,
I pay my club, and so good b'ye.

VERSES MADE FOR FRUIT-WOMEN, &c.

APPLES.

COME buy my fine wares,
Plumbs, apples, and pears,
A hundred a penny,
In conscience too many :
Come, will you have any ?
My children are seven,
I wish them in heaven ;
My husband a sot,
With his pipe and his pot,
Not a farthing will gain them ;
And I must maintain them.

ASPARAGUS.

RIFE 'sparagrafs,
Fit for lad or lass,
To make their water pass :
Oh, 'tis pretty picking
With a tender chicken !

ONIONS.

COME, follow me by the smell,
Here are delicate onions to sell ;
I promise to use you well.
They make the blood warmer ;
You'll feed like a farmer :
For this is every cook's opinion,
No savoury dish without an onion ;
But, lest your kissing should be spoil'd,
Your onions must be thoroughly boil'd :
Or else you may spare
Your mistress a share,
The secret will never be known ;
She cannot discover
The breath of her lover,
But think it as sweet as her own.

OYSTERS.

CHARMING oysters I cry :
My masters, come buy.
So plump and so fresh,
So sweet is their flesh,
No Colchester oyster
Is sweeter and moister :
Your stomach they settle,
And rouse up your mettle ;
They'll make you a dad
Of a lass or a lad ;
And madam your wife
They'll please to the life !
Be she barren, be she old,
Be she flut, or be she scold,
Eat my oysters, and lie near her,
She'll be fruitful, never fear her.

HERRINGS.

Be not sparing,
Leave off swearing.
Buy my herring
Fresh from Malahide *,
Better never was try'd.
Come, eat them with pure fresh butter and mustard ;
Their bellies are soft, and as white as a custard.
Come, six-pence a dozen to get me some bread,
Or, like my own herrings, I soon shall be dead.

ORANGES.

COME buy my fine oranges, sauce for your veal,
And charming when squeez'd in a pot of brown ale ;
Well roasted, with sugar and wine in a cup,
They'll make a sweet bishop when gentle-folks sup.

* Near Dublin.

ON ROVER, A LADY'S SPANIEL.

INSTRUCTIONS TO A PAINTER*.

HAPPIEST of the spaniel race,
Painter, with thy colours grace:
Draw his forehead large and high,
Draw his blue and humid eye;
Draw his neck so smooth and round,
Little neck with ribbands bound;
And the musely swelling breast
Where the Loves and Graces rest;
And the spreading even back,
Soft, and sleek, and glossy black;
And the tail that gently twines,
Like the tendrils of the vines;
And the silky twisted hair,
Shadowing thick the velvet ear;
Velvet ears, which, hanging low,
O'er the veiny temples flow.

With a proper light and shade,
Let the winding hoop be laid;
And within that arching bower
(Secret circle, mystic power)
In a doriny slumber place
Happiest of the spaniel race;
While the soft perspiring dame,
Glowing with the softest flame,
On the ravish'd favourite pours
Balmy dews, ambrosial showers!

With thy utmost skill express
Nature in her richest dress;
Limpid rivers smoothly flowing,
Orchards by those rivers blowing;
Curling woodbine, myrtle shade,
And the gay enamel'd mead;
Where the linnets sit and sing,
Little sportlings of the spring;
Where the breathing field and grove
Soothe the heart, and kindle love:
Here for me, and for the muse,
Colours of resemblance choose;
Make of lineaments divine,
Daply female spaniels shine,
Pretty fondlings of the fair,
Gentle damsels, gentle care;
But to one alone impart
All the flattery of thy art.
Crowd each feature, crowd each grace,
Which complete the desperate face;
Let the spotted wanton dame
Feel a new resistless flame;
Let the happiest of his race
Win the fair to his embrace.
But in shade the rest conceal,
Nor to sight their joys reveal,
Lest the pencil and the muse
Loose desires and thoughts infuse.

AY AND NO;

A TALE FROM DUBLIN. 1737.

AT Dublin's high feast fate Primate and Dean,
Both dress'd like divines, with band and face clean.

* In ridicule of Philip's poem on Miss Carteret, and written, it has been said, "to affront the lady of Arch-bishop Boulter."

Quoth Hugh of Armagh*, "The mob is grown
"bold."

"Ay, ay," quoth the Dean, "the cause is old
"No, no," quoth the Primate, "if causes we list,
"This mischief arises from witty Dean Swift."

The smart-one replied, "There's no wit in the case;
"And nothing of that ever troubled your Grace."

"Though with your state-sieve your own notions
"you split,

"A Boulter by name is no bolter of wit.

"It is matter of weight, and a mere money-job;

"But the lower the coin, the higher the mob.

"Go tell your friend Bob and the other great folk,

"That sinking the coin is a dangerous joke.

"The Irish dear-joys have enough common sense,

"To treat gold reduced like Wood's copper pence.

"It is pity a prelate should die without law;

"But if I say the word—take care of Armagh!"

DR. SWIFT'S ANSWER TO A FRIEND'S QUESTION.

THE furniture that best doth please
St. Patrick's dean, good Sir, are these:
The knife and fork with which I eat;
And, next, the pot that boils the meat
The next to be preferr'd, I think,
Is the glass in which I drink;
The shelves on which my books I keep;
And the bed on which I sleep;
An antique elbow-chair between,
Big enough to hold the Dean;
And the store that gives delight
In the cold bleak wintery night;
To these we add a thing below,
More for use reserv'd than show:
These are what the Dean do please;
All superfluous are but these.

APOLLO'S EDICT†.

IRELAND is now our royal care,
We lately fix'd our viceroy there;
How near was she to be undone,
Till pious love inspir'd her son!
What cannot our vicegerent do,
As poet and as patriot too?
Let his success our subjects sway,
Our inspirations to obey,
And follow where he leads the way:
Then study to correct your taste;
Nor beaten paths be longer trac'd.
No simile shall be begun,
With rising or with setting sun;
And let the sacred head of Nile
Be ever banish'd from your isle.

When wretched lovers live on air,
I beg you'll the camelion spare?
And, when you'd make a hero grander,
Forget he's like a salamander.

No son of mine shall dare to say,
Aurora usher'd-in the day,
Or ever name the milky-way.

* Dr. Hugh Boulter.

† This poem was originally written in 1720; the latter part of it was re-published in 1743, on the death of the Countess of Donegal.

You all agree, I make no doubt,
 Elijah's mantle is worn out.
 The bird of Jove shall toil no more
 To teach the humble wren to soar.
 Your tragic heroes shall not rant,
 Nor shepherds use poetic cant.
 Simplicity alone can grace
 The manners of the rural race.
 Theocritus and Philips be
 Your guides to true simplicity.

When Damon's soul shall take its flight,
 Though poets have the second sight,
 They shall not see a trail of light.
 Nor shall the vapours upward rise.
 Nor a new star adorn the skies:
 For who can hope to place one there,
 As glorious as Belinda's hair?
 Yet, if his name you'd eternize,
 And must exalt him to the skies;
 Without a star, this may be done:
 So Tickell mourn'd his Addison.

If Anna's happy reign you praise,
 Pray, not a word of balcony-days;
 Nor let my votaries show their skill
 In aping lines from Cooper's-Hill;
 For know, I cannot bear to hear
 The mimicry of deep, yet clear.

Whene'er my viceroy is address'd,
 Against the Phoenix I protest.
 When poets soar in youthful strains,
 No Phaeton to hold the reins.

When you describe a lovely girl,
 No lips of coral, teeth of pearl.
 Cupid shall ne'er mistake another,
 However beauteous, for his mother:
 Nor shall his darts at random fly
 From magazine in Celia's eye.
 With women-compounds I am cloy'd,
 Which only pleas'd in Biddy Floyd.
 For foreign aid, what need they roam,
 Whom fate has amply blest at home?

Unerring heaven, with bounteous hand,
 Has form'd a model for your land,
 Whom Jove endow'd with every grace;
 The glory of the Granard race;
 Now destin'd by the powers divine
 The blessing of another line.
 Then, would you paint a matchless dame,
 Whom you'd consign to endless fame?
 Invoke not Cytherea's aid,
 Nor borrow from the blue-ey'd maid;
 Nor need you on the Graces call;—
 Take qualities from Donegal.

EPIGRAMS.

BEHOLD! a proof of Irish sense!
 Here Irish wit is seen!
 When nothing's left, that's worth defence,
 We build a magazine.

* The Dean, in his lunacy, had some intervals of sense; at which time his guardians, or physicians, took him out for the air. On one of these days, when they came to the Park, Swift remarked a new building, which he had never seen, and asked what it was designed for. To which Dr. Kingbury answered, "That, Mr. Dean, is the magazine for arms and powder, for the security of

EPIGRAMS,

Occasioned by Dr. Swift's intended Hospital for Idiots and Lunatics.

THE Dean must die—our Idiots to maintain,
 Perish, ye Idiots! and long live the Dean!

O genius of Hibernia's state,
 Sublimely good, severely great!
 How doth this latest act excel
 All you have done or wrote so well!
 Satire may be the child of spite,
 And fame might bid the Drapier write;
 But to relieve, and to endow,
 Creatures that know not whence or how,
 Argues a soul both good and wise,
 Resembling Him who rules the skies.
 He to the thoughtful mind displays
 Immortal skill ten thousand ways;
 And, to complete his glorious task,
 Gives what we have not sense to ask!

Lo! Swift to Idiots bequeaths his store;
 Be wise, ye rich!—consider thus the poor!

ON THE

DEAN OF ST. PATRICK'S BIRTH-DAY †,

Nov. 30, St. Andrew's Day.

BETWEEN the hours of twelve and one,
 When half the world to rest were gone,
 Entranc'd in softest sleep I lay,
 Forgetful of an anxious day;
 From every care and labour free,
 My soul as calm as it could be,

The Queen of Dreams, well pleas'd to find
 An undisturb'd and vacant mind,
 With magic pencil trac'd my brain,
 And there she drew St. Patrick's Dean.
 I strait beheld on either hand
 Two saints, like guardian angels, stand,
 And either claim'd him for their son;
 And thus the high dispute begun.

St. Andrew first, with reason strong,
 Maintain'd to him he did belong:

"Swift is my own, by right divine,
 "All born upon this day are mine."
 St. Patrick said, "I own this true,
 "So far he does belong to you:
 "But in my church he's born again,
 "My son adopted, and my Dean.
 "When first the Christian truth I spread,
 "The poor within this isle I fed,
 "And darkest errors banish'd hence,
 "Made knowledge in their place commence;
 "Nay more, at my divine command,
 "All noxious creatures fled the land.

"the city." "Oh! oh!" says the Dean, pulling out his pocket-book, "let me take an item of that. This is worth remarking: my tablets, as Hamlet says, my tablets—memory, put down that!"—Which produced the above lines, said to be the last he ever wrote.

† See, in Parnell's Poems, an elegant compliment on the same occasion.

" I made both peace and plenty smile.
 " Hibernia was my favourite isle;
 " Now his—for he succeeds to me,
 " Two angels cannot more agree.
 " His joy is, to relieve the poor;
 " Behold them weekly at his door!
 " His knowledge too, in brightest rays,
 " He like the sun to all conveys;
 " Shows wisdom in a single page,
 " And in one hour instructs an age.
 " When ruin lately stood around
 " Th' inclosures of my sacred ground,
 " He gloriously did interpose,
 " And sav'd it from invading foes;
 " For this I claim immortal Swift,
 " As my own son, and heaven's best gift."

The Caledonian faint, enrag'd,
 Now closer in dispute engag'd,
 Effays to prove, by transmigration,
 The Dean is of the Scottish nation;
 And, to confirm the truth, he chose
 The loyal soul of great Montrose.
 " Montrose and he are both the same,
 " They only differ in the name;
 " Both, heroes in a righteous cause,
 " Assert their liberties and laws:
 " He's now the same, Montrose was then,
 " But that the sword is turn'd a pen;
 " A pen of so great power, each word
 " Defends beyond the hero's sword."

Now words grew high—we can't suppose
 Immortals ever come to blows;
 But, lest unruly passion should
 Degrade them into flesh and blood,
 An angel quick from Heaven descends,
 And he at once the contest ends:

" Ye reverend pair, from discord cease,
 " Ye both mistake the present case;
 " One kingdom cannot have pretence
 " To so much virtue! so much sense:
 " Search Heaven's record; and there you'll find,
 " That he was born for all mankind."

EPISTLE TO ROBERT NUGENT, ESQ.

With a Picture of Dean Swift.

BY DR. DUNKIN*.

To gratify thy long desire
 (So love and piety require),
 From Bindon's† colours you may trace
 The patriot's venerable face,
 The last, O Nugent! which his art
 Shall ever to the world impart;
 For know, the prime of mortal men,
 That matchless monarch of the pen
 (Whose labours, like the genial sun,
 Shall through revolving ages run,
 Yet never, like the sun, decline,
 But in their full meridian shine),

* This elegant tribute of gratitude, as it was written at a period when all suspicion of flattery must vanish, reflects the highest honour on the ingenious writer, and cannot but be agreeable to the admirers of Swift.

† Samuel Bindon, Esq. a celebrated painter.

That ever-honour'd, envied sage,
 So long the wonder of his age,
 Who charm'd us with his golden strain,
 Is not the shadow of the Dean:
 He only breathes Æolian air—
 Oh! what a falling-off was there!

Hibernia's Helicon is dry,
 Invention, wit, and humour die;
 And what remains against the storm
 Of malice, but an empty form?
 The nodding ruins of a pile,
 That stood the bulwark of this isle;
 In which the sisterhood was fix'd
 Of candid honour, truth unmix'd,
 Impartial reason, thought profound,
 And charity, diffusing round,
 In cheerful rivulets, the flow
 Of fortune to the sons of woe?

Such one, my Nugent, was thy Swift,
 Endued with each exalted gift.
 But, lo! the pure ethereal flame
 Is darken'd by a misty steam:
 The balm exhausted breathes no smell,
 The rose is wither'd ere it fell.
 That godlike supplement of law,
 Which held the wicked world in awe,
 And could the tide of faction stem,
 Is but a shell without the gem.

Ye sons of genius, who would aim
 To build an everlasting fame,
 And, in the field of letter'd arts,
 Display the trophies of your parts,
 To yonder mansion turn aside,
 And mortify your growing pride.
 Behold the brightest of the race,
 And Nature's honour, in disgrace:
 With humble resignation own,
 That all your talents are a loan;
 By Providence advanc'd for use,
 Which you should study to produce.
 Reflect, the mental stock, alas!
 However current now it pass,
 May haply be recal'd from you
 Before the grave demands his due.
 Then, while your morning-star proceeds,
 Direct your course to worthy deeds,
 In fuller day discharge your debts;
 For, when your sun of reason sets,
 The night succeeds; and all your schemes
 Of glory vanish with your dreams.

Ah! where is now the supple train,
 That danc'd attendance on the Dean?
 Say, where are those facetious folks,
 Who shook with laughter at his jokes,
 And with attentive rapture hung
 On wisdom dropping from his tongue;
 Who look'd with high disdainful pride
 On all the busy world beside,
 And rated his productions more
 Than treasures of Peruvian ore?

Good Christians! they with bended knees
 Ingulph'd the wine, but loath the lees,
 Averting (so the text commands),
 With ardent eyes and up-cast hands,
 The cup of sorrow from their lips,
 And fly, like rats from sinking ships.
 While some, who by his friendship rose
 To wealth, in concert with his foes,

Run counter to their former track,
Like old Actæon's horrid pack
Of yelling mungrels, in requitals
To riot on their master's vitals;
And, where they cannot blast his laurels,
Attempt to stigmatize his morals;
Through scandal's magnifying-glass
His foibles view, but virtues pass,
And on the ruins of his fame
Erect an ignominious name.
So vermin foul, of vile extraction,
The spawn of dirt and putrefaction,
The sounder members traverse o'er,
But fix and fatten on a fore.
Hence! peace, ye wretches, who revile
His wit, his humour, and his style;
Since all the monsters which he drew
Were only meant to copy you;
And, if the colours be not fainter,
Arraign yourselves, and not the painter.
But, oh! that He, who gave him breath,
Dread arbiter of life and death;
That He, the moving soul of all,
The sleeping spirit would recall,
And crown him with triumphant meeds,
For all his past heroic deeds,
In mansions of unbroken rest,
The bright republic of the blest'd!
Irradiate his benighted mind
With living light of light refin'd;
And these the blank of thought employ
With objects of immortal joy!

Yet, while he drags the sad remains
Of life, flow-creeping through his veins,
Above the views of private ends,
The tributary muse attends,
To prop his feeble steps, or shed
The pious tear around his bed.
So pilgrims, with devout complaints,
Frequent the graves of martyr'd saints,
Inscribe their worth in artless lines,
And, in their stead, embrace their shrines.

Her vocal stones shall vindicate him dead.

To which is prefixed

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

Hail Nature's poet! whom she taught alone
To sing her works in numbers like her own;
Sweet as the thrush that warbles in the dale,
And soft as Philomela's tender tale.
She lent her pencil too, of wond'rous power,
To catch the rainbow, and to paint the flower
Of many mingling hues; then smiling said,
(But first with laurel crown'd her fav'rite's head)
"These beauteous children, though so fair they shine,
"Fade in my Seasons—let them live in thine!"
And live they shall, the charm of every eye,
Till Nature sickens, and the Seasons die.

How Nature's power! when the night alone
To long her works in numbers like her own;
Sweet as the truth that warbles in the dale,
And soft as Philomela's tender tale.
She has her pencil too, of wondrous power,
To catch the rainbow, and to paint the flower
Of many mingling hues; then smiling full,
(Her face with laurel crown'd her father's head)
"These beauteous children, though to fair they seem,
"Fare in my bosom—for them live in them."

THE LIFE OF THOMSON.

For the life of Thomson, the world is obliged to Dr. Murdoch, who was his intimate friend, and wrote from personal knowledge.

Some inaccuracies in the narrative of Dr. Murdoch have been corrected by Shiels, and some defects supplied by the masterly pen that has lately enriched our national stock of criticism and biography.

Mr. Boswell has inserted in his life of our great poetical biographer, some information which he had obtained from Thomson's relations, for his use, but of which he had neglected fully to avail himself.

The Earl of Buchan, with a laudable enthusiasm to celebrate the memory of a poet who is justly accounted an honour to his country, has collected several additional particulars of his life, and has intermingled his information with some valuable letters, and poetical compositions, which were not previously communicated to the public. These are the authorities upon which most of the following facts are stated.

James Thomson was born at Ednam, near Kelso, in Roxburghshire, September 11. 1700. His father was minister of Ednam, in the presbytery of Kelso, and afterwards of Southdean, in the presbytery of Jedburgh, in that county, and much respected for his piety and diligence in the discharge of his pastoral duties. His mother, Beatrix Trotter, was daughter and coheiress of Mr. Trotter, a small portioner of land at Foggo, in Berwickshire, and equally amiable by her piety, which was enlivened by singular fervour of imagination, and by the social and domestic duties.

The difficulty with which his father supported his family, having nine children, occasioned his removal to Southdean, the salary of which, though not large, was more adequate to his expences than that of Ednam.

After the settlement of his father at Southdean, he was sent to the school of the neighbouring town of Jedburgh, where he was taught the common rudiments of learning. In the progress of his education, he was not distinguished among his school-fellows by any remarkable superiority of parts.

Although he was not considered by his master as superior to common boys, he obtained notice by his genius, even in his boyish years. Mr. Riccalton, minister of the neighbouring parish of Hobkirk, a man of taste and learning, discovered his early propensity to poetry, encouraged his first poetical essays, and corrected his performances.

According to Lord Buchan, he was occasionally invited to spend the vacation of the school at the country seat of Sir William Bennet of Chesters, the most accomplished country gentleman in that part of Scotland, and was also favourably noticed by Sir Gilbert Elliot of Minto, afterwards Lord Justice Clerk. The late Hon. Mrs Selby of Paston, in Northumberland, informed the present writer, that he was likewise a frequent visitor at Crailing, the seat of her father Lord Cranston.

Thus encouraged, he began, at an early age, to amuse himself and his friends with poetical compositions; with which, however, he so little pleased himself, that on every new-year's day he threw into the fire all the productions of the foregoing year.

From the school, he was removed to the University of Edinburgh; where he was not more distinguished among his fellow-students than he had been among his school-fellows. By the time when he went to College, he had probably begun to consider himself as intended by nature for a poet. The conscious dignity of genius, therefore, would teach him to disdain those studies in which he could not excel: And thus, the contempt of his class-fellows, and the encouragement of his poetical friends, would equally conspire to confirm his predilection for poetry, and to prompt him to renewed efforts in poetical composition.

In the second session of his attendance at the University, his studies were interrupted by the sudden death of his father. He was summoned home to receive his dying benediction; but came too late. This circumstance contributed to increase his sorrow, and his filial piety was expressed on this mournful occasion in instances of conduct which his surviving relations afterwards delighted to recollect.

His mother, now raising upon her little estate what money a mortgage could afford, removed with her family to Edinburgh; and he renewed the prosecution of his studies.

As it was the wish of his friends, that he should embrace the clerical profession, he entered upon the study of theology, which he prosecuted without distinction or expectation, till, at the usual time, he performed a probationary exercise, by explaining a psalm. His diction was so poetically splendid, that Mr. Hamilton, the professor of divinity, reproved him for speaking language unintelligible to a popular audience; which so disgusted him with his theological pursuits, that he seems to have soon after this incident, resolved to betake himself more entirely to the cultivation of poetry.

About that time, elegant literature began to be cherished and cultivated in the University; and a poetical club, called "The Athenian Society," had ventured to publish a collection of poems, intitled, "The Edinburgh Miscellany," furnished chiefly by Callander, Symmers, and Mitchell, young men of great promise, and of Thomson's acquaintance.

What share Thomson had in "the Edinburgh Miscellany," cannot now be known; but it is probable he was a contributor, as well as Mallet, who was then aspiring to poetical composition; and with whom he contracted an early intimacy, which improved with their years, undisturbed by any casual mistake, envy, or jealousy on either side.

A similarity of taste and of pursuits, connected him also in habits of early intimacy with Paterson, the translator of Paterculus, Malcolm, author of the Treatise on Music, and Murdoch, afterwards a clergyman of the church of England, a Fellow of the Royal Society, and the biographer of his youthful companion.

About this time he is said to have received particular attention from the family of Baillie of Jeriswood, to which he was introduced by the relations of his mother; and Mr. Boswell informs us, that he lived for some time in the family of Lord Binning, as tutor to the present Earl of Haddington. Some verses of his, addressed to one of that family, for the use of some books, are, Lord Buchan believes, still preserved, "as a specimen of his infantine genius."

Having laid aside all thought of the clerical profession, and addicted himself to the study of poetry, in which he reasonably hoped to attain high eminence, he easily discovered that the only stage on which a poet could appear with advantage, was London; where merit might soon become conspicuous, and would find friends, as soon as it became reputable, to befriend it.

It may be supposed, therefore, that he eagerly received any shadow of encouragement, however slight, which was held out to him; when Lady Grizzel Baillie, his mother's friend, advised him to try his fortune as a poet in London, and promised him some countenance and assistance.

Accordingly, in the autumn of the year 1725, he embarked at Leith for London, bedewed with the tears of his affectionate mother, the recollection of which produced, on her death, which happened not long after, the unpremeditated, but beautiful verses to her memory in the collection of Lord Buchan.

On his arrival in London, he found his way to Mallet, his fellow collegian, then tutor to the sons of the Duke of Montrose; to whom he showed his Winter, written at first in detached pieces, or occasional descriptions, who advised him to form them into one connected piece, and get it printed immediately.

He had recommendations to several persons of distinction, particularly to Mr. Forbes, afterwards President of the Court of Session, then attending his duty in parliament, who, having seen a specimen of his poetry in Scotland, received him kindly, and introduced him to several of his friends; among whom was Aikman the painter, who was equally ready in assisting him with the kind offices of friendship. He obtained likewise the notice of Hill, whom, being friendless and indigent, and glad of kindness, he courted with every expression of servile adulation.

The reception he met with, wherever he was introduced, encouraged him to risk the publication of his Winter; which for some time could find no purchaser, till at last Mr. Millan was persuaded by Mallet to buy it at a low price.

It was published in 1726, with a preface, dedication to Sir Spencer Compton, and recommendatory verses by Hill, Mallet, and a Lady, whose fictitious name was Mira, "once," says Dr. Johnson, "too well known."

It was not, immediately upon its appearance, eagerly received by the readers of poetry, and Mr. Millan had, for some time, reason to regret the expence of publication; till, by accident, Mr. Whateley, a man of taste and learning, happening to cast his eye upon it, was so delighted, that he ran from place to place celebrating its excellence: By degrees, it gained upon the public; and edition after edition was printed and sold.

The dedication, however, attracted no regard from Sir Spencer Compton to the author, till Hill awakened his attention, by some verses addressed to Thomson in one of the newspapers, which censured the great for their neglect of ingenious men. Thomson then obtained his notice, and a present of twenty guineas.

As soon as Winter was published, he sent a copy of it to Mitchell, his brother poet, who, not liking many parts of it, returned him the following couplet:

Beauties and faults so thick lie scatter'd here;
Those I could read, if these were not so near.

To this Thomson answered extempore.

Why all not faults, injurious Mitchell, why
Appears one beauty to thy blissing eye;
Damnation worse than thine, if worse can be,
Is all I ask, and all I want from thee:

Finding other judges more favourable, he did not suffer himself to sink into despondence. Every day brought him new friends. He had been introduced to Pope; and, among others, Dr. Rundle, afterwards Bishop of Derry, sought his acquaintance, and found his qualities such, that he recommended him to the Lord Chancellor Talbot.

In 1727, he published his Summer, which he would have dedicated to Lord Binning; but the same kindness which had at first disposed his Lordship to encourage him, determined him to refuse the dedication, which was, by his advice, addressed to Mr. Dodington, afterwards Lord Melcombe, a man who had more power to advance the reputation and fortune of a poet.

The same year, he published his Poem, sacred to the Memory of Sir Isaac Newton, whom he was enabled to praise with due intelligence, by the scientific information of his friend Mr. Gray. It was accompanied by Britannia, a poetical invective against the ministry, whom the nation then thought not forward enough in resenting the depredations of the Spaniards.

In 1728, he published his Spring, with a dedication to the Countess of Hertford, afterwards Duchess of Somerset, by whom he was invited to spend a summer at Lord Hertford's country seat.

Autumn, the season to which the Spring and Summer are preparatory, still remained unsung, and was delayed till he published his works, collected in 4to, 1730. Autumn was addressed to Mr. Onslow.

The same year, he brought on the stage at Drury-Lane, the tragedy of Sophonisba, which raised such expectation, that every rehearsal was dignified with a splendid audience, collected to anticipate the delight that was preparing for the public. It was observed, however, that nobody was affected, and that the company rose as from a moral lecture.

It had upon the stage no unusual degree of success. There is a feeble line in the play:

Oh, Sophonisba! Sophonisba, Oh!

This gave occasion to a waggish parody:

Oh, Jemmy Thomson! Jemmy Thomson, Oh!

which, for a while, was echoed through the town.

Dr. Johnson was told by Savage, that, of the prologue to Sophonisba, the first part was written by Pope, who could not be persuaded to finish it, and that the concluding lines were added by Mallet.

Not long afterwards, he was, by the influence of Dr. Rundle, sent to travel with the Honourable Charles Talbot, eldest son of the Chancellor, with whom he visited most of the courts in Europe, and returned with his views greatly enlarged, not of exterior nature only, and the works of art, but of human life and manners, and of the constitution and policy of the several states.

In the second session of his attendance at the University, his studies were interrupted by the sudden death of his father. He was summoned home to receive his dying benediction; but came too late. This circumstance contributed to increase his sorrow, and his filial piety was expressed on this mournful occasion in instances of conduct which his surviving relations afterwards delighted to recollect.

On his return to England, he was rewarded for his attendance, by the place of Secretary of the Briefs, which required little attendance, and was equal to all his wants.

While abroad, he had conceived the idea of a Poem upon Liberty, upon which he spent two years. While he was busy in this laborious work, Mr. Talbot died; and he opens the first book with an affectionate tribute to his memory.

The poem of Liberty, upon which he congratulated himself as his noblest work, was less eagerly received by the public than he had expected, and is still less generally read than several of his other compositions. It does not now appear in its original state, having been shortened by Lord Lyttleton, after his death, with a liberty which cannot be justified by any supposed propriety of the alteration, or kindness of the friend.

Not long after the publication of his favourite work, the Chancellor died. His place then became vacant, and was, after some delay, given by Lord Hardwick, the new Chancellor, to another, because he did not think proper to ask it.

He was now obliged to rely on his literary exertions for support. Yet, even at this time, he appears, by his letters to Mr. George Ross, published by the Earl of Buchan, to have been affectionately anxious to assist the narrow circumstances of his sisters, Jean and Elizabeth, who then lived with Mr. Guthart, one of the ministers of Edinburgh.

In 1738, he brought on the stage at Drury-Lane, his tragedy of Agamemnon, which, Dr. Johnson observes, was much shortened in the representation. It had the fate which most commonly attends mythological stories, and was only endured, but not favoured. Pope, who had favoured Thomson, when in Italy, with a poetical epistle, countenanced Agamemnon, by coming to it the first night, and was welcomed to the theatre by a general clap.

About this time, he was introduced by Mr. Lyttleton, afterwards Lord Lyttleton, to the Prince of Wales, then struggling for popularity, and professing himself the patron of wit; and being questioned about the state of his affairs, said, "that they were in a more poetical posture than formerly," and had a pension allowed him of one hundred pounds a-year.

In 1731, he offered to the stage another tragedy, Edward and Eleonora; but his connection with the opposition having excited the jealousy of the ministry, the representation of it was prohibited by the Lord Chamberlain, on account of its political complexion.

In 1740, he was employed, in conjunction with Mallet, to write the masque of Alfred, which was acted before the Prince, at Cliefden-house, on the birth-day of the Princess Augusta.

It appears, by some letters and verses which have been lately published by Lord Buchan, that he rented a house, about this time, at the upper end of Kew-lane; and that the Amanda, whom he has frequently celebrated in his verses, was a Miss Young, sister of Mrs. Robertson, wife of his neighbour Mr. James Robertson of Richmond, surgeon to the Household at Kew.

In 1745, he brought on the stage at Drury-lane, the tragedy of Tancred and Sigismunda, the most successful of all his dramatic pieces; for it still keeps its turn upon the stage. The plot is taken from the novel of Gil Blas. The characters are well supported; yet they are not sufficiently new and striking. The loves of Tancred and Sigismunda are tender, pathetic, and affecting; yet there is too little variety of incident to preserve the attention of an audience. The language is, in many places, poetical and flowery; yet in general too declamatory and sentimental.

Dr. Johnson has communicated to the public a letter, which occurs about this period, from Thomson to his sister Mrs. Jean Thomson, wife of Mr. Robert Thomson, master of the grammar school at Lanark, which exhibits a pleasing proof of tender solicitude and fraternal affection. The kindness of Thomson to his relations, however removed from them by place or condition, is recorded by the present writer with much pleasure, as it affords him an opportunity of reflecting on the worth and learning of his brother-in-law, under whom he was initiated in classical learning, and of commemorating the amiable benevolence of his sister, from whom he received many personal civilities.

The last piece that he lived to publish, was the Castle of Indolence, which was many years under his hand, but was at last finished with great accuracy, and is perhaps the most perfect and pleasing of all his compositions. It appeared in 1746.

His friend Mr. Lyttleton was now in power, and procured him the place of Surveyor General of the Leeward Islands, from which, when his deputy was paid, he received about three hundred pounds a year. The deputy whom he appointed was his friend Paterfon, whose tragedy of "Arminius" had been prohibited by the Lord Chamberlain, soon after the publication of Edward and Eleonora. Paterfon lived to succeed him in the office.

He was now in a situation of ease and affluence, but was not long to enjoy it; for, by taking cold on the river, in returning in the evening from London to Kew Lane, he caught a disorder, which, with some careless exasperation, by again exposing himself incautiously to the dews of the evening, ended in a fever that put an end to his life, 27th August 1748, in the 48th year of his age. He was buried in the church of Richmond, under a plain stone, without any inscription; but a decent monument was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey in 1762, the charge of which was defrayed by the profits arising from a splendid edition of his works, given by Mr. Millar, the bookseller. A tablet, with a memorial inscription, was placed on the wall in Richmond church, by the Earl of Buchan, in 1792.

"Only one gentleman, (Collins)" says Dr. Murdoch, "wrote an ode to his memory." There is, however, another performance on his death, intitled, "Mufidorus, an Elegy, &c." by Robert Shiels, a young North Briton, bred a mechanic, and destitute of education, but not destitute of genius. He adored Thomson, and studied his manner. He wrote a poem on "Beauty," and was the real author of the "Lives of the Poets," published under the name of Theo-Cibber. He died of a consumption. Thompson, Langhorne, and various other poets, have since lamented his death, and commemorated his merits.

The Earl of Buchan, desirous of promoting a subscription for erecting a monument to his memory on Ednam Hill, persuaded a considerable number of gentlemen to celebrate the anniversary of his birth-day at Ednam, in 1790 and 1791, with an eager and officious enthusiasm, which has perhaps defeated its own purpose.

He left behind him the tragedy of Coriolanus, which was brought upon the stage at Covent Garden in 1749, by his executors, Sir George Lyttleton and Mr. (afterwards Sir Andrew) Mitchell, for the benefit of his family. Sir George Lyttleton wrote the prologue, which Quin, who had long lived with Thomson in fond intimacy, spoke in such a manner as shewed him "to be," on that occasion, "no actor."

The commencement of this intimacy is highly honourable to Quin, who is reported to have delivered Thomson, then known to him only for his genius, from an arrest, by a present of a hundred pounds: and its continuance is honourable to both; for friendship is not always the sequel of obligation.

By this tragedy, which is far from being the best of his dramatic pieces, a considerable sum was raised; of which part discharged his debts, and the rest was remitted to his two surviving sisters, Mrs. Jean Thomson and Mrs. Mary Craig.

He had a brother who followed him into England, and lived with him for some time as his amanuensis; but being seized with a consumption, he returned to Scotland, to try the benefit of his native air, and soon after died.

His sister Elizabeth, married to Mr. Bell minister of Strathaven, in Lanarkshire, died before 1747, leaving a son, the present Dr. James Bell, minister of Coldstream in Berwickshire, and a daughter, Beatrix, married to Mr. Thomas Prentice of Jerviswood, near Lanark. Dr. Bell possesses a large portion of the worth and genius of his uncle. He published a volume of sermons in 8vo, 1790, and is preparing a collated edition of his uncle's works, from the edition 1730, the additions and alterations to be printed in Italics, with a correct account of his life. Mrs. Thomson died in 1782, leaving no issue. Mrs. Craig died in 1792, leaving a son, Mr. James Craig, the ingenious architect who drew the plan of the New Town of Edinburgh.

His poems and plays were collected and published by Mr. Millar the bookseller, in two volumes 4to, 1762, to which was prefixed an account of his life by Dr. Murdoch. The subsequent editions, particularly of the Seasons, are too numerous to be specified. The edition in 8vo, 1768, is illustrated

On his return to England, he was rewarded for his attendance, by the place of Secretary of the Briefs, which required little attendance, and was equal to all his wants.

The language is, in many places, poetical and flowery; yet in general too declamatory and sentimental.

Dr. Johnson has communicated to the public a letter, which occurs about this period, from Thomson to his sister Mrs. Jean Thomson, wife of Mr. Robert Thomson, master of the grammar school at Lanark, which exhibits a pleasing proof of tender solicitude and fraternal affection. The kindness of Thomson to his relations, however removed from them by place or condition, is recorded by the present writer with much pleasure, as it affords him an opportunity of reflecting on the worth and learning of his brother-in-law, under whom he was initiated in classical learning, and of commemorating the amiable benevolence of his sister, from whom he received many personal civilities.

The last piece that he lived to publish, was the Castle of Indolence, which was many years under his hand, but was at last finished with great accuracy, and is perhaps the most perfect and pleasing of all his compositions. It appeared in 1746.

His friend Mr. Lyttleton was now in power, and procured him the place of Surveyor General of the Leeward Islands, from which, when his deputy was paid, he received about three hundred pounds a year. The deputy whom he appointed was his friend Paterfon, whose tragedy of "Arminius" had been prohibited by the Lord Chamberlain, soon after the publication of Edward and Elzouora. Paterfon lived to succeed him in the office.

He was now in a situation of ease and affluence, but was not long to enjoy it; for, by taking cold on the river, in returning in the evening from London to Kew Lane, he caught a disorder, which, with some careless exasperation, by again exposing himself incautiously to the dews of the evening, ended in a fever that put an end to his life, 27th August 1748, in the 48th year of his age. He was buried in the church of Richmond, under a plain stone, without any inscription; but a decent monument was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey in 1762, the charge of which was defrayed by the profits arising from a splendid edition of his works, given by Mr. Millar, the bookseller. A tablet, with a memorial inscription, was placed on the wall in Richmond church, by the Earl of Buchan, in 1792.

"Only one gentleman, (Collins)" says Dr. Murdoch, "wrote an ode to his memory." There is, however, another performance on his death, intitled, "Mufidorus, an Elegy, &c." by Robert Shiels, a young North Briton, bred a mechanic, and destitute of education, but not destitute of genius. He adored Thomson, and studied his manner. He wrote a poem on "Beauty," and was the real author of the "Lives of the Poets," published under the name of Theo-Cibber. He died of a consumption. Thompson, Langhorne, and various other poets, have since lamented his death, and commemorated his merits.

The Earl of Buchan, desirous of promoting a subscription for erecting a monument to his memory on Ednam Hill, persuaded a considerable number of gentlemen to celebrate the anniversary of his birth-day at Ednam, in 1790 and 1791, with an eager and officious enthusiasm, which has perhaps defeated its own purpose.

He left behind him the tragedy of Coriolanus, which was brought upon the stage at Covent Garden in 1749, by his executors, Sir George Lyttleton and Mr. (afterwards Sir Andrew) Mitchell, for the benefit of his family. Sir George Lyttleton wrote the prologue, which Quin, who had long lived with Thomson in fond intimacy, spoke in such a manner as shewed him "to be," on that occasion, "no actor."

The commencement of this intimacy is highly honourable to Quin, who is reported to have delivered Thomson, then known to him only for his genius, from an arrest, by a present of a hundred pounds: and its continuance is honourable to both; for friendship is not always the sequel of obligation.

By this tragedy, which is far from being the best of his dramatic pieces, a considerable sum was raised; of which part discharged his debts, and the rest was remitted to his two surviving sisters, Mrs. Jean Thomson and Mrs. Mary Craig.

He had a brother who followed him into England, and lived with him for some time as his amanuensis; but being seized with a consumption, he returned to Scotland, to try the benefit of his native air, and soon after died.

His sister Elizabeth, married to Mr. Bell minister of Strathaven, in Lanarkshire, died before 1747, leaving a son, the present Dr. James Bell, minister of Coldstream in Berwickshire, and a daughter, Beatrix, married to Mr. Thomas Prentice of Jerviswood, near Lanark. Dr. Bell possesses a large portion of the worth and genius of his uncle. He published a volume of sermons in 8vo, 1790, and is preparing a collated edition of his uncle's works, from the edition 1730, the additions and alterations to be printed in Italics, with a correct account of his life. Mrs. Thomson died in 1782, leaving no issue. Mrs. Craig died in 1792, leaving a son, Mr. James Craig, the ingenious architect who drew the plan of the New Town of Edinburgh.

His poems and plays were collected and published by Mr. Millar the bookseller, in two volumes 4to, 1762, to which was prefixed an account of his life by Dr. Murdoch. The subsequent editions, particularly of the Seasons, are too numerous to be specified. The edition in 8vo, 1768, is illustrated by an essay on the Seasons by Dr. Aikin; that in 4to, Perth 1793, by a critical essay on the poem by Mr. Heron; and that in 8vo, 1794, with notes by Mr. Stockdale. The two last editions are embellished with beautiful engravings.

Thomson was of stature above the middle size, and "more fat," says Armstrong, "than bard be- seems," of a dull countenance, and a gross, unanimated, uninviting appearance; silent in mingled com- pany, but cheerful among select friends, and by his friends very tenderly and warmly beloved. His be- nevolence was fervent, but not active: he would give, on all occasions, what his purse could supply; but offices of intervention and solicitation, he could not conquer his natural sluggishness sufficiently to perform. The affairs of others, however, were not more neglected than his own. He had often felt the inconveniences of idleness; but he never cured it; and was so conscious of his own character, that he talked of writing an eastern tale, Of the man who loved to be in distress.

Dr. Johnson has related, on the authority of Savage, that Thomson discovered, in his habits of life, little of that delicacy of sentiment which breathes through his writings. Savage's veracity was not in high repute among his acquaintance; he might therefore have misrepresented Thomson's ha- bits, and aggravated the grossness of his manners. That in love he was susceptible of something more refined than the mere passion for the sex, is evident from his tender attachment to Miss Young. Other proofs appear of the purity and delicacy of his sentiments, in his songs and smaller pieces of poetry, in the description of the effects of the tender passion in his Spring, and in the fond impassioned commemoration of Miss Stanley, in his Summer. Even Savage, according to Dr. Johnson, always spoke with the most eager praise of his social qualities, his warmth and constancy of friendship, and his adherence to his first acquaintance, when the advancement of his reputation had left them behind him.

Among his peculiarities, was a very unskillful and inarticulate manner of pronouncing any lofty or solemn composition. He was once reading to Dodington, who, being himself a reader eminently elegant, was so much provoked by his odd utterance, that he snatched the paper from his hand, and told him that he did not understand his own verses.

"By what I have learned," says Mr. Heron, whose ingenuity and kindness make it a pleasure to the compiler of this collection to reflect upon his friendship, "of the circumstances of Thomson's life, and by the complexion of his writings, I should suppose him to have been a man of mild virtue, and of gentle, careless manners, with a sound judgment, an extensive imagination, and a feeling heart; less acute in his observation of human life, than of external nature; extensively informed in all the more popular parts of knowledge, and well acquainted with the general principles of the fine arts."

As a dramatist, the compositions of Thomson have been judged by the critics to be elaborate, decla- matory, and uninteresting; and that judgment must be generally allowed.

Considered in his principal character of a descriptive poet, he is well entitled to the exclusive denomination of the "Poet of Nature." The pictures of other poets, comparatively with his, often want precision, colour, and expression, because they are rather secondary descriptions, than transcripts made immediately from the living volume of nature. In his Autumn, he has described, with the strictest truth, the tenor and habit of his poetical life.

I solitary court
Th' inspiring breeze, and meditate the book
Of Nature, ever open; aiming thence
Warm from the heart to pour the moral song.

As the "Poet of Liberty," his merits have not been so fairly estimated, or generally allowed. "I never saw," says Hill, in a letter to Thomson, "more energy in poetry, never imagery more glowing, never sentiments more elevated. It is all over soul: it inspires, and must therefore have been inspir- ed. The images live in it, (as you say sculpture does in the neighbourhood of Rome). They stand out and present themselves to the touch, as if not described but embodied. Yet one is led by the turn of your sentiments to suspect you of robbery, as if you had stolen from unhappy Italy, what, in the poverty of her present condition, she can, of all things, least spare; for while you are writing of Old Rome's liberty, you seem to have sucked in with the Roman air the soul of an old Roman."

The plan of Liberty, which unfortunately is minutely and circumstantially historical, spreads a damp and langour through several parts of the poem. Its beauties, however, are numerous. The description of the scenery of Switzerland, in particular, is a piece of powerful and exquisite painting. The Genius of the deep is perhaps one of the most awful beings ever yet imagined by poetic fancy, and strongly reminds us of the "spirit of the Cape" in the "Lusiad."

The subject of the poem is noble, and dear to Britons; yet it has been treated by Dr. Johnson with a fastidiousness unworthy of a liberal mind. "The poem of Liberty," says he, "when it first appeared, I tried to read, and soon desisted. I have never tried again, and therefore will not hazard either praise or censure."

The opinion of Mr. Heron is more favourable. "This poem is written in a more correct style than perhaps any of his larger works; it abounds with sublime genuine imagery, and has many exquisite particular images scattered through it. It contains much animated eloquence, which may serve as a model to the orator. It presents a pleasing view of the progress of civilization and refinement, and offers many exhortations to virtuous exertions, which appear to have been poured warm from the heart. Its disadvantages seem to be, that the business of the poem is assigned to an embodied abstract idea, a metaphysical personage; that so much of it is employed in relating generally known facts, in the Grecian, the Roman, and the English history; and that it is diversified by no little episodes, which might relieve the tediousness of uninteresting historic narrative and political declamation."

His Castle of Indolence, is embellished with all the decorations which poetical imagination could confer. The plan is artfully laid, and naturally conducted, and the descriptions rise in a beautiful succession. The charms of indolence, while it only moderates and gives a particular direction to our activity, without unfitting us entirely for social converse and enjoyment, are, in the first part of the poem, most exquisitely painted; and its loathsome squalid misery, when it declines into the languid helplessness of gross sloth, is afterwards most skilfully described. The style and stanza of Spenser, appropriated by custom to all allegorical poems in our language, have been adopted with the happiest skill. In the Castle of Indolence, he has characterised Dr. Murdoch, "the pily man of God," Mr. Quin, and other intimate friends. The character of himself, in stanza LXVIII, was written by Armstrong. The English language possesses nothing more exquisitely delicate than his songs und odes; and his elegies, and smaller pieces have no inconsiderable share of merit.

The Seasons, his greatest work, have been so often the subject of critical examination, that general criticism can say little of them that has not been said already. Scott, Dr. Aikin, Mr. Heron, and Mr. Stockdale, have explained their plan and character, and pointed out their beauties and defects with the minuteness and regularity of particular criticism. As there is no great reason to object to Dr. Johnson's opinion of them, it would be presumptuous to try the same task, which has already exercised his powers, in hopes of doing more than he has done.

"As a writer, Thomson is entitled to one praise of the highest kind,—his mode of thinking, and of expressing his thoughts, is original. His blank verse is no more the blank verse of Milton, or of any other poet, than the rhymes of Prior are the rhymes of Cowley. His numbers, his pauses, his diction, are of his own growth, without transcription, without imitation. He thinks in a peculiar train, and he thinks always as a man of genius: he looks round on nature, and on life, with the eye which nature only bestows on a poet, the eye that distinguishes in every thing presented to its view, whatever there is on which imagination can delight to be detained, and with a mind that at once comprehends the vast, and attends to the minute. The reader of the Seasons wonders that he never saw before what Thomson shows him, and that he never yet felt what Thomson impresses.

"His is one of the works in which blank verse seems properly used. Thomson's wide expansion of general views, and his enumeration of circumstantial varieties, would have been obstructed and embarrassed by the frequent intersection of the senns, which are the necessary effects of rhyme.

"His description of extended scenes, and general effects, bring before us the whole magnificence of nature, whether pleasing or dreadful. The gaiety of Spring, the splendor of Summer, the tranquillity of Autumn, and the horrors of Winter, take in their turns possession of the mind. The poet leads us through the appearances of things as they are successively varied by the vicissitudes of the year, and imparts to us so much of his own enthusiasm, that our thoughts expand with his imagery, and kindle with his sentiments. Nor is the naturalist without his share in the entertainment; for he is assisted to recollect and to combine, to arrange his discoveries, and to amplify the sphere of his contemplation.

"The great defect of the Seasons is want of method; but for this I know not that there was any remedy. Of many appearances subsisting all at once, no rule can be given why one should be mentioned before another; yet the memory wants the help of order, and the curiosity is not exerted by suspense or expectation.

"His diction is in the highest degree fluid and luxuriant; such as may be said to be to his images and thoughts, 'both their lustre and their shade;' such as invest them with splendor through which perhaps they are not always easily discerned. It is too exuberant, and sometimes may be charged with filling the ear more than the mind.

"These poems, with which I was acquainted on their first appearance, I have since found altered and enlarged by subsequent revivals, as the author supposed his judgment to grow more exact, and as books or conversation extended his knowledge and opened his prospects. They are, I think, improved in general; yet I know not whether they have not lost part of what Temple calls their "race," a word which, when applied to wine, in its primitive sense, means the flavour of the soil.

"The highest praise which he has received, ought not to be suppressed; it is said by Lord Lyttleton, in the prologue to his posthumous play, that his works contained

No line which dying he could wish to blot."

This account of the "Poet of the Seasons" cannot conclude more properly than with the following "Address to the Shade of Thomson," written by Mr. Burns, whose poems in the Scottish dialect are well known among his countrymen, and universally admired.

While virgin Spring, by Eden's flood,
Unfolds her tender mantle green;
Or pranks the sod in frolic mood,
Or tunes Eolian strains between:

While Summer, with a matron grace,
Retreats to Dryburgh's cooling shade;
Yet, oft delighted, stops to trace
The progress of the spiky blade:

While Autumn, benefactor kind,
By Tweed erects her aged head;
And fees, with self-approving mind,
Each creature on her bounty fed:

While maniac Winter rages o'er
The hills where classic Yarrow flows,
Rousing the turbid torrent's roar,
Or sweeping wild a waste of snows:

So long, sweet poet of the year,
Shall bloom that wreath thou well hast won,
While Scotia, with exulting tear,
Proclaims that THOMSON was her son.

THE SEASONS.

SPRING 1728.

“ Et nunc omnis, ager nunc omnis parturit arbor,
“ Nunc frondent sylvæ, nunc formosissimus annus.”

VIRG.

The Argument.

The subject proposed. Inscribed to the Countess of Hertford. The season is described as it affects the various parts of Nature, ascending from the lower to the higher; with digressions arising from the subject. Its influence on inanimate matter, on vegetables, on brute animals, and, last, on man; concluding with a dissuasive from the wild and irregular passion of love, opposed to that of a pure and happy kind.

COME, gentle Spring, ethereal mildness, come;
And from the bosom of yon dropping cloud,
While music wakes around, veil'd in a shower
Of shadowing roses, on our plains descend.

O Hertford, fitted or to shine in courts
With unaffected grace, or walk the plain
With innocence and meditation join'd
In soft assemblage, listen to my song,
Which thy own season paints; when nature all
Is blooming and benevolent, like thee.

And see where furly Winter passes off,
Far to the north, and calls his ruffian blasts:
His blasts obey, and quit the howling hill,
The shatter'd forest, and the ravag'd vale;
While softer gales succeed, at whose kind touch,
Dissolving snows in livid torrents lost,
The mountains lift their green heads to the sky.

As yet the trembling year is unconfirm'd,
And Winter oft at eve resumes the breeze,
Chills the pale morn, and bids his driving fleets
Deform the day delightful: so that scarce
The bittern knows his time, with bill ingulph'd
To shake the sounding marsh; or from the shore
The plovers when to scatter o'er the heath,
And sing their wild notes to the listening waste.

At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun,
And the bright bull receives him. Then no more
Th' expansive atmosphere is cramm'd with cold;
But, full of life and vivifying soul, [thin,
Lifts the light clouds sublime, and spreads them
Fleecy and white, o'er all-surrounding heaven.

Forth fly the tepid airs; and unconfined,
Unbinding earth, the moving softness strays.
Joyous, th' impatient husbandman perceives

Relenting nature, and his lusty steers [plough,
Drives from their stalls, to where the well-us'd
Lies in the furrow, loosen'd from the frost.

There, unrefusing, to the harnefs'd yoke
They lend their shoulder, and begin their toil,
Cheer'd by the simple song and soaring lark.
Meanwhile, incumbent o'er the shining share
The master leans, removes the obstructing clay,
Winds the whole work, and sidelong lays the globe.

White through the neighbouring field the sower stalks,

With measur'd step, and liberal throws the grain
Into the faithful bosom of the ground:

The harrow follows harsh, and shuts the scene.

Be gracious, Heaven! for now laborious man

Has done his part. Ye fostering breezes, blow!

Ye softening dews, ye tender showers, descend!

And temper all, thou world-reviving sun,

Into the perfect year! Nor ye who live

In luxury and ease, in pomp and pride,

Think these lost themes unworthy of your ear:

Such themes as these the rural Maro sung

To wide imperial Rome, in the full height

Of elegance and taste, by Greece refin'd.

In ancient times, the sacred plough employ'd

The kings, and awful fathers of mankind:

And some, with whom compar'd your insect-tribes

Are but the beings of a summer's day,

Have held the scale of empire, rul'd the storm

Of mighty war, then, with unwearied hand,

Disdaining little delicacies, seiz'd

The plough, and greatly independent liv'd.

Ye generous Britons, venerate the plough;

And o'er your hills, and long withdrawing vales,

Let Autumn spread his treasures to the sun,
Luxuriant and unbounded: as the sea,
Far through his azure turbulent domain,
Your empire owns, and from a thousand shores
Wafts all the pomp of life into your ports;
So with superior boon may your rich soil,
Exuberant, Nature's better blessings pour
O'er every land, the naked nations clothe,
And be th' exhaustless granary of a world!

Nor only through the lenient air, this change,
Delicious, breathes; the penetrative sun
His force deep-darting to the dark retreat
Of vegetation, sets the steaming power
At large, to wander o'er the verdant earth,
In various hues; but chiefly thee, gay green!
'Thou smiling nature's universal robe!
United light and shade! where the light dwells
With growing strength, and ever-new delight.

From the moist meadow to the wither'd hill,
Led by the breeze, the vivid verdure runs,
And swells, and deepens, to the cherish'd eye.
The hawthorn whitens; and the juicy groves
Put forth their buds, unfolding by degrees,
Till the whole leafy forest stands display'd
In full luxuriance to the sighing gales;
Where the deer rustle through the twining brake,
And the birds sing conceal'd. At once array'd
In all the colours of the flushing year,
By nature's swift and secret-working hand,
The garden glows, and fills the liberal air
With lavish fragrance; while the promis'd fruit
Lies yet a little embryo, unperceiv'd,
Within its crimson folds. Now from the town
Buried in smoke, and sleep, and noisome damps,
Oft let me wander o'er the dewy fields, [drops
Where freshness breathes, and dash the trembling
From the bent bush, as through the verdant maze
Of sweet-briar hedges I pursue my walk;
Or taste the smell of dairy; or ascend
Some eminence, Augusta, in thy plains,
And see the country, far diffus'd around,
One boundless blush, one white empurpled shower
Of mingled blossoms; where the raptur'd eye
Hurries from joy to joy, and, hid beneath
The fair profusion, yellow Autumn spies.

If, brush'd from Russian wilds, a cutting gale
Rise not, and scatter from his humid wings
The clammy mildew; or, dry-blowing, breathe
Untimely frost; before whose baleful blast
The full-blown Spring through all her foliage
shrinks,

Joyless and dead, a wide-dejected waste.
For, oft engender'd by the hazy north,
Myriads on myriads, insect armies waft
Keen in thy poison'd breeze; and wasteful eat,
Through buds and bark, into the blacken'd core,
Their eager way. A feeble race! yet oft
The sacred sons of vengeance; on whose course
Corrosive famine waits, and kills the year.
To check this plague the skilful farmer chaff,
And blazing straw before his orchard burns;
Till, all involv'd in smoke, the latent foe
From every cranny suffocated falls:
Or scatters o'er the blooms the pungent dust
Of pepper, fatal to the frosty tribe:
Or, when th' envenom'd leaf begins to curl,
With sprinkled water drowns them in their nest;
Nor, while they pick them up with busy bill,

The little trooping birds unwisely scares.

Be patient, swains, these cruel seeming winds
Blow not in vain. For hence they keep repress'd
Those deepening clouds on clouds, furcharg'd with
That, o'er the vast Atlantic hither borne, [rain,
In endless train, would quench the summer-blaze,
And, cheerless, drown the crude unripened year.

The north-east spends his rage; he now shut up
Within his iron cave, th' effusive south
Warms the wide air, and o'er the void of heaven
Breathes the big clouds with vernal showers dif-
At first a dusky wreath they seem to rise, [tent.
Scarce staining ether; but by swift degrees,
In heaps on heaps, the doubling vapour sails
Along the loaded sky, and mingled deep
Sits on th' horizon round a settled gloom:
Not such as wintry storms, on mortals shed,
Oppressing life; but lovely, gentle, kind,
And full of every hope and every joy,
The wish of nature. Gradual sinks the breeze
Into a perfect calm, that not a breath
Is heard to quiver through the closing woods,
Or rustling turn the many twinkling leaves
Of aspen tall. Th' uncurling floods, diffus'd
In glassy breadth, seem through delusive lapse
Forgetful of their course. 'Tis silence all,
And pleasing expectation. Herds and flocks
Drop the dry sprig, and mute-imploing eye
The falling verdure. Hush'd in short suspense,
The plummy people streak their wings with oil,
To throw the lucid moisture trickling off;
And wait th' approaching sign to strike, at once,
Into the general choir. Ev'n mountains, vales,
And forests seem, impatient, to demand
The promis'd sweetness. Man superior walks
Amid the glad creation, musing praise,
And looking lively gratitude. At last,
The clouds consign their treasures to the fields;
And, softly shaking on the dimpled pool
Prelusive drops, let all their moisture flow,
In large effusion, o'er the freshen'd world.
The stealing shower is scarce to patter heard,
By such as wander through the forest walks,
Beneath th' umbrageous multitude of leaves.
But who can hold the shade, while Heaven de-
In universal bounty shedding herbs, [scende
And fruits and flowers, on nature's ample lap?
Swift fancy fir'd anticipates their growth;
And, while the milky nutriment distils,
Beholds the kindling country colour round.

Thus all day long the full-distended clouds
Indulge their genial stores, and well-shower'd
Is deep-enrich'd with vegetable life; [earth
Till, in the western sky, the downward sun
Looks out, effulgent, from amid the flush
Of broken clouds, gay-shifting to his beam.
The rapid radiance instantaneous strikes
Th' illumin'd mountain, through the forest streams,
Shakes on the floods, and in a yellow mist,
Far smoking o'er the interminable plain,
In twinkling myriads lights the dewy gems.
Moist, bright, and green, the landscape laughs
around.

Full swell the woods; their very music wakes,
Mixt in wild concert with the warbling brook
Increas'd, the distant bleatings of the hills,
And hollow lows responsive from the vales,
Whence blending all the sweeten'd zephyr springs.

Meantime refracted from yon eastern cloud,
 Bestriding earth, the grand ethereal bow
 Shoots up immense; and every hue unfolds,
 In fair proportion running from the red,
 To where the violet fades into the sky.
 Here, awful Newton, the dissolving clouds
 Form, fronting on the sun, thy showery prism;
 And to the sage instructed eye unfold
 The various twine of light, by that disclos'd
 From the white mingling maze. Not so the boy;
 He wondering views the bright enchantment bend,
 Delightful, o'er the radiant fields, and runs
 To catch the falling glory; but amaz'd
 Beholds th' amusive arch before him fly,
 Then vanish quite away. Still night succeeds,
 And soften'd shade, and saturated earth
 Awaits the morning-beam, to give to light,
 Rais'd through ten thousand different plastic tubes,
 The balmy treasures of the former day.

Then spring the living herbs, profusely wild,
 O'er all the deep-green earth, beyond the power
 Of botanists to number up their tribes:
 Whether he steals along the lonely dale,
 In silent search; or through the forest, rank
 With what the dull incurious weeds account,
 Bursts his blind way, or climbs the mountain rock,
 Fir'd by the nodding verdure of its brow.
 With such a liberal hand has nature flung
 Their seeds abroad, blown them about in winds,
 Innumerable mixt them with the nursing mold,
 The moistening current, and prolific rain.

But who their virtues can declare? who pierce,
 With vision pure, into these secret stores,
 Of health, and life, and joy? The food of man,
 While yet he liv'd in innocence, and told
 A length of golden years; unflinch'd in blood,
 A stranger to the savage arts of life,
 Death, rapine, carnage, surfeit, and disease;
 The lord, and not the tyrant, of the world.

The first fresh dawn then wak'd the gladden'd
 Of uncorrupted man, nor blush'd to see [race
 The sluggard sleep beneath its sacred beam:
 For their light slumbers gently fum'd away;
 And up they rose as vigorous as the sun,
 Or to the culture of the willing glebe,
 Or to the cheerful tendance of the flock: [sport,
 Meantime the song went round; and dance and Wisdom and friendly talk, successive, stole
 Their hours away; while in the rosy vale
 Love breath'd his infant sighs, from anguish free,
 And full replete with bliss; save the sweet pain,
 That, inly thrilling, but exalts it more.
 Nor yet injurious act, nor surly deed,
 Was known among those happy sons of heaven;
 For reason and benevolence were law.
 Harmonious nature too look'd smiling on.
 Clear shone the skies, cool'd with eternal gales,
 And balmy spirit all. The youthful sun
 Shot his best rays, and still the gracious clouds
 Dropp'd fatness down; as o'er the swelling mead,
 The herds and flocks, commixing, play'd secure.
 This when, emergent from the gloomy wood,
 The glaring lion saw, his horrid heart
 Was meek'd, and he join'd his sullen joy.
 For music held the whole in perfect peace:
 Sigh'd the flute; the tender voice was heard,
 Warbling the varied heart; the woodlands round
 Apply'd their quire; and winds and waters flow'd

In consonance. Such were those prime of days.

But now those white unblemish'd manners, whence

The fabling poets took their golden age,
 Are found no more amid these iron times,
 These dregs of life! Now the distemper'd mind
 Has lost that concord of harmonious powers,
 Which forms the soul of happiness, and all
 Is off the poise within: the passions all
 Have burst their bounds; and reason, half extinct,
 Or impotent, or else approving, sees
 The foul disorder. Senseless, and deform'd,
 Convulsive anger storms at large; or pale,
 And silent, settles into full revenge.
 Base envy withers at another's joy,
 And hates that excellence it cannot reach.
 Desponding fear, of feeble fancies full,
 Weak and unmanly, loosens every power.
 Ev'n love itself is bitterness of soul,
 A pensive anguish pining at the heart;
 Or, sunk to sordid interest, feels no more
 That noble wish, that never-cloy'd desire,
 Which, selfish joy disdaining, seeks alone
 To bless the dearer object of its flame.
 Hope sickens with extravagance; and grief,
 Of life impatient, into madness swells;
 Or in dead silence wastes the weeping hours.
 These, and a thousand mixt emotions more,
 From ever-changing views of good and ill,
 Form'd infinitely various, vex the mind
 With endless storm: whence, deeply rankling,
 The partial thought, a listless unconcern, [grows
 Cold, and averting from our neighbour's good;
 Then dark disgust, and hatred, winding wiles,
 Coward deceit, and ruffian violence;
 At last, extinct each social feeling, fell
 And joyless inhumanity pervades
 And petrifies the heart. Nature disturb'd
 Is deem'd vindictive to have chang'd her course.

Hence, in old dusky time, a deluge came:
 When the deep-cleft disparting orb, that arch'd
 The central waters round, impetuous rush'd,
 With universal burst, into the gulf,
 And o'er the high-pil'd hills of fractur'd earth
 Wide dash'd the waves, in undulation vast;
 Till, from the centre to the streaming clouds,
 A shoreless ocean tumbled round the globe.

The Seasons since have, with severer sway,
 Oppress'd a broken world: the Winter keen
 Shook forth his waste of snows; and Summer shot
 His pestilential heats. Great Spring, before,
 Green'd all the year; and fruits and blossoms
 blush'd,

In social sweetness, on the self-same bough.
 Pure was the temperate air; and even calm
 Perpetual reign'd, save what the zephyrs bland
 Breath'd o'er the blue expanse; for then nor storms

Were taught to blow, nor hurricanes to rage;
 Sound slept the waters; no sulphureous glooms
 Swell'd in the sky, and sent the lightning forth;
 While sickly damps, and cold autumnal fogs,
 Hung not, relaxing, on the springs of life.
 But now, of turbid elements the sport,
 From clear to cloudy tost, from hot to cold,
 And dry to moist, with inward-eating change,
 Our drooping days are dwindled down to nought,
 Their period finish'd ere 'tis well begun.

And yet the wholesome herb neglected dies;
 Though with the pure exhilarating soul
 Of nutriment and health, and vital powers,
 Beyond the search of art, 'tis copious blest.
 For, with hot ravine fir'd, ensanguin'd man
 Is now become the lion of the plain,
 And worse. The wolf, who from the nightly fold
 Fierce drags the bleating prey, ne'er drunk her milk,

Nor wore her warming fleece: nor has the steer,
 At whose strong chest the deadly tiger hangs,
 E'er plough'd for him. They too are temper'd high,
 With hunger stung and wild necessity,
 Nor lodges pity in their shaggy breast.
 But man, whom Nature form'd of milder clay,
 With every kind emotion in his heart,
 And taught alone to weep; while from her lap
 She pours ten thousand delicacies, herbs,
 And fruits, as numerous as the drops of rain
 Or beams that gave them birth: shall he, fair form!
 Who wears sweet smiles, and looks erect on hea-
 E'er stoop to mingle with the prowling herd, [ven,
 And dip his tongue in gore? The beast of prey,
 Blood-stain'd, deserves to bleed: but you, ye flocks,
 What have ye done; ye peaceful people, what,
 To merit death? you, who have given us milk
 In luscious streams, and lent us your own coat
 Against the Winter's cold? And the plain ox,
 That harmless, honest, guileless animal,
 In what has he offended? he, whose toil,
 Patient and ever ready, clothes the land
 With all the pomp of harvest: shall he bleed,
 And struggling groan beneath the cruel hands,
 Ev'n of the clown he feeds? and that, perhaps,
 To swell the riot of th' autumnal feast,
 Won by his labour? Thus the feeling heart
 Would tenderly suggest: but 'tis enough,
 In this late age, adventurous to have touch'd
 Light on the numbers of the Samian sage.
 High Heaven forbids the bold presumptuous strain,
 Whose wisest will has fix'd us in a state
 That must not yet to pure perfection rise.

Now when the first foul torrent of the brooks,
 Swell'd with the vernal rains, is ebb'd away,
 And, whitening, down their mossy tinctur'd stream
 Descends the billowy foam: now is the time,
 While yet the dark brown water aids the guile,
 To tempt the trout. The well-dissembled fly,
 The rod fine-tapering with elastic spring,
 Snatch'd from the hoary steed the floating line,
 And all thy slender wat'ry stores prepare.
 But let not on thy hook the tortur'd worm,
 Convulsive, twist in agonizing folds;
 Which, by rapacious hunger swallow'd deep
 Gives, as you tear it from the bleeding breast
 Of the weak helpless uncomplaining wretch,
 Harsh pain, and horror to the tender hand.

When with his lively ray the potent sun
 Has pierc'd the streams, and rous'd the finny race,
 Then issuing cheerful, to thy sport repair;
 Chief should the western breezes curling play,
 And light o'er ether bear the shadowy clouds.
 High to their fount, this day, amid the hills
 And woodlands warbling round, trace up the brooks;

The next, pursue their rocky-channel'd maze,
 Down to the river, in whose ample wave
 Their little Naiads love to sport at large.

Just in the dubious point, where with the pool
 Is mix'd the trembling stream, or where it boils
 Around the stone, or from the hollow'd bank
 Reverted plays in undulating flow,
 There throw, nice-judging, the delusive fly;
 And as you lead it round in artful curve,
 With eye attentive mark the springing game.
 Strait as above the surface of the flood
 They wanton rise, or urg'd by hunger leap,
 Then fix, with gentle twitch, the barbed hook:
 Some lightly tossing to the grassy bank,
 And to the shelving shore, slow dragging some,
 With various hand proportion'd to their force.
 If yet too young, and easily deceiv'd,
 A worthless prey scarce bends your pliant rod,
 Him, pitious of his youth and the short space
 He has enjoy'd the vital light of heaven,
 Soft disengage, and back into the stream
 The speckled captive throw. But should you lure
 From his dark haunt, beneath the tangled roots
 Of pendent trees, the monarch of the brook,
 Behoves you then to ply your finest art.
 Long time he, following cautious, scans the fly;
 And oft attempts to seize it, but as oft
 The dimpled water speaks his jealous fear.
 At last, while haply o'er the shaded sun
 Passes a cloud, he desperate takes the death,
 With sudden plunge. At once he darts along,
 Deep-struck, and runs out all the lengthen'd line:
 Then seeks the farthest ooze, the sheltering weed,
 The cavern'd bank, his old secure abode;
 And flies aloft, and flounces round the pool,
 Indignant of the guile. With yielding hand,
 That feels him still, yet to his furious course,
 Gives way, you, now retiring, following now,
 Across the stream, exhaust his idle rage:
 Till floating broad upon his breathless side,
 And to his fate abandon'd, to the shore
 You gaily drag your unresisting prize.
 Thus pass the temperate hours: but when the sun
 Shakes from his noon-day throne the scattering
 clouds,

Ev'n shooting listless langour through the deeps:
 Then seek the bank where flowering elders crowd,
 Where scatter'd wild the lily of the vale
 Its balmy essence breathes, where cowslips hang
 The dewy head, where purple violets lurk,
 With all the lowly children of the shade;
 Or lie reclin'd beneath yon spreading ash,
 Hung o'er the steep; whence, borne on liquid wing
 The founding culver shoots; or where the hawk,
 High, in the beetling cliff, his airy builds.
 There let the classic page thy fancy lead
 Through rural scenes; such as the Mantuan swain
 Paints in the matchless harmony of song.
 Or catch thyself the landkip, gliding swift
 Athwart imagination's vivid eye:
 Or by the vocal woods and waters lull'd,
 And lost in lonely musing, in the dream,
 Confus'd, of careless solitude, where mix
 Ten thousand wandering images of things,
 Soothe every gust of passion into peace;
 All but the swellings of the soften'd heart,
 That waken, not disturb, the tranquil mind,
 Behold yon breathing prospect bids the Muse
 Throw all her beauty forth. But who can paint
 Like Nature? Can imagination boast.
 Amid its gay creation, hues like hers?

Or can it mix them with that matchless skill,
And lose them in each other, as appears
In every bud that blows? If fancy then
Unequal fails beneath the pleasing task,
Ah, what shall language do? ah, where find words
Ting'd with so many colours; and whose power,
To life approaching, may perfume my lays
With that fine oil, those aromatic gales
That inexhaustive flow continual round?

Yet, though successful, will the toil delight.
Come then, ye virgins and ye youths, whose hearts
Have felt the raptures of refining love;
And thou, Amanda, come, pride of my song!
Form'd by the Graces, loveliness itself!
Come with those downcast eyes, sedate and sweet,
Those looks demure, that deeply pierce the soul,
Where, with the light of thoughtful reason mix'd,
Shines lively fancy and the feeling heart:
O come! and while the rosy-footed May
Steals blushing on, together let us tread
The morning dews, and gather in their prime
Fresh-blooming flowers, to grace thy braided hair,
And thy lov'd bosom that improves their sweets.

See where the winding vale its lavish stores,
Irriguous, spreads. See, how the lily drinks
The latent rill, scarce oozing through the grass,
Of growth luxuriant; or the humid bank,
In fair profusion, decks. Long let us walk,
Where the breeze blows from yon extended field
Of blossom'd beans. Arabia cannot boast
A fuller gale of joy, than, liberal, thence [soul.
Breathes through the sense, and takes the ravish'd
Nor is the mead unworthy of thy foot,
Full of fresh verdure, and unnumber'd flowers,
The negligence of Nature, wide, and wild;
Where, undisguis'd by mimic art, she spreads
Unbounded beauty to the roving eye.
Here their delicious task the fervent bees,
In swarming millions, tend: around, athwart,
Through the soft air, the busy nations fly,
Cling to the bud, and, with inserted tube,
Suck its pure essence, its ethereal soul;
And oft, with bolder wing, they soaring dare
The purple heath, or where the wild thyme grows,
And yellow load them with the luscious spoil.

At length the finish'd garden to the view
Its vistas opens, and its alleys green.
Snatch'd through the verdant maze, the hurried
Distracted wanders; now the bowery walk [eye
Of covert close, where scarce a speck of day
Falls on the lengthen'd gloom, protracted sweeps:
Now meets the bending sky; the river now
Dimpled along, the breezy ruffled lake,
The forest darkening round, the glittering spire,
Th' ethereal mountain, and the distant main.
But why so far excursive? when at hand,
Along these blushing borders, bright with dew,
And in yon mingled wilderness of flowers,
Fair-handed Spring unbosoms every grace;
Throws out the snow-drop, and the crocus first;
The daisy, primrose, violet darkly blue,
And polyanthus of unnumber'd dyes;
The yellow wall-flower, stain'd with iron-brown;
And lavish stock that scents the garden round:
From the soft wing of vernal breezes shed,
Anemonies; auriculas, enrich'd
With shining meal o'er all their velvet leaves;
And full ranunculas of glowing red.

Then comes the tulip-race, where beauty plays
Her idle freaks; from family diffus'd
To family, as flies the father-dust,
The varied colours run; and, while they break
On the charm'd eye th' exulting florid marks,
With secret pride, the wonders of his hand.
No gradual bloom is wanting; from the bud,
First-born of Spring, to Summer's musky tribes:
Nor hyacinths, of purest virgin white,
Low bent, and blushing inward; nor jonquils
Of potent fragrance; nor narcissus fair,
As o'er the fabled fountain hanging still;
Nor broad carnations, nor gay-spotted pinks;
Nor, shower'd from every bush, the damask-rose.
Infinite numbers, delicacies, smells,
With hues on hues expression cannot paint,
The breath of nature, and her endless bloom.

Hail, Source of Being! Universal soul
Of heaven and earth! Essential Presence, hail!
To Thee I bend the knee; to Thee my thoughts,
Continual, climb; who, with a master-hand,
Hast the great whole into perfection touch'd.
By Thee the various vegetative tribes,
Wrapt in a filmy net, and clad with leaves,
Draw the live ether, and imbibe the dew.
By Thee dispos'd into congenial soils,
Stands each attractive plant, and sucks, and swells
The juicy tide; a twining mass of tubes.
At Thy command the vernal sun awakes
The torpid sap, detruded to the root
By wintry winds; that now in fluent dance,
And lively fermentation, mounting, spreads
All this innumerable-colour'd scene of things.

As rising from the vegetable world
My theme ascends, with equal wing ascend,
My panting muse; and hark, how loud the woods
Invite you forth in all your gayest trim.
Lend me your song, ye nightingales! oh! pour
The mazy-running soul of melody
Into my varied verse! while I deduce,
From the first note the hollow cuckoo sings,
The symphony of Spring, and touch a theme
Unknown to fame, the passion of the groves.

When first the soul of love is sent abroad,
Warm through the vital air, and on the heart
Harmonious seizes, the gay troops begin,
In gallant thought to plume the painted wing;
And try again the long-forgotten strain,
At first faint-warbled. But no sooner grows
The soft infusion prevalent and wide,
Than, all alive, at once their joy o'erflows
In music unconfin'd. Up-springs the lark,
Shrill-voic'd; and loud, the messenger of morn;
Ere yet the shadows fly, he mounted sings
Amid the dawning clouds, and from their haunts
Calls up the tuneful nations. Every copse
Deep-tangled, tree irregular, and bush
Bending with dewy moisture, o'er the heads
Of the coy quirksters that lodge within,
Are prodigal of harmony. The thrush
And wood-lark, o'er the kind-contending throng
Superior heard, run through the sweetest length
Of notes; when listening Philomela deigns
To let them joy, and purposes, in thought
Elate, to make her night excel their day.
The blackbird whistles from the thorny brake;
The mellow bullfinch answers from the grove:
Nor are the linnets, o'er the flowering furze

Pour'd out profusely, silent. Join'd to these Innumerable songsters, in the freshening shade
Of new-sprung leaves, their modulations mix
Mellifluous. The jay, the rook, the daw,
And each harsh pipe, discordant heard alone,
Aid the full concert: while the stock-dove breathes
A melancholy murmur through the whole.

'Tis love creates their melody, and all
This waste of music is the voice of love;
That ev'n to birds, and beasts, the tender arts
Of pleasing teaches. Hence the glossy kind
Try every winning way inventive love
Can dictate, and in courtship to their mates
Pour forth their little souls. First, wide around,
With distant awe, in airy rings they rove,
Endeavouring by a thousand tricks to catch
The cunning, conscious, half-averted glance
Of their regardless charmer. Should she seem
Softening the least approbance to bestow,
Their colours burnish, and, by hope inspir'd
They brisk advance; then, on a sudden struck,
Retire disorder'd; then again approach;
In fond rotation spread the spotted wing,
And shiver every feather with desire.

Connubial leagues agreed, to the deep woods
They haste away, all as their fancy leads,
Pleasure, or food, or secret safety prompts;
That nature's great command may be obey'd:
Nor all the sweet sensations they perceive
Indulg'd in vain. Some to the holly-hedge
Nestling repair, and to the thicket some;
Some to the rude protection of the thorn
Commit their feeble offspring: the cleft tree
Offers its kind concealment to a few,
Their food its insects, and its moss their nests.
Others apart far in the grassy dale,
Or roughening waste, their humble texture weave.
But most in woodland solitudes delight,
In unfrequented glooms, or shaggy banks,
Steep, and divided by a babbling brook,
Whose murmurs soothe them all the live-long day,
When by kind duty fix'd. Among the roots
Of hazel, pendent o'er the plaintive stream,
They frame the first foundation of their domes:
Dry sprigs of trees, in artful fabric laid,
And bound with clay together. Now 'tis nought
But restless hurry through the busy air,
Beat by unnumber'd wings. The swallow sweeps
The slimy pool, to build his hanging house
Intent. And often, from the careless back
Of herds and flocks a thousand tugging bills
Pluck hair and wool; and oft, when unobserv'd,
Steal from the barn a straw: till soft and warm,
Clean, and complete, their habitation grows.

As thus the patient dam assiduous sits,
Not to be tempted from her tender task,
Or by sharp hunger, or by smooth delight,
Though the whole loosen'd spring around her blows.
Her sympathizing lover takes his stand
High on th' opponent bank, and ceaseless sings
The tedious time away: or else supplies
Her place a moment, while she sudden flits
To pick the scanty meal. Th' appointed time
With pious toil fulfil'd, the callow young,
Warm'd and expanded into perfect life,
Their brittle bondage break, and come to light,
A helpless family, demanding food
With constant clamour: O what passions then,

What melting sentiments of kindly care,
On the new parents seize! Away they fly
Affectionate, and undesiring bear
The most delicious morsel to their young;
Which equally distributed, again
The search begins. Ev'n so a gentle pair,
By fortune sunk, but form'd of generous mould,
And charm'd with cares beyond the vulgar breast,
In some lone cot amid the distant woods,
Sustain'd alone by providential heaven,
Oft, as they weeping eye their infant train,
Check their own appetites, and give them all.

Nor toil alone they scorn: exalting love,
By the great Father of the Spring inspir'd,
Gives instant courage to the fearful race,
And to the simple art. With stealthy wing,
Should some rude foot their woody haunts molest,
Amid a neighbouring bush they silent drop,
And whirring thence, as if alarm'd, deceive
Th' unfeeling school-boy. Hence, around the head
Of wandering swain, the white wing'd plover wheels
Her sounding flight, and then directly on
In long excursion skims the level lawn, [hence,
To tempt him from her nest. The wild-duck,
O'er the rough moss, and o'er the trackless waste
The heath-hen flutters, pious fraud! to lead
The hot pursuing spaniel far astray.

Be not the muse asham'd, here to bemoan
Her brothers of the grove, by tyrant man
Inhuman caught, and in the narrow cage
From liberty confin'd, and boundless air.
Dull are the pretty slaves, their plumage dull,
Ragged, and all its brightening lustre lost;
Nor is that sprightly wildness in their notes.
Which, clear and vigorous, warbles from the beech.
O then, ye friends of love and love-taught song,
Spare the soft tribes, this barbarous art forbear;
If on your bosom innocence can win,
Music engage, or piety persuade.

But let not chief the nightingale lament
Her ruin'd care, too delicately fram'd
To brook the harsh confinement of the cage.
Oft when, returning with her loaded bill,
Th' astonish'd mother finds a vacant nest,
By the hard hand of unrelenting clowns
Robb'd, to the ground the vain provision falls;
Her pinions ruffle, and, low-drooping, scarce
Can bear the mourner to the poplar shade;
Where, all abandon'd to despair, she sings
Her sorrows through the night; and, on the bough,
Sole-sitting, still at every dying fall
Takes up again her lamentable strain
Of winding woe; till, wide around, the woods
Sigh to her song, and with her wail resound.

But now the feather'd youth their former bounds,
Ardent, disdain; and, weighing oft their wings,
Demand the free possession of the sky:
This one glad office more, and then dissolves
Parental love at once, now needless grown.
Unlavish'd wisdom never works in vain.
'Tis on some evening, sunny, grateful, mild,
When nought but balm is breathing through the woods,
With yellow lustre bright, that the new tribes
Visit the spacious heavens, and look abroad
On nature's common far as they can see,
Or wing, their range and pasture. O'er the boughs
Dancing about, still at the giddy verge

Their resolution fails; their pinions still,
In loose libration stretch'd, to trust the void
Trembling refuse: till down before them fly
The parent-guides, and chide, exhort, command,
Or push them off. The surging air receives
Its plummy burden; and their self-taught wings
Winnow the waving element. On ground
Alighted, bolder up again they lead,
Farther and farther on, the lengthening flight;
Till, vanish'd every fear, and every power
Rous'd into life and action, light in air
Th' acquitted parents see their soaring race,
And once rejoicing never know them more.

High from the summit of a craggy cliff,
Hung o'er the deep, such as amazing frowns
On utmost * Kilda's shore, whose lonely race
Reign the setting sun to Indian worlds,
The royal eagle draws his vigorous young,
Strong-pounc'd, and ardent with paternal fire.
Now fit to raise a kingdom of their own,
He drives them from his fort, the towering seat,
For ages of his empire; which, in peace,
Unstain'd he holds, while many a league to sea
He wings his course, and preys in distant isles.

Should I my steps turn to the rural seat,
Whose lofty elms, and venerable oaks,
Invite the rook, who high amid the boughs,
In early Spring, his airy city builds,
And ceaseless caws amusive; there, well-pleas'd,
I might the various polity survey
Of the mixt household kind. The careful hen
Calls all her chirping family around,
Fed and defended by the fearless cock;
Whose breast with ardour flames, as on he walks,
Graceful and crows defiance. In the pond,
The finely-chequer'd duck, before her train,
Rows garrulous. The stately-sailing swan
Gives out his snowy plumage to the gale;
And, arching proud his neck, with oary feet
Bears forward fierce, and guards his osier-isle,
Protective of his young. The turkey nigh,
Loud threatening reddens; while the peacock
His every-colour'd glory to the sun, [spreads
And swims in radiant majesty along.
O'er the whole homely scene, the cooing dove
Flies thick in amorous chase, and wanton rolls
The glancing eye, and turns the changeful neck.

While thus the gentle tenants of the shade
Indulge their purer loves, the rougher world
Of brutes, below, rush furious into flame,
And fierce desire. Through all his lusty veins
The bull, deep-scorch'd, the raging passion feels.
Of pasture sick, and negligent of food,
Scarce seen, he wades among the yellow broom,
While o'er his ample side the rambling sprays
Luxuriant shoot; or through the mazy wood
Dejected wanders, nor th' enticing bud
Crops, though it presses on his careless sense.
And oft, in jealous maddening fancy wrapt,
He seeks the fight; and, idly-butting, feigns
His rival gor'd in every knotty trunk.
Him should he meet, the bellowing war begins:
Their eyes flash fury; to the hollow'd earth,
Whence the sand flies, they mutter bloody deeds,
And, groaning deep, th' impetuous battle mix:
While the fair heifer, balmy breathing, near,

* The farthest of the western islands of Scotland.

Stands kindling up their rage. The trembling steed,
With this hot impulse seiz'd in every nerve,
Nor heeds the rein, nor hears the sounding thong;
Blows are not felt; but, tossing high his head,
And by the well-known joy to distant plains
Attracted strong, all wild he bursts away;
O'er rocks, and woods, and craggy mountains flies:
And, neighing, on th' aerial summit takes
Th' exciting gale; then, steep-descending, cleaves
The headlong torrents foaming down the hills,
Ev'n where the madness of the straiten'd stream
Turns in black eddies round; such is the force
With which his frantic heart and sinews swell.

Nor undelighted by the boundless Spring
Are the broad monsters of the foaming deep:
From the deep ooze and gelid cavern rous'd;
They flounce and tumble in unwieldy joy.
Dire were the strain, and dissonant, to sing
The cruel raptures of the savage kind:
How by this flame their native wrath sublim'd,
They roam, amid the fury of their heart,
The far-resounding waste in fiercer bands,
And growl their horrid loves. But this the theme
I sing, enraptur'd, to the British Fair,
Forbids, and leads me to the mountain-brow,
Where sits the shepherd on the grassy turf,
Inhaling, healthful, the descending sun.
Around him feeds his many-bleating flock,
Of various cadence; and his sportive lambs,
This way and that convolv'd, in friskful glee,
Their frolics play. And now the sprightly race
Invites them forth; when swift, the signal given,
They start away, and sweep the massy mound
That runs around the hill; the rampart once
Of iron war, in ancient barbarous times,
When disunited Britain ever bled,
Lost in eternal broil: ere yet she grew
To this deep-laid indissoluble state,
Where wealth and commerce lift their golden heads;
And o'er our labours, liberty and law,
Impartial, watch; the wonder of a world!

What is this mighty breath, ye sages, say,
That in a powerful language, felt, not heard,
Instructs the fowls of heaven; and through their breast

These arts of love diffuses? What, but God?
Inspiring God! who, boundless spirit all,
And unremitting energy, pervades,
Adjusts, sustains, and agitates the whole.
He ceaseless works alone; and yet alone
Seems not to work: with such perfection fram'd
Is this complex stupendous scheme of things.
But, though conceal'd, to every purer eye
Th' informing Author in his works appears:
Chief, lovely Spring, in thee, and thy soft scenes,
The smiling God is seen; while water, earth,
And air, attest his bounty; which exalts
The brute creation to this finer thought,
And annual melts their undesigning hearts
Profusely thus in tenderness and joy.

Still let my song a nobler note assume,
And sing th' infusive force of Spring on man;
When heaven and earth, as if contending, vie
To raise his being, and serene his soul.
Can he forbear to join the general smile
Of nature? Can fierce passions vex his breast,
While every gale is peace, and every grove
Is melody? Hence! from the bounteous walks

Of flowing Spring, ye sordid sons of earth,
 Hard, and unfeeling of another's woe!
 Or only lavish to yourselves; away!
 But come, ye generous minds, in whose wide
 Of all his works, creative bounty burns [thought,
 With warmest beam; and on your open front
 And liberal eye, sits, from his dark retreat
 Inviting modest want. Nor, till invoc'd
 Can restless goodness wait: your active search
 Leaves no cold wintry corner unexplor'd;
 Like silent-working heaven, surprising oft
 The lonely heart with unexpected good.
 For you the roving spirit of the wind
 Blows Spring abroad; for you the teeming clouds
 Descend in gladsome plenty o'er the world;
 And the sun sheds his kindest rays for you,
 Ye flower of human race! In these green days,
 Reviving sickness lifts her languid head:
 Life flows afresh; and young-ey'd health exalts
 The whole creation round. Contentment walks
 The sunny glade, and feels an inward bliss
 Spring o'er his mind, beyond the power of kings
 To purchase. Pure serenity apace
 Induces thought, and contemplation still.
 By swift degrees the love of nature works,
 And warms the bosom; till at last sublim'd
 To rapture, and enthusiastic heat,
 We feel the present Deity, and taste
 The joy of God to see a happy world!
 These are the sacred feelings of thy heart,
 Thy heart inform'd by reason's purer ray,
 O Lyttleton the friend! thy passions thus
 And meditations vary, as at large, [stray'ft;
 Courting the muse, through Hagley Park thou
 Thy British temple! There along the dale,
 With woods o'er-hung, and shagg'd with mossy rocks,
 Whence on each hand the gushing waters play,
 And down the rough cascade white-dashing fall,
 Or gleam in lengthen'd vista through the trees,
 You silent steal: or sit beneath the shade
 Of solemn oaks, that tuft the swelling mounts
 Thrown graceful round by Nature's careless hand,
 And pensive listen to the various voice
 Of rural peace: the herds, the flocks, the birds,
 The hollow-whispering breeze, the plaint of rills,
 That, purling down amid the twisted roots
 Which creep around, their dewy murmurs shake
 On the sooth'd ear. From these abstracted oft,
 You wander through the philosophic world;
 Where in bright train continual wonders rise,
 Or to the curious or the pious eye.
 And oft, conducted by historic truth,
 You tread the long extent of backward time:
 Planning, with warm benevolence of mind,
 And honest zeal unwarp'd by party-rage,
 Britannia's weal; how from the venal gulf
 To raise her virtue, and her arts revive.
 Or, turning thence thy view, these graver thoughts
 The muses charm: while, with sure taste refin'd,
 You draw th' inspiring breath of ancient song;
 Till nobly rises, emulous, thy own.
 Perhaps thy lov'd Lucinda shares thy walk,
 With soul to thine, attun'd. Then nature all
 Wears to the lover's eye a look of love;
 And all the tumult of a guilty world,
 Tost by ungenerous passions, sinks away.
 The tender heart is animated peace;

And as it pours its copious treasures forth;
 In varied converse, softening every theme,
 You, frequent pausing, turn, and from her eyes,
 Where meekness dwells, and amiable grace,
 And lively sweetness dwell, enraptur'd, drink
 That nameless spirit of ethereal joy,
 Unutterable happiness! which love,
 Alone, bestows, and on a favour'd few.
 Meantime you gain the height, from whose fair brow
 The bursting prospect spreads immense around:
 And snatch'd o'er hill and dale, and wood and lawn,
 And verdant field, and darkening heath between,
 And villages embosom'd soft in trees,
 And spiry towns by surging columns mark'd
 Of household smoke, your eye excursive roams:
 Wide-stretching from the hall, in whose kind haunt
 The hospitable genius lingers still,
 To where the broken landscape, by degrees,
 Ascending, roughens into rigid hills;
 O'er which the Cambrian mountains, like far clouds
 That skirt the blue horizon, dusky rise.
 Flush'd by the spirit of the genial year,
 Now from the virgin's cheek a fresher bloom
 Shoots, less and less, the live carnation round;
 Her lips blush deeper sweets; she breathes of youth;
 The shining moisture swells into her eyes,
 In brighter flow; her wishing bosom heaves,
 With palpitations wild; kind tumults seize
 Her veins, and all her yielding soul is love.
 From the keen gaze her lover turns away,
 Full of the dear ecstatic power, and sick
 With sighing languishment. Ah then, ye fair!
 Be greatly cautious of your sliding hearts:
 Dare not th' infectious sigh; the pleading look,
 Downcast, and low, in meek submission dress'd,
 But full of guile. Let not the fervent tongue,
 Prompt to deceive, with adulation smooth,
 Gain on your purpos'd will. Nor in the bower,
 Where woodbines flaunt, and roses shed a couch,
 While evening draws her crimson curtains round,
 Trust your soft minutes with betraying man.
 And let th' aspiring youth beware of love,
 Of the smooth glance beware; for 'tis too late,
 When on his heart the torrent-softness pours.
 Then wisdom prostrate lies, and fading fame
 Dissolves in air away; while the fond soul,
 Wrapt in gay visions of unreal bliss,
 Still paints th' illusive form; the kindling grace;
 Th' enticing smile; the modest-seeming eye,
 Beneath whose beauteous beams, belying heaven,
 Lurk searchless cunning, cruelty, and death:
 And still false-warbling in his cheated ear,
 Her syren voice, enchanting, draws him on
 To guileful shores, and meads of fatal joy.
 Ev'n present, in the very lap of love
 Inglorious laid; while music flows around,
 Perfumes and oils, and wine, and wanton hours;
 Amid the roses fierce repentance rears
 Her shaky crest: a quick returning pang [still,
 Shoots through the conscious heart; where honour
 And great design, against the oppressive load
 Of luxury, by fits, impatient heave.
 But absent, what fantastic woes arousd,
 Rage in each thought, by restless musing fed,
 Chill the warm cheek, and blast the bloom of life?
 Neglected fortune flies; and sliding swift,
 Prone into ruin, fall his scorn'd affairs.

'Tis nought but gloom around : the darken'd sun
 Loses his light. The rosy-bosom'd Spring
 To weeping fancy pines; and yon bright arch,
 Contracted, bends into a dusky vault.
 All nature fades extinct; and she alone
 Heard, felt, and seen, possesses every thought,
 Fills every sense, and pants in every vein.
 Books are but formal dulness, tedious friends;
 And sad amid the social band he sits,
 Lonely, and unattentive. From his tongue
 Th' unfinish'd period falls: while, borne away
 On swelling thought, his waisted spirit flies
 To the vain bosom of his distant fair;
 And leaves the semblance of a lover, fix'd
 In melancholy site, with head declin'd,
 And love-dejected eyes. Sudden he starts,
 Shook from his tender trance, and restless runs
 To glimmering shades, and sympathetic glooms;
 Where the dun umbrage o'er the falling stream,
 Romantic, hangs; there through the pensive dusk
 Strays, in heart-thrilling meditation lost,
 Indulging all to love: or on the bank
 Thrown, amid drooping lilies, swells the breeze
 With sighs unceasing, and the brook with tears.
 Thus in soft anguish he consumes the day,
 Nor quits his deep retirement, till the moon
 Peeps through the chambers of the fleecy east,
 Enlighten'd by degrees, and in her train
 Leads on the gentle hours; then forth he walks,
 Beneath the trembling languish of her beam,
 With soften'd soul, and wooes the bird of eve
 To mingle woes with his: or while the world
 And all the sons of care lie hush'd in sleep,
 Associates with the midnight shadows drear;
 And, sighing to the lonely taper, pours
 His idly-tortur'd heart into the page,
 Meant for the moving messenger of love;
 Where rapture burns on rapture, every line
 With rising frenzy fir'd. But if on bed
 Delirious flung, sleep from his pillow flies,
 All night he tosses, nor the balmy power
 In any posture finds; till the gray morn
 Lifts her pale lustre on the paler wretch,
 Exanimate by love: and then perhaps
 Exhausted nature sinks a while to rest,
 Still interrupted by distracted dreams,
 That o'er the sick imagination rise,
 And in black colours paint the mimic scene.
 Oft with th' enchantress of his soul he talks;
 Sometimes in crowds distress'd; or if retir'd
 To secret winding flower-enwoven bowers,
 Far from the dull impertinence of man,
 Just as he, credulous, his endless cares
 Begins to lose in blind oblivious love,
 Snatch'd from her yielding hand, he knows not how,
 Through forests huge, and long untravel'd heaths
 With desolation brown, he wanders waste,
 In night and tempest wrapt; or shrinks aghast,
 Back, from the bending precipice; or wades
 The turbid stream below, and strives to reach
 The farther shore; where succourless, and sad,
 She with extended arms his aid implores;
 But strives in vain: borne by th' outrageous flood
 To distance down, he rides the ridgy wave,
 Or whelm'd beneath the boiling eddy sinks.

These are the charming agonies of love,
 Whose misery delights. But through the heart
 Should jealousy its venom once diffuse,

'Tis then delightful misery no more,
 But agony unmix'd, incessant gall,
 Corroding every thought, and blasting all
 Love's paradise. Ye fairy prospects, then,
 Ye beds of roses, and ye bowers of joy,
 Farewell! Ye gleamings of departed peace,
 Shine out your last! The yellow-tinging plague
 Internal vision taints, and in a night
 Of livid gloom imagination wraps.
 Ah, then! instead of love-enliven'd cheeks,
 Of sunny features, and of ardent eyes
 With flowing rapture bright, dark looks succeed,
 Suffus'd and glaring with untender fire;
 A clouded aspect, and a burning cheek,
 Where the whole poison'd soul, malignant, sits,
 And frightens love away. Ten thousand fears
 Invented wild, ten thousand frantic views
 Of horrid rivals, hanging on the charms
 For which he melts in fondness, eat him up
 With fervent anguish, and consuming rage.
 In vain reproaches lend their idle aid,
 Deceitful pride, and resolution frail,
 Giving false peace a moment. Fancy pours,
 Afresh, her beauties on his busy thought,
 Her first endearments twining round the soul,
 With all the witchcraft of ensnaring love.
 Straight the fierce storm involves his mind anew,
 Flames through the nerves, and boils along the veins;
 While anxious doubt distracts the tortur'd heart:
 For ev'n the sad assurance of his fears
 Were ease to what he feels. Thus the warm youth,
 Whom love deludes into his thorny wilds,
 Through flowery-tempting paths, or leads a life
 Of fever'd rapture, or of cruel care;
 His brightest flames extinguish'd all, and all
 His lively moments running down to waste.

But happy they! the happiest of their kind!
 Whom gentler stars unite, and in one fate
 Their hearts, their fortunes, and their beings blend.
 'Tis not the coarser tie of human laws,
 Unnatural oft, and foreign to the mind,
 That binds their peace, but harmony itself,
 Attuning all their passions into love;
 Where friendship full-exerts her softest power,
 Perfect esteem enliven'd by desire
 Ineffable, and sympathy of soul;
 Thought meeting thought, and will preventing will,
 With boundless confidence: for nought but love
 Can answer love, and render bliss secure.
 Let him, ungenerous, who, alone intent
 To bliss himself, from sordid parents buys
 The loathing virgin, in eternal care,
 Well-merited, consume his nights and days:
 Let barbarous nations, whose inhuman love
 Is wild desire, fierce as the suns they feel;
 Let eastern tyrants, from the light of heaven
 Seclude their bosom-slaves, meanly possess'd
 Of a mere, lifeless, violated form:
 While those whom love cements in holy faith,
 And equal transport, free as nature live,
 Disdaining fear. What is the world to them,
 Its pomp, its pleasure, and its nonsense all!
 Who in each other clasp whatever fair
 High fancy forms, and lavish hearts can wish;
 Something than beauty dearer, should they look
 Or on the mind, or mind-illumin'd face;
 Truth, goodness, honour, harmony, and love,
 The richest bounty of indulgent heaven.

Meantime a smiling offspring rises round,
 And mingles both their graces. By degrees,
 The human blossom blows; and every day,
 Soft as it rolls along, shows some new charm,
 The father's lustre, and the mother's bloom.
 Then infant reason grows apace, and calls
 For the kind hand of an assiduous care:
 Delightful task! to rear the tender thought,
 To teach the young idea how to shoot,
 To pour the fresh instruction o'er the mind,
 To breathe th' enlivening spirit, and to fix
 The generous purpose in the glowing breast.
 Oh, speak the joy! ye, whom the sudden tear
 Surprises often, while you look around,
 And nothing strikes your eye but sights of bliss,
 All various nature pressing on the heart:

An elegant sufficiency, content,
 Retirement, rural quiet, friendship, books,
 Ease and alternate labour, useful life,
 Progressive virtue, and approving heaven.
 These are the matchless joys of virtuous love;
 And thus their moments fly. The Seasons thus,
 As ceaseless round a jarring world they roll,
 Still find them happy; and consenting Spring
 Sheds her own rosy garland on their heads:
 Till evening comes at last, serene and mild;
 When, after the long vernal day of life,
 Enamour'd more, as more remembrance swells
 With many a proof of recollected love,
 Together down they sink in social sleep;
 Together freed, their gentle spirits fly
 To scenes where love and bliss immortal reign.

S U M M E R. 1727.

The Argument.

The subject proposed. Invocation. Address to Mr. Doddington. An introductory reflection on the motion of the heavenly bodies; whence the succession of the Seasons. As the face of nature in this Season is almost uniform, the progress of the poem is a description of a Summer's day. The dawn. Sun-rising. Hymn to the sun. Forenoon. Summer insects described. Hay-making. Sheep-shearing. Noon-day. A woodland retreat. Groupe of herds and flocks. A solemn grove: how it affects a contemplative mind. A cataract, and rude scene. View of Summer in the torrid zone. Storm of thunder and lightning. A tale. The storm over, a serene afternoon. Bathing. Hour of walking. Transition to the prospect of a rich well-cultivated country; which introduces a panegyric on Great Britain. Sun-set. Evening. Night. Summer meteors. A comet. The whole concluding with the praise of philosophy.

From brightening fields of ether fair disclos'd,
 Child of the sun, resurgent Summer comes,
 In pride of youth, and felt through nature's depth:
 He comes attended by the sultry hours,
 And ever-fanning breezes, on his way;
 While, from his ardent look, the turning Spring
 Averts her blushful face; and earth, and skies,
 All-smiling, to his hot dominion leaves.

Hence, let me haste into the mid-wood shade,
 Where scarce a sun-beam wanders through the gloom;

And on the dark-green grass, beside the brink
 Of haunted stream, that by the roots of oak
 Rolls o'er the rocky channel, lie at large,
 And sing the glories of the circling year.

Come, inspiration! from thy hermit-seat,
 By mortal seldom found: may fancy dare,
 From thy fix'd serious eye, and raptur'd glance
 Shot on surrounding heaven, to steal one look
 Creative of the poet, every power
 Exalting to an ecstasy of soul.

And thou, my youthful muse's early friend,
 In whom the human graces all unite:
 Pure light of mind, and tenderness of heart;
 Genius, and wisdom; the gay social sense,
 By decency chastis'd; goodness and wit,
 In seldom-meeting harmony combin'd;
 Unblemish'd honour, and an active zeal
 For Britain's glory, liberty, and man:
 O Doddington! attend my rural song,

Stoop to my theme, inspire every line,
 And teach me to deserve thy just applause.

With what an awful world-revolving power
 Were first th' unwieldy planets launch'd along
 Th' illimitable void! Thus to remain,
 Amid the flux of many thousand years,
 That oft has swept the toiling race of men,
 And all their labour'd monuments away.
 Firm, unremitting, matchless, in their course;
 To the kind-temper'd change of night and day,
 And of the seasons ever stealing round,
 Minutely faithful: Such th' all-perfect hand!
 That pois'd, impels, and rules the steady whole.

When now no more th' alternate twins are fir'd,
 And Cancer reddens with the solar blaze,
 Short is the doubtful empire of the night;
 And soon, observant of approaching day,
 The meek-ey'd morn appears, mother of dews;
 At first faint-gleaming in the dappled east:
 Till far o'er ether spreads the widening glow;
 And, from before the lustre of her face,
 White break the clouds away. With quicken'd step,
 Brown night retires: Young day pours in apace,
 And opens all the lawny prospect wide.
 The dripping rock, the mountain's misty top
 Swell on the sight, and brighten with the dawn.
 Blue, through the dusk, the smoking currents shine;
 And from the bladed field the fearful hare
 Limp, awkward; while along the forest-glade
 The wild deer trip, and often turning gaze

At early passenger. Music awakes
The native voice of undissembled joy;
And thick around the woodland hymns arise.
Rous'd by the cock, the soon clad shepherd leaves
His mossy cottage, where with peace he dwells;
And from the crowded fold, in order, drives
His flock, to taste the verdure of the morn.

Falsely luxurious, will not man awake;
And, springing from the bed of sloth, enjoy
The cool, the fragrant, and the silent hour,
To meditation due and sacred song?
For is there aught in sleep can charm the wise?
To lie in dead oblivion, losing half
The fleeting moments of too short a life;
Total extinction of th' enlighten'd soul!
Or else to feverish vanity alive,
Wilder'd, and tossing through distemper'd dreams?
Who would in such a gloomy state remain
Longer than nature craves; when every muse
And every blooming pleasure wait without,
To bless the wildly devious morning walk?

But yonder comes the powerful king of day,
Rejoicing in the east. The lessening cloud,
The kingling azure, and the mountain's brow
Illum'd with fluid gold, his near approach
Betoken glad. Lo; now, apparent all,
Aslant the dew-bright earth, and colour'd air,
He looks in boundless majesty abroad;
And sheds the shining day, that burnish'd plays
On rocks, and hills, and towers, and wandering streams,

High-gleaming from afar. Prime cheerer light!
Of all material beings first, and best!
Efflux divine! nature's resplendent robe!
Without whose vesting beauty all were wrapt
In unessential gloom; and thou, O sun!
Soul of surrounding worlds! in whom best seen
Shines out thy Maker! may I sing of thee?

'Tis by thy secret, strong, attractive force,
As with a chain indissoluble bound,
Thy system rolls entire; from the far bourne
Of utmost Saturn, wheeling wide his round
Of thirty years; to Mercury, whose disk
Can scarce be caught by philosophic eye,
Lost in the near effulgence of thy blaze.

Informer of the planetary train! [orbs
Without whose quickening glance their cumbrous
Were brute unlovely mafs, inert and dead,
And not, as now, the green abodes of life!
How many forms of being wait on thee!
Inhaling spirit; from th' unfetter'd mind,
By thee sublim'd, down to the daily race,
The mixing myriads of thy setting beam.

The vegetable world is also thine,
Parent of Seasons! who the pomp precede
That waits thy throne, as through thy vast domain,
Annual, along the bright ecliptic road,
In world-rejoicing state, it moves sublime.
Meantime th' expecting nations, circled gay
With all the various tribes of foodful earth,
Implore thy bounty, or send grateful up
A common hymn: while, round thy beaming car,
High-seen, the Seasons lead, in sprightly dance
Harmonious knit, the rosy-finger'd hours,
The zephyrs floating loose, the timely rains,
Of bloom ethereal the light-footed dews,
And soften'd into joy the surly storms.
These, in successive turn, with lavish hand,

Shower every beauty, every fragrance shower,
Herbs, flowers, and fruits; till, kindling at thy touch,
From land to land is flush'd the vernal year.

Nor to the surface of enliven'd earth,
Graceful with hills and dales, and leafy woods,
Her liberal treasures, is thy force confin'd:
But to the bowel'd cavern darting deep,
The mineral kinds confess thy mighty power.
Effulgent, hence the veiny marble shines;
Hence labour draws his tools; hence burnish'd war
Gleams on the day; the nobler works of peace
Hence bless mankind, and generous commerce binds
The round of nations in a golden chain.

Th' unfruitful rock itself, impregn'd by thee,
In dark retirement forms the lucid stone.
The lively diamond drinks thy purest rays,
Collected light, compact; that, polish'd bright,
And all its native lustre let abroad,
Dares, as it sparkles on the fair-one's breast,
With vain ambition emulate her eyes.
At thee the ruby lights its deepening glow,
And with a waving radiance inward flames.
From thee the sapphire, solid ether, takes
Its hue cerulean; and, of evening tinct,
The purple-streaming amethyst is thine.
With thy own smile the yellow topaz burns,
Nor deeper verdure dyes the robe of Spring,
When first she gives it to the southern gale,
Than the green emerald shows. But, all combin'd,
Thick through the whitening opal play thy beams;
Or, flying several from its surface, form
A trembling variance of revolving hues,
As the site varies in the gazer's hand.

The very dead creation, from thy touch,
Assumes a mimic life. By thee refin'd,
In brighter mazes the reluctant stream
Plays o'er the mead. The precipice abrupt,
Projecting horror on the blacken'd flood,
Softens at thy return. The desert joys
Wildly, through all his melancholy bounds
Rude ruins glitter; and the briny deep,
Seen from some pointed promontory's top,
Far to the blue horizon's utmost verge,
Restless, reflects a floating gleam. But this,
And all the much-transported muse can sing,
Are to thy beauty, dignity, and use,
Unequal far; great delegated source
Of light, and life, and grace, and joy below!

How shall I then attempt to sing of him!
Who, light himself, in uncreated light
Invested deep, dwells awefully retir'd
From mortal eye, or angel's purer ken;
Whose single smile has, from the first of time,
Fill'd, o'erflowing, all those lamps of heaven,
That beam for ever through the boundless sky:
But, should he hide his face, th' astonish'd sun,
And all th' extinguish'd stars, would loosening reel
Wide from their spheres, and Chaos come again.

And yet was every faltering tongue of man,
Almighty Father! silent in thy praise,
Thy works themselves would raise a general voice,
Ev'n in the depth of solitary woods
By human foot untrod; proclaim thy power,
And to the quire celestial thee resound,
Th' eternal cause, support, and end of all!

To me be nature's volume broad-display'd;
And to peruse its all-instructing page,
Or, haply catching inspiration thence,

Some easy passage, raptur'd, to translate,
My sole delight; as through the falling glooms
Pensive I stray, or with the rising dawn
On fancy's eagle-wing excursive soar.

Now, flaming up the heavens, the potent sun
Melts into limpid air the high-rais'd clouds,
And morning fogs, that hover'd round the hills
In party-colour'd bands; till wide unveil'd
The face of nature shines, from where earth seems,
Far stretch'd around, to meet the bending sphere.

Half in a blush of clustering roses lost,
Dew-drooping coolness to the shade retires;
There, on the verdant turf, or flowery bed,
By gelid founts and careless rills to muse;
While tyrant heat, disspreading through the sky,
With rapid sway, his burning influence darts
On man, and beast, and herb, and tepid stream.

Who can unpitying see the flowery race,
Shed by the morn, their new-flush'd bloom resign,
Before the parching beam? So fade the fair,
When fevers revel through their azure veins.
But one, the lofty follower of the sun,
Sad when he sits, shuts up her yellow leaves,
Drooping all night; and, when he warm returns,
Points her enamour'd bosom to his ray.

Home, from his morning task, the swain retreats;
His flock before him stepping to the fold:
While the full-udder'd mother lows around
The cheerful cottage, then expecting food,
The food of innocence and health! The daw,
The rook and magpie, to the grey-grown oaks,
That the calm village in their verdant arms,
Sheltering, embrace, direct their lazy flight;
Where on the mingling boughs they sit embower'd,
All the hot noon, till cooler hours arise.
Faint, underneath, the household fowls convene;
And, in a corner of the buzzing shade,
The house-dog, with the vacant greyhound, lies,
Out-stretch'd, and sleepy. In his slumbers, one
Attacks the nightly thief, and one exults
O'er hill and dale; till, waken'd by the wasp,
They starting snap. Nor shall the muse disdain
To let the little noisy summer-race
Live in her lay, and flutter through her song:
Not mean, though simple; to the sun ally'd,
From him they draw their animating fire.

Wak'd by his warmer ray, the reptile young
Come wing'd abroad; by the light air upborn,
Lighter, and full of soul. From every chink,
And secret corner, where they slept away
The wintry storms; or rising from their tombs,
To higher life; by myriads, forth at once,
Swarming they pour; of all the vary'd hues
Their beauty-beaming parent can disclose.
Ten thousand forms! ten thousand different tribes!
People the blaze. To sunny waters some
By fatal instinct fly; where on the pool
They, sportive, wheel; or, sailing down the stream,
Are snatch'd immediate by the quick-ey'd trout,
Or darting salmon. Through the green-wood glade
Some love to stray; there lodg'd, amus'd and fed,
In the fresh leaf. Luxurious, others make
The meads their choice, and visit every flower,
And every latent herb: for the sweet task,
To propagate their kinds, and where to wrap,
In what soft beds, their young yet undisclos'd,
Employs their tender care. Some to the house,
The fold, and dairy, hungry, bend their flight;

Sip round the pail, or taste the curdling cheese;
Oft, inadvertent, from the milky stream
They meet their fate; or, weltering in the bowl,
With powerless wings around them wrapt, expire.

But chief to heedless flies the window proves
A constant death; where, gloomily retir'd,
The villain spider lives, cunning, and fierce,
Mixture abhorr'd! Amid a mangled heap
Of carcases, in eager watch he sits,
O'erlooking all his waving snares around.
Near the dire cell the dreadful wanderer oft
Passes, as oft the ruffian shows his front;
The prey at last ensnar'd, he dreadful darts,
With rapid glide, along the leaning line;
And, fixing in the wretch his cruel fangs, [wing
Strikes backward, grimly pleas'd: the fluttering
And shriller sound declare extreme distress,
And ask the helping hospitable hand.

Resounds the living surface of the ground:
Nor undelightful is the ceaseless hum,
To him who muses through the woods at noon:
Or drowsy shepherd, as he lies reclin'd,
With half-shut eyes, beneath the floating shade
Of willows gray, close-crowding o'er the book.

Gradual, from these what numerous kinds descend,
Evading ev'n the microscopic eye! [scend,
Full Nature swarms with life; one wondrous mass
Of animals, or atoms organiz'd,
Waiting the vital Breath, when Parent-Heaven
Shall bid his spirit blow. The hoary fen,
In putrid steams, emits the living cloud
Of pestilence. Through subterranean cells,
Where searching sun-beams scarce can find a way,
Earth animated heaves. The flowery leaf
Wants not its soft inhabitants. Secure,
Within its winding citadel, the stone
Holds multitudes. But chief the forest-boughs,
That dance unnumber'd to the playful breeze,
The downy orchard, and the melting pulp
Of mellow fruit, the nameless nations feed
Of evanescent insects. Where the pool
Stands mantled o'er with green, invisible,
Amid the floating verdure millions stray.
Each liquid too, whether it pierces, soothes,
Inflames, refreshes, or exalts the taste,
With various forms abounds. Nor is the stream
Of purest crystal, nor the lucid air,
Though one transparent vacancy it seems,
Void of their unseen people. These, conceal'd
By the kind art of forming Heaven, escape
The grosser eye of man: for, if the worlds
In worlds enclos'd should on his senses burst,
From cates ambrosial, and the nectar'd bowl,
He would abhorrent turn; and in dead night,
When silence sleeps o'er all, be stunn'd with noise

Let no presuming impious railer tax
Creative Wisdom, as if aught was form'd
In vain, or not for admirable ends.
Shall little haughty ignorance pronounce
His works unwise, of which the finallest part
Exceeds the narrow vision of her mind?
As if upon a full-proportion'd dome,
On swelling columns heav'd, the pride of art!
A critic-fly, whose feeble ray scarce spreads
An inch around, with blind presumption bold,
Should dare to tax the structure of the whole.
And lives the man whose universal eye
Has swept at once th' unbounded scheme of things;

Mark'd their dependence so, and firm accord,
As with unfaltering accent to conclude
That this availeth nought? Has any seen
The mighty chain of beings, lessening down
From Infinite Perfection to the brink
Of dreary nothing, desolate abyss!
From which astonish'd thought, recoiling, turns?
Till then alone let zealous praise ascend,
And hymns of holy wonder, to that Power
Whose wisdom shines as lovely on our minds,
As on our smiling eyes his servant sun.

Thick in yon stream of light, a thousand ways,
Upward, and downward, thwarting, and convolv'd,
The quivering nations sport; till, tempest-wing'd,
Fierce Winter sweeps them from the face of day.
Ev'n so luxurious men, unheeding, pass
An idle summer life in fortune's shine,
A season's glitter! Thus they flutter on
From toy to toy, from vanity to vice;
Till, blown away by death, oblivion comes
Behind, and strikes them from the book of life.

Now swarms the village o'er the jovial mead:
The rustic youth, brown with meridian toil,
Healthful and strong; full as the summer rose
Blown by prevailing suns, the ruddy maid,
Half naked, swelling on the sight, and all
Her kindled graces, burning on her cheek.
Ev'n stooping age is here: and infant hands
Trail the long rake, or, with the fragrant load
O'ercharg'd, amid the kind oppression roll.
Wide flies the tedded grain; all in a row
Advancing broad, or wheeling round the field,
They spread their breathing harvest to the sun,
That throws refreshful round a rural smell:
Or, as they rake the green-appearing ground,
And drive the dusky wave along the mead,
The russet hay-cock rises thick behind,
In order gay. While, heard from dale to dale,
Waking the breeze, resounds the blended voice
Of happy labour, love, and social glee.

Or rushing thence, in one diffusive band,
They drive the troubled flocks, by many a dog
Compell'd, to where the mazy-running brook
Forms a deep pool; this bank abrupt and high,
And that fair spreading in a pebbled shore.
Urg'd to the giddy brink, much is the toil
The clamour much, of men, and boys, and dogs,
 Ere the soft fearful people to the flood
Commit their woolly fides. And oft the swain,
On some impatient seizing, hurls them in:
Embolden'd then, nor hesitating more,
Fast, fast, they plunge amid the flashing wave,
And panting labour to the farthest shore.
Repeated this, till the deep well-wash'd fleece
Has drunk the flood, and from his lively haunt
The trout is banish'd by the fordid stream;
Heavy, and dripping, to the breezy brow
Slow move the harmless race; where, as they spread
Their swelling treasures to the sunny ray,
Inly disturb'd, and wond'ring what this wild
Outrageous tumult means, their loud complaints
The country fill; and, toss'd from rock to rock,
Incessant bleatings run around the hills.
At last, of snowy white, the gather'd flocks
Are in the wattled pen innumerable press'd,
Head above head: and, rang'd in lusty rows,
The shepherds sit, and whet the sounding shears.
The housewife waits to roll her fleecy stores,

VOL. IX.

With all her gay-drest maids attending round.
One, chief in gracious dignity enthron'd,
Shines o'er the rest, the pastoral queen, and rays
Her smiles, sweet-beaming, on her shepherd-king;
While the glad circle round them yield their souls
To festive mirth, and wit that knows no gall.
Meantime, their joyous task goes on apace:
Some mingling stir the melted tar, and some,
Deep on the new-shorn vagrant's heaving-side,
To stamp his master's cypher ready stand;
Others th' unwilling wether drag along;
And, glorying in his might, the sturdy boy
Holds by the twisted horns th' indignant ram.
Behold where bound, and of its robe bereft,
By needy man, that all-depending lord,
How meek, how patient, the mild creature lies!
What softness in its melancholy face,
What dumb complaining innocence appears!
Fear not, ye gentle tribes, 'tis not the knife
Of horrid slaughter that is o'er you wav'd;
No, 'tis the tender swain's well-guided shears,
Who having now, to pay his annual care,
Borrow'd your fleece, to you a cumbrous load,
Will send you bounding to your hills again.

A simple scene! yet hence Britannia sees
Her solid grandeur rise: hence she commands
Th' exalted stores of every brighter clime,
The treasures of the sun without his rage:
Hence, fervent all, with culture, toil, and arts,
Wide glows her land: her dreadful thunder hence
Rides o'er the waves sublime, and now, ev'n now,
Impending hangs o'er Gallia's humbled coast;
Hence rules the circling deep, and awes the world.

'Tis raging noon; and, vertical, the sun
Darts on the head direct his forceful rays.
O'er heaven and earth, far as the ranging eye
Can sweep, a dazzling deluge reigns; and all
From pole to pole is undistinguish'd blaze.
In vain the sight, dejected to the ground,
Stoops for relief; thence hot-ascending steams,
And keen reflection pain. Deep to the root
Of vegetation parch'd, the cleaving fields
And slippery lawn an arid hue disclose,
Blast fancy's bloom, and wither ev'n the soul.
Echo no more returns the cheerful sound
Of sharpening scythe: the mower sinking heaps
O'er him the humid hay, with flowers perfum'd;
And scarce a chirping grass-hopper is heard
Through the dumb mead. Distressful nature pants.
The very streams look languid from afar;
Or, through the unshelter'd glade, impatient seem
To hurl into the covert of the grove.

All-conquering heat, oh, intermit thy wrath!
And on my throbbing temples potent thus
Beam not so fierce! Incessant still you flow,
And still another fervent flood succeeds,
Pour'd on the head profuse. In vain I sigh,
And restless turn, and look around for night;
Night is far off, and hotter hours approach.
Thrice happy he! who, on the sunless side
Of a romantic mountain, forest-crown'd,
Beneath the whole collected shade reclines:
Or in the gelid caverns, woodbine-wrought,

Sits coolly calm; while all the world without,
Unsatisfied and sick, tosses in noon:

N

Some easy passage, raptur'd, to translate,
My sole delight; as through the falling glooms
Pensive I stray, or with the rising dawn
On fancy's eagle-wing excursive soar.

Now, flaming up the heavens, the potent sun
Melts into limpid air the high-raised clouds,
And morning fogs, that hover'd round the hills
In party-colour'd bands; till wide unveil'd
The face of nature shines, from where earth seems,
Far stretch'd around, to meet the bending sphere.

Half in a blush of clustering roses lost,
Dew-drooping coolness to the shade retires;
There, on the verdant turf, or flowery bed,
By gelid founts and careless rills to muse;
While tyrant heat, disspreading through the sky,
With rapid sway, his burning influence darts
On man, and beast, and herb, and tepid stream.

Who can un pitying see the flowery race,
Shed by the morn, their new-flush'd bloom resign,
Before the parching beam? So fade the fair,
When fevers revel through their azure veins.
But ore, the lofty follower of the sun,
Sad when he sits, shuts up her yellow leaves,
Drooping all night; and, when he warm returns,
Points her enamour'd bosom to his ray.

Home, from his morning task, the swain retreats;
His flock before him stepping to the fold:
While the full-udder'd mother lows around
The cheerful cottage, then expecting food,
The food of innocence and health! The daw,
The rook and magpie, to the grey-grown oaks,
That the calm village in their verdant arms,
Sheltering, embrace, direct their lazy flight;
Where on the mingling boughs they sit embower'd,
All the hot noon, till cooler hours arise.
Faint, underneath, the household fowls convene;
And, in a corner of the buzzing shade,
The house-dog, with the vacant greyhound, lies,
Out-stretch'd, and sleepy. In his slumbers, one
Attacks the nightly thief, and one exults
O'er hill and dale; till, waken'd by the wasp,
They starting snap. Nor shall the muse disdain
To let the little noisy summer-race
Live in her lay, and flutter through her song:
Not mean, though simple; to the sun ally'd,
From him they draw their animating fire.

Wak'd by his warmer ray, the reptile young
Come wing'd abroad; by the light air upborn,
Lighter, and full of soul. From every chink,
And secret corner, where they slept away
The wintry storms; or rising from their tombs,
To higher life; by myriads, forth at once,
Swarming they pour; of all the vary'd hues
Their beauty-beaming parent can disclose.
Ten thousand forms! ten thousand different tribes!
People the blaze. To sunny waters some
By fatal instinct fly; where on the pool
They, sportive, wheel; or, sailing down the stream,
Are snatch'd immediate by the quick-ey'd trout,
Or darting salmon. Through the green-wood glade
Some love to stray; there lodg'd, amus'd and fed,
In the fresh leaf. Luxurious, others make
The meads their choice, and visit every flower,
And every latent herb: for the sweet task,
To propagate their kinds, and where to wrap,
In what soft beds, their young yet undisclos'd,
Employs their tender care. Some to the house,
The fold, and dairy, hungry, bend their flight;

Sip round the pail, or taste the curdling cheese;
Oft, inadvertent, from the milky stream
They meet their fate; or, weltering in the bowl,
With powerless wings around them wrapt, expire.

But chief to heedless flies the window proves
A constant death; where, gloomily retir'd,
The villain spider lives, cunning, and fierce,
Mixture abhorr'd! Amid a mangled heap
Of carcases, in eager watch he sits,
O'erlooking all his waving snares around.
Near the dire cell the dreadful wanderer oft
Passes, as oft the ruffian shows his front;
The prey at last ensnar'd, he dreadful darts,
With rapid glide, along the leaning line;
And, fixing in the wretch his cruel fangs, [wing
Strikes backward, grimly pleas'd: the fluttering
And shriller sound declare extreme distress,
And ask the helping hospitable hand.

Resounds the living surface of the ground:
Nor undelightful is the ceaseless hum,
To him who muses through the woods at noon:
Or drowsy shepherd, as he lies reclin'd,
With half-shut eyes, beneath the floating shade
Of willows gray, close-crowding o'er the book.

Gradual, from these what numerous kinds de-
Evading ev'n the microscopic eye! [scend,
Full Nature swarms with life; one wondrous mass
Of animals, or atoms organiz'd,
Waiting the vital Breath, when Parent-Heaven
Shall bid his spirit blow. The hoary fen,
In putrid steams, emits the living cloud
Of pestilence. Through subterranean cells,
Where searching sun-beams scarce can find a way,
Earth animated heaves. The flowery leaf
Wants not its soft inhabitants. Secure,
Within its winding citadel, the stone
Holds multitudes. But chief the forest-boughs,
That dance unnumber'd to the playful breeze,
The downy orchard, and the melting pulp
Of mellow fruit, the nameless nations feed
Of evanescent insects. Where the pool
Stands mantled o'er with green, invisible,
Amid the floating verdure millions stray.
Each liquid too, whether it pierces, soothes,
Inflames, refreshes, or exalts the taste,
With various forms abounds. Nor is the stream
Of purest crystal, nor the lucid air,
Though one transparent vacancy it seems,
Void of their unseen people. These, conceal'd
By the kind art of forming Heaven, escape
The grosser eye of man: for, if the worlds
In worlds enclos'd should on his senses burst,
From cates ambrosial, and the nectar'd bowl,
He would abhorrent turn; and in dead night,
When silence sleeps o'er all, be stunn'd with noise.

Let no presuming impious railer tax
Creative Wisdom, as if aught was form'd
In vain, or not for admirable ends.
Shall little haughty ignorance pronounce
His works unwise, of which the smallest part
Exceeds the narrow vision of her mind?
As if upon a full-proportion'd dome,
On swelling columns heav'd, the pride of art!
A critic-fly, whose feeble ray scarce spreads
An inch around, with blind presumption bold,
Should dare to tax the structure of the whole.
And lives the man whose universal eye
Has swept at once th' unbounded scheme of things;

Mark'd their dependance so, and firm accord,
As with unfaltering accent to conclude
That this availeth nought? Has any seen
The mighty chain of beings, lessening down
From Infinite Perfection to the brink
Of dreary nothing, desolate abyss!
From which astonish'd thought, recoiling, turns?
Till then alone let zealous praise ascend,
And hymns of holy wonder, to that Power
Whose wisdom shines as lovely on our minds,
As on our smiling eyes his servant sun.

Thick in yon stream of light, a thousand ways,
Upward, and downward, thwarting, and convolv'd,
The quivering nations sport; till, tempest-wing'd,
Fierce Winter sweeps them from the face of day.
Ev'n so luxurious men, unheeding, pass
An idle summer life in fortune's shine,
A season's glitter! Thus they flutter on
From toy to toy, from vanity to vice;
Till, blown away by death, oblivion comes
Behind, and strikes them from the book of life.

Now swarms the village o'er the jovial mead:
The rustic youth, brown with meridian toil,
Healthful and strong; full as the summer rose
Blown by prevailing suns, the ruddy maid,
Half naked, swelling on the sight, and all
Her kindled graces, burning on her cheek.
Ev'n a stooping age is here: and infant hands
Trail the long rake, or, with the fragrant load
O'ercharg'd, amid the kind oppression roll.
Wide flies the tedded grain; all in a row
Advancing broad, or wheeling round the field,
They spread their breathing harvest to the sun,
That throws refreshful round a rural smell:
Or, as they rake the green-appearing ground,
And drive the dusky wave along the mead,
The russet hay-cock rises thick behind,
In order gay. While, heard from dale to dale,
Waking the breeze, resounds the blended voice
Of happy labour, love, and social glee.

Or rushing thence, in one diffusive band,
They drive the troubled flocks, by many a dog
Compell'd, to where the mazy-running brook
Forms a deep pool; this bank abrupt and high,
And that fair spreading in a pebbled shore.
Urg'd to the giddy brink, much is the toil
The clamour much, of men, and boys, and dogs,
Ere the soft fearful people to the flood
Commit their woolly fides. And oft the swain,
On some impatient seizing, hurls them in:
Embolden'd then, nor hesitating more,
Fast, fast, they plunge amid the flashing wave,
And panting labour to the farthest shore.
Repeated this, till the deep well-wash'd fleece
Has drunk the flood, and from his lively haunt
The trout is banish'd by the fordid stream;
Heavy, and dripping, to the breezy brow
Slow move the harmless race; where, as they spread
Their swelling treasures to the sunny ray,
Inly disturb'd, and wond'ring what this wild
Outrageous tumult means, their loud complaints
The country fill; and, toss'd from rock to rock,
Incessant bleatings run around the hills.
At last, of snowy white, the gather'd flocks
Are in the wattled pen innumerable press'd,
Head above head: and, rang'd in lusty rows,
The shepherds sit, and whet the sounding shears.
The housewife waits to roll her fleecy stores,

VOL. IX.

With all her gay-drest maids attending round.
One, chief in gracious dignity enthron'd,
Shines o'er the rest, the pastoral queen, and rays
Her smiles, sweet-beaming, on her shepherd-king;
While the glad circle round them yield their souls
To festive mirth, and wit that knows no gall.
Meantime, their joyous task goes on apace:
Some mingling stir the melted tar, and some,
Deep on the new-shorn vagrant's heaving-side,
To stamp his master's cypher ready stand;
Others th' unwilling wether drag along;
And, glorying in his might, the sturdy boy
Holds by the twisted horns th' indignant ram.
Behold where bound, and of its robe bereft,
By needy man, that all-depending lord,
How meek, how patient, the mild creature lies!
What softness in its melancholy face,
What dumb complaining innocence appears!
Fear not, ye gentle tribes, 'tis not the knife
Of horrid slaughter that is o'er you wav'd;
No, 'tis the tender swain's well-guided shears,
Who having now, to pay his annual care,
Borrow'd your fleece, to you a cumbrous load,
Will send you bounding to your hills again.

A simple scene! yet hence Britannia sees
Her solid grandeur rise: hence she commands
Th' exalted stores of every brighter clime,
The treasures of the sun without his rage:
Hence, fervent all, with culture, toil, and arts,
Wide glows her land: her dreadful thunder hence
Rides o'er the waves sublime, and now, ev'n now,
Impending hangs o'er Gallia's humbled coast;
Hence rules the circling deep, and awes the world.

'Tis raging noon; and, vertical, the sun
Darts on the head direct his forceful rays.
O'er heaven and earth, far as the ranging eye
Can sweep, a dazzling deluge reigns; and all
From pole to pole is undistinguish'd blaze.
In vain the sight, dejected to the ground,
Stoops for relief; thence hot-ascending steams,
And keen reflection pain. Deep to the root
Of vegetation parch'd, the cleaving fields
And slippery lawn an arid hue disclose,
Blast fancy's bloom, and wither ev'n the soul.
Echo no more returns the cheerful sound
Of sharpening scythe: the mower sinking heaps
O'er him the humid hay, with flowers perfum'd;
And scarce a chirping grass-hopper is heard
Through the dumb mead. Distressful nature pants.
The very streams look languid from afar;
Or, through the unshelter'd glade, impatient seem
To hurl into the covert of the grove.

All-conquering heat, oh, intermit thy wrath!
And on my throbbing temples potent thus
Beam not so fierce! Incessant still you flow,
And still another fervent flood succeeds,
Pour'd on the head profuse. In vain I sigh,
And restless turn, and look around for night;
Night is far off, and hotter hours approach.
Thrice happy he! who, on the sunless side
Of a romantic mountain, forest-crown'd,
Beneath the whole collected shade reclines:
Or in the gelid caverns, woodbine-wrought,
And fresh bedew'd with ever-spouting streams,
Sits coolly calm; while all the world without,

And every passion aptly harmoniz'd,
Amid a jarring world with vice inflam'd.
Welcome, ye shades! ye bowery thickets, hail!
Ye lofty pines! ye venerable oaks!
Ye ashes wild, resounding o'er the steep!
Delicious is your shelter to the soul,
As to the hunted hart the sallying spring,
Or stream full-flowing, that his swelling sides
Laves, as he floats along the herbag'd brink,
Cool, through the nerves, your pleasing comfort
glides;
The heart beats glad; the fresh-expanded eye
And ear resume their watch; the sinews knit;
And life shoots swift through all the lighten'd limbs.

Around th' adjoining brook, that purls along
The vocal grove, now fretting o'er a rock,
Now scarcely moving through a reedy pool,
Now starting to a sudden stream, and now
Gently diffus'd into a limpid plain;
A various group the herds and flocks compose,
Rural confusion! on the grassy bank
Some ruminating lie; while others stand
Half in the flood, and, often bending, sip
The circling surface. In the middle droops
The strong laborious ox, of honest front,
Which incompas'd he shakes; and from his sides
The troublous insects lashes with his tail,
Returnin' still. Amid his subjects safe,
Slumbers the monarch-swain; his careless arm
Thrown round his head, on downy moss sustain'd;
Here laid his scrip, with wholesome viands fill'd;
There, listening every noise, his watchful dog.

Light fly his slumbers, if perchance a flight
Of angry gad-flies, fasten on the herd;
That startling scatters from the shallow brook,
In search of lavish stream. Tossing the foam,
They scorn the keeper's voice, and scour the plain,
Through all the bright severity of noon;
While, from their labouring breasts, a hollow moan
Proceeding, runs low-bellowing round the hills.

Oft in this season too the horse, provok'd,
While his big sinews full of spirits swell,
Trembling with vigour, in the heat of blood,
Springs the high fence; and, o'er the field effus'd,
Darts on the gloomy flood, with steadfast eye,
And heart estrang'd to fear: his nervous chest
Luxuriant, and erect! the seat of strength!
Bears down th' opposing stream: quenchless his
He takes the river at redoubled draughts; [thirst;
And with wide nostrils, snorting, skims the wave.

Still let me pierce into the midnight depth
Of yonder grove, of wildest largest growth:
That, forming high in air a woodland quire,
Nods o'er the mount beneath. At every step,
Solemn, and slow, the shadows blacker fall,
And all is awful listening gloom around.

These are the haunts of Meditation, these
The scenes where ancient bards th' inspiring breath,
Ecstatic, felt; and, from this world retir'd,
Convers'd with angels and immortal forms,
On gracious errands bent: to save the fall
Of virtue struggling on the brink of vice;
In waking whispers, and repeated dreams,
To hint pure thought, and warn the favour'd soul
For future trials fated to prepare;
To prompt the poet, who devoted gives
His muse to better themes; to soothe the pangs

Of dying worth, and from the patriot's breast
(Backward to mingle in detested war,
But foremost when engag'd) to turn the death;
And numberless such offices of love
Daily, and nightly, zealous to perform.

Shook sudden from the bosom of the sky,
A thousand shapes or glide athwart the dusk,
Or stalk majestic on. Deep-rous'd, I feel
A sacred terror, a severe delight, [thinks,
Creep through my mortal frame; and thus, me-
A voice, than human more, th' abstracted ear
Of fancy strikes. "Be not of us afraid,
"Poor kindred man! thy fellow-creatures, we
"From the same Parent-Power our beings drew,
"The same our Lord, and laws, and great pursuit.
"Once some of us, like thee, through stormy life,
"Toil'd, tempest-beaten, ere we could attain
"This holy calm, this harmony of mind,
"Where purity and peace immingle charms.
"Then fear not us; but with responsive song,
"Amid these dim recesses, undisturb'd
"By noisy folly and discordant vice,
"Of Nature sing with us, and Nature's God.
"Here frequent, at the visionary hour,
"When musing midnight reigns or silent noon,
"Angelic harps are in full concert heard, [hail,
"And voices chaunting from the wood-crown'd
"The deepening dale, or inmost sylvan glade:
"A privilege bestow'd by us, alone,
"On Contemplation, or the hallow'd ear
"Of poet, swelling to seraphic strain."

And art thou, * Stanley, of that sacred band?
Alas, for us too soon! Though rais'd above
The reach of human pain, above the flight
Of human joy; yet, with a mingled ray
Of sadly-pleas'd remembrance, must thou feel
A mother's love, a mother's tender woe:
Who seeks thee still, in many a former scene;
Seeks thy fair form, thy lovely beaming eyes,
Thy pleasing converse, by gay lively sense
Inspir'd: where moral wisdom mildly shone,
Without the toil of art; and virtue glow'd,
In all her smiles, without forbidding pride.
But, O thou best of parents! wipe thy tears;
Or rather to parental nature pay
The tears of grateful joy, who for a while
Lent thee this younger self, this opening bloom
Of thy enlighten'd mind and gentle worth.
Believe the muse: the wintery blast of death
Kills not the buds of virtue; no, they spread
Beneath the heavenly beam of brighter suns,
Through endless ages, into higher powers.

Thus up the mount, in æry vision rapt,
I stray, regardless whither; till the sound
Of a near fall of water every sense [ing back,
Wakes from the charm of thought: swift-shrink-
I check my steps, and view the broken scene.

Smooth to the shelving brink a copious flood
Rolls fair, and placid; where collected all,
In one impetuous torrent, down the steep
It thundering shoots, and shakes the country round.
At first, an azure sheet, it rushes broad;
Then whitening by degrees, as prone it falls,
And from the loud-resounding rocks below
Dash'd in a cloud of foam, it sends aloft

* A young lady, who died at the age of eighteen, in the year 1738.

A hoary mist, and forms a ceaseless shower.
Nor can the tortur'd wave here find repose:
But, raging still amid the shaggy rocks,
Now flashes o'er the scatter'd fragments, now
Assault the hollow channel rapid darts;
And, falling fast from gradual slope to slope,
With wild inflected course, and less'n'd roar,
It gains a safer bed, and steals, at last,
Along the mazes of the quiet vale.

Invited from the cliff, to whose dark brow
He clings, the steep-ascending eagle soars,
With upward pinions, through the flood of day;
And, giving full his bosom to the blaze,
Gains on the sun; while all the tuneful race,
Smit by afflictive noon, disorder'd droop,
Deep in the thicket; or, from bower to bower
Responsive, force an interrupted strain.
The stock-dove only through the forest cooes,
Mournfully hoarse; oft ceasing from his plaint,
Short interval of weary woe! again
The sad idea of his murder'd mate,
Struck from his side by savage fowler's guile,
Across his fancy comes; and then resounds
A louder song of sorrow through the grove.

Beside the dewy border let me sit,
All in the freshness of the humid air;
There in that hollow'd rock, grotesque and wild,
An ample chair moss-lin'd, and over head
By flowering umbrage shaded: where the bee
Strays diligent, and with th' extracted balm
Of fragrant woodbine loads his little thigh.

Now, while I taste the sweetness of the shade,
While Nature lies around deep-lull'd in noon,
Now come bold fancy, spread a daring flight,
And view the wonders of the torrid zone:
Climes unrelenting! with whose rage compar'd,
Yon blaze is feeble, and yon skies are cool.

See, how at once the bright effulgent sun,
Rising direct, swift chafes from the sky
The short-liv'd twilight; and with ardent blaze
Looks gaily fierce through all the dazzling air:
He mounts his throne; but kind before him sends,
Issuing from out the portals of the morn,
The * general breeze, to mitigate his fire,
And breathe refreshment on a fainting world.
Great are the scenes, with dreadful beauty crown'd
And barbarous wealth, that see each circling year,
Returning suns † and double seasons pass:
Rocks rich in gems, and mountains big with mines,
That on the high equator ridgy rise,
Whence many a bursting stream auriferous plays:
Majestic woods, of every vigorous green,
Stage above stage, high waving o'er the hills;
Or to the far horizon wide diffus'd,
A boundless deep immensity of shade.
Here lofty trees, to ancient song unknown,
The noble sons of potent heat and floods
Prone rushing from the clouds, rear high to heaven

* Which blows constantly between the tropics from the east, or the collateral points, the north-east and south-east; caused by the pressure of the rarefied air on that before it, according to the diurnal motion of the sun from east to west.

† In all climates between the tropics, the sun, as he passes and repasses in his annual motion, is twice a year vertical, which produces this effect.

Their thorny stems, and broad around them throw
Meridian gloom. Here, in eternal prime,
Unnumber'd fruits of keen delicious taste
And vital spirit, drink amid the cliffs,
And burning sands that bank the shrubby vales,
Redoubled day, yet in their rugged coats
A friendly juice to cool its rage contain.

Bear me, Pomona, to thy citron groves;
To where the lemon and the piercing lime,
With the deep orange, glowing through the green,
Their lighter glories blend. Lay me reclin'd
Beneath the spreading tamarind that shakes,
Fann'd by the breeze, its fever-cooling fruit.
Deep in the night the massy locust sheds [maze,
Quench my hot limbs: or lead me through the Embowering endles, of the Indian fig;
Or, thrown at gayer ease, on some fair brow,
Let me behold, by breezy murmurs cool'd,
Broad o'er my head the verdant cedar wave,
And high palmetos lift their graceful shade.
Or stretch'd amid these orchards of the sun,
Give me to drain the cocoa's milky bowl,
And from the palm to draw its freshening wine!
More bounteous far than all the frantic juice
Which Bacchus pours. Nor, on its slender twigs
Low-bending, be the full pomegranate scorn'd;
Nor, creeping through the woods, the gelid race
Of berries. Oft in humble station dwells
Unboastful worth, above fastidious pomp.
Witness, thou best Anâna, thou the pride
Of vegetable life, beyond whate'er
The poets imag'd in the golden age:
Quick let me strip thee of thy tufty coat,
Spread thy ambrosial stores, and feast with Jove!

From these the prospect varies. Plains immense
Lie stretch'd below, interminable meads
And vast savannahs, where the wandering eye,
Unfixt, is in a verdant ocean lost.

Another Flora there, of bolder hues,
And richer sweets, beyond our gardens pride,
Plays o'er the fields, and showers with sudden hand
Exuberant Spring; for oft these vallies shift
Their green-embroider'd robe to fiery brown,
And swift to green again, as scorching suns,
Or streaming dews and torrent rains, prevail.

Along these lonely regions, where retir'd,
From little scenes of art, great Nature dwells
In awful solitude, and nought is seen
But the wild herds that own no master's stall,
Prodigious rivers roll their fattening seas:
On whose luxuriant herbage, half conceal'd,
Like a fall'n cedar, far diffus'd his train,
Cas'd in green scales, the crocodile extends.
The flood disparts: behold! in plaited mail,
Behemoth rears his head. Glanc'd from his side
The darted steel in idle shivers flies:
He fearless walks the plain, or seeks the hills;
Where, as he crops his varied fare, the herds,
In widening circle round, forget their food,
And at the harmless stranger wondering gaze.

Peaceful, beneath primæval trees, that cast
Their ample shade o'er Niger's yellow stream,
And where the Ganges rolls his sacred wave;
Or mid t' central depth of blackening woods,
High-rais'd in solemn theatre around,

* The Hippopotamus, or river-horse.

Leans the huge elephant; wisest of brutes!
 O truly wise! with gentle might endow'd,
 Though powerful, not destructive! Here he sees
 Revolving ages sweep the changeable earth,
 And empires rise and fall; regardless he
 Of what the never-resting race of men
 Project: thrice happy! could he 'scape their guile,
 Who mine, from cruel avarice, his steps;
 Or with his towery grandeur swell their state,
 The pride of kings! or else his strength pervert,
 And bid him rage amid the mortal fray,
 Astonish'd at the madness of mankind.

Wide o'er the winding umbrage of the floods,
 Like vivid blossoms glowing from afar, [hand,
 Thick swarm the brighter birds. For Nature's
 That with a sportive vanity has deck'd
 The plumed nations, there her gayest hues
 Profusely pours. * But, if she bids them shine,
 Array'd in all the beauteous beams of day,
 Yet, frugal still, she humbles them in song.
 Nor envy we the gaudy robes they lent
 Proud Montezuma's realm, whose legions cast
 A boundless radiance waving on the sun,
 While Philomel is ours; while in our shades,
 Through the soft silence of the listening night,
 The sober-suited songstresses trills her lay.

But come, my muse, the desert barrier burst,
 A wild expanse of lifeless sand and sky:
 And, swifter than the toiling caravan,
 Shoot o'er the vale of Senaar; ardent climb
 The Nubian mountains, and the secret bounds
 Of jealous Abyssinia boldly pierce.
 Thou art no ruffian, who beneath the mask
 Of social commerce com'st to rob their wealth;
 No boly fury thou, blaspheming Heaven,
 With consecrated steel to stab their peace,
 And through the land, yet red from civil wounds,
 To spread the purple tyranny of Rome.
 Thou, like the harmless bee, may'st freely range,
 From mead to mead bright with exalted flowers,
 From jasmine grove to grove, may'st wander gay,
 Through palmy shades and aromatic woods,
 That grace the plains, invest the peopled hills,
 And up the more than Alpine mountains wave.
 There on the breezy summit, spreading fair,
 For many a league; or on stupendous rocks,
 That from the sun-redoubling valley lift,
 Cool to the middle air, their lawny tops;
 Where palaces, and fanes, and villas rise;
 And gardens smile around, and culter'd fields;
 And fountains gush; and careless herds and flocks
 Securely stray; a world within itself,
 Disdaining all assault: there let me draw
 Ethereal soul, there drink reviving gales,
 Profusely breathing from the spicy groves,
 And vales of fragrance; there at distance hear
 The roaring floods, and cataracts, that sweep
 From disembowell'd earth the virgin gold;
 And o'er the varied landscape, restless, rove,
 Fervent with life of every fairer kind:
 A land of wonders! which the sun still eyes
 With ray direct, as of the lovely realm
 Enamour'd, and delighting there to dwell.

* In all the regions of the torrid zone, the birds, though more beautiful in their plumage, are observed to be less melodious than ours.

How chang'd the scene! In blazing height of noon,

The sun, oppress'd, is plung'd in thickest gloom.
 Still horror reigns, a dreary twilight round,
 Of struggling night and day malignant mix'd.
 For to the hot equator crowding fast,
 Where, highly rarefy'd, the yielding air
 Admits their stream, incessant vapours roll,
 Amazing clouds on clouds continual heap'd!
 Or whirl'd tempestuous by the gusty wind,
 Or silent borne along, heavy, and slow,
 With the big stores of steaming oceans charg'd.
 Meantime, amid these upper seas, condens'd
 Around the cold aerial mountain's brow,
 And by conflicting winds together dash'd,
 The thunder holds his black tremendous throne:
 From cloud to cloud the rending lightnings rage;
 Till, in the furious elemental war
 Dissolv'd; the whole precipitated mass
 Unbroken floods and solid torrents pours.

The treasures these, hid from the bounded search
 Of ancient knowledge; whence, with annual pomp,
 Rich king of floods! o'erflows the swelling Nile.
 From his two springs, in Gojam's sunny realm,
 Pure-welling out, he through the lucid lake
 Of fair Dambea rolls his infant stream.
 There, by the Naiads nurs'd, he sports away
 His playful youth, amid the fragrant isles,
 That with unfading verdure smile around.
 Ambitious, thence the manly river breaks;
 And, gathering many a flood, and copious fed
 With all the mellow'd treasures of the sky,
 Winds in progressive majesty along:
 Through splendid kingdoms now devolves his maze,
 Now wanders wild o'er solitary tracts
 Of life-deserted sand; till, glad to quit
 The joyless desert, down the Nubian rocks
 From thundering steep to steep, he pours his urn,
 And Egypt joys beneath the spreading wave.

His brother Niger, too, and all the floods
 In which the full-form'd maids of Afric lave
 Their jetty limbs; and all that from the tract
 Of woody mountains stretch'd through gorgeous
 Fall on Coromandel's coast, or Malabar; [Ind

Nor less thy world, Columbus, drinks, refresh'd,
 The lavish moisture of the melting year.
 Wide o'er his isles, the branching Oronoque
 Rolls a brown deluge; and the native drives
 To dwell aloft on life-sufficing trees,
 At once his dome, his robe, his food, and arms.
 Swell'd by a thousand streams, impetuous hurl'd
 From all the roaring Andes, huge descends
 The mighty † Orellana. Scarce the muse
 Dares stretch her wing o'er this enormous mass
 Of rushing water; scarce she dares attempt
 The sealike Plata; to whose dread expanse,
 Continuous depth, and wondrous length of course,
 Our floods are rills. With unabated force,

* The river that runs through Siam; on whose banks a vast multitude of those insects called fire-flies, make a beautiful appearance in the night.

† The river of the Amazons.

In silent dignity they sweep along,
And traverse realms unknown, and blooming wilds,
And fruitless deserts, worlds of solitude,
Where the sun smiles and seasons teem in vain,
Unseen, and unenjoy'd. Forfaking these,
O'er peopled plains they fair-diffusive flow,
And many a nation feed, and circle safe,
In their soft bosom, many a happy isle;
The seat of blameless Pan, yet undisturb'd
By Christian crimes and Europe's cruel sons.
Thus pouring on they proudly seek the deep,
Whose vanquish'd tide, recoiling from the shock,
Yields to the liquid weight of half the globe;
And Ocean trembles for his green domain.

But what avails this wondrous waste of wealth?
This gay profusion of luxurious bliss?
This pomp of nature? what their balmy meads,
Their powerful herbs, and Ceres void of pain?
By vagrant birds dispers'd, and wafting winds,
What their unplanted fruits? what the cool
draughts,
Th' ambrosial food, rich gums, and spicy health,
Their forests yield? their toiling insects what,
Their silky pride, and vegetable robes?
Ah! what avail their fatal treasures, hid
Deep in the bowels of the pitying earth,
Golconda's gems, and sad Potosi's mines;
Where dwelt the gentlest children of the sun?
What all that Afric's golden rivers roll,
Her odorous woods, and shining ivory stores?
Ill-fated race! the softening arts of peace,
Whate'er the humanizing muses teach;
The godlike wisdom of the temper'd breast;
Progressive truth, the patient force of thought;
Investigation calm, whose silent powers [Heaven;
Command the world; the light that leads to
Kind equal rule, the government of laws,
And all-protecting freedom, which alone
Sustains the name and dignity of man:
These are not theirs. The parent-sun himself
Seems o'er this world of slaves to tyrannize;
And, with oppressive ray, the roseate bloom
Of beauty blasting, gives the gloomy hue,
And feature gross: or worse, to ruthless deeds,
Mad jealousy, blind rage, and fell revenge,
Their fervid spirit fires. Love dwells not there,
The soft regards, the tenderness of life,
The heart-shed tear, th' ineffable delight
Of sweet humanity: these court the beam
Of milder climes; in selfish fierce desire,
And the wild fury of voluptuous sense,
There lost. The very brute creation there
This rage partakes, and burns with horrid fire.

Lo! the green serpent, from his dark abode,
Which ev'n Imagination fears to tread,
At noon forth-issuing, gathers up his train
In orbs immense, then, darting out anew,
Seeks the refreshing fount; by which diffus'd,
He throws his folds: and while, with threatening
tongue,
And deathful jaws erect, the monster curls
His flaming crest, all other thirst appal'd,
Or shivering flies, or check'd at distance stands,
Nor dares approach. But still more direful he,
The small close-lurking minister of fate,
Whose high-concocted venom through the veins
A rapid lightning darts, arresting swift
The vital current. Form'd to humble man,

This child of vengeful nature! There, sublim'd
To fearless lust of blood, the savage race
Roam, licens'd by the shading hour of guilt,
And foul misdeed, when the pure day has shut
His sacred eye. The tiger darting fierce
Impetuous on the prey his glance has doom'd:
The lively shining leopard, speckled o'er
With many a spot, the beauty of the waste;
And, scorning all the taming arts of man,
The keen hyena, fellest of the fell.
These, rushing from th' inhospitable woods
Of Mauritania, or the tufted isles,
That verdant rise amid the Libyan wild,
Innumerable glare around their shaggy king,
Majestic, stalking o'er the printed sand;
And, with imperious and repeated roars,
Demand their fated food. The fearful flocks
Crowd near the guardian swain; the nobler herds,
Where round their lordly bull, in rural ease,
They ruminating lie, with horror hear
The coming rage. Th' awaken'd village starts;
And to her fluttering breast the mother strains
Her thoughtless infant. From the pirate's den,
Or stern Morocco's tyrant fang escap'd,
The wretch half-wishes for his bonds again:
While, uproar all, the wilderness resounds,
From Atlas eastward to the frightened Nile.

Unhappy he! who from the first of joys,
Society, cut off, is left alone
Amid this world of death. Day after day,
Sad on the jutting eminence he sits,
And views the main that ever toils below;
Still fondly forming in the farthest verge,
Where the round ether mixes with the wave,
Ships, dim discover'd, dropping from the clouds;
At evening, to the setting sun he turns
A mournful eye, and down his dying heart
Sinks helpless; while the wonted roar is up,
And his continual through the tedious night.
Yet here, ev'n here, into these black abodes
Of monsters unappall'd, from stooping Rome,
And guilty Cæsar, liberty retir'd,
Her Cato following through Numidian wilds:
Disdainful of Campania's gentle plains,
And all the green delights Ausonia pours;
When for them she must bend the servile knee,
And fawning take the splendid robber's boon.
Nor stop the terrors of these regions here.
Commission'd demons oft, angels of wrath,
Let loose the raging elements. Breath'd hot,
From all the boundless furnace of the sky,
And the wide glittering waste of burning sand,
A suffocating wind the pilgrim smites
With instant death. Patient of thirst and toil,
Son of the desert! ev'n the camel feels,
Shot through his wither'd heart, the fiery blast.
Or from the black-red ether, bursting broad,
Sallies the sudden whirlwind. Strait the sands,
Commov'd around, in gathering eddies play:
Nearer and nearer still they darkening come;
Till, with the general all-involving storm
Swept up, the whole continuous wilds arise;
And by their noon-day fount dejected thrown,
Or sunk at night in sad disastrous sleep,
Beneath descending hills, the caravan
Is buried deep. In Cairo's crowded streets
Th' impatient merchant, wondering, waits in vain,
And Mecca saddens at the long delay.

But chief at sea, whose every flexile wave
 Obeys the blast, th' aerial tumult swells.
 In the dread ocean, undulating wide,
 Beneath the radiant line that girts the globe,
 The circling * Typhon, whirl'd from point to point,
 Exhausting all the rage of all the sky,
 And dire * Ecnephia reign. Amid the heavens,
 Falsely serene, deep in a cloudy † speck
 Compress'd, the mighty tempest brooding dwells:
 Of no regard, save to the skilful eye,
 Fiery and foul, the small prognostic hangs
 Aloft, or on the promontory's brow
 Musters its force. A faint deceitful calm,
 A fluttering gale the demon sends before,
 To tempt the spreading sail. Then down at once,
 Precipitant, descends a mingled mass
 Of roaring winds, and flame, and rushing floods.
 In wild amazement fix'd the sailor stands.
 Art is too slow: by rapid fate oppress'd,
 His broad-wing'd vessel drinks the whelming tide,
 Hid in the bosom of the black abyss.
 With such mad seas the daring ‡ Gama fought,
 For many a day, and many a dreadful night,
 Incessant, labouring round the stormy Cape;
 By bold ambition led, and bolder thirst
 Of gold. For then from ancient gloom emerg'd
 The rising world of trade: the genius, then,
 Of navigation, that, in hopeless sloth,
 Had slumber'd on the vast Atlantic deep,
 For idle ages, starting, heard at last
 The § Lusitanian Prince; who, heaven-inspir'd,
 To love of useful glory rous'd mankind,
 And in unbounded commerce mix'd the world.

Increasing still the terrors of these storms,
 His jaws horrific arm'd with threefold fate,
 Here dwells the direful shark. Lur'd by the scent
 Of steaming crowds, of rank disease, and death,
 Behold! he rushing cuts the briny flood,
 Swift as the gale can bear the ship along;
 And, from the partners of that cruel trade,
 Which spoils unhappy Guinea of her sons,
 Demands his share of prey; demands themselves.
 The stormy fates descend: one death involves Tyrants and slaves; when strait, their mangled
 limbs

Crashing at once, he dyes the purple seas
 With gore, and riots in the vengeful meal.

When o'er this world, by equinoctial rains
 Flooded immense, looks out the joyless sun,
 And draws the copious steam: from swampy fens,
 Where putrefaction into life ferments,
 And breathes destructive myriads; or from woods,
 Impenetrable shades, recesses foul.
 In vapours rank and blue corruption wrapt,
 Whose gloomy horrors yet no desperate foot
 Has ever dar'd to pierce; then, wasteful, forth

† Called by sailors the Ox-eye, being in appearance at first no bigger.

 by the Cape of Good Hope, to the East Indies.

§ Don Henry, third son to John the First, king of Portugal. His strong genius to the discovery of new countries, was the chief source of all the modern improvements in navigation.

Walks the dire power of pestilent disease.
 A thousand hideous fiends her course attend,
 Sick nature blasting, and to heartless woe,
 And feeble desolation, casting down
 The towering hopes and all the pride of man.
 Such as, of late, at Carthage quench'd
 The British fire. You, gallant Vernon, saw
 The miserable scene; you, pitying, saw
 To infant-weakness sunk the warrior's arm;
 Saw the deep-racking pang, the ghastly form,
 The lip pale-quivering, and the beamless eye
 No more with ardour bright: you heard the groans
 Of agonizing ships from shore to shore;
 Heard, nightly plung'd amid the fullen waves,
 The frequent corse; while, on each other fix'd,
 In sad presage, the blank assistants seem'd,
 Silent, to ask, whom fate would next demand.

What need I mention those inclement skies,
 Where, frequent o'er the sickening city, plague,
 The fiercest child of Nemesis divine,
 Descends? * From Ethiopia's poison'd woods
 From stifled Cairo's filth, and fetid fields
 With locust-armies putrefying heap'd,
 This great destroyer sprung. Her awful rage
 The brutes escape: Man is her destin'd prey,
 Intemperate man! and, o'er his guilty domes,
 She draws a close incumbent cloud of death;
 Uninterrupted by the living winds,
 Forbid to blow a wholesome breeze; and stain'd
 With many a mixture by the sun, suffus'd,
 Of angry aspect. Princely wisdom, then,
 Dejects his watchful eye; and from the hand
 Of feeble justice, ineffectual, drop
 The sword and balance: mute the voice of joy,
 And hush'd the clamour of the busy world.
 Empty the streets, with uncouth verdure clad;
 Into the worst of deserts sudden turn'd
 The cheerful haunt of men, unless escap'd
 From the doom'd house, where matchless horror reigns,

Shut up by barbarous fear, the smitten wretch,
 With frenzy wild, breaks loose; and, loud to hea-
 Screaming, the dreadful policy arraigns, [ven,
 Inhuman, and unwise. The fullen door,
 Yet uninfected, on its cautious hinge
 Fearing to turn, abhors society:
 Dependants, friends, relations, love himself,
 Savag'd by woe, forget the tender tie,
 The sweet engagement of the feeling heart.
 But vain their selfish care: the circling sky,
 The wide enlivening air, is full of fate;
 And, struck by turns, in solitary pangs
 They fall, unblest, untended, and unmourn'd.
 Thus o'er the prostrate city black despair
 Extends her raven wing; while, to complete
 The scene of desolation, stretch'd around,
 The grim guards stand, denying all retreat,
 And give the flying wretch a better death.

Much yet remains unsung: the rage intense
 Of brazen-vaulted skies, of iron fields,
 Where drought and famine starve the blasted year:
 Fir'd by the torch of noon to tenfold rage,
 Th' infuriate hill that shoots the pillar'd flame;
 And, rous'd within the subterranean world,
 Th' expanding earthquake, that resistless shakes

* These are the causes supposed to be the first origin of the Plague, in Dr. Mead's elegant book on that subject.

Aspiring cities from their solid base,
And buries mountains in the flaming gulf.
But 'tis enough; return, my vagrant muse:
A nearer scene of horror calls thee home.

Behold, flow-settling o'er the lurid grove
Unusual darkness broods; and growing gains
The full possession of the sky, surcharg'd
With wrathful vapour, from the secret beds,
Where sleep the mineral generations, drawn.
Thence nitre, sulphur, and the fiery spume
Of fat bitumen, steaming on the day,
With various-tinctur'd trains of latent flame,
Pollute the sky, and in yon baleful cloud,
A reddening gloom, a magazine of fate,
Ferment; till, by the touch ethereal rous'd,
The dash of clouds, or irritating war
Of fighting winds, while all is calm below,
They furious spring. A boding silence reigns,
Dread through the dun expanse; save the dull sound
That from the mountain, previous to the storm,
Rolls o'er the muttering earth, disturbs the flood,
And shakes the forest-leaf without a breath.
Prone, to the lowest vale, th' aerial tribes
Descend: the tempest-loving raven scarce
Dares wing the dubious dusk. In rueful gaze
The cattle stand, and on the scowling heavens
Cast a deploring eye; by man forsook,
Who to the crowded cottage hies him fast,
Or seeks the shelter of the downward cave.

'Tis listening fear and dumb amazement all:
When to the startled eye the sudden glance
Appears far south, eruptive through the cloud;
And following flower, in explosion vast,
The thunder raises his tremendous voice.
At first, heard solemn o'er the verge of heaven,
The tempest growls; but as it nearer comes,
And rolls its awful burden on the wind,
The lightnings flash a larger curve, and more
The noise astounds: till over head a sheet
Of livid flame discloses wide; then shuts,
And opens wider; shuts and opens still
Expansive, wrapping ether in a blaze.
Follows the loosen'd aggravated roar,
Enlarging, deepening, mingling; peal on peal
Crush'd horrible, convulsing heaven and earth.

Down comes a deluge of sonorous hail,
Or prone-descending rain. Wide-rent, the clouds
Pour a whole flood; and yet, its flame unquench'd,
Th' unconquerable lightning struggles through,
Ragged and fierce, or in red whirling balls,
And fires the mountains with redoubled rage.
Black from the stroke, above, the smouldering pine
Stands a sad shatter'd trunk; and, stretch'd below,
A lifeless group the blasted cattle lie:
Here the soft flocks, with that same harmless look
They wore alive, and ruminating still
In fancy's eye; and there the frowning bull,
And ox half-rai'd. Struck on the castled cliff,
The venerable tower and spiry fane
Resign their aged pride. The gloomy woods
Start at the flash, and from their deep recess,
Wide-flaming out, their trembling inmates shake.
Amid Carnarvon's mountains rages loud
The percussive roar: with mighty crush,
Into the flashing deep, from the rude rocks
Of Penmanmaur heap'd hideous to the sky,
Tumble the smitten cliffs; and Snowden's peak,
Dissolving, instant yields his wintery load.

Far-seen, the heights of heathy Cheviot blaze,
And Thulé bellows through her utmost isles.

Guilt hears appall'd, with deeply troubled thought.
And yet not always on the guilty head
Descends the fated flash. Young Celadon
And his Amelia were a matchless pair;
With equal virtue form'd, and equal grace,
The same, distinguish'd by their sex alone:
Hers the mild lustre of the blooming morn,
And his the radiance of the risen day.

They lov'd: but such their guileless passion was,
As in the dawn of time inform'd the heart
Of innocence, and undissembled truth.
'Twas friendship heighten'd by the mutual wish,
Th' enchanting hope, and sympathetic glow,
Beam'd from the mutual eye. Devoting all
To love, each was to each a dearer self;
Supremely happy in th' awaken'd power
Of giving joy. Alone, amid the shades,
Still in harmonious intercourse they liv'd
The rural day, and talk'd the flowing heart,
Or sigh'd and look'd unutterable things.

So pass'd their life, a clear united stream,
By care unruffled; till, in evil hour,
The tempest caught them on the tender walk,
Heedless how far, and where its mazes stray'd,
While, with each other blest, creative love
Still bade eternal Eden smile around.
Presaging instant fate, her bosom heav'd
Unwonted sighs, and stealing oft a look
Of the big gloom on Celadon her eye
Fell tearful, wetting her disorder'd cheek.
In vain assuring love, and confidence
In heaven, repress'd her fear; it grew, and shook
Her frame near dissolution. He perceiv'd
Th' unequal conflict; and as angels look
On dying faints, his eyes compassion shed,
With love illumin'd high. "Fear not, he said,
"Sweet innocence! thou stranger to offence,
"And inward storm! he, who yon skies involves
"In frowns of darkness, ever smiles on thee
"With kind regard. O'er thee the secret shaft
"That wastes at midnight, or th' undreaded hour
"Of noon, flies harmless: and that very voice
"Which thunders terror through the guilty heart,
"With tongues of seraphs whispers peace to thine.
"Tis safety to be near thee sure, and thus
"To clasp perfection!" From his void embrace,
Mysterious heaven! that moment, to the ground,
A blacken'd corse, was struck the beauteous maid.
But who can paint the lover, as he stood,
Pierc'd by severe amazement, hating life,
Speechless, and fix'd in all the death of woe!
So, faint resemblance! on the marble tomb,
The well-disssembled mourner stooping stands,
For ever silent, and for ever sad.

As from the face of heaven the shatter'd clouds
Tumultuous rove, th' interminable sky
Sublimely swells, and o'er the world expands
A purer azure. Through the lighten'd air
A higher lustre and a clearer calm,
Diffusive, tremble; while, as if in sign
Of danger past, a glittering robe of joy,
Set off abundant by the yellow ray,
Invests the fields; and nature smiles reviv'd.

'Tis beauty all, and grateful song around,
Join'd to the low of kine, and numerous bleat
Of flocks thick-nibbling through the clover'd vale.

And shall the hymn be marr'd by thankless man,
Most favour'd; who with voice articulate
Should lead the chorus of this lower world?
Shall he, so soon forgetful of the hand
That hush'd the thunder, and serenest the sky,
Extinguish'd feel that spark the tempest wak'd,
That sense of powers exceeding far his own,
Ere yet his feeble heart has lost its fears?

Cheer'd by the milder beam, the sprightly youth
Speeds to the well-known pool, whose crystal depth
A sandy bottom shows. A while he stands
Gazing th' inverted landskip, half afraid
To meditate the blue profound below;
Then plunges headlong down the circling flood.
His ebon tresses and his rosy cheek
Instant emerge; and through th' obedient wave,
At each short breathing by his lip repell'd,
With arms and legs according well, he makes,
As humour leads, an easy-winding path:
While, from his polish'd sides, a dewy light
Effuses on the pleas'd spectators round.

This is the purest exercise of health,
The kind refresher of the Summer heats;
Nor, when cold Winter keens the brightening flood,
Would I weak-shivering linger on the brink.
'Thus life redoubles, and is oft preserv'd,
By the bold swimmer, in the swift illapse
Of accident disastrous. Hence the limbs
Knit into force; and the same Roman arm,
That rose victorious o'er the conquer'd earth,
First learn'd, while tender, to subdue the wave.
Ev'n from the body's purity, the mind
Receives a secret sympathetic aid.

Close in the covert of an hazel copse,
Where winded into pleasing solitudes
Runs out the rambling dale, young Damon sat
Pensive, and pierc'd with love's delightful pangs.
There to the stream that down the distant rocks
Hoarse-murmuring fell, and plaintive breeze that
Among the bending willows, falsely he [play'd
Of Musidora's cruelty complain'd.
She felt his flame; but deep within her breast,
In bashful coyness, or in maiden pride,
The soft return conceal'd, save when it stole
In sidelong glances from her downcast eye,
Or from her swelling soul in stifled sighs.
Touch'd by the scene, no stranger to his vows,
He fram'd a melting lay, to try her heart;
And, if an infant passion struggled there,
To call that passion forth. Thrice happy swain!
A lucky chance, that oft decides the fate
Of mighty monarchs, then decided thine,
For, lo! conducted by the laughing loves,
'This cool retreat his Musidora sought:
Warm in her cheek the sultry season glow'd;
And, rob'd in loose array, she came to bathe
Her fervent limbs in the refreshing stream.
What shall he do? In sweet confusion lost,
And dubious flutterings, he a while remain'd:
A pure ingenuous elegance of soul,
A delicate refinement, known to few,
Perplex'd his breast, and urg'd him to retire:
But love forbade. Ye prudes in virtue, say,
Say, ye severest, what would you have done?
Meantime, this fairer nymph than ever blest
Arcadian stream, with timid eye around
The banks surveying, strip'd her beauteous limbs,
To taste the lucid coolness of the flood.

Ah, then! not Paris on the piny top
Of Ida panted stronger, when aside
The rival-goddesses the veil divine
Cast unconfin'd, and gave him all their charms,
Than, Damon, thou; as from the snowy leg,
And slender foot, th' inverted silk she drew;
As the soft touch dissolv'd the virgin zone;
And, through the parting robe, th' alternate
breast,

With youth wild-throbbing, on thy lawless gaze
In full luxuriance rose. But, desperate youth,
How durst thou risk the soul distracting view;
As from her naked limbs, of glowing white,
Harmonious swell'd by Nature's finest hand,
In folds loose-floating fell the fainter lawn;
And fair-expos'd she stood, shrunk from herself,
With fancy blushing, at the doubtful breeze
Alarm'd, and starting like the fearful fawn?
Then to the flood she rush'd; the parted flood
Its lovely guest with closing waves receiv'd;
And every beauty softening, every grace
Flushing anew, a mellow lustre shed:
As shines the lily through the crystal mild;
Or as the rose amid the morning dew
Fresh from Aurora's hand, more sweetly glows.
While thus she wanton'd, now beneath the wave
But ill-conceal'd; and now with streaming locks,
That half-embrac'd her in a humid veil,
Rising again, the latent Damon drew
Such maddening draughts of beauty to the soul,
As for a while o'erwhelm'd his raptur'd thought
With luxury too daring. Check'd, at last,
By love's respectful modesty, he deem'd
The theft profane, if aught profane to love
Can e'er be deem'd; and struggling from the shade,

With headlong hurry fled: but first these lines,
Trac'd by his ready pencil, on the bank
With trembling hand he threw. "Bathe on, my
"Yet unbeheld, save by the sacred eye [fair,
"Of faithful love: I go to guard thy haunt,
"To keep from thy recess each vagrant foot,
"And each licentious eye." With wild surprise,
As if to marble struck, devoid of sense,
A stupid moment motionless she stood:
So stands the statue* that enchants the world,
So bending tries to veil the matchless boast,
The mingled beauties of exulting Greece.
Recovering, swift she flew to find those robes
Which blissful Eden knew not; and, array'd
In careless haste, th' alarming paper snatch'd.
But, when her Damon's well-known hand she saw,
Her terrors vanish'd, and a softer train
Of mixt emotions, hard to be describ'd,
Her sudden bosom seiz'd: shame void of guilt,
The charming blush of innocence, esteem
And admiration of her lover's flame,
By modesty exalted: ev'n a sense
Of self-approving beauty stole across
Her busy thought. At length, a tender calm
Hush'd by degrees the tumult of her soul;
And on the spreading beach, that o'er the stream
Incumbent hung, she with the sylvan pen
Of rural lovers this confession carv'd,
Which soon her Damon kiss'd with weeping joy:

* The Venus of Medici.

" Dear youth! sole judge of what these verses mean,

" By fortune too much favour'd, but by love,

" Alas! not favour'd less, be still as now

" Discreet: the time may come you need not fly."

The sun has lost his rage: his downward orb
Shoots nothing now but animating warmth,
And vital lustre, that, with various ray,
Lights up the clouds, those beauteous robes of Incessant roll'd into romantic shapes, [heaven,
The dream of waking fancy! Broad below,
Cover'd with ripening fruits, and swelling fast
Into the perfect year, the pregnant earth
And all her tribes rejoice. Now the soft hour
Of walking comes: for him who lonely loves
To seek the distant hills, and there converse
With Nature; there to harmonize his heart,
And in pathetic song to breathe around
The harmony to others. Social friends,
Attun'd to happy unison of soul;
To whose exalting eye a fairer world,
Of which the vulgar never had a glimpse,
Displays its charms; whose minds are richly fraught
With philosophic stores, superior light;
And in whose breast, enthusiastic, burns
Virtue, the sons of interest deem romance;
Now call'd abroad, enjoys the falling day:
Now to the verdant portico of woods,
To Nature's vast lyceum, forth they walk;
By that kind school where no proud master reigns,
The full free converse of the friendly heart,
Improving and improv'd. Now from the world,
Sacred to sweet retirement, lovers steal,
And pour their souls in transport, which the fire
Of love approving hears, and calls it good.
Which way, Amanda, shall we bend our course?
The choice perplexes. Wherefore should we choose?
All is the same with thee. Say, shall we wind
Along the streams? or walk the smiling mead?
Or court the forest glades? or wander wild
Among the waving harvests? or ascend,
While radiant summer opens all its pride,
Thy hill, delightful Shene*? Here let us sweep
The boundless landscape: now the raptur'd eye,
Exulting swift, to huge Augusta send,
Now to the sister-hills† that skirt her plain,
To lofty Harrow now, and now to where
Majestic Windsor lifts his princely brow.
In lovely contrast to this glorious view
Calmly magnificent, then will we turn
To where the silver Thames first rural grows.
There let the feasted eye unwearied stray;
Luxurious, there, rove through the pendent woods
That nodding hang o'er Harrington's retreat;
And, stooping thence to Ham's embowering walks,
Beneath whose shades, in spotless peace retir'd,
With her the pleasing partner of his heart,
The worthy Queensberry yet laments his Gay,
And polish'd Cornbury wooes the willing muse,
Slow let us trace the matchless vale of Thames;
Fair winding up to where the muse's haunt
In Twit'nam's bowers, and for their Pope implore
The healing god‡; to royal Hampton's pile,

* The old name of Richmond, signifying, in Saxon, shining or splendor.

† Highgate and Hamstead. ‡ In his last sickness.

To Clermont's terrass'd height, and Esler's groves,
Where in the sweetest solitude, embrac'd
By the soft windings of the silent Mole,
From courts and senates Pelham finds repose,
Enchanting vale! beyond whate'er the muse
Has of Achaia or Hesperia sung!
O vale of bliss! O softly-swelling hills!
On which the power of cultivation lies,
And joys to see the wonders of his toil.

Heavens! what a goodly prospect spreads around,
Of hills, and dales, and woods, and lawns, and spires,

And glittering towns, and gilded streams, till all
The stretching landscape into smoke decays!
Happy Britannia! Where, the queen of arts,
Inspiring vigour, liberty abroad
Walks, unconfin'd, ev'n to thy farthest cots,
And scatters plenty with unsparing hand.

Rich is thy soil, and merciful thy clime;
Thy streams unfailing in the Summer's drought;
Unmatch'd thy guardian-oaks; thy vallies float
With golden waves: and on thy mountains flocks
Bleat numberless; while, roving round their sides,
Bellow the blackening herds in lusty droves.
Beneath thy meadows glow, and rise unquell'd
Against the mower's scythe. On every hand
Thy villas shine. Thy country teems with wealth;
And property assures it to the swain,
Pleas'd, and unwearied, in his guarded toil.

Full are thy cities with the sons of art;
And trade with joy, in every busy street,
Mingling are heard: ev'n drudgery himself,
As at the car he sweats, or dusty hews
The palace-stone looks gay. Thy crowded ports,
Where rising masts an endless prospect yield,
With labour burn, and echo to the shouts
Of hurried sailor, as he hearty waves
His last adieu, and, loosening every sheet,
Reigns the spreading vessel to the wind.

Bold, firm, and graceful, are thy generous youth,

By hardship sinew'd, and by danger fir'd,
Scattering the nations where they go; and first
Or on the list'd plain, or stormy seas.
Mild are thy glories too, as o'er the plans
Of thriving peace thy thoughtful fires preside;
In genius, and substantial learning, high;
For every virtue, every worth renown'd;
Sincere, plain-hearted, hospitable, kind;
Yet, like the mustering thunder, when provok'd,
The dread of tyrants, and the sole resource
Of those that under grim oppression groan.

Thy sons of glory many! Alfred thine,
In whom the splendor of heroic war,
And more heroic peace, when govern'd well,
Combine; whose hallow'd names the virtues saint,
And his own muses love; the best of kings!
With him thy Edwards and thy Henrys shine,
Names dear to fame; the first who deep impress'd
On haughty Gaul the terror of thy arms,
That awes her genius still. In statesmen thou,
And patriots, fertile. Thine a steady More,
Who, with a generous, though mistaken zeal,
Withstood a brutal tyrant's useful rage,
Like Cato firm, like Aristides just,
Like rigid Cincinnatus nobly poor,
A dauntless soul erect, who smil'd on death,
Frugal and wise, a Walsingham is thine;

A Drake, who made thee mistress of the deep,
 And bore thy name in thunder round the world.
 Then flam'd thy spirit high: but who can speak
 The numerous worthies of the maiden reign?
 In Raleigh mark their every glory mix'd;
 Raleigh, the scourge of Spain! whose breast with all
 The sage, the patriot, and the hero, burn'd.
 Nor sunk his vigour, when a coward-reign
 The warrior fetter'd, and at last resign'd,
 To glut the vengeance of a vanquish'd foe.
 Then, active still and unrestrain'd, his mind
 Explor'd the vast extent of ages past,
 And with his prison-hours enrich'd the world;
 Yet found no times, in all the long research,
 So glorious, or so base, as those he prov'd,
 In which he conquer'd, and in which he bled.
 Nor can the muse the gallant Sidney pass,
 The plume of war! with early laurels crown'd,
 The lover's myrtle, and the poet's bay.
 A Hampden too is thine, illustrious land,
 Wise, strenuous, firm, of unsubmitting soul,
 Who stem'd the torrent of a downward age
 To slavery prone, and bade thee rise again,
 In all thy native pomp of freedom bold.
 Bright, at his call, thy age of men effulg'd,
 Of men on whom late time a kindling eye
 Shall turn, and tyrants tremble while they read.
 Bring every sweetest flower, and let me strew
 The grave where Russell lies; whose temper'd blood,
 With calmest cheerfulness for thee resign'd,
 Stain'd the sad annals of a giddy reign;
 Aiming at lawless power, though meanly sunk
 In loose inglorious luxury. With him
 His friend, the * British Cassius, fearless bled;
 Of high determin'd spirit, roughly brave,
 By ancient learning to th' enlighten'd love
 Of ancient freedom warm'd. Fair they renown
 In awful sages and in noble bards;
 Soon as the light of dawning science spread
 Her orient ray, and wak'd the muses' song.
 Thine is a Bacon; hapless in his choice,
 Unfit to stand the civil storm of state,
 And through the smooth barbarity of courts,
 With firm, but pliant virtue, forward still
 To urge his course: him for the studious shade
 Kind Nature form'd, deep, comprehensive, clear,
 Exact, and elegant; in one rich soul,
 Plato, the Stagyrte, and Tully join'd.
 The great deliverer he! who from the gloom
 Of cloister'd monks, and jargon-teaching schools,
 Led forth the true philosophy, there long
 Held in the magic chain of words and forms,
 And definitions void: he led her forth,
 Daughter of heaven! that, slow-ascending still,
 Investigating sure the chain of things,
 With radiant finger points to heaven again.
 The generous† Ashley thine, the friend of man;
 Who scan'd his nature with a brother's eye,
 His weakness prompt to shade to raise his aim,
 To touch the finer movements of the mind,
 And with the moral beauty charm the heart.
 Why need I name thy Boyle, whose pious search
 Amid the dark recesses of his works,
 The great Creator sought? And why thy Locke,
 Who made the whole internal world his own?

* Algernon Sidney.

† Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of Shaftesbury.

Let Newton, pure intelligence, whom God
 To mortals lent, to trace his boundless works
 From laws sublimely simple, speak thy fame
 In all philosophy. For lofty sense,
 Creative fancy, and inspection keen
 Through the deep windings of the human heart,
 Is not wild Shakspeare thine and Nature's boast?
 Is not each great, each amiable muse
 Of classic ages in thy Milton met?
 A genius universal as his theme;
 Astonishing as Chaos, as the bloom
 Of blowing Eden fair, as heaven sublime.
 Nor shall my verse that elder bard forget,
 The gentle Spenser, fancy's pleasing son;
 Who, like a copious river, pour'd his song
 O'er all the mazes of enchanted ground:
 Nor thee, his ancient master, laughing sage,
 Chaucer, whose native manners-painting verse,
 Well-moraliz'd, shines through the Gothic cloud
 Of time and language o'er thy genius thrown.

May my song soften, as thy daughters I,
 Britannia, hail! for beauty is their own,
 The feeling heart, simplicity of life,
 And elegance, and taste: the faultless form,
 Shap'd by the hand of harmony; the cheek,
 Where the live crimson, through the native white
 Soft-shooting, o'er the face diffuses bloom,
 And every nameless grace; the parted lip,
 Like the red rose-bud moist with morning-dew,
 Breathing delight; and, under flowing jet,
 Or sunny ringlets, or of circling brown,
 The neck slight-shaded, and the swelling breast;
 The look resistless, piercing to the soul,
 And by the soul inform'd, when drest in love
 She sits high-smiling in the conscious eye.

Island of bliss! amid the subject seas,
 That thunder round thy rocky coasts, set up,
 At once the wonder, terror, and delight,
 Of distant nations; whose remotest shores
 Can soon be shaken by thy naval arm;
 Not to be shook thyself, but all assaults
 Baffling, as thy hoar cliffs the loud sea-wave.

O Thou! by whose almighty rod the scale
 Of empire rises, or alternate falls,
 Send forth the saving virtues round the land,
 In bright patrol: white peace, and social love;
 The tender-looking charity, intent,
 On gentle deeds, and shedding tears through smiles;
 Undaunted truth, and dignity of mind;
 Courage compos'd, and keen; sound temperance,
 Healthful in heart and look; clear chastity,
 With blushes reddening as she moves along,
 Disorder'd at the deep regard she draws;
 Rough industry; activity untir'd,
 With copious life inform'd, and all awake:
 While in the radiant front, superior shines
 That first paternal virtue, public zeal;
 Who throws o'er all an equal wide survey,
 And, ever musing on the common weal,
 Still labours glorious with some great design.

Low walks the sun, and broadens by degrees,
 Just o'er the verge of day. The shifting clouds
 Assembled gay, a richly-gorgeous train,
 In all their pomp attend his setting throne.
 Air, earth, and ocean smile immense. And now,
 As if his weary chariot fought the bowers
 Of Amphitrite, and her tending nymphs,
 (So Grecian fable sung) he dips his orb;

Now half-immers'd; and now a golden curve
Gives one bright glance, then total disappears.

For ever running an enchanted round,
Passes the day, deceitful, vain, and void;
As fleets the vision o'er the formful brain,
This moment hurrying wild th' impassion'd soul,
The next in nothing lost. 'Tis so to him,
The dreamer of this earth, an idle blank:
A sight of horror to the cruel wretch,
Who, all day long in sordid pleasure roll'd,
Himself an useless load, has squander'd vile,
Upon his scoundrel train, what might have cheer'd
A drooping family of modest worth.
But to the generous still-improving mind,
That gives the hopeless heart to sing for joy,
Diffusing kind beneficence around,
Boastless, as now descends the silent dew;
To him the long review of order'd life
Is inward rapture, only to be felt.

Confess'd from yonder flow-extinguish'd clouds,
All ether softening, sober evening takes,
Her wonted station in the middle air;
A thousand shadows at her beck. First this
She sends on earth; then that of deeper dye
Steals soft behind; and then a deeper still,
In circle following circle, gathers round,
To close the face of things. A fresher gale
Begins to wave the wood, and stir the stream,
Sweeping with shadowy gust the fields of corn;
While the quail clamours for his running mate.
Wide o'er the thistly lawn, as swells the breeze,
A whitening shower of vegetable down
Amusive floats. The kind impartial care
Of Nature nought disdains: thoughtful to feed
Her lowest sons, and clothe the coming year,
From field to field the feather'd seeds she wings.

His folded flock secure, the shepherd home
Hies, merry-hearted; and by turns relieves
The ruddy milk-maid of her brimming pail;
The beauty whom perhaps his witless heart,
Unknowing what the joy-mixt anguish means,
Sincerely loves, by that best language shown
Of cordial glances, and obliging deeds.
Onward they pass, o'er many a panting height
And valley sunk, and unfrequented; where
At fall of eve the fairy people throng,
In various game, and revelry, to pass
The summer-night, as village-stories tell.
But far about they wander from the grave
Of him, whom his ungentle fortune urg'd
Against his own sad breast to lift the hand
Of impious violence. The lonely tower
Is also shunn'd; whose mournful chambers hold,
So night-struck fancy dreams, the yelling ghost.

Among the crooked lanes, on every hedge,
The glow-worm lights his gem; and, through the dark,

A moving radiance twingles. Evening yields
The world to night; not in her winter-robe
Of massy Stygian woof, but loose array'd
In mantle dun. A faint erroneous ray,
Glanc'd from th' imperfect surfaces of things,
Flings half an image on the straining eye;
While wavering woods, and villages, and streams,
And rocks, and mountains tops, that long retain'd
Th' ascending gleam, are all one swimming scene,
Uncertain if beheld. Sudden to heaven
Thence weary vision turns; where, leading soft

The silent hours of love, with purest ray
Sweet Venus shines; and from her genial rise,
When day-light sickens till it springs afresh,
Unrival'd reigns, the fairest lamp of night.
As thus th' effulgence tremulous I drink,
With cherish'd gaze, the lambent lightnings shoot
Across the sky; or horizontal dart
In wondrous shapes: by fearful murmuring crowds
Portentous deem'd. Amid the radiant orbs,
That more than deck, that animate the sky,
The life-infusing suns of other worlds;
Lo! from the dread immensity of space
Returning, with accelerated course,
The rushing comet to the sun descends;
And as he sinks below the shading earth,
With awful train projected o'er the heavens,
The guilty nations tremble. But, above
Those superstitious horrors that enslave
The fond sequacious herd, to mystic faith
And blind amazement prone, th' enlighten'd few,
Whose godlike minds philosophy exalts,
The glorious stranger hail. They feel a joy
Divinely great; they in their powers exult,
That wondrous force of thought, which mounting spurns

This dusky spot, and measures all the sky;
While, from his far excursion through the wilds
Of barren ether, faithful to his time,
They see the blazing wonder rise anew,
In seeming terror clad, but kindly bent
To work the will of all-sustaining Love:
From his huge vapoury train perhaps to shake
Reviving moisture on the numerous orbs,
Through which his long ellipsis winds; perhaps
To lend new fuel to declining suns,
To light up worlds, and feed th' eternal fire.

With thee, serene philosophy, with thee,
And thy bright garland, let me crown my song!
Effusive source of evidence, and truth!
A lustre shedding o'er th' ennobled mind,
Stronger than summer-noon; and pure as that,
Whose mild vibrations soothe the parted soul,
New to the dawning of celestial day. [thee,
Hence through her nourish'd powers, enlarg'd by
She springs aloft, with elevated pride,
Above the tangling mafs of low desires, [wing'd,
That bind the fluttering crowd: and, angel-
The heights of science and of virtue gains,
Where all is calm and clear; with nature round,
Or in the starry regions, or th' abyss,
To reason's and to fancy's eye display'd:
The First up-tracing, from the dreary void,
The chain of causes and effects to him,
The world-producing Essence, who alone
Possesses being; while the Last receives
The whole magnificence of heaven and earth,
And every beauty, delicate or bold,
Obvious or more remote, with livelier sense,
Diffusive painted on the rapid mind.

Tutor'd by thee, hence poetry exalts
Her voice to ages; and informs the page
With music, image, sentiment, and thought,
Never to die! the treasure of mankind!
Their highest honour, and their truest joy!

Without thee what were unenlighten'd man?
A savage roaming through the woods and wilds,
In quest of prey; and with th' unfashion'd fur
Rough-clad; devoid of every finer art,

And elegance of life. Nor happiness
 Domestic, mix'd of tenderness and care,
 Nor moral excellence, nor social bliss,
 Nor guardian law were his; nor various skill
 To turn the furrow, or to guide the tool
 Mechanic; nor the heaven-conducted prow
 Of navigation bold, that fearless braves
 The burning line, nor dares the wint'ry pole;
 Moth'rs severe of infinite delights!
 Nothing, save rapine, indolence, and guile,
 And woes on woes, a still-revolving train!
 Whose horrid circle had made human life
 That non-existence worse: but, taught by thee,
 Ours are the plans of policy and peace;
 To live like brothers, and conjunctive all
 Embellish life. While thus laborious crowds
 Ply the tough oar, philosophy directs
 The ruling helm; or like the liberal breath
 Of potent heaven, invisible, the sail
 Swells out, and bears th' inferior world along,
 Nor to this evanescent speck of earth
 Poorly confin'd, the radiant tracts on high

Are her exalted range; intent to gaze
 Creation through; and, from that full complex
 Of never-ending wonders, to conceive
 Of the Sole Being right, who spoke the word,
 And Nature mov'd complete. With inward view,
 Thence on th' ideal kingdom swift she turns
 Her eye; and instant, at her powerful glance,
 Th' obedient phantoms vanish or appear;
 Compound, divide, and into order shift,
 Each to his rank, from plain perception up
 To the fair forms of fancy's fleeting train:
 To reason then, deducing truth from truth;
 And notion quite abstract; where first begins
 The world of spirits, action all, and life
 Unfetter'd, and unmixt. But here the cloud,
 So wills Eternal Providence, sits deep.
 Enough for us to know that this dark state,
 In wayward passions lost, and vain pursuits,
 This infancy of being, cannot prove
 The final issue of the works of God,
 By boundless love and perfect wisdom form'd,
 And ever rising with the rising mind.

AUTUMN. 1730.

The Argument.

The subject proposed. Addressed to Mr. Onflow. A prospect of the fields ready for harvest. Reflections in praise of industry raised by that view. Reaping. A tale relative to it. A harvest storm. Shooting and hunting, their barbarity. A ludicrous account of fox-hunting. A view of an orchard. Wall-fruit. A vineyard. A description of fogs, frequent in the latter part of Autumn; whence a digression, inquiring into the rise of fountains and rivers. Birds of season considered, that now shift their habitation. The prodigious number of them that cover the northern and western isles of Scotland. Hence a view of the country. A prospect of the discoloured, fading woods. After a gentle dusky day, moon-light. Autumnal meteors. Morning: to which succeeds a calm, pure, sun-shiny day, such as usually shuts up the Season. The harvest being gathered in, the country dissolved in joy. The whole concludes with a panegyric on a philosophical country life.

CROWN'D with the sickle and the wheaten sheaf,
 While Autumn, nodding o'er the yellow plain,
 Comes jovial on: the Doric reed once more,
 Well pleas'd, I tune. Whate'er the Wintery frost
 Nitrous prepar'd; the various-blossom'd spring
 Put in white promise forth: and Summer suns
 Concocted strong, rush boundless now to view,
 Full, perfect all, and swell my glorious theme.

Onflow! the muse, ambitious of thy name,
 To grace, inspire and dignify her song,
 Would from the public voice thy gentle ear
 A while engage. Thy noble care she knows,
 The patriot virtues that distend thy thought,
 Spread on thy front, and in thy bosom glow;
 While listening senates hang upon thy tongue,
 Devolving through the maze of eloquence
 A roll of periods sweeter than her song.
 But she too pants for public virtue; she
 Though weak in power, yet strong in ardent will,
 Whene'er her country rushes on her heart,
 Assumes a bolder note, and fondly tries
 To mix the patriot's with the poet's flame.

When the bright virgin gives the beauteous days,
 And Libra weighs in equal scales the year;
 From heaven's high cope the fierce effulgence
 Of parting Summer, a serener blue, [hook
 With golden light enliven'd, wide invests
 The happy world. Attemper'd suns arise,
 Sweet-beam'd, and shedding oft through lucid clouds
 A pleasing calm; while broad, and brown, below
 Extensive harvest hang the heavy head.
 Rich, silent, deep, they stand; for not a gale
 Rolls its light billows o'er the bending plain:
 A calm for plenty! till the ruffled air
 Falls from its poise, and gives the breeze to blow.
 Rent is the fleecy mantle of the sky;
 The clouds fly different; and the sudden sun
 By fits effulgent gilds th' illumin'd field,
 And black by fits the shadows sweep along.
 A gaily-checker'd heart-expanding view,
 Far as the circling eye can shoot around,
 Unbounded tossing in a flood of corn.

These are thy blessings, Industry! rough power;
 Whom labour still attends, and sweat, and pain;

Yet the kind source of every gentle art,
 And all the soft civility of life :
 Raifer of human kind ! by Nature cast,
 Naked, and helpless, out amid the woods
 And wilds, to rude inclement elements ;
 With various seeds of art deep in the mind
 Implanted, and profusely pour'd around
 Materials infinite ; but idle all.
 Still unexerted, in th' unconscious breast,
 Slept the lethargic powers ; corruption still,
 Voracious, swallow'd what the liberal hand
 Of bounty scatter'd o'er the savage year :
 And still the sad barbarian, roving, mix'd
 With beasts of prey ; or for his acorn-meal
 Fought the fierce tusky boar ; a shivering wretch !
 Aghast, and comfortless, when the bleak north,
 With Winter charg'd, let the mixt tempest fly,
 Hail, rain, and snow, and bitter-breathing frost :
 Then to the shelter of the hut he fled ;
 And the wild season, fordid, pin'd away.
 For home he had not ; home is the resort
 Of love, of joy, of peace and plenty, where,
 Supported and supported, polish'd friends,
 And dear relations mingle into bliss.
 But this rugged savage never felt,
 Ev'n desolate in crowds ; and thus his days
 Roll'd heavy, dark, and unenjoy'd along :
 A waste of time ; till industry approach'd,
 And rous'd him from his miserable sloth :
 His faculties unfolded ; pointed out
 Where lavish Nature the directing hand
 Of Art demanded ; show'd him how to raise
 His feeble force by the mechanic powers,
 To dig the mineral from the vaulted earth,
 On what to turn the piercing rage of fire,
 On what the torrent, and the gather'd blast ;
 Gave the tall ancient forest to his axe ;
 Taught him to chip the wood, and hew the stone,
 Till by degrees the finish'd fabric rose ;
 Tore from his limbs the blood-polluted fur,
 And wrapt them in the woolly vestment warm,
 Or bright in glossy silk, and flowing lawn ;
 With wholesome viands fill'd his table, pour'd
 The generous glass around, inspir'd to wake
 The life refining soul of decent wit :
 Nor stop'd at barren bare necessity ;
 But, still advancing bolder, led him on
 To pomp, to pleasure, elegance and grace ;
 And, breathing high ambition through his soul,
 Set science, wisdom, glory, in his view,
 And bade him be the lord of all below.

Then gathering men their natural powers com-
 And form'd a public ; to the general good [bin'd
 Submitting, aiming, and conducting all.
 For this the patriot-council met, the full
 The free, and fairly represented whole ;
 For this they plann'd the holy guardian laws,
 Distinguish'd orders, animated arts,
 And, with joint force oppression chaining, set
 Imperial justice at the helm ; yet still
 To them accountable ; nor slavish dream'd
 That toiling millions must resign their weal,
 And all the honey of their search, to such
 As for themselves alone themselves have rais'd.

Hence every form of cultivated life
 In order set, protected, and inspir'd,
 Into perfection wrought. Uniting all
 Society grew numerous, high, polite,

And happy. Nurse of art ! the city rear'd
 In beauteous pride her tower-encircled head ;
 And, stretching street on street, by thousands drew,
 From twining woody haunts, or the tough yew
 To bows strong-straining, her aspiring sons.

Then commerce brought into the public walk
 The busy merchant ; the big warehouse built ;
 Rais'd the strong crane ; chok'd up the loaded street

With foreign plenty ; and thy stream, O Thames,
 Large, gentle, deep, majestic, king of floods !
 Chose for his grand resort. On either hand,
 Like a long wintery forest, groves of masts
 Shot up their spires ; the bellying sheet between Possess'd the breezy void ; the footy hulk
 Steer'd sluggish on ; the splendid barge along
 Row'd, regular, to harmony ; around,
 The boat, light skimming, stretch'd its oary wings ;
 While deep the various voice of fervent toil
 From bank to bank increas'd ; whence ribb'd with oak

To bear the British thunder, black, and bold,
 The roaring vessel rush'd into the main.

Then too the pillar'd dome, magnific, heav'd
 Its ample roof ; and luxury within {smooth,
 Pour'd out her glittering stores ; the canvas
 With glowing life protuberant, to the view
 Embodied rose ; the statue seem'd to breathe,
 And soften into flesh, beneath the touch
 Of forming art, imagination-flush'd.

All is the gift of industry ; whate'er
 Exalts, embellishes, and renders life
 Delightful. Pensive Winter cheer'd by him
 Sits at the social fire, and happy hears
 Th' excluded tempest idly rave along ;
 His harden'd fingers deck the gaudy Spring ;
 Without him Summer were an arid waste ;
 Nor to th' autumnal months could thus transmit
 Those full, mature, immeasurable stores,
 That, waving round, recal my wandering song.

Soon as the morning trembles o'er the sky,
 And, unperceiv'd, unfolds the spreading day ;
 Before the ripen'd field the reapers stand,
 In fair array ; each by the lass he loves,
 To bear the rougher part, and mitigate
 By nameless gentle offices her toil.

At once they stoop and swell the lusty sheaves ;
 While through their cheerful band the rural talk,
 The rural scandal, and the rural jest,
 Fly harmless to deceive the tedious time,
 And steal unfelt the sultry hours away.
 Behind the master walks, builds up the shocks ;
 And, conscious, glancing oft on every side
 His fated eye, feels his heart heave with joy.
 The gleaners spread around, and here and there,
 Spike after spike, their scanty harvest pick.
 Be not too narrow, husbandmen ! but fling
 From the full sheaf, with charitable stealth,
 The liberal handful. Think, oh, grateful think !
 How good the God of harvest is to you ;
 Who pours abundance o'er your flowing fields ;
 While these unhappy partners of your kind
 Wide-hover round you like the fowls of heaven,
 And ask their humble dole. The various turns
 Of fortune ponder ; that your sons may want
 What now, with hard reluctance, faint, ye give.

The lovely young Lavinia once had friends ;
 And fortune smil'd, deceitful, on her birth.

For, in her helpless years depriv'd of all,
 Of every stay, save innocence and heaven,
 She, with her widow'd mother, feeble, old,
 And poor, liv'd in a cottage, far retir'd
 Among the windings of a woody vale;
 By solitude and deep surrounding shades,
 But more by bashful modesty, conceal'd.
 Together thus they shunn'd the cruel scorn
 Which virtue, sunk to poverty, would meet
 From giddy passion and low-minded pride:
 Almost on Nature's common bounty fed;
 Like the gay birds that sung them to repose,
 Content, and careless of to-morrow's fare.
 Her form was fresher than the morning rose,
 When the dew wets its leaves; unstain'd and pure,
 As is the lily, or the mountain snow.
 The modest virtues mingled in her eyes,
 Still on the ground dejected, darting all
 Their humid beams into the blooming flowers:
 Or when the mournful tale her mother told,
 Of what her faithless fortune promis'd once,
 Thrill'd in her thought, they, like the dewy star
 Of evening, shone in tears. A native grace
 Sat fair-proportion'd on her polish'd limbs,
 Veil'd in a simple robe, their best attire,
 Beyond the pomp of dress; for loveliness
 Needs not the foreign aid of ornament,
 But is, when unadorn'd, adorn'd the most.
 Thoughtless of beauty, she was beauty's self,
 Recluse amid the close-embowering woods.
 As in the hollow breast of Appenine,
 Beneath the shelter of encircling hills
 A myrtle rises, far from human eye,
 And breathes its balmy fragrance o'er the wild;
 So flourish'd blooming, and unseen by all,
 The sweet Lavinia; till, at length, compell'd
 By strong necessity's supreme command,
 With smiling patience in her looks, she went
 To glean Palemon's fields. The pride of swains
 Palemon was, the generous, and the rich;
 Who led the rural life in all its joy
 And elegance, such as Arcadain song
 Transmits from ancient uncorrupted times;
 When tyrant custom had not shackled man,
 But free to follow nature was the mode.
 He then, his fancy with autumnal scenes
 Amusing, chanc'd beside his reaper-train
 To walk, when poor Lavinia drew his eye;
 Unconscious of her power, and turning quick
 With unaffected blushes from his gaze:
 He saw her charming, but he saw not half
 The charms her downcast modesty conceal'd.
 That very moment love and chaste desire
 Sprung in his bosom, to himself unknown;
 For still the world prevail'd, and its dread laugh,
 Which scarce the firm philosopher can scorn,
 Should his heart own a gleaner in the field:
 And thus in secret to his soul he sigh'd.

"What pity! that so delicate a form,
 "By beauty kindled, where enlivening sense
 "And more than vulgar goodness seem to dwell,
 "Should be devoted to the rude embrace
 "Of some indecent clown! She looks, methinks,
 "Of old Acasto's line; and to my mind
 "Recals that patron of my happy life,
 "From whom my liberal fortune took its rise;
 "Now to the dust gone down; his houses, lands,
 "And once fair-spreading family, dissolv'd.

"Tis said that in some lone obscure retreat,
 "Urg'd by remembrance sad, and decent pride,
 "Far from those scenes which knew their better
 "His aged widow and his daughter live, [days,
 "Whom yet my fruitless search could never find.
 "Romantic wish! would this the daughter were!"

When, strict inquiring, from herself he found
 She was the same, the daughter of his friend,
 Of bountiful Acasto; who can speak
 The mingled passions that surpris'd his heart,
 And through his nerves in shivering transport ran?
 Then blaz'd his smother'd flame, avow'd, and bold;
 And as he view'd her, ardent, o'er and o'er,
 Love, gratitude, and pity, wept at once.
 Confus'd, and frighten'd at his sudden tears,
 Her rising beauties flush'd a higher bloom,
 As thus Palemon, passionate and just,
 Pour'd out the pious rapture of his soul.

"And art thou then Acasto's dear remains?
 "She, whom my restless gratitude has sought
 "So long in vain? O, heavens! the very same,
 "The soften'd image of my noble friend,
 "Alive his every look, his every feature,
 "More elegantly touch'd. Sweeter than Spring!
 "Thou sole surviving blossom from the root
 "That nourish'd up my fortune! Say, ah where,
 "In what sequester'd desert, hast thou drawn
 "The kindest aspect of delighted heaven?
 "Into such beauty spread, and blown so fair;
 "Though poverty's cold wind, and crushing rain,
 "Beat keen, and heavy, on thy tender years?
 "O let me now, into a richer soil, [showers,
 "Transplant thee safe! where vernal suns, and
 "Diffuse their warmest, largest influence;
 "And of my garden be the pride, and joy!
 "Ill it befits thee, oh, it ill befits
 "Acasto's daughter, his whose open stores,
 "Though vast, were little to his ampler heart,
 "The father of a country thus to pick
 "The very refuse of those harvest-fields,
 "Which from his bounteous friendship I enjoy.
 "Then throw that shameful pittance from thy
 "hand,

"But ill apply'd to such a rugged task;
 "The fields, the master, all, my fair, are thine;
 "If to the various blessings which thy house
 "Has on me lavish'd, thou wilt add that bliss,
 "That dearest bliss, the power of blessing thee!"

Here ceas'd the youth, yet still his speaking eye
 Express'd the sacred triumph of his soul,
 With conscious virtue, gratitude, and love,
 Above the vulgar joy divinely rais'd.
 Nor waited he reply. Won by the charm
 Of goodness irresistible, and all
 In sweet disorder lost, she blush'd consent.
 The news immediate to her mother brought,
 While, pierc'd with anxious thought, she pin'd
 The lonely moments for Lavinia's fate; [away
 Amaz'd, and scarce believing what she heard,
 Joy seiz'd her wither'd veins, and one bright gleam
 Of setting life shone on her evening hours:
 Not less enraptur'd than the happy pair;
 Who flourish'd long in tender bliss, and rear'd
 A numerous offspring, lovely like themselves,
 And good, the grace of all the country round.

Defeating oft the labours of the year,
 The sultry south collects a potent blast.
 At first, the groves are scarcely seen to stir

Their trembling tops; and a still murmur runs
Along the soft-inclining fields of corn.
But as th' ærial tempest fuller swells,
And in one mighty stream, invisible,
Immense, the whole excited atmosphere,
Impetuous rushes o'er the sounding world:
Strain'd to the root, the stooping forest pours
A rustling shower of yet untimely leaves,
High-beat, the circling mountains eddy in,
From the bare wild, the dissipated storm,
And send it in a torrent down the vale.
Expos'd, and naked, to its utmost rage,
Through all the sea of harvest rolling round,
The billowy plain floats wide; nor can evade,
Though pliant to the blast, its seizing force;
Or whirl'd in air, or into vacant chaff
Shook waste. And sometimes too a burst of rain,
Swept from the black horizon, broad, descends
In one continuous flood. Still over head
The mingling tempest weaves its gloom, and still
The deluge deepens; till the fields around
Lie sunk, and flatted, in the sordid wave.
Sudden, the ditches swell; the meadows swim.
Red, from the hills, innumerable streams
Tumultuous roar; and high above its banks
The river lift; before whose rushing tide,
Herds, flocks, and harvests, cottages, and swains,
Roll mingled down; all that the winds had spar'd
In one wild moment ruin'd; the big hopes,
And well-earn'd treasures of the painful year.
Fled to some eminence, the husbandman
Helpless beholds the miserable wreck
Driving along; his drowning ox at once
Descending, with his labours scatter'd round,
He sees; and instant o'er his shivering thought
Comes Winter unprovided, and a train
Of clamant children dear. Ye masters, then,
Be mindful of the rough laborious hand,
That sinks you soft in elegance and ease;
Be mindful of those limbs in russet clad,
Whose toil to yours is warmth, and graceful pride;
And, oh! be mindful of that sparing board,
Which covers yours with luxury profuse,
Makes your glass sparkle, and your sense rejoice!
Nor cruelly demand what the deep rains
And all-involving winds have swept away.

Here the rude clamour of the sportsman's joy,
The gun fast-thundering, and the winded horn,
Would tempt the muse to sing the rural game:
How, in his mid-career, the spaniel struck,
Stiff, by the tainted gale, with open nose,
Out-stretch'd, and finely sensible, draws full,
Fearful, and cautious, on the latent prey;
As in the sun the circling covey bask
Their varied plumes, and watchful every way,
Through the rough stubble turn the secret eye.
Caught in the meshy snare, in vain they beat
Their idle wings, entangled more and more:
Nor on the surges of the boundless air,
Though borne triumphant, are they safe; the gun,
Glanc'd just, and sudden, from the fowler's eye
Overtakes their sounding pinions; and again,
Immediate, brings them from the towering wing,
Dead to the ground; or drives them wide-dispers'd,
Wounded, and wheeling various, down the wind.

These are not subjects for the peaceful muse,
Nor will she stain with such her spotless song;
Then most delighted, when she social sees

The whole mix'd animal-creation round,
Alive, and happy. 'Tis not joy to her,
This falsely-cheerful barbarous game of death;
This rage of pleasure, which the restless youth
Awakes, impatient, with the gleaming morn;
When beasts of prey retire, that all night long,
Urg'd by necessity, had rang'd the dark,
As if their conscious ravage shun'd the light,
Asham'd. Not so the steady tyrant man,
Who with the thoughtless insolence of power
Inflam'd, beyond the most infuriate wrath
Of the worst monster that e'er roam'd the waste,
For sport alone pursues the cruel chase,
Amid the beamings of the gentle days.
Upbraid, ye ravening tribes, our wanton rage,
For hunger kindles you, and lawless want;
But lavish fed, in Nature's bounty roll'd,
To joy at anguish, and delight in blood,
Is what your horrid bosoms never knew.

Poor is the triumph o'er the timid hare!
Scar'd from the corn, and now to some lone seat
Retir'd: the rushy fen; the ragged furze,
Stretch'd o'er the stony heath; the stubble chapt;
The thistly lawn; the thick entangled broom;
Of the same friendly hue, the wither'd fern;
The fallow ground laid open to the sun,
Concoctive; and the nodding sandy bank,
Hung o'er the mazes of the mountain brook.
Vain is her best precaution; though she sits
Conceal'd, with folded-ears; unsleeping eyes,
By Nature rais'd to take th' horizon in;
And head couch'd close betwixt her hairy feet,
In act to spring away. The scented dew
Betrays her early labyrinth; and deep,
In scatter'd fullen openings, far behind,
With every breeze she hears the coming storm.
But nearer, and more frequent, as it loads
The sighing gale, she springs amaz'd, and all
The savage soul of game is up at once:
The pack full-opening, various; the shrill horn
Resounded from the hills; the neighing steed,
Wild for the chase; and the loud hunter's shout;
O'er a weak, harmless, flying creature, all
Mix'd in mad tumult, and discordant joy.

The stag, too, singled from the herd, where long
He rang'd the branching monarch of the shades,
Before the tempest drives. At first, in speed
He, sprightly, puts his faith; and, rous'd by fear,
Gives all his swift ærial soul to flight;
Against the breeze he darts, that way the more
To leave the lessening murderous cry behind:
Deception short! though fleetier than the winds
Blown o'er the keen-air'd mountains by the north,
He bursts the thickets, glances through the glades,
And plunges deep into the wildest wood;
If slow, yet sure, adhesive to the track
Hot-steamings, up behind him come again
Th' inhuman route, and from the shady depth
Expel him, circling through his every shift.
He sweeps the forest oft; and sobbing sees
The glades, mild opening to the golden day;
Where, in kind contest, with his butting friends
He wont to struggle, or his loves enjoy.
Oft in the full-descending flood he tries
To lose the scent, and lave his burning sides:
Oft seeks the herd; the watchful herd, alarm'd,
With selfish care avoid a brother's woe.

What shall he do? His once so vivid nerves,

So full of buoyant spirit, now no more
Inspire the course; but fainting breathless toil,
Sick, seizes on his heart: he stands at bay;
And puts his last weak refuge in despair.
The big round tears run down his dappled face;
He groans in anguish; while the growling pack,
Blood-happy, hang at his fair jutting chest,
And mark his beauteous checker'd sides with gore.

Of this enough. But if the sylvan youth,
Whose fervent blood boils into violence,
Must have the chase; behold, despising flight,
The rous'd-up lion, resolute, and slow,
Advancing full on the protended spear,
And coward-band, that circling wheel aloof.
Slunk from the cavern, and the troubled wood,
See the grim wolf; on him his shaggy foe
Vindictive fix, and let the ruffian die:
Or, growling horrid, as the brindled boar
Grins fell destruction, to the monster's heart
Let the dart lighten from the nervous arm.

These Britain knows not; give, ye Britons, then
Your sportive fury, pityless, to pour
Loose on the nightly robber of the fold:
Him, from his craggy winding haunts unearth'd,
Let all the thunder of the chase pursue.
Throw the broad ditch behind you; o'er the hedge
High-bound, resistless; nor the deep morafs
Refuse, but through the shaking wilderness
Pick your nice way; into the perilous flood
Bear fearless, of the raging instinct full;
And as you ride the torrent, to the banks
Your triumph found sonorous, running round,
From rock to rock, in circling echoes tost;
Then scale the mountains to their woody tops;
Rush down the dangerous steep: and o'er the lawn
In fancy swallowing up the space between,
Pour all your speed into the rapid game,
For happy he! who tops the wheeling chase;
Has every maze evolv'd, and every guile
Disclos'd; who knows the merits of the pack;
Who saw the villain seiz'd, and dying hard,
Without complaint, though by an hundred mouths
Relentless torn: O glorious he, beyond
His daring peers! when the retreating horn
Calls them to ghostly halls of gray renown,
With woodland honours grac'd; the fox's fur,
Depending decent from the roof; and spread
Round the drear walls, with antic figures fierce,
The stag's large front: he then is loudest heard,
When the night staggers with severer toils,
With feats Thessalian Centaurs never knew,
And their repeated wonders shake the dome.

But first the fuel'd chimney blazes wide;
The tankards foam; and the strong table groans
Beneath the smoking surloin, stretch'd immense
From side to side; in which, with desperate knife,
They deep incision make, and talk the while
Of England's glory, ne'er to be defac'd
While hence they borrow vigour: or amain
Into the pasty plung'd, at intervals,
If stomach keen can intervals allow,
Relating all the glories of the chase.
Then fated Hunger bids his brother Thirst
Produce the mighty bowl; the mighty bowl,
Swell'd high with fiery juice, steams liberal round
A potent gale, delicious as the breath
Of Maia to the love-sick shepherdess,
On violets diffus'd, while soft she hears

Her panting shepherd stealing to her arms:
Nor wanting is the brown October, drawn,
Mature and perfect, from his dark retreat
Of thirty years; and now his honest front
Flames in the light refulgent, not afraid
Ev'n with the vineyard's best produce to vie.
To cheat the thirsty moments, whist a while
Walks his dull round, beneath a cloud of smoke,
Wreath'd, fragrant, from the pipe; or the quick
In thunder leaping from the box, awake [dice,
The sounding gammon: while romp-loving miss
Is haul'd about, in gallantry robust.

At last these puling idleneffes laid
Aside, frequent and full, the dry divan
Close in firm circle; and set, ardent, in
For serious drinking. Nor evasion fly,
Nor sober shift, is to the puking wretch
Indulg'd apart; but earnest, brimming bowls
Lave every soul, the table floating round,
And pavement, faithless to the fuddled foot.
Thus as they swim in mutual swill, the talk,
Vociferous at once from twenty tongues,
Reels fast from theme to theme; from horses,
To church or mistress, politics or ghost, [hounds,
In endless mazes, intricate, perplex'd.
Meantime, with sudden interruption, loud,
Th' impatient catch bursts from the joyous heart;
That moment touch'd is every kindred soul;
And, opening in a full-mouth'd cry of joy,
The laugh, the slap, the jocund curse, go round;
While, from their slumbers shook, the kennel'd
Mix in the music of the day again. [hounds
As when the tempest, that has vex'd the deep
The dark night long, with fainter murmurs falls:
So gradual sinks their mirth. Their feeble tongues,
Unable to take up the cumbrous word,
Lie quite dissolv'd. Before their maudlin eyes,
Seen dim, and blue, the double tapers dance,
Like the sun wading through the misty sky.
Then sliding soft, they drop. Confus'd above,
Glasses and bottles, pipes and gazetteers,
As if the table ev'n itself was drunk,
Lie a wet broken scene; and wide, below,
Is heap'd the social slaughter; where astride
The lubber power in filthy triumph sits,
Slumberous, inclining still from side to side,
And sleeps them drench'd in potent sleep till morn.
Perhaps some doctor, of tremendous paunch,
Awful and deep, a black abyss of drink,
Outlives them all; and from his bury'd flock
Retiring, full of rumination sad,
Laments the weakness of these latter times.

But if the rougher sex by this fierce sport
Is hurried wild, let not such horrid joy
E'er stain the bosom of the British Fair.
Far be the spirit of the chase from them!
Uncomely courage, unbeseeming skill;
To spring the fence, to rein the prancing steed;
The cap, the whip, the masculine attire;
In which they roughen to the sense, and all
The winning softness of their sex is lost.
In them 'tis graceful to dissolve at woe;
With every motion, every word, to wave
Quick o'er the kindling cheek the ready blush;
And from the smallest violence to shrink
Unequal, then the loveliest in their fears;
And by this silent adulation, soft,
To their protection more engaging man.

O may their eyes no miserable sight,
 Save weeping lovers, see! a nobler game,
 Through love's enchanting wiles pursued, yet fled,
 In chase ambiguous. May their tender limbs
 Float in the loose simplicity of dress!
 And, fashion'd all to harmony, alone
 Know they to seize the captivated soul,
 In rapture warbled from love-breathing lips;
 To teach the lute to languish; with smooth step,
 Disclosing motion in its every charm,
 To swim along, and swell the mazy dance;
 To train the foliage o'er the snowy lawn;
 To guide the pencil, turn the tuneful page;
 To lend new flavour to the fruitful year,
 And heighten Nature's dainties: in their race
 To rear their graces into second life;
 To give society its highest taste;
 Well-ordered home man's best delight to make;
 And by submissive wisdom, modest skill,
 With every gentle care-eluding art,
 To raise the virtues, animate the bliss,
 And sweeten all the toils of human life:
 This be the female dignity and praise.

Ye swains, now hasten to the hazel bank;
 Where, down yon dale, the wildly-winding brook
 Falls hoarse from steep to steep. In close array,
 Fit for the thickets, and the tangling shrub,
 Ye virgins come. For you their latest song
 The woodlands raise; the clustering nuts for you
 The lover finds amid the secret shade;
 And, where they burnish on the topmost bough,
 With active vigour crushes down the tree;
 Or shakes them ripe from the resigning husk,
 A glossy shower, and of an ardent brown,
 As are the ringlets of Melinda's hair:
 Melinda! form'd with every grace complete,
 Yet these neglecting, above beauty wise,
 And far transcending such a vulgar praise.

Hence from the busy joy-resounding fields,
 In cheerful error, let us tread the maze
 Of Autumn, unconfin'd; and taste, reviv'd,
 The breath of orchard big with bending fruit.
 Obedient to the breeze and beating ray,
 From the deep-loaded bough a mellow shower
 Incessant melts away. The juicy pear
 Lies, in a soft profusion, scatter'd round.
 A various sweetness swells the gentle race;
 By Nature's all-refining hand prepar'd;
 Of temper'd sun, and water, earth, and air,
 In ever-changing composition mixt.
 Such, falling frequent through the chiller night
 The fragrant stores, the wide-projected heaps
 Of apples, which the lusty-handed year,
 Innumerable, o'er the blushing orchard shakes.
 A various spirit, fresh, delicious, keen,
 Dwells in their gelid pores; and, active, points
 The piercing cyder for the thirsty tongue:
 Thy native theme, and boon inspirer too,
 Phillips, Pomona's bard, the second thou
 Who nobly durst, in rhyme-unfetter'd verse,
 With British freedom sing the British song:
 How, from Silurian vats, high-sparkling wines
 Foam in transparent floods; some strong, to cheer
 The wintery revels of the labouring hind;
 And tasteful some, to cool the summer-hours.

In this glad season, while his sweetest beams
 The sun sheds equal o'er the meek'd day;
 Oh, lose me in the green delightful walks

VOL. IX.

Of, Doddington, thy seat, serene, and plain;
 Where simple Nature reigns; and every view,
 Diffusive, spreads the pure Dorsetian downs,
 In boundless prospect: yonder shagg'd with wood,
 Here rich with harvest, and there white with flocks!
 Meantime the grandeur of thy lofty dome,
 Far-splendid, seizes on the ravish'd eye.
 New beauties rise with each revolving day;
 New columns swell, and still the fresh Spring fiads
 New plants to quicken, and new groves to green.
 Full of thy genius all! the muses' seat:
 Where in the secret bower, and winding walk,
 For virtuous Young and thee they twine the bay,
 Here wandering oft, fir'd with the restless thirst
 Of thy applause, I solitary court
 Th' inspiring breeze: and meditate the book
 Of nature ever open: aiming thence,
 Warm from the heart, to learn the moral song.
 Here, as I steal along the sunny wall,
 Where Autumn basks, with fruit empurpled deep,
 My pleasing theme continual prompts my thought:
 Presents the downy peach; the shining plumb;
 The ruddy, fragrant nectarine; and dark,
 Beneath his ample leaf, the luscious fig.
 The vine too here her curling tendrils shoots;
 Hangs out her clusters, glowing to the south;
 And scarcely wishes for a warmer sky.
 Turn we a moment fancy's rapid flight
 To vigorous soils, and climes of fair extent;
 Where, by the potent sun, elated high,
 The vineyard swells resplendent on the day;
 Spreads o'er the vale; or up the mountain climbs;
 Profuse; and drinks amid the sunny rocks,
 From cliff to cliff increas'd, the heighten'd blaze.
 Low bend the weighty boughs. The clusters clear,
 Half through the foliage seen, or ardent flame,
 Or shine transparent; while perfection breathes
 White o'er the turgent film the living dew.
 As thus they brighten with exalted juice,
 Touch'd into flavour by the mingling ray;
 The rural youth, and virgins o'er the field,
 Each fond for each to cull th' autumnal prime,
 Exulting rove, and speak the vintage night.
 Then comes the crushing swain; the country floats;
 And foams unbounded with the mazy flood;
 That by degrees fermented and refin'd,
 Round the rais'd nations pours the cup of joy:
 The claret smooth, red as the lip we press
 In sparkling fancy, while we drain the bowl;
 The mellow-tasted Burgundy; and quick,
 As is the wit it gives; the gay Champagne.

Now, by the cool declining year condens'd,
 Descend the copious exhalations, check'd
 As up the middle sky unseen they stole,
 And roll the doubling fogs around the hill.
 No more the mountain, horrid, vast, sublime,
 Who pours a sweep of rivers from his sides,
 And high between contending kingdoms rears
 The rocky long division fills, the view
 With great variety; but in a night
 Of gathering vapour, from the baffled sense
 Sinks dark and dreary. Thence expanding far,
 The huge dusk, gradual, swallows up the plain:
 Vanish the woods; the dim-seen river seems
 Sullen, and slow, to roll the misty wave.
 Ev'n in the height of noon oppress'd, the sun
 Sheds weak, and blunt, his wide refracted ray;
 Whence glaring oft, with many a broaden'd orb,

Q

He frights the nations. Indistinct on earth,
Seen through the turbid air, beyond the life
Objects appear; and, wilder'd, o'er the waste
The shepherd stalks gigantic. Till at last Wreath'd dun around, in deeper circles still Successive closing, fits the general fog
Unbounded o'er the world; and, mingling thick,
A formless gray confusion covers all.
As when of old (so sung the Hebrew bard)
Light, uncollected, through the chaos urg'd
Its infant way; nor order yet had drawn
His lovely train from out the dubious gloom.

These roving mists, that constant now begin
To smoke along the hilly country, these,
With weighty rains, and melted Alpine snows,
The mountain-cisterns fill, those ample stores
Of water, scoop'd among the hollow rocks; [play,
Whence gush the streams, the ceaseless fountains
And their unfailing wealth the rivers draw.
Some sages say, that, where the numerous wave
For ever lashes the resounding shore,
Drill'd through the sandy stratum, every way,
The waters with the sandy stratum rise;
Amid whose angles infinitely strain'd,
They joyful leave their jaggy salts behind,
And clear and sweeten, as they soak along.
Nor stops the restless fluid, mounting still,
Though oft amidst th' irriguous vale it springs;
But to the mountain courted by the sand,
That leads it darkling on in faithful maze,
Far from the parent-main, it boils again
Fresh into day; and all the glittering hill
Is bright with spouting rills. But hence this vain
Amusive dream! why should the waters love
To take so far a journey to the hills,
When the sweet vallies offer to their toil
Inviting quiet, and a nearer bed?
Or if, by blind ambition led astray,
They must aspire; why should they sudden stop
Among the broken mountain's rushy dells,
And, ere they gain its highest peak, desert
Th' attractive sand that charm'd their course so
Besides, the hard agglomerating salts, [long?
The spoil of ages, would impervious choke
Their secret channels; or, by slow degrees,
High as the hills protrude the swelling vales:
Old ocean too, suck'd through the porous globe,
Had long ere now forsook his horrid bed,
And brought Deucalion's watery times again.

Say then, where lurk the vast eternal springs,
That, like creating Nature, lie conceal'd
From mortal eye, yet with their lavish stores
Refresh the globe, and all its joyous tribes?
O, thou pervading genius, given to man,
To trace the secrets of the dark abyss,
O, lay the mountains bare! and wide display
Their hidden structure to th' astonish'd view!
Strip from the branching Alps their piny load;
The huge incumbrance of horrific woods
From the Asian Taurus, from Imaus stretch'd
Athwart the roving Tartar's sullen bounds!
Give opening Hemus to my searching eye,
And high Olympus pouring many a stream!
O, from the sounding summits of the north,
The Dofrine hills, through Scandinavia roll'd
To farthest Lapland and the frozen main;
From lofty Caucasus, far-seen by those
Who in the Caspian and black Euxine toil;

From cold Riphean rocks, which the wild Ruse
Believes the stony girdle * of the world;
And all the dreadful mountains, wrapt in storm,
Whence wide Siberia draws her lonely floods;
O, sweep th' eternal snows! hung o'er the deep
That ever works beneath his sounding base,
Bid Atlas, propping heaven, as poets feign,
His subterranean wonders spread! unveil
The miny caverns, blazing on the day,
Of Abyssinia's cloud compelling cliffs,
And of the bending Mountains † of the Moon!
O'ertopping all these giant sons of earth,
Let the dire Andes, from the radiant line
Stretch'd to the stormy seas that thunder round
The southern pole, their hideous deeps unfold!
Amazing scene! Behold! the glooms disclose,
I see the rivers in their infant beds!
Deep, deep I hear them, labouring to get free!
I see the leaning strata, artful rang'd;
The gaping fissures to receive the rains,
The melting snows, and ever-dripping fogs.
Strow'd bibulous above I see the sands,
The pebbly gravel next, the layers then
Of mingled moulds, of more retentive earths,
The gutter'd rocks, and mazy-running clefts;
That, while the stealing moisture they transmit,
Retard its motion, and forbid its waste.
Beneath th' incessant weeping of these drains,
I see the rocky syphons stretch'd immense,
The mighty reservoirs, of harden'd chalk,
Or stiff compacted clay, capacious form'd.
O'erflowing thence, the congregated stores,
The crystal treasures of the liquid world,
Through the stirr'd sands a bubbling passage burst;
And swelling out, around the middle steep,
Or from the bottoms of the bosom'd hills,
In pure effusion flow. United, thus,
Th' exhaling sun, the vapour-burden'd air,
The gelid mountains, that to rain condens'd
These vapours in continual current draw,
And send them o'er the fair-divided earth,
In bounteous rivers to the deep again,
A social commerce hold, and firm support
The full-adjusted harmony of things.

When Autumn scatters his departing gleams,
Warn'd of approaching Winter, gather'd, play
The swallow-people; and tofs'd wide around,
O'er the calm sky, in convulsion swift,
The feather'd eddy floats; rejoicing once,
Ere to their wintry slumbers they retire;
In clusters clung, beneath the mouldering bank,
And where, unpierc'd by frost, the cavern sweats,
Or rather into warmer climes convey'd,
With other kindred birds of season, there
They twitter cheerful, till the vernal months
Invite them welcome back; for, thronging, now
Innumerable wings are in commotion all.

Where the Rhine loses his majestic force
In Belgian plains, won from the raging deep,
By diligence amazing, and the strong
Unconquerable hand of liberty,

* The Muscovites call the Riphean Mountains Weli-liki Camenypoy, that is, the great stony girdle; because they suppose them to encompass the whole earth.

† A range of mountains in Africa that surround almost all Monomotapa.

The stork-assembly meets; for many a day,
Consulting deep, and various, ere they take
Their arduous voyage through the liquid sky.
And now their rout design'd, their leaders chose,
Their tribes adjusted, clean'd their vigorous wings;
And many a circle, many a short essay,
Wheel'd round and round, in congregation full
The figur'd flight ascends; and, riding high
The aerial billows, mixes with the clouds.

Or where the northern ocean, in vast whirls,
Boils round the naked melancholy isles
Of fairest Thulé, and th' Atlantic surge
Pours in among the stormy Hebrides;
Who can recount what transmigrations there
Are annual made? what nations come and go?
And how the living clouds on clouds arise?
Infinite wings! till all the plume-dark air
And rude resounding shore are one wild cry.

Here the plain harmless native his small flock,
And herd diminutive of many hues,
Tends on the little island's verdant swell,
The shepherd's sea-girt reign; or, to the rocks
Dire-clinging, gathers his ovarious food;
Or sweeps the fishy shore; or treasures up
The plumage, rising full, to form the bed
Of luxury. And here a while the muse,
High hovering o'er the broad cerulean scene,
Sees Caledonia, in romantic view:
Her airy mountains, from the waving main,
Invested with a keen diffusive sky,
Breathing the soul acute; her forests huge,
Incult, robust, and tall, by Nature's hand
Planted of old; her azure lakes between,
Pour'd out extensive, and of watery wealth
Full; winding deep, and green, her fertile vales;
With many a cool translucent brimming flood
Wash'd lovely from the Tweed (pure parent stream
Whose pastoral banks first heard my Doric reed,
With, sylvan Jed, thy tributary brook)
To where the north-inflated tempest foams
O'er Orca's or Betubium's highest peak:
Nurse of a people, in misfortune's school
Train'd up to hardy deeds; soon visited
By learning, when before the Gothic rage
She took her western flight. A manly race,
Of unsubmitting spirit, wise, and brave;
Who still through bleeding ages struggled hard,
(As well unhappy Wallace can attest,
Great patriot-hero! ill-requited chief!)
To hold a generous undiminish'd state;
Too much in vain! Hence of unequal bounds
Impatient, and by tempting glory borne
O'er every land, for every land their life
Has flow'd profuse, their piercing genius plann'd,
And swell'd the pomp of peace their faithful toil.
As from their own clear north, in radiant streams,
Bright over Europe bursts the boreal morn.

Oh, is there not some patriot, in whose power
That best, that godlike luxury is plac'd,
Of blessing thousands, thousands yet unborn,
Through late posterity? some, large of soul,
To cheer dejected industry? to give
A double harvest to the pining swain?
And teach the labouring hind the sweets of toil?
How, by the finest art, the native robe
To weave; how, white as Hyperborean snow,
To form the lucid lawn; with venturous oar
How to dash wide the billow; nor look on,

Shamefully passive; while Batavian fleets
Defraud us of the glittering finny swarms,
That heave our friths, and crowd upon our shores;
How all-enlivening trade to rouse, and wing
The prosperous sail from every growing port,
Uninjur'd, round the sea-encircled globe;
And thus, in soul united as in name,
Bid Britain reign the mistress of the deep?

Yes, there are such. And full on thee, Argyll,
Her hope, her stay, her darling, and her boast,
From her first patriots and her heroes sprung,
Thy fond imploring country turns her eye;
In thee, with all a mother's triumph, sees
Her every virtue, every grace combin'd,
Her genius, wisdom, her engaging turn,
Her pride of honour, and her courage try'd,
Calm, and intrepid, in the very throat
Of sulphurous war, on Tenier's dreadful field.
Nor less the palm of peace inwreathes thy brow:
For, powerful as thy sword, from thy rich tongue
Persuasion flows, and wins the high debate;
While mix'd in thee combine the charm of youth,
The force of manhood, and the depth of age.
Thee, Forbes, too, whom every worth attends,
As truth sincere, as weeping friendship kind,
Thee, truly generous, and in silence great,
Thy country feels through her reviving arts,
Plann'd by thy wisdom, by thy soul inform'd;
And seldom has she known a friend like thee.

But see the fading many-coloured woods,
Shade deepening over shade, the country round
Imbrown'd; a crowded umbrage, dusk, and dun,
Of every hue, from wan-declining green
To sooty dark. These now the lonesome muse,
Low-whispering, lead into their leaf-strown walks,
And give the season in its latest view.

Meantime, light-shadowing all, a sober calm
Fleeces unbounded ether; whose least wave
Stands tremulous, uncertain where to turn
The gentle current: while illumin'd wide,
The dewy-skirted clouds imbibe the sun,
And through their lucid veil his soften'd force
Shed o'er the peaceful world. Then is the time
For those whom wisdom and whom Nature charm,
To steal themselves from the degenerate crowd,
And soar above this little scene of things;
To tread low-thoughted vice beneath their feet;
To soothe the throbbing passions into peace;
And woo lone Quiet in her silent walks.

Thus solitary, and in pensive guise,
Oft let me wander o'er the russet mead,
And through the sadden'd grove, where scarce is heard

One dying strain, to cheer the woodman's toil.
Haply some widow'd songster pours his plaint,
Far, in faint warblings, through the tawny copse.
While congregated thrushes, linnets, larks,
And each wild throat, whose artless strains so late
Swell'd all the music of the swarming shades,
Robb'd of their tuneful souls, now shivering sit
On the dead tree, a dull despondent flock;
With not a brightness waving o'er their plumes,
And nought save chattering discord in their note.
O, let not, aim'd from some inhuman eye,
The gun the music of the coming year
Destroy; and harmless, unsuspecting harm,
Lay the weak tribes a miserable prey,
In mingled murder, fluttering on the ground!

The pale descending year; yet pleasing still,
A gentler mood inspires; for now the leaf
Incessant rustles from the mournful grove;
Oft startling such as, studious, walk below,
And slowly circles through the waving air.
But should a quicker breeze among the boughs
Sob, o'er the sky the leafy deluge streams;
Till chok'd, and matted with the dreary shower,
The forest-walks, at every rising gale,
Roll wide the wither'd waste, and whistle bleak.
Fled is the blasted verdure of the fields;
And, shrunk into their beds, the flowery race
Their sunny robes resign. Ev'n what remain'd
Of stronger fruits falls from the naked tree;
And woods, fields, gardens, orchards, all around
The desolated prospect thrills the soul.

He comes! he comes! in every breeze the power
Of philosophic melancholy comes!
His near-approach the sudden starting tear,
The glowing cheek, the mild dejected air,
The soften'd feature, and the beating heart,
Pierc'd deep with many a virtuous pang, declare.
O'er all the soul his sacred influence breathes!
Inflames imagination; through the breast
Infuses every tenderness; and far
Beyond dim earth exalts the swelling thought.
Ten thousand thousand fleet ideas, such
As never mingled with the vulgar dream,
Crowd fast into the mind's creative eye.
As fast the correspondent passions rise,
As varied, and as high: Devotion rais'd
To rapture, and divine astonishment;
The love of nature unconfin'd, and, chief,
Of human race; the large ambitious wish,
To make them blest; the sigh for suffering worth
Lost in obscurity; the noble scorn
Of tyrant pride; the fearless great resolve;
The wonder which the dying patriot draws,
Inspiring glory through remotest time;
Th' awaken'd throb for virtue, and for fame;
The sympathies of love, and friendship dear;
With all the social offspring of the heart.

Oh, bear me to vast embowering shades,
To twilight groves, and visionary vales;
To weeping grottoes, and prophetic glooms;
Where angel forms athwart the solemn dusk
Tremendous sweep, or seem to sweep along;
And voices more than human, through the void
Deep-sounding, seize th' enthusiastic ear!

Or is this gloom too much? Then lead, ye
That o'er the garden and the rural seat [powers,
Preside, which shining through the cheerful land
In countless numbers blest Britannia sees;
O, lead me to the wide extended walks,
The fair majestic paradise of Stowe*!
Not Persian Cyrus on Ionia's shore
E'er saw such sylvan scenes; such various art
By genius fir'd, such ardent genius tam'd
By cool judicious art; that, in the strife,
All-beauteous Nature fears to be outdone.
And there, O Pitt, thy country's early boast,
There let me sit beneath the shelter'd slopes,
Or in that † Temple where, in future times,
Thou well shalt merit a distinguish'd name;

* The seat of the Lord Viscount Cobham.

† The Temple of Virtue in Stowe Gardens.

And, with thy converse blest, catch the last smiles
Of Autumn beaming o'er the yellow woods.
While there with thee th' enchanted round I walk,
The regulated wild, gay fancy then
Will tread in thought the groves of Attic land;
Will from thy standard taste refine her own,
Correct her pencil to the purest truth
Of Nature, or, the unimpassion'd shades
Forsaking, raise it to the human mind.
Or if hereafter she, with juster hand,
Shall draw the tragic scene, instruct her thou,
To mark the varied movements of the heart,
What every decent character requires,
And every passion speaks: O, through her strain
Breathe thy pathetic eloquence! that moulds
Th' attentive senate, charms, persuades, exalts,
Of honest zeal th' indignant lightning throws,
And shakes corruption on her venal throne.
While thus we talk, and through Elysian vales
Delighted rove, perhaps a sigh escapes:
What pity, Cobham, thou thy verdant files
Of order'd trees shouldst here inglorious range,
Instead of squadrons flaming o'er the field,
And long embattled hosts! when the proud foe,
The faithless vain disturber of mankind,
Insulting Gaul, has rous'd the world to war;
When keen, once more, within their bounds to press
Those polish'd robbers, those ambitious slaves,
The British youth would hail thy wise command,
Thy temper'd ardor, and thy veteran skill.

The western sun withdraws the shorten'd day;
And humid evening, gliding o'er the sky,
In her chill progress, to the ground condens'd
The vapours throws. Where creeping waters ooze,
Where marshes stagnate, and where rivers wind,
Cluster the rolling fogs, and swim along
The dusky-mantled lawn. Mean-while the moon
Full-orb'd, and breaking through the scatter'd
clouds,

Shows her broad visage in the crimson'd east.
Turn'd to the sun direct, her spotted disk,
Where mountain's rise, umbrageous dales descend,
And caverns deep, as optic tube descends,
A smaller earth, gives us his blaze again,
Void of its flame, and sheds a softer day.
Now through the passing cloud she seems to stoop,
Now up the pure cerulean rides sublime.
Wide the pale deluge floats, and streaming mild
O'er the sky'd mountain to the shadowy vale,
While rocks and floods reflect the quivering gleam,
The whole air whitens with a boundless tide
Of silver radiance, trembling round the world.

But when half blotted from the sky her light,
Fainting, permits the starry fires to burn
With keener lustre through the depth of heaven;
Or near extinct her deaden'd orb appears,
And scarce appears, of sickly beamless white;
Oft in this season, silent from the north
A blaze of meteors shoots: ensweeping first
The lower skies, they all at once converge
High to the crown of heaven, and all at once
Relapsing quick as quickly reascend,
And mix, and thwart, extinguish, and renew,
All ether courting in a maze of light.

From look to look, contagious through the crowd,
The panic runs, and into wondrous shapes
Th' appearance throws: armies in meet array,
Throng'd with aerial spears and steeds of fire;

Till the long lines of full-extended war
In bleeding fight commixt, the sanguine flood
Rolls a broad slaughter o'er the plains of heaven.
As thus they scan the visionary scene,
On all sides swell the superstitious din,
Incontinent; and busy frenzy talks
Of blood and battle; cities overturn'd,
And late at night in swallowing earthquake sunk,
Or hideous wrapt in fierce ascending flame;
Of fallow famine, inundation, storm;
Of pestilence, and every great distress;
Empires subvers'd, when ruling fate has struck
Th' unalterable hour: ev'n Nature's self
Is deem'd to totter on the brink of time.
Not so the man of philosophic eye,
And inspect sage; the waving brightness he
Curious surveys, inquisitive to know
The causes, and materials, yet unfix'd,
Of this appearance beautiful and new.

Now black, and deep, the night begins to fall,
A shade immense. Sunk in the quenching gloom,
Magnificent and vast, are heaven and earth.
Order confounded lies; all beauty void;
Distinction lost; and gay variety
One universal blot: such the fair power
Of light, to kindle and create the whole.
Drear is the state of the benighted wretch,
Who then, bewilder'd, wanders through the dark,
Full of pale fancies, and chimeras huge;
Nor visited by one directive ray,
From cottage streaming, or from airy hall.
Perhaps, impatient as he stumbles on,
Struck from the root of slimy rushes, blue,
The wild-fire scatters round, or gather'd trails
A length of flame deceitful o'er the moss:
Whither decoy'd by the fantastic blaze,
Now lost, and now renew'd, he sinks absorpt,
Rider and horse, amid the miry gulf:
While still, from day to day, his pining wife
And plaintive children his return await,
In wild conjecture lost. At other times,
Sent by the better genius of the night,
Innoxious, gleaming on the horse's mane,
The meteor sits; and shows the narrow path,
That winding leads through pits of death, or else
Instructs him how to take the dangerous ford.

The lengthen'd night elaps'd, the morning shines
Serene, in all her dewy beauty bright,
Unfolding fair the last autumnal day.
And now the mounting sun dispels the fog;
The rigid hoar-frost melts before his beam;
And hung on every spray, on every blade
Of grass, the myriad dew-drops twinkle round.

Ah, see, where robb'd, and murder'd, in that pit
Lies the still heaving hive! at evening snatch'd,
Beneath the cloud of guilt-concealing night,
And fix'd o'er sulphur: while, not dreaming ill,
The happy people, in their waxen cells,
Sat tending public cares, and planning schemes
Of temperance, for Winter poor; rejoic'd
To mark, full flowing round, their copious stores.
Sudden the dark oppressive steam ascends;
And, us'd to milder scents, the tender race,
By thousands, tumble from their honey'd domes,
Convolv'd, and agonizing in the dust.
And was it then for this you roam'd the Spring,
Intent from flower to flower? for this you toil'd
Ceaseless the burning Summer-heats away?

For this in Autumn search'd the blooming waste,
Nor lost one sunny gleam? for this sad fate?
O, man! tyrannic lord! how long, how long,
Shall prostrate nature groan beneath your rage,
Awaiting renovation? when oblig'd,
Must you destroy? Of their ambrosial food
Can you not borrow; and, in just return,
Afford them shelter from the wintry winds?
Or, as the sharp year pinches, with their own
Again regale them on some smiling day?
See where the stony bottom of their town
Looks desolate, and wild; with here and there
A helpless number, who the ruin'd state
Survive, lamenting weak, cast out to death.
Thus a proud city, populous and rich,
Full of the works of peace, and high in joy,
At theatre or feast, or sunk in sleep,
(As late, Palermo, was thy fate) is seiz'd
By some dread earthquake, and convulsive hurl'd
Sheer from the black foundation, stench involv'd,
Into a gulf of blue sulphureous flame.

Hence every harsher sight! for now the day,
O'er heaven and earth diffus'd, grows warm, and Infinite splendor! wide investing all. [high,
How still the breeze! save what the filmy threads
Of dew evaporate brushes from the plain.
How clear the cloudless sky! how deeply ting'd
With a peculiar blue! th' ethereal arch
How swell'd immense! amid whose azure thron'd
The radiant sun how gay! how calm below
The gilded earth! the harvest-treasures all
Now gather'd in, beyond the rage of storms,
Sure to the swain; the circling fence shut up;
And instant Winter's utmost rage defy'd.
While, loose to festive joy, the country round
Laughs with the loud sincerity of mirth, [youth,
Shook to the wind their cares. The toil-strung
By the quick sense of music taught alone,
Leaps wildly graceful in the lively dance.
Her every charm abroad, the village-toast,
Young, buxom, warm, in native beauty rich,
Darts not unmeaning looks; and, where her eye
Points an approving smile, with double force,
The cudgel rattles, and the wrestler twines.
Age too shines out; and, garrulous, recounts
The feats of youth. Thus they rejoice; nor think
That, with to-morrow's sun, their annual toil
Begins again the never-ceasing round.

Oh, knew he but his happiness, of men
The happiest he! who, far from public rage,
Deep in the vale, with a choice few retir'd,
Drinks the pure pleasures of the rural life. [gate,
What though the dome be wanting, whose proud
Each morning, vomits out the sneaking crowd
Of flatterers false, and in their turn abus'd?
Vile intercourse! What though the glittering robe,
Of every hue reflected light can give,
Or floating loose, or stiff with mazy gold,
The pride and gaze of fools! oppress him not?
What though, from utmost land and sea purvey'd,
For him each rarer tributary life
Bleeds not, and his insatiate table heaps
With luxury and death? what though his bowl
Flames not with costly juice: nor sunk in beds,
Oft of gay care, he tosses out the night,
Or melts the thoughtless hours in idle state?
What though he knows not those fantastic joys,
That still amuse the wanton, still deceive;

A face of pleasure, but a heart of pain;
 Their hollow moments undelighted all?
 Sure peace is his; a solid life, estrang'd
 To disappointment, and fallacious hope:
 Rich in content, in nature's bounty rich,
 In herbs and fruits; whatever greens the Spring,
 When heaven descends in showers; or bends the bough

When Summer reddens, and when Autumn beams;
 Or in the wintry glebe whatever lies
 Conceal'd, and fattens with the richest sap:
 These are not wanting; nor the milky drove,
 Luxuriant, spread o'er all the lowing vale;
 Nor bleating mountains; nor the chide of streams,
 And hum of bees, inviting sleep sincere
 Into the guiltless breast, beneath the shade,
 Or thrown at large amid the fragrant hay;
 Nor aught besides of prospect, grove, or song,
 Dim grottoes, gleaming lakes, and fountains clear.
 Here too dwells simple truth; plain innocence;
 Unfollied beauty; sound unbroken youth,
 Patient of labour, with a little pleas'd;
 Health ever blooming; unambitious toil;
 Calm contemplation, and poetic ease.

Let others brave the flood in quest of gain,
 And beat, for joyless months, the gloomy wave.
 Let such as deem it glory to destroy,
 Rush into blood, the sack of cities seek;
 Unpierc'd, exulting in the widow's wail,
 The virgin's shriek, and infant's trembling cry.
 Let some far distant from their native soil,
 Urg'd or by want or harden'd avarice,
 Find other lands beneath another sun.
 Let this through cities work his eager way,
 By regal outrage and establish'd guile,
 The social sense extinct; and that ferment
 Mad into tumult the seditious herd,
 Or melt them down to slavery. Let these
 Insnare the wretched in the toils of law,
 Fomenting discord, and perplexing right,
 An iron race! and those of fairer front,
 But equal inhumanity, in courts,
 Delusive pomp, and dark cabals, delight;
 Wreath the deep bow, diffuse the lying smile,
 And tread the weary labyrinth of state.
 While he, from all the stormy passions free
 That restless men involve, hears, and but hears,
 At distance safe, the human tempest roar,
 Wrapt close in conscious peace. The fall of kings,
 The rage of nations, and the crush of states,
 Move not the man, who, from the world escap'd,
 In still retreats, and flowery solitudes,
 To nature's voice attends, from month to month,
 And day to day, through the revolving year;
 Admiring, sees her in her every shape;
 Feels all her sweet emotions at his heart;
 Takes what she liberal gives, nor thinks of more.
 He, when young Spring protrudes the bursting gems,
 Marks the first bud, and sucks the healthful gale
 Into his freshen'd soul; her genial hours

He full enjoys; and not a beauty blows,
 And not an opening blossom breathes in vain.
 In Summer he, beneath the living shade,
 Such as o'er frigid Tempe wont to wave,
 Or Hemus cool, reads what the muse, of these,
 Perhaps, has in immortal numbers sung;
 Or what she dictates writes: and oft, an eye
 Shot round, rejoices in the vigorous year.
 When Autumn's yellow lustre gilds the world,
 And tempts the sickled swain into the field,
 Seiz'd by the general joy, his heart distends
 With gentle throws; and through the tepid gleams
 Deep musing, then he best exerts his song.
 Ev'n Winter, wild to him, is full of bliss.
 The mighty tempest, and the hoary waste,
 Abrupt, and deep, stretch'd o'er the buried earth,
 Awake to solemn thought. At night the skies,
 Disclos'd, and kindled, by refining frost,
 Pours every lustre on th' exalted eye,
 A friend, a book, the stealing hours secure,
 And mark them down for wisdom. With swift wing,
 O'er land and sea imagination roams;
 Or truth, divinely breaking on his mind,
 Elates, his being, and unfolds his powers;
 Or in his breast heroic virtue burns.
 The touch of kindred too and love he feels;
 The modest eye, whose beams on his alone
 Ecstatic shine; the little strong embrace
 Of prattling children, twin'd around his neck,
 And emulous to please him, calling forth
 The fond parental soul. Nor purpose gay,
 Amusement, dance, or song, he sternly scorns;
 For happiness and true philosophy
 Are of the social still, and smiling kind.
 This is the life which those who fret in guilt,
 And guilty cities, never knew; the life,
 Led by primeval ages, uncorrupt,
 When angels dwelt, and God himself, with man!
 Oh, Nature! all-sufficient! over all!
 Enrich me with the knowledge of thy works!
 Snatch me to heaven; thy rolling wonder there,
 World beyond world, in infinite extent,
 Profusely scatter'd o'er the blue immense,
 Show me; their motions, periods, and their laws,
 Give me to scan; through the disclosing deep
 Light my blind way; the mineral strata there;
 Thrust, blooming, thence the vegetable world;
 O'er that the rising system, more complex,
 Of animals; and higher still, the mind,
 The varied scene of quick-compounded thought,
 And where the mixing passions endless shift;
 These ever open to my ravish'd eye;
 A search, the flight of time can ne'er exhaust!
 But if to that unequal; if the blood,
 In sluggish streams about my heart, forbid
 That best ambition; under closing shades,
 Inglorious, lay me by the lowly brook,
 And whisper to my dreams. From thee begin,
 Dwell all on thee, with thee conclude my song;
 And let me never, never stray from thee!

W I N T E R. 1726.

The Argument.

The subject proposed. Address to the Earl of Wilmington. First approach of Winter. According to the natural course of the Season, various storms described. Rain. Wind. Snow. The driving of the snows: a man perishing among them; whence reflections on the wants and miseries of human life. The wolves descending from the Alps and Apennines. A Winter Evening described: as spent by philosophers; by the country people; in the city. Frost. A view of Winter within the Polar Circle. A thaw. The whole concluding with moral reflections on a future state.

SEE, Winter comes, to rule the varied year,
Sullen and sad, with all his rising train:
Vapours, and clouds, and storms. Be these my theme,
These! that exalt the soul to solemn thought,
And heavenly musing. Welcome, kindred glooms!
Congenial horrors, hail! with frequent foot,
Pleas'd have I, in my cheerful morn of life,
When nurs'd by careless solitude I liv'd,
And sung of Nature with unceasing joy,
Pleas'd have I wander'd through your rough domain;
Trod the pure virgin-snows, myself as pure;
Heard the winds roar, and the big torrent burst;
Or seen the deep fermenting tempest brew'd,
In the grim evening sky. Thus pass'd the time,
Till through the lucid chambers of the south
Look'd out the joyous Spring, look'd out, and smil'd.

To thee, the patron of her first essay,
The muse, O Wilmington! renews her song.
Since has she rounded the revolving year:
Skim'd the gay Spring; on eagle-pinions borne,
Attempted through the Summer-blaze to rise;
Then swept o'er Autumn with the shadowy gale;
And now among the wintery clouds again,
Roll'd in the doubling storm, she tries to soar;
To swell her note with all the rushing winds;
To suit her sounding cadence to the floods;
As is her theme, her numbers wildly great:
Thrice happy! could she fill thy judging ear
With bold description, and with manly thought.
Nor art thou skill'd in awful schemes alone,
And how to make a mighty people thrive:
But equal goodness, sound integrity,
A firm unshaken uncorrupted soul
Amid a sliding age, and burning strong,
Not vainly blazing for thy country's weal,
A steady spirit regularly free;
These, each exalting each, the statesman light
Into the patriot; these, the public hope
And eye to thee converting, bid the muse
Record what envy dares not flattery call.

Now when the cheerless empire of the sky
To Capricorn the Centaur Archer yields,
And fettee Aquarius stains th' inverted year;
Hung o'er the farthest verge of heaven, the sun
Scarce spreads through ether the dejected day.
Faint are his gleams, and ineffectual shoot
His struggling rays, in horizontal lines,
Through the thick air; as, cloth'd in cloudy storm,
Weak, wan, and broad, he skirts the southern sky;
And, soon-descending, to the long dark night,

Wide-shading all, the prostrate world resigns.
Nor is the night unwish'd; while vital heat,
Light, life, and joy, the dubious day forsake.
Meantime, in sable-cincture, shadows vast,
Deep-ting'd and damp, and congregated clouds,
And all the vapoury turbulence of heaven,
Involve the face of things. Thus Winter falls,
A heavy gloom oppressive o'er the world,
Through nature shedding influence malign,
And rouses up the seeds of dark disease.
The soul of man dies in him, loathing life,
And black with more than melancholy views.
The cattle droop; and o'er the furrow'd land,
Fresh from the plough, the dun discolour'd flocks,
Untended spreading, crop the wholesome root.
Along the woods, along the moorish fens,
Sighs the sad genius of the coming storm;
And up among the loose disjointed cliffs,
And fractur'd mountains wild, the brawling brook
And cave, presageful, send a hollow moan,
Resounding long in listening fancy's ear.

Then comes the father of the tempest forth,
Wrapt in black glooms. First joyless rains obscure
Drive through the mingling skies with vapour foul;
Dash on the mountain's brow, and shake the woods,
That grumbling wave below. Th' unfightly plain
Lies a brown deluge; as the low-bent clouds
Pour flood on flood, yet unexhausted still
Combine, and deepening into night shut up
The day's fair face. The wanderers of heaven,
Each to his home, retire; save those that love
To take their pastime in the troubled air,
Or skimming flutter round the dimply pool.
The cattle from th' untasted fields return,
And ask, with meaning lowe, their wonted stalls,
Or ruminate in the contiguous shade.

Thither the household feathery people crowd,
The crested cock, with all his female train,
Pensive, and dripping; while the cottage-hind
Hangs o'er th' enlivening blaze, and taleful there
Recounts his simple frolic: much he talks,
And much he laughs, nor recks the storm that Without, and rattles on his humble roof. [blows

Wide o'er the brim, with many a torrent swell'd,
And the mix'd ruin of its banks o'erspread,
At last the rous'd-up river pours along:
Resistless, roaring, dreadful, down it comes,
From the rude mountain, and the mossy wild,
Tumbling through rocks abrupt, and sounding far;
Then o'er the sand'd valley floating spreads,

Calm, sluggish, silent; till again, constrain'd
Between two meeting hills, it bursts away,
Where rocks and woods o'erhang the turbid stream;
There gathering triple force, rapid, and deep,
It boils, and wheels, and foams, and thunders through.

Nature! great parent! whose unceasing hand
Rolls round the Seasons of the changeful year,
How mighty, how majestic, are thy works!
With what a pleasing dread they swell the soul!
That sees astonish'd! and astonish'd sings!
Ye too, ye winds! that now begin to blow,
With boisterous sweep, I raise my voice to you.
Where are your stores, ye powerful beings! say,
Where your aerial magazines reserv'd,
To swell the brooding terrors of the storm?
In what far-distant region of the sky,
Hush'd in deep silence, sleep ye when 'tis calm?

When from the pallid sky the sun descends,
With many a spot, that o'er his glaring orb
Uncertain wanders, stain'd; red fiery streaks
Begin to flush around. The reeling clouds
Stagger with dizzy poise, as doubting yet
Which master to obey: while rising slow,
Blank, in the leaden-colour'd east, the moon
Wears a wan circle round her blunted horns.
Seen through the turbid fluctuating air,
The stars obtuse emit a shiver'd ray;
Or frequent seem to shoot athwart the gloom,
And long behind them trail the whitening blaze.
Snatch'd in short eddies, plays the wither'd leaf;
And on the flood the dancing feather floats.
With broaden'd nostrils to the sky up-turn'd,
The conscious heifer snuffs the stormy gale.
Ev'n as the matron, at her nightly task,
With pensive labour draws the flaxen thread,
The wasted taper and the crackling flame
Foretell the blast. But chief the plummy race,
The tenants of the sky, its changes speak.
Retiring from the downs, where all day long
They pick'd their scanty fare, a blackening train
Of clamorous rooks thick urge their weary flight,
And seek the closing shelter of the grove;
Assiduous, in his bower, the wailing owl
Plies his sad song. The cormorant on high
Wheels from the deep, and screams along the land.
Loud shrieks the soaring hern; and with wild
wing

The circling sea-fowl cleave the flaky clouds.
Ocean, unequal press'd, with broken tide
And blind commotion heaves; while from the shore,

Eat-into caverns by the restless wave,
And forest-rustling mountains, comes a voice,
That solemn sounding bids the world prepare.
Then issues forth the storm with sudden burst,
And hurls the whole precipitated air,
Down, in a torrent. On the passive main
Descends th' ethereal force, and with strong gust
Turns from its bottom the discolour'd deep.
Through the black night that sits immense around,
Lash'd into foam, the fierce conflicting brine
Seems o'er a thousand raging waves to burn:
Meantime the mountain-billows to the clouds
In dreadful tumult swell'd, surge above surge,
Burst into chaos with tremendous roar,
And anchor'd navies from their stations drive,
Wild as the winds across the howling waste

Of mighty waters: now th' inflated wave
Straining they scale, and now impetuous shoot
Into the secret chambers of the deep,
The wintery Baltic thundering o'er their head.
Emerging thence again, before the breath
Of full-exerted heaven they wing their course,
And dart on distant coasts; if some sharp rock,
Or shoal insidious break not their career,
And in loose fragments fling them floating round.

Nor less at land the loosen'd tempest reigns.
The mountain thunders; and its sturdy sons
Stoop to the bottom of the rocks they shade.
Lone on the midnight steep, and all aghast,
The dark way-faring stranger breathless toils,
And, often falling, climbs against the blast.
Low waves the rooted forest, vex'd and sheds
What of its tarnish'd honours yet remain;
Dash'd down, and scatter'd by the tearing wind's
Assiduous fury, its gigantic limbs.
Thus struggling through the dissipat'd grove,
The whirling tempest raves along the plain;
And on the cottage thatch'd, or lordly roof,
Keen-fastening, shakes them to the solid base.
Sleep frighted flies; and round the rocking dome,
For entrance eager, howls the savage blast.
Then too, they say, through all the burden'd air,
Long groans are heard, shrill sounds, and distant sighs
That, utter'd by the demon of the night,
Warn the devoted wretch of woe and death.

Huge uproar lords it wide. The clouds commixt
With stars swift gliding sweep along the sky.
All nature reels. Till Nature's King, who oft
Amid tempestuous darkness dwells alone,
And on the wings of careering wind
Walks dreadfully serene, commands a calm;
Then strait air, sea, and earth, are hush'd at once.

As yet 'tis midnight deep. The weary clouds,
Slow-meeting, mingle into solid gloom.
Now, while the drowsy world lies lost in sleep,
Let me associate with the serious night,
And Contemplation her sedate compeer;
Let me shake off th' intrusive cares of day,
And lay the meddling senses all aside.

Where now, ye lying vanities of life!
Ye ever-tempting, ever-cheating train!
Where are you now? and what is your amount?
Vexation, disappointment, and remorse.
Sad, sickening thought! and yet deluded man,
A scene of crude disjointed visions past,
And broken slumbers, rises still resolv'd,
With new-flush'd hopes, to run the giddy round.

Father of light and life! thou Good supreme!
O, teach me what is good! teach me Thyself!
Save me from folly, vanity, and vice,
From every low pursuit! and feed my soul
With knowledge, conscious peace, and virtue pure;
Sacred, substantial, never-fading bliss!

The keener tempests rise: and, fuming dun
From all the livid east, or piercing north,
Thick clouds ascend; in whose capacious womb
A vapoury deluge lies, to snow congeal'd.
Heavy they roll their fleecy world along;
And the sky saddens with the gather'd storm.
Through the hush'd air the whitening shower descends,
At first thin wavering; till at last the flakes
Fall broad, and wide, and fast, dimming the day,
With a continual flow. The cherish'd fields

Put on their winter-robe of purest white.
 'Tis brightness all; save where the new snow melts
 Along the mazy current. Low, the woods
 Bow their hoar head; and, ere the languid sun
 Faint from the west emits his evening ray,
 Earth's universal face, deep hid, and chill,
 Is one wide dazzling waste, that buries wide
 The works of man. Drooping, the labourer-ox
 Stands cover'd o'er with snow, and then demands
 The fruit of all his toil. The fowls of heaven,
 Tam'd by the cruel season, crowd around
 The winnowing store, and claim thy little boon
 Which Providence assigns them. One alone,
 The red-breast, sacred to the household gods,
 Wisely regardful of th' embroiling sky,
 In joyless fields, and thorny thickets, leaves
 His shivering mates, and pays to trusted man
 His annual visit. Half-afraid, he first
 Against the window beats: then, brisk, alights
 On the warm hearth; then, hopping o'er the floor,
 Eyes all the smiling family askance,
 And pecks, and starts, and wonders where he is:
 Till, more familiar grown, the table-crumb
 Attract his slender feet. The foodless wilds
 Pour forth their brown inhabitants. The hare,
 Though timorous of heart, and hard beset
 By death in various forms, dark snares, and dogs,
 And more un pitying men, the garden seeks,
 Urg'd on by fearless want. The bleating kind
 Eye the bleak heaven, and next the glistening earth,
 With looks of dumb despair, then, sad-dispers'd,
 Dig for the wither'd herb through heaps of snow.

Now, shepherds, to your helpless charge be kind;
 Baffle the raging year, and fill their pens
 With food at will; lodge them below the storm,
 And watch them strict: for from the bellowing east,
 In this dire season, oft the whirlwind's wing
 Sweeps up the burthen of whole wintery plains
 At one wide waft, and o'er the hapless flocks,
 Hid in the hollow of two neighboring hills,
 The bellowy tempest whelms; till, upward urg'd,
 The valley to a shining mountain swells,
 Tipt with a wreath high-curling in the sky.

As thus the snows arise; and foul, and fierce,
 All Winter drives along the darken'd air;
 In his own loose-revolving fields, the swain
 Disaster'd stands; sees other hills ascend,
 Of unknown joyless brow; and other scenes,
 Of horrid prospect, shag the trackless plain;
 Nor find the river, nor the forest, hid
 Beneath the formless wild; but wanders on
 From hill to dale, still more and more astray;
 Impatient flouncing through the drifted heaps,
 Stung with the thoughts of home; the thoughts of home

Rush on his nerves, and call their vigour forth
 In many a vain attempt. How sinks his soul!
 What black despair, what horror, fills his heart!
 When for the dusky spot, which fancy feign'd
 His tufted cottage rising through the snow,
 He meets the roughness of the middle waste,
 Far from the track, and blest abode of man;
 While round him night resistless closes fast,
 And every tempest, howling o'er his head,
 Renders the savage wilderness more wild.
 Then throng the busy shapes into his mind,
 Of cover'd pits, unfathomably deep,
 A dire descent! beyond the power of frost;

Of faithless bogs; of precipices huge,
 Smooth'd up with snow; and, what is land, un-
 What water of the still unfrozen spring, [known,
 In the loose marsh of solitary lake,
 Where the fresh fountain from the bottom boils.
 These check his fearful steps; and down he sinks
 Beneath the shelter of the shapeless drift,
 Thinking o'er all the bitterness of death,
 Mix'd with the tender anguish nature shoots
 Through the wrung bosom of the dying man,
 His wife, his children, and his friends unseen.
 In vain for him th' officious wife prepares
 The fire fair-blazing, and the vestment warm;
 In vain his little children, peeping out
 Into the mingling storm, demand their fire,
 With tears of artless innocence. Alas!
 Nor wife, nor children, more shall he behold,
 Nor friends, nor sacred home. On every nerve
 The deadly winter seizes; shuts up sense;
 And, o'er his inmost vitals creeping cold,
 Lays him along the snows, a stiffen'd corse,
 Stretch'd out, and bleaching in the northern blast.

Ah, little think the gay licentious proud,
 Whom pleasure, power, and affluence surround;
 They, who their thoughtless hours in giddy mirth,
 And wanton, often cruel, riot waste;
 Ah, little think they, while they dance along,
 How many feel, this very moment, death
 And all the sad variety of pain.
 How many sink in the devouring flood,
 Or more devouring flame. How many bleed,
 By shameful variance betwixt man and man.
 How many pine in want, and dungeon glooms;
 Shut from the common air, and common use
 Of their own limbs. How many drink the cup
 Of baleful grief, or eat the bitter bread
 Of misery. Sore pierc'd by wintery winds,
 How many shrink into the sordid hut
 Of cheerless poverty. How many shake
 With all the fiercer tortures of the mind,
 Unbounded passion, madness, guilt, remorse;
 Whence tumbled headlong from the height of life,
 They furnish matter for the tragic muse.
 Ev'n in the vale, where wisdom loves to dwell,
 With friendship, peace, and contemplation join'd,
 How many, rack'd with honest passions, droop
 In deep retir'd distress. How many stand
 Around the death-bed of their dearest friends,
 And point the parting anguish. Thought fond man
 Of these, and all the thousand nameless ills,
 That one incessant struggle render life,
 One scene of toil, of suffering, and of fate,
 Vice in his high career would stand appall'd,
 And heedless rambling impulse learn to think;
 The conscious heart of charity would warm,
 And her wide wish benevolence dilate,
 The social tear would rise, the social sigh;
 And into clear perfection, gradual bliss,
 Refining still, the social passions work.

And here can I forget the generous * band,
 Who, touch'd with human woe, redressive search'd
 Into the horrors of the gloomy jail?
 Unpitied, and unheard, where misery moans;
 Where sickness pines; where thirst and hunger
 burn,
 And poor misfortune feels the lash of vice.

* The Gaol Committee in the year 1729.

While in the land of liberty, the land
Whose every street and public meeting glow
With open freedom, little tyrants rag'd;
Snatch'd the lean morsel from the starving mouth;
Tore from cold wintery limbs the tatter'd weed;
Ev'n robb'd them of the last of comforts, sleep;
The free-born Briton to the dungeon chain'd,
Or, as the lust of cruelty prevail'd,
At pleasure mark'd him with inglorious stripes;
And crush'd out lives, by secret barbarous ways,
That for their country would have toil'd, or bled.
O, great design! if executed well,
With patient care, and wisdom-temper'd zeal.
Ye sons of mercy! yet resume the search;
Drag forth the legal monsters into light,
Wrench from their hands oppression's iron rod,
And bid the cruel feel the pains they give.
Much still untouch'd remains; in this rank age,
Much is the patriot's weeding hand requir'd.
The toils of law, (what dark insidious men
Have cumberous added to perplex the truth,
And lengthen simple justice into trade)
How glorious were the day! that saw these broke,
And every man within the reach of right.

By wintery famine rous'd, from all the tract
Of horrid mountains which the shining Alps,
And wavy Appenine, and Pyrenees,
Branch out stupendous into distant lands;
Cruel as death, and hungry as the grave!
Burning for blood! bony, and ghaut, and grim!
Assembling wolves in raging troops descend;
And, pouring o'er the country, bear along,
Keen as the north-wind sweeps the glossy snow.
All is their prize. They fasten on the steed,
Press him to earth, and pierce his mighty heart.
Nor can the bull his awful front defend,
Or shake the murdering savages away.
Rapacious, at the mother's throat they fly,
And tear the screaming infant from her breast.
The godlike face of man avails him nought.
Ev'n beauty, force divine! at whose bright glance
The generous lion stands in soften'd gaze,
Here bleeds, a hapless undistinguish'd prey.
But if, appriz'd of the severe attack,
The country be shut up, lur'd by the scent,
On church-yards drear (inhuman to relate!)
The disappointed prowlers fall, and dig
The shrouded body from the grave; o'er which,
Mix'd with foul shades, and frightened ghosts, they howl.

Among those hilly regions, where embrac'd
In peaceful vales the happy Grisons dwell.
Oft, rushing sudden from the loaded cliffs,
Mountains of snow their gathering terrors roll.
From sleep to sleep, loud thundering, down they
A wintery waste in dire commotion all; [come,
And herds, and flocks, and travellers, and swains,
And sometimes whole brigades of marching troops,
Or hamlets sleeping in the dead of night,
Are deep beneath the smothering ruin whelm'd.

Now, all amid the rigours of the year,
In the wild depth of Winter, while without
The ceaseless winds blow ice, be my retreat,
Between the groaning forest and the shore
Beat by the boundless multitude of waves;
A rural, shelter'd, solitary scene;
Where ruddy fire and beaming tapers join,
To cheer the gloom. There studious let me sit,

And hold high converse with the mighty dead;
Sages of ancient time, as gods rever'd,
As gods beneficent, who blest mankind
With arts, with arms, and humaniz'd a world.
Rous'd at th' inspiring thought, I throw aside
The long-liv'd volume; and, deep musing, hail
The sacred shades, that slowly-rising pass
Before my wondering eyes. First Socrates,
Who, firmly good in a corrupted state,
Against the rage of tyrants single stood,
Invincible! calm reason's holy law,
That voice of God within th' attentive mind,
Obeying, fearless, or in life, or death:
Great moral teacher! wisest of mankind!
Solon the next, who built his common-weal
On equity's wide base; by tender laws
A lively people curbing, yet undamp'd
Preserving still that quick peculiar fire,
Whence in the laurel'd field of finer arts,
And of bold freedom, they unequal'd shone,
The pride of smiling Greece, and human-kind.
Lycurgus then, who bow'd beneath the force
Of strictest discipline, severely wise,
All human passions. Following him, I see,
As at Thermopylae he glorious fell,
The firm * devoted chief, who prov'd by deeds
The hardest lesson which the other taught.
Then Aristides lifts his honest front;
Spotless of heart, to whom th' unflattering voice
Of freedom gave the noblest name of Just;
In pure majestic poverty rever'd;
Who, ev'n his glory to his country's weal
Submitting, swell'd a haughty † rival's fame.
Rear'd by his care, of softer ray appears
Cimon sweet-soul'd; whose genius, rising strong,
Shook off the load of young debauch; abroad
The scourge of Persian pride, at home the friend
Of every worth and every splendid art;
Modest, and simple, in the pomp of wealth.
Then the last worthies of declining Greece,
Late call'd to glory, in unequal times,
Pensive, appear. The fair Corinthian boast,
Timoleon, happy temper! mild and firm,
Who wept the brother, while the tyrant bled.
And, equal to the best, the † Theban pair,
Whose virtues in heroic concord join'd,
Their country rais'd to freedom, empire, fame.
He too, with whom Athenian honour sunk;
And left a mass of sordid lees behind;
Phocion the good; in public life severe,
To virtue still inexorably firm;
But when, beneath his low illustrious roof,
Sweet peace and happy wisdom smooth'd his brow,
Not friendship softer was, nor love more kind.
And he, the last of old Lycurgus' sons,
The generous victim to that vain attempt,
To save a rotten state, Agis, who saw
Ev'n Sparta's self to servile avarice sunk.
The two Achaian heroes close the train:
Aratus, who a while relum'd the soul
Of fondly lingering liberty in Greece:
And he her darling as her latest hope,
The gallant Philopœmen; who to arms
Turn'd the luxurious pomp he could not cure;

* Leonidas.

† Themistocles.

‡ Pelopidas and Epaminondas.

Or toiling in his farm, a simple swain;
 Or, bold and skilful, thundering in the field.
 Of rougher front, a mighty people come!
 A race of heroes! in those virtuous times
 Which knew no stain, save that with partial flame
 Their dearest country they too fondly lov'd:
 Her better founder first, the light of Rome,
 Numa, who soften'd her rapacious sons:
 Servius the King, who laid the solid base
 On which o'er earth the vast republic spread.
 Then the great consuls venerable rise.
 The * public father who the private quell'd,
 As on the dread tribunal sternly sad.
 He, whom his thankless country could not lose,
 Camillus, only vengeful to his foes.
 Fabricius, scorn of all-conquering gold;
 And Cincinnatus, awful from the plough.
 Thy † willing victim, Carthage, bursting loose
 From all that pleading Nature could oppose,
 From a whole city's tears, by rigid faith
 Imperious call'd, and honour's dire command.
 Scipio, the gentle chief, humanely brave,
 Who soon the race of spotless glory ran,
 And, warm in youth, to the poetic shade
 With Friendship and Philosophy retir'd.
 Tully, whose powerful eloquence a while
 Restrain'd the rapid fate of rushing Rome.
 Unconquer'd Cato, virtuous in extreme.
 And thou, unhappy Brutus, kind of heart,
 Whose steady arm, by awful virtue urg'd,
 Lifted the Roman steel against thy friend.
 Thousands besides the tribute of a verse
 Demand; but who can count the stars of heaven?
 Who sing their influence on this lower world?
 Behold, who yonder comes! in sober state,
 Fair, mild, and strong, as is a vernal sun:
 'Tis Phœbus self, or else the Mantuan swain!
 Great Homer too appears, of daring wing,
 Parent of song! and equal by his side,
 The British muse; join'd hand in hand they walk,
 Darkling, full up the middle steep to fame.
 Nor absent are those shades, whose skilful touch
 Pathetic drew th' impassion'd heart, and charm'd
 Transported Athens with the moral scene:
 Nor those who, tuneful, wak'd th' enchanting lyre.
 First of your kind! society divine!
 Still visit thus my nights, for you reserv'd,
 And mount my soaring soul to thoughts like yours,
 Silence, thou lonely power! the door be thine;
 See on the hallow'd hour that none intrude,
 Save a few chosen friends, who sometimes deign
 To bless my humble roof, with sense refin'd,
 Learning digested well, exalted faith,
 Unstudy'd wit, and humour ever gay,
 Or from the muse's hill will Pope descend,
 To raise the sacred hour, to bid it smile,
 And with the social spirit warm the heart?
 For though not sweeter his own Homer sings,
 Yet is his life the more endearing song.
 Where art thou, Hammond? thou the darling
 pride,
 The friend and lover of the tuneful throng!
 Ah, why, dear youth, in all the blooming prime
 Of vernal genius, where disclosing fast
 Each active worth, each manly virtue lay,

Why wert thou ravish'd from our hope so soon?
 What now avails that noble thirst of fame,
 Which stung thy fervent breast? that treasur'd
 store
 Of knowledge, early gain'd? that eager zeal
 To serve thy country, glowing in the band
 Of youthful patriots, who sustain her name?
 What now, alas! that life-diffusing charm
 Of sprightly wit? that rapture for the muse,
 That heart of friendship, and that soul of joy,
 Which bade with softest light thy virtues smile?
 Ah! only show'd, to check our fond pursuits,
 And teach our humbled hopes that life is vain!
 Thus in some deep retirement would I pass
 The winter-gloom, with friends of pliant soul,
 Or blithe, or solemn, as the theme inspir'd:
 With them would search, if Nature's boundless
 frame

Was call'd, late rising from the void of night,
 Or sprung eternal from th' Eternal Mind;
 Its life, its laws, its progress and its end.
 Hence larger prospects of the beauteous whole
 Would, gradual, open on our opening minds;
 And each diffusive harmony unite
 In full perfection to th' astonish'd eye.
 Then would we try to scan the moral world,
 Which, though to us it seems embroil'd, moves on
 In higher order; fitted, and impell'd,
 By Wisdom's finest hand, and issuing all
 In general good. The sage historic muse
 Should next conduct us through the deeps of time:
 Show us how empire grew, declin'd, and fell,
 In scatter'd states; what makes the nations smile,
 Improves their soil, and gives them double suns;
 And why they pine beneath the brightest skies,
 In Nature's richest lap. As thus we talk'd,
 Our hearts would burn within us, would inhale
 The portion of divinity, that ray
 Of purest heaven, which lights the public soul
 Of patriots, and of heroes. But if doom'd,
 In powerless humble fortune, to repress
 These ardent risings of the kindling soul;
 Then, ev'n superior to ambition, we
 Would learn the private virtues how to glide
 Through shades and plains, along the smoothest
 Of rural life; or snatch'd away by hope, [stream
 Through the dim spaces of futurity,
 With earnest eye anticipate those scenes
 Of happiness, and wonder; where the mind,
 In endless growth and infinite ascent,
 Rises from state to state, and world to world.
 But when with these the serious thought is soil'd,
 We, shifting for relief, would play the shapes
 Of frolic fancy; and incessant form
 Those rapid pictures, that assembled train
 Of fleet ideas, never join'd before,
 Whence lively wit excites to gay surprise;
 Or folly-painting humour, grave himself,
 Calls laughter forth, deep-shaking every nerve.
 Meantime the village rouses up the fire;
 While well attested and as well believ'd,
 Heard solemn, goes the goblin-story round;
 Till superstitious horror creeps o'er all.
 Or, frequent in the sounding hall, they wake
 The rural gambol. Rustic mirth goes round;
 The simple joke that takes the shepherd's heart,
 Easily pleas'd; the long loud laugh, sincere;
 The kiss, snatch'd hasty from the side-long maid

† Regulus.

On purpose guardless, or pretending sleep:
 The leap, the flap, the haul; and, shook to notes
 Of native music, the respondent dance.
 Thus jocund fleets with them the winter-night.
 The city swarms intense. The public haunt,
 Full of each theme, and warm with mixt discourse,
 Hums indistinct. The sons of riot flow
 Down the loose stream of false enchanted joy,
 To swift destruction. On the rankled soul
 The gaming fury fall; and in one gulf
 Of total ruin, honour, virtue, peace,
 Friends, families, and fortune, headlong sink.
 Up-springs the dance along the lighted dome,
 Mix'd, and evolv'd, a thousand sprightly ways.
 The glittering court effuses every pomp;
 The circle deepens: beam'd from gaudy robes,
 Tapers, and sparkling gems, and radiant eyes,
 A soft effulgence o'er the palace waves:
 While, a gay insect in his summer-shine,
 The fop, light-fluttering, spreads his mealy wings.
 Dread o'er the scene, the ghost of Hamlet stalks;
 Othello rages; poor Monimia mourns;
 And Belvidera pours her soul in love.
 Terror alarms the breast; the comely tear
 Steals o'er the cheek: or else the comic muse
 Holds to the world a picture of itself,
 And raises fly the fair impartial laugh.
 Sometimes she lifts her strain, and paints the scenes
 Of beauteous life; whate'er can deck mankind,
 Or charm the heart, in generous * Bevil show'd.
 O, thou, whose wisdom, solid yet refin'd,
 Whose patriot-virtues, and consummate skill
 To touch the finer springs that move the world,
 Join'd to whate'er the graces can bestow,
 And all Apollo's animating fire,
 Give thee, with pleasing dignity, to shine
 At once the guardian, ornament, and joy,
 Of polish'd life; permit the rural muse,
 O Chesterfield, to grace with thee her song!
 Ere to the shades again she humbly flies,
 Indulge her fond ambition, in thy train,
 (For every muse has in thy train a place)
 To mark thy various full-accomplish'd mind:
 To mark that spirit, which, with British scorn,
 Rejects th' allurements of corrupted power;
 That elegant politeness, which excels,
 Ev'n in the judgment of presumptuous France,
 The boasted manners of her shining court;
 That wit, the vivid energy of sense,
 The truth of nature, which, with Attic point,
 And kind well-temper'd satire, smoothly keen,
 Steals through the soul, and without pain corrects.
 Or, rising thence with yet a brighter flame,
 O, let me hail thee on some glorious day,
 When to the listening senate, ardent, crowd
 Britannia's sons to hear her pleaded cause.
 Then dress'd by thee, more amiably fair,
 Truth the soft robe of mild persuasion wears:
 Thou to assenting reason giv'st again
 Her own enlighten'd thoughts; call'd from the heart,
 Th' obedient passions on thy voice attend;
 And ev'n reluctant party feels a while
 Thy gracious power: as through the varied maze
 Of eloquence, now smooth, now quick, now strong,
 Profound and clear, you roll the copious flood.

* A character in the Conscious Lovers, written by Sir Richard Steele.

To thy lov'd haunt return, my happy muse:
 For now, behold, the joyous winter-days,
 Frosty, succeed; and through the blue serene,
 For sight too fine, th' ethereal nitre flies;
 Killing infectious damps, and the spent air
 Storing afresh with elemental life.
 Close crowds the shining atmosphere; and binds
 Our strengthen'd bodies in its cold embrace,
 Constringent; feeds, and animates our blood;
 Refines our spirits, through the new-strung nerves,
 In swifter sallies darting to the brain;
 Where sits the soul, intense, collected, cool,
 Bright as the skies, and as the season keen.
 All nature feels the renovating force
 Of Winter, only to the thoughtless eye
 In ruin seen. The frost-concocted globe
 Draws in abundant vegetable soul,
 And gathers vigour for the coming year.
 A stronger glow sits on the lively cheek
 Of ruddy fire: and luculent along
 The purer rivers flow; their fullen deeps,
 Transparent, open to the shepherd's gaze,
 And murmur hoarser at the fixing frost. [stores
 What art thou, frost? and whence are thy keen
 Deriv'd, thou secret all-invading power,
 Whom ev'n th' illusive fluid cannot fly?
 Is not thy potent energy, unseen,
 Myriads of little salts, or hook'd, or shap'd
 Like double wedges, and diffus'd immense
 Through water, earth, and ether? Hence at eve,
 Steam'd eager from the red horizon round,
 With the fierce rage of Winter deep suffus'd,
 An icy gale, oft shifting, o'er the pool
 Breathes a blue film, and in its mid career
 Arrests the bickering stream. The loosen'd ice,
 Let down the flood, and half dissolv'd by day,
 Rustles no more; but to the sedgey bank
 Fast grows, or gathers round the pointed stone,
 A crystal pavement, by the breath of heaven
 Cemented firm; till, seiz'd from shore to shore,
 The whole imprison'd river growls below.
 Loud rings the frozen earth, and hard reflects
 A double noise; while, at his evening watch,
 The village dog deters the nightly thief;
 The heifer lows; the distant water-fall
 Swells in the breeze; and, with the hasty tread
 Of traveller, the hollow-sounding plain
 Shakes from afar. The full ethereal round,
 Infinite worlds disclosing to the view,
 Shines out intensely keen; and, all one cope
 Of starry glitter, glows from pole to pole.
 From pole to pole the rigid influence falls,
 Through the still night, incessant, heavy, strong,
 And seizes nature fast. It freezes on;
 Till morn, late-rising o'er the drooping world,
 Lifts her pale eye unjoyous. Then appears
 The various labour of the silent night:
 Prone from the dripping cave, and dumb cascade,
 Whose idle torrents only seem to roar,
 The pendent icicle; the frost-work fair,
 Where transient hues and fancy'd figures rise;
 Wide-spouted o'er the hill, the frozen brook,
 A livid tract, cold-gleaming on the morn;
 The forest bent beneath the plummy wave;
 And by the frost refin'd the whiter snow,
 Incrusted hard, and sounding to the tread
 Of early shepherd, as he pensive seeks
 His pining flock, or from the mountain top,

Pleas'd with the slippery surface, swift descends.

On blithsome frolics bent, the youthful swains,
While every work of man is laid at rest,
Fond o'er the river crowd, in various sport
And revelry dissolv'd; where mixing glad,
Happiest of all the train! the raptur'd boy
Lashes the whirling top. Or, where the Rhine
Branch'd out in many a long canal extends,
From every province swarming, void of care,
Batavia rushes forth; and as they sweep,
On sounding skates, a thousand different ways,
In circling poise, swift as the winds, along,
'The then gay land is madden'd all to joy.
Nor less the northern courts, wide o'er the snow,
Pour a new pomp. Eager, on rapid sleds,
'Their vigorous youth in bold contention wheel
The long-resounding course. Meantime, to raise
The manly strife, with highly blooming charms,
Flush'd by the season, Scandinavia's dames,
Or Russia's buxom daughters glow around.

Pure, quick, and sportful, is the wholesome day;
But soon elaps'd. The horizontal sun,
Broad o'er the south, hangs at his utmost noon:
And, ineffectual, strikes the gelid cliff:
His azure gloss the mountain still maintains,
Nor feels the feeble touch. Perhaps the vale
Relents a while to the reflected ray;
Or from the forest falls the cluster'd snow,
Myriads of gems, that in the waving gleam
Gay-twinkle as they scatter. Thick around
Thunders the sport of those, who with the gun,
And dog impatient bounding at the shot,
Worse than the season, desolate the fields;
And, adding to the ruins of the year,
Distress the footed or the feather'd game.

But what is this? Our infant Winter sinks,
Divested of his grandeur, should our eye
Astonish'd shoot into the frigid zone;
Where, for relentless months, continual night
Holds o'er the glittering waste her starry reign.

There, through the prison of unbounded wilds,
Barr'd by the hand of Nature from escape,
Wide-rooms the Russian exile. Nought around
Strikes his sad eye, but deserts lost in snow;
And heavy-loaded groves; and solid floods,
That stretch, athwart the solitary vast,
Their icy horrors to the frozen main;
And cheerless towns far-distant, never blest'd,
Save when its annual course the caravan
Bends to the golden coast of rich * Cathay,
With news of human-kind. Yet there life glows;
Yet cherish'd there, beneath the shining waste,
The furry nations harbour: tipt with jet,
Fair ermines, spotless as the snows they press;
Sables, of glossy black; and dark-embrown'd,
Or beauteous freckl'd with many a mingled hue,
Thousands besides, the costly pride of courts.
There, warm together press'd, the trooping deer
Sleep on the new-fall'n snows; and, scarce his head
Rais'd o'er the heapy wreath, the branching elk
Lies slumbering fullen in the white abyss.
The ruthless hunter wants nor dogs nor toils,
Nor with the dread of sounding bows he drives
The fearful flying race; with ponderous clubs,
As weak against the mountain heaps they push
Their beating breast in vain, and piteous bray,

* The old name for China.

He lays them quivering on th' ensanguin'd snows,
And with loud shouts rejoicing bears them home.
There through the piny forest half-absorpt,
Rough tenant of these shades, the shapeless bear,
With dangling ice all horrid, stalks forlorn;
Slow-pac'd, and sorer as the storms increase,
He makes his bed beneath th' inclement drift,
And, with stern patience, scorning weak complaint,
Hardens his heart against assailing want.

Wide o'er the spacious regions of the north,
That sees Boöes urge his tardy wain,
A boisterous race, by frosty * Caurus pierc'd,
Who little pleasure know, and fear no pain,
Prolific swarm. They once relum'd the flame
Of lost mankind in polish'd slavery sunk, [sweep
Drove martial † horde on horde, with dreadful
Resistless rushing o'er th' enfeebled south,
And gave the vanquish'd world another form.
Not such the sons of Lapland: wisely they
Despise th' insensate barbarous trade of war;
They ask no more than simple nature gives,
They love their mountains, and enjoy their storms;
No false desires, no pride-created wants,
Disturb the peaceful current of their time;
And through the restless ever-tortur'd maze
Of pleasure, or ambition, bid it rage. [tents,
Their rein-deer form their riches. These their
Their robes, their beds, and all their homely wealth

Supply, their wholesome fare, and cheerful cups.
Obsequious at their call, the docile tribe
Yield to the sled their necks, and whirl them swift
O'er hill and dale, heap'd into one expanse
Of marbled snow, as far as eye can sweep
With a blue crust of ice unbounded glaz'd.
By dancing meteors then, that ceaseless shake
A waving blaze refracted o'er the heavens,
And vivid moons, and stars that keener play
With double lustre from the glossy waste,
Ev'n in the depth of Polar Night, they find
A wondrous day: enough to light the chase,
Or guide their daring steps to Finland fairs.
Wish'd Spring returns; and from the hazy south,
While dim Aurora slowly moves before,
The welcome sun, just verging up at first,
By small degrees extends the swelling curve!
'Till seen at large for gay rejoicing months,
Still round and round, his spiral course he winds,
And as he nearly dips his flaming orb,
Wheels up again, and reascends the sky.
In that glad season from the lakes and floods,
Where pure Niemi's ‡ fairy mountains rise,
And fring'd with roses § Tenglio rolls his stream,

* The north-west wind.

† The wandering Scythian-clans.

‡ M. de Maupertuis, in his book on the figure of the earth, after having described the beautiful lake and mountain of Niemi in Lapland, says,—“From this height we had opportunity several times to see those vapours rise from the lake, which the people of the country call Haltios, and which they deem to be the guardian spirits of the mountains. We had been frightened with stories of bears that haunted this place, but saw none. It seemed rather a place of resort for fairies and genii, than bears.”

§ The same author observes—“I was surprised to see upon the banks of this river (the Tenglio) roses of as lively a red as any that are in our gardens.”

They draw the copious fry. With these, at eve,
 They cheerful loaded to their tents repair;
 Where, all day long in useful care employ'd,
 Their kind unblemish'd wives the fire prepare.
 Thrice happy race! by poverty secur'd
 From legal plunder and rapacious power:
 In whom fell interest never yet has sown [knew
 The seeds of vice: whose spotless swains ne'er
 Injurious deed, nor, blasted by the breath
 Of faithless love, their blooming daughters woe.

Still pressing on, beyond Tornæa's lake,
 And Hecla flaming through a waste of snow,
 And farthest Greenland, to the pole itself,
 Where, failing gradual, life at length goes out,
 The muse expands her solitary flight;
 And, hovering o'er the wild stupendous scene,
 Beholds new seas beneath, another sky*.
 Thron'd in his palace of cerulean ice,
 Here Winter holds his unrejoicing court;
 And through his airy hall the loud misrule
 Of driving tempest is for ever heard:
 Here the grim tyrant meditates his wrath;
 Here arms his winds with all-subduing frost;
 Moulds his fierce hail, and treasures up his snows,
 With which he now oppresses half the globe.

Thence winding eastward to the Tartar's coast,
 She sweeps the howling margin of the main;
 Where undissolving, from the first of time,
 Snows swell on snows amazing to the sky;
 And icy mountains high on mountains pil'd,
 Seem to the shivering sailor from afar,
 Shapeless and white, an atmosphere of clouds.
 Projected hue, and horrid, o'er the surge,
 Alps frown on Alps; or crushing hideous down,
 As if old Chaos was again return'd,
 Wide-rend the deep, and shake the solid pole.
 Ocean itself no longer can resist
 The binding fury; but, in all its rage
 Of tempest taken by the boundless frost,
 Is many a fathom to the bottom chain'd,
 And bid to roar no more: a bleak expanse,
 Shagg'd o'er with wavy rocks, cheerless and void
 Of every life, that from the dreary months
 Flies conscious southward. Miserable they!
 Who, here entangled in the gathering ice,
 Take their last look of the descending sun;
 While, full of death, and fierce with tenfold frost,
 The long long night, incumbent o'er their heads,
 Falls horrible. Such was the Briton's † fate,
 As with first prow, (what have not Britons dar'd!)
 He for the passage sought, attempted since
 So much in vain, and seeming to be shut
 By jealous Nature with eternal bars.

In these fell regions, in Arzina caught,
 And to the stony deep his idle ship
 Immediate seal'd, he with his hapless crew,
 Each full exerted at his several task,
 Froze into statues; to the cordage glued
 The sailor, and the pilot to the helm. [stream

Hard by these shores, where scarce his freezing
 Rolls the wild Oby, live the last of men;
 And half-enliven'd by the distant sun,
 That rears and ripens man, as well as plants,
 Here human nature wears its rudest form.

* The other hemisphere.

† Sir Hugh Willoughby, sent by Queen Elizabeth to discover the north-east passage.

Deep from the piercing season sunk in caves,
 Here by dull fires, and with unjoyous cheer,
 They waste the tedious gloom. Immers'd in furs,
 Doze the gross race. Nor sprightly jest, nor song,
 Nor tenderness they know; nor ought of life,
 Beyond the kindred bears, that stalk without.
 Till morn at length, her roses drooping all,
 Sheds a long twilight brightening o'er the fields,
 And calls the quiver'd savage to the chase.

What cannot active government perform,
 New-moulding man! wide-stretching from these
 A people savage from remotest time, [shores,
 A huge neglected empire, one vast Mind,
 By Heaven inspir'd, from Gothic darkness call'd.
 Immortal Peter! first of monarchs! he
 His stubborn country tam'd, her rocks, her fens,
 Her floods, her seas, her ill-submitting sons;
 And while the fierce barbarian he subdued,
 To more exalted soul he rais'd the man.
 Ye shades of ancient heroes, ye who toil'd
 Through long successive ages to build up
 A labouring plan of state, behold at once
 The wonder done! behold the matchless prince!
 Who left his native throne, where reign'd till then
 A mighty shadow of unreal power;
 Who greatly spurn'd the slothful pomp of courts;
 And, roaming every land, in every port
 His sceptre laid aside, with glorious hand,
 Unwearied plying the mechanic tool,
 Gather'd the seeds of trade, of useful arts,
 Of civil wisdom, and of martial skill.
 Charg'd with the stores of Europe, home he goes;
 Then cities rise amid th' illumin'd waste;
 O'er joyless deserts smiles the rural reign;
 Far distant flood to flood is social join'd;
 Th' astonish'd Euxine hears the Baltic roar;
 Proud navies ride on seas that never foam'd
 With daring keel before; and armies stretch
 Each way their dazzling files, repressing here
 The frantic Alexander of the north,
 And awing there stern Othman's shrinking sons.
 Sloth flies the land, and ignorance, and vice,
 Of old dishonour proud: it glows around,
 Taught by the royal hand that rous'd the whole,
 One scene of arts, of arms, of rising trade:
 For what his wisdom plann'd, and power enforc'd,
 More potent still, his great example show'd.

Muttering, the winds at eve, with blunted point,
 Blow hollow-blustering from the south. Subdued,
 The frost resolves into a trickling thaw.
 Spotted the mountains shine; loose flect descends,
 And floods the country round. The rivers swell,
 Of bonds impatient. Sudden from the hills,
 O'er rocks and woods, in broad brown cataracts,
 A thousand snow-fed torrents shoot at once;
 And, where they run, the wide-resounding plain
 Is left one slimy waste. Those sullen seas,
 That wash'd th' ungenial pole, will rest no more
 Beneath the shackles of the mighty north;
 But, rousing all their waves, resistless heave.
 And hark! the lengthening roar continuous runs
 Athwart the rifted deep: at once it bursts,
 And piles a thousand mountains to the clouds.
 Ill fares the bark with trembling wretches charg'd,
 That, tost amid the floating fragments, moors
 Beneath the shelter of an icy isle,
 While night o'erwhelms the sea, and horror looks
 More horrible. Can human force endure

Th' assembled mischiefs that besiege them round?
Heart-gnawing hunger, fainting weariness,
The roar of winds and waves, the crush of ice,
Now ceasing, now renew'd with louder rage,
And in dire echoes bellowing round the main.
More to embroil the deep, leviathan
And his unwieldy train, in dreadful sport,
Tempest the loosen'd brine, while through the Far from the bleak inhospitable shore, [gloom,
Loading the winds, is heard the hungry howl
Of famish'd monsters, there awaiting wrecks.
Yet providence, that ever-waking eye,
Looks down with pity on the feeble toil
Of mortals lost to hope, and lights them safe,
Through all this dreary labyrinth of fate.

'Tis done! dread Winter spreads his latest glooms,
And reigns tremendous o'er the conquer'd year.
How dead the vegetable kingdom lies!
How dumb the tuneful! Horror wide extends
His desolate domain. Behold, fond man!
See here thy pictur'd life; pass some few years,
Thy flowering Spring, thy Summer's ardent
Thy sober Autumn fading into age, [strength,
And pale concluding Winter comes at last,
And shuts the scene. Ah! whither now are fled,
Those dreams of greatness? those unsolid hopes
Of happiness? those longings after fame?
Those restless cares? those busy bustling days?
Those gay-spent, festive nights? those veering thoughts,
Lost between good and ill, that shar'd thy life?

All now are vanish'd! Virtue sole survives,
Immortal never-failing friend of man,
His guide to happiness on high. And see!
'Tis come, the glorious morn! the second birth
Of heaven and earth! awakening Nature hears
The new-creating word, and starts to life,
In every heighten'd form, from pain and death
For ever free. The great eternal scheme,
Involving all, and in a perfect whole
Uniting, as the prospect wider spreads,
To reason's eye refin'd clears up apace.
Ye vainly wise! ye blind presumptuous! now,
Confounded in the dust, adore that Power,
And Wisdom, oft arraign'd: see now the cause,
Why unassuming worth in secret liv'd,
And dy'd, neglected: why the good man's share
In life was gall and bitterness of soul:
Why the lone widow and her orphans pin'd
In starving solitude; while luxury,
In palaces, lay straining her low thought,
To form unreal wants: why heaven-born truth,
And moderation fair, wore the red marks
Of superstition's scourge: why licens'd pain
That cruel spoiler, that embosom'd foe,
Imbitter'd all our bliss. Ye good distressed!
Ye noble few! who here unbending stand
Beneath life's pressure, yet bear up a while,
And what your bounded view, which only saw
A little part, deem'd evil, is no more:
The storms of wintry time will quickly pass,
And one unbounded Spring encircle all.

A H Y M N.

THESE, as they change, Almighty Father, these,
Are but the varied God. The rolling year
Is full of thee. Forth in the pleasing Spring
Thy beauty walks, thy tenderness and love.
Wide flush the fields; the softening air is balm;
Echo the mountains round; the forest smiles;
And every sense, and every heart, is joy.
Then comes thy glory in the Summer months,
With light and heat refulgent. Then thy sun
Shoots full perfection through the swelling year:
And oft thy voice in dreadful thunder speaks;
And oft at dawn, deep noon, or falling eve,
By brooks and groves, in hollow-whispering gales.
Thy bounty shines in Autumn unconfin'd,
And spreads a common feast for all that lives.
In Winter awful thou! with clouds and storms
Around thee thrown, tempest o'er tempest roll'd,
Majestic darkness! on the whirlwind's wing,
Riding sublime, thou bidst the world adore,
And humblest nature with thy northern blast.
Mysterious round! what skill, what force divine,
Deep felt, in these appear! a simple train,
Yet so delightful mixt with such kind art,
Such beauty and beneficence combin'd;
Shade, unperceiv'd, so softening into shade;

And all so forming an harmonious whole;
That, as they still succeed, they ravish still.
But wandering oft, with brute unconscious gaze,
Man marks not thee, marks not the mighty hand,
That ever-busy wheels, the silent spheres;
Works in the secret deep; shoots, steaming, thence
The fair profusion that o'erspreads the Spring:
Flings from the sun direct the flaming day;
Feeds every creature; hurls the tempest forth;
And, as on earth this grateful change revolves,
With transport touches all the springs of life.
Nature attend! join every living soul,
Beneath the spacious temple of the sky,
In adoration join; and, ardent, raise
One general song! to him, ye vocal gales,
Breathe soft, whose spirit in your freshness breathes:
Oh, talk of him in solitary glooms!
Where, o'er the rock, the scarcely waving pine
Fills the brown shade with a religious awe.
And ye, whose bolder note is heard afar,
Who shake th' astonish'd world, lift high to heaven
Th' impetuous song, and say from whom you rage.
His praise, ye brooks, attune, ye trembling rills;
And let me catch it as I muse along.
Ye headlong torrents, rapid, and profound

Ye softer floods, that lead the humid maze
 Along the vale; and thou, majestic main,
 A secret world of wonders in thyself,
 Sound his stupendous praise; whose greater voice
 Or bids you roar, or bids your roarings fall.
 Soft-roll your incense, herbs and fruits, and flowers,
 In mingled clouds to him; whose sun exalts,
 Whose breath perfumes you, and whose pencil paints.

Ye forests bend, ye harvests wave, to him;
 Breathe your still song into the reaper's heart,
 As home he goes beneath the joyous moon.
 Ye that keep watch in heaven, as earth asleep
 Unconscious lies, effuse your mildest beams,
 Ye constellations, while your angels strike,
 Amid the spangled sky, the silver lyre.
 Great source of day! best image here below
 Of thy Creator, ever pouring wide,
 From world to world, the vital ocean round,
 On nature write with every beam his praise.
 The thunder rolls: be hush'd the prostrate world;
 While cloud to cloud returns the solemn hymn.
 Bleat out afresh, ye hills: ye mossy rocks,
 Retain the sound: the broad responsive lowe,
 Ye vallies, raise; for the Great Shepherd reigns;
 And his unsuffering kingdom yet will come.
 Ye woodlands all, awake: a boundless song
 Burst from the groves! and when the restless day
 Expiring, lays the warbling world asleep,
 Sweetest of birds! sweet Philomela, charm
 The listening shades, and teach the night his praise.

Ye chief, for whom the whole creation smiles,
 At once the head, the heart, and tongue of all,
 Crown the great hymn! in swarming cities vast,

Assembled men, to the deep organ join
 The long-resounding voice, oft-breaking clear,
 At solemn pauses, through the swelling base;
 And, as each mingling flame increases each,
 In one united ardor rise to heaven.
 Or if you rather choose the rural shade,
 And find a fane in every secret grove;
 There let the shepherd's flute, the virgin's lay,
 The prompting seraph, and the poet's lyre,
 Still sing the God of Seasons, as they roll.
 For me, when I forget the darling theme,
 Whether the blossom blows, the summer-ray
 Ruffles the plain, inspiring Autumn gleams;
 Or Winter rises in the blackening east;
 Be my tongue mute, my fancy paint no more,
 And, dead to joy, forget my heart to beat.

Should fate command me to the farthest verge
 Of the green earth, to distant barbarous climes,
 Rivers unknown to song; where first the sun
 Gilds Indian mountains, or his setting beam
 Flames on th' Atlantic isles; 'tis nought to me:
 Since God is ever present, ever felt,
 In the void waste as in the city full;
 And where he vital breathes, there must be joy.
 When ev'n at last the solemn hour should come,
 And wing my mystic flight to future worlds,
 I cheerful will obey; there, with new powers,
 Will rising wonders sing: I cannot go
 Where Universal Love not smiles around,
 Sustaining all yon orbs, and all their suns;
 From seeming evil still educating good,
 And better thence again, and better still,
 In infinite progression. But I lose
 Myself in him, in Light ineffable;
 Come then, expressive Silence, muse his praise.

THE CASTLE OF INDOLENCE,

AN ALLEGORICAL POEM.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THIS poem being writ in the manner of Spenser, the obsolete words, and a simplicity of diction in some of the lines, which borders on the ludicrous, were necessary, to make the imitation more perfect. And the style of that admirable poet, as well as the measure in which he wrote, are, as it were, appropriated by custom to allegorical poems writ in our language; just as in French the style of Marot, who lived under Francis I. has been used in tales and familiar epistles, by the politest writers of the age of Louis XIV.

Ween—to think, be of opinion.

Weet—to know; to weet, to wit.

Whilom—ere-while, formerly.

Wight—man.

Wis, for Wist—to know, think, understand.

Wonne—(a noun) dwelling.

Wroke—wreakt.

N. B. The letter Y is frequently placed in the beginning of a word by Spenser, to lengthen it a syllable, and en at the end of a word, for the same reason, as withouten, casten, &c.

Yborn—born.

Yblent, or blent—blended, mingled.

Yclad—clad.

Ycleped—called, named.

Yfere—together.

Ymolten—milted.

Yode (preter tense of yede) went.

THE CASTLE OF INDOLENCE.

The castle height of indolence,

And its false luxury ;

Where for a little time, alas !

We liv'd right jollily.

O MORTAL man, who livest here by toil,
Do not complain of this thy hard estate ;
That like an emmet thou must ever moil,
Is a sad sentence of an ancient date ;
And, certes, there is for it reason great ;
For, though sometimes it makes thee weep and wail,
And curse thy star, and early drudge and late,
Withouten that would come an heavier bale,
Loose life, unruly passions, and diseases pale.

In lowly dale, fast by a river's side,
With woody hill o'er hill encompass'd round,
A most enchanting wizard did abide,
Than whom a fiend more fell is no where found,
It was, I ween, a lovely spot of ground :
And there a season atween June and May,
Half pranked with spring, with summer half
imbrown'd,
A listless climate made, where, sooth to say,
No living wight could work, ne cared ev'n for play.

Was nought around but images of rest :
Sleep-soothing groves, and quiet lawns between ;
And flowery beds that slumberous influence
keft,
From poppies breath'd ; and beds of pleasant
green,
Where never yet was creeping creature seen.
Mean-time unnumber'd glittering streamlets
play'd,
And hurl'd every-where their waters sheen ;
That, as they bicker'd through the sunny glade,
Though restless still themselves, a lulling murmur made.

Join'd to the prattle of the purling rills,
Where heard the lowing herds along the vale,
And flocks loud-bleating from the distant hills,
And vacant shepherds piping in the dale :
And now and then sweet Philomel would wail,
Or stock-doves plain amid the forest deep,
That drowsy rustled to the sighing gale ;
And still a coil the grasshopper did keep ;
Yet all these sounds yblent inclined all to sleep.

Full in the passage of the vale, above,
A fable, silent, solemn forest stood ;

Where nought but shadowy forms was seen to
move,

As Idless fancy'd in her dreaming mood :
And up the hills, on either side, a wood
Of blackening pines, ay waving to and fro,
Sent forth a sleepy horror through the blood ;
And where this valley winded out, below,
The murmuring main was heard, and scarcely heard, to flow.

A pleasing land of drowsy-head it was,
Of dreams that wave before the half-shut eye ;
And of gay castles in the clouds that pass,
For ever flushing round a summer-sky :
There eke the soft delights, that witchingly
Instil a wanton sweetness through the breast,
And the calm pleasures always hover'd nigh ;
But whate'er smack'd of noyance, or unrest,
Was far far off expell'd from this delicious nest.

The landskip such, inspiring perfect ease,
Where Indolence (for so the wizard hight)
Close-hid his castle mid embowering trees,
That half shut out the beams of Phœbus bright,
And made a kind of checker'd day and night ;
Meanwhile, unceasing at the massy gate,
Beneath a spacious palm, the wicked wight
Was plac'd ; and to his lute, of cruel fate, [estate.
And labour harsh, complain'd, lamenting man's

Thither continual pilgrims crowded still,
From all the roads of earth that pass there by :
For, as they chaunc'd to breathe on neighbouring hill,

The freshness of this valley smote their eye,
And drew them ever and anon more nigh ;
Till clustering round th' enchanter false they
Ymolten with his syren melody ; [hung.
While o'er th' enfeebling lute his hand he flung,
And to the trembling chords these tempting verses sung :

" Behold ! ye pilgrims of this earth, behold !

" See all but man with unearn'd pleasure gay :

" See her bright robes the butterfly unfold,

" Broke from her wintery tomb in prime of May !

" What youthful bride can equal her array ?

" Who can with her for easy pleasure vie?
 " From mead to mead with gentle wing to stray,
 " From flower to flower on balmy gales to fly,
 " Is all she has to do beneath the radiant sky.

" Behold the merry minstrels of the morn,
 " The swarming songsters of the careless grove,
 " Ten thousand throats! that from the flower-
 " ing thorn,
 " Hymn their good God, and carol sweet of
 " love,
 " Such grateful kindly raptures them emove:
 " They neither plough, nor sow: ne, fit for flail,
 " E'er to the barn the nodding sheaves they
 " drove;
 " Yet theirs each harvest dancing in the gale,
 " Whatever crowns the hill, or smiles along the " vale.

" Outcast of nature, man! the wretched thrall
 " Of bitter dropping sweat, of sweltry pain,
 " Of cares that eat away thy heart with gall,
 " And of the vices, an inhuman train,
 " That all proceed from savage thirst of gain:
 " For when hard-hearted Interest first began
 " To poison earth, Astræa left the plain;
 " Guile, violence, and murder seiz'd on man,
 " And, for soft milky streams, with blood the " rivers ran.

" Come, ye, who still the cumberous load of life
 " Push hard up hill; but as the farthest steep
 " You trust to gain, and put an end to strife,
 " Down thunders back the stone with mighty
 " sweep,
 " And hurls your labours to the valley deep,
 " For-ever vain: come, and, withouten fee,
 " I in oblivion will your sorrows steep,
 " Your cares, your toils, will sleep you in a sea
 " Of full delight: O come, ye weary wights, to " me!

" With me, you need not rise at early dawn,
 " To pass the joyless day in various sounds:
 " Or, louting low, on upstart fortune fawn,
 " And sell fair honour for some paltry pounds;
 " Or through the city take your dirty rounds,
 " To cheat, and dun, and lye, and visit pay,
 " Now flattering base, now giving secret wounds:
 " Or proul in courts of law for human prey,
 " In vernal senate thief, or rob on broad highway.

" No cocks, with me, to rustic labour call,
 " From village on to village sounding clear:
 " To tardy swain no shrill-voic'd matrons squall;
 " No dogs, no babes, no wives, to stun your ear;
 " No hammers thump; no horrid blacksmith
 " fear,
 " Ne noisy tradesmen your sweet slumbers start,
 " With sounds that are a misery to hear:
 " But all is calm, as would delight the heart
 " Of Sybarite of old, all nature, and all art.

" Here nought but candour reigns, indulgent
 " ease,
 " Good-natur'd lounging, sauntering up and
 " down:
 " They who are pleas'd themselves must always
 " please;
 " On others' ways they never squint a frown,
 " Nor heed what haps in hamlet or in town:

" Thus, from the source of tender indolence,
 " With milky blood the heart is overflown,
 " Is sooth'd and sweeten'd by the social sense;
 " For interest, envy, pride, and strife are banish'd
 " hence.

" What, what, is virtue, but repose of mind,
 " A pure ethereal calm, that knows no storm;
 " Above the reach of wild ambition's wind,
 " Above the passions that this world deform,
 " And torture man, a proud malignant worm?
 " But here, instead, soft gales of passion play,
 " And gently stir the heart, thereby to form
 " A quicker sense of joy; as breezes stray
 " Across th' enliven'd skies, and make them still
 " more gay.

" The best of men have ever lov'd repose:
 " They hate to mingle in the filthy fray;
 " Where the soul sours, and gradual rancour
 " grows,
 " Imbitter'd more from peevish day to day.
 " Ev'n those whom Fame has lent her fairest ray,
 " The most renown'd of worthy wights of yore,
 " From a base world at last have stol'n away:
 " So Scipio, to the soft Cumæan shore
 " Retiring, tasted joy he never knew before.

" But if a little exercise you chuse,
 " Some zest for ease, 'tis not forbidden here.
 " Amid the groves you may indulge the muse,
 " Or tend the blooms, and deck the vernal year;
 " Or softly stealing, with your watery gear,
 " Along the brook, the crimson spotted fry
 " You may delude: the whilst, amus'd, you hear
 " Now the hoarse stream, and now the zephyr's
 " sigh,
 " Attuned to the birds, and woodland melody.

" O grievous folly! to heap up estate,
 " Losing the days you see beneath the sun;
 " When, sudden, comes blind unrelenting fate,
 " And gives th' untasted portion you have won,
 " With ruthless toil, and many a wretch undone,
 " To those who mock you gone to Pluto's reign,
 " There with sad ghosts to pine, and shadows
 " dun:

" But sure it is of vanities most vain,
 " To toil for what you here untoiling may obtain."

He ceas'd. But still their trembling ears retain'd
 The deep vibrations of his witching song;
 That, by a kind of magic power, constrain'd
 To enter in, pell-mell, the listening throng,
 Heaps pour'd on heaps, and yet they slept along,
 In silent ease: as when beneath the beam
 Of summer-moons, the distant woods among,
 Or by some flood all silver'd with the gleam,
 The soft-embodied fays through airy portal stream:

By the smooth demon so it order'd was,
 And here his baneful bounty first began:
 Though some there were who would not further
 pass,
 And his alluring baits suspected han,
 The wise distrust the too fair spoken man.
 Yet through the gate they cast a wishful eye:
 Not to move on, perdie, is all they can;
 For do their very best they cannot fly,
 But often each way look, and often sorely sigh.

When this the watchful wicked wizard saw,
 With sudden spring he leap'd upon them strait;
 And soon as touch'd by his unhallow'd paw,
 They found themselves within the curf'd gate;
 Full hard to be repass'd, like that of fate.
 Not stronger were of old the giant crew,
 Who fought to pull high Jove from regal state;
 Though feeble wretch he seem'd of fallow hue:
 Certes, who bides his grasp, will that encounter rue.

For whomsoever the villain takes in hand,
 Their joints unknit, their sinews melt apace;
 As lithe they grow as any willow-wand,
 And of their vanish'd force remains to trace:
 So when a maiden fair, of modest grace,
 In all her buxom blooming May of charms,
 Is seiz'd in some lovel's hot embrace,
 She waxeth very weakly as she warms,
 Then sighing yields her up to love's delicious harms.

Wak'd by the crowd, slow from his bench arose
 A comely full-spread porter, swoln with sleep:
 His calm, broad, thoughtless aspect breath'd repose;

And in sweet torpor he was plunged deep,
 Ne could himself from ceaseless yawning keep;
 While o'er his eyes the drowsy liquor ran.
 Through which his half-wak'd soul would faintly peep.

Then taking his black staff he call'd his man,
 And rous'd himself as much as rouse himself he can.

The lad leap'd lightly at his master's call.
 He was, to weet, a little roguish page,
 Save sleep and play who minded nought at all,
 Like most the untaught striplings of his age.
 This boy he kept each hand to disengage,
 Garters and buckles, task for him unfit,
 But ill-becoming his grave personage,
 And which his portly paunch would not permit,
 So this same limber page to all performed it.

Meantime the master-porter wide display'd
 Great store of caps, of slippers, and of gowns;
 Wherewith he those that enter'd in, array'd
 Loose, as the breeze that plays along the downs,
 And waves the summer-woods when evening frowns.

O fair undress, best dress! it checks no vein,
 But every flowing limb in pleasure drowns,
 And heightens ease with grace. This done,
 right fain,

Sir porter sat him down, and turn'd to sleep again.

Thus easy rob'd, they to the fountain sped,
 That in the middle of the court up-threw
 A stream, high-spouting from its liquid bed,
 And falling back again in drizzly dew: [drew.
 There each deep draughts, as deep he thirsted,
 It was a fountain of Nepenthe rare: [grew.
 Whence, as Dan Homer sings, huge pleasure
 And sweet oblivion of vile earthly care;
 Fair gladsome waking thoughts, and joyous dreams
 more fair.

This rite perform'd, all inly pleas'd and still,
 Withouten tromp, was proclamation made.
 "Ye sons of Indolence, do what you will;
 "And wander where you list, through hall or
 "glade!

"Be no man's pleasure for another staid;
 "Let each as likes him best his hours employ,
 "And curs'd be he who minds his neighbour's
 "trade!
 "Here dwells kind ease and unrepining joy:
 "He little merits bliss who others can annoy."

Straight of these endless numbers, swarming round,
 As thick as idle motes in sunny ray,
 Not one eftsoons in view was to be found,
 But every man stroll'd off his own glad way,
 Wide o'er this ample court's blank area,
 With all the lodges that thereto pertain'd,
 No living creature could be seen to stray;
 While solitude and perfect silence reign'd:
 So that to think you dreamt you almost was constrain'd.

As when a shepherd of the Hebrid-isles,
 Plac'd far amid the melancholy main,
 (Whether it be lone fancy him beguiles;
 Or that aerial beings sometimes deign
 To stand embodied, to our senses plain)
 Sees on the naked hill, or valley low,
 The whilst in ocean Phæbus dips his wain,
 A vast assembly moving to and fro;
 Then all at once in air dissolves the wondrous show.

Ye gods of quiet, and of sleep profound!
 Whose soft dominion o'er this castle sways,
 And all the widely-silent places round,
 Forgive me, if my trembling pen displays
 What never yet was sung in mortal lays.
 But how shall I attempt such arduous string,
 I who have spent my nights and nightly days,
 In this soul-deadening place, loose-loitering?
 Ah! how shall I for this uprear my molted wing?

Come on, my muse, nor stoop to low despair,
 Thou imp of Jove, touch'd by celestial fire!
 Thou yet shalt sing of war, and actions fair,
 Which the bold sons of Britain will inspire;
 Of ancient bards thou yet shalt sweep the lyre;
 Thou yet shalt tread in tragic pall the stage,
 Paint love's enchanting woes, the hero's ire,
 The sages calm, the patriot's noble rage, [age.
 Dashing corruption down through every worthless

The doors, that knew no shrill alarming bell,
 Ne curf'd knocker ply'd by villain's hand,
 Self-open'd into halls, where, who can tell
 What elegance and grandeur wide expand
 The pride of Turkey and of Persia land?
 Soft quilts on quilts, on carpets carpets spread,
 And couches stretch'd around in seemly band;
 And endless pillows rise to prop the head;
 So that each spacious room was one full-swell'ing-bed.

And every where huge cover'd tables stood,
 With wines high flavour'd and rich viands
 crown'd;
 Whatever sprightly juice or tasteful food
 On the green bosom of this earth are found,
 And all old ocean genders in his round:
 Some hand unseen these silently display'd,
 Ev'n undemand'd by a sign or sound;
 You need but wish, and, instantly obey'd,
 Fair rang'd the dishes rose, and thick the glasses
 play'd.

Here freedom reign'd, without the least alloy;
Nor gossip's tale, nor ancient maiden's gall,
Nor faintly spleen durst murmur at our joy,
And with envenom'd tongue our pleasures pall.
For why? there was but one great rule for all;
To wit, that each shou'd work his own desire,
And eat, drink, study, sleep, as it may fall,
Or melt the time in love, or wake the lyre,
And carol what, unbid, the muses might inspire.

The rooms with costly tapestry were hung,
Where was inwoven many a gentle tale;
Such as of old the rural poets sung,
Or of Arcadian or Sicilian vale:
Reclining lovers, in the lonely dale,
Pour'd forth at large the sweetly-tortur'd heart;
Or, fighting tender passion, swell'd the gale,
And taught charm'd echo to resound their smart;
While flocks, woods, streams, around, repose and peace impart.

Those pleas'd the most, where, by a cunning
hand,
Depainted was the patriarchal age;
What time Dan Abraham left the Chaldee land,
And pastur'd on from verdant stage to stage,
Where fields and fountains fresh could best engage.
Toil was not then. Of nothing took they heed,
But with wild beasts the sylvan war to wage,
And o'er vast plains their herds and flocks to feed:

Blest sons of Nature they! true golden age indeed!

Sometimes the pencil, in cool airy halls,
Bade the gay bloom of vernal landscapes rise,
Or autumn's varied shades imbrown the walls:
Now the black tempest strikes th' astonish'd eyes,
Now down the steep the flashing torrent flies;
The trembling sun now plays o'er ocean blue,
And now rude mountains frown amid the skies;
Whate'er Lorraine light-touch'd with softening hue,

Or savage Rhsa dash'd, or learned Poussin drew.

Each sound too here, to languishment inclin'd,
Lull'd the weak bosom, and induced ease,
Aerial music in the warbling wind,
At distance rising oft by small degrees,
Nearer and nearer came, till o'er the trees
It hung, and breath'd such soul-dissolving airs,
As did, alas! with soft perdition please:
Entangled deep in its enchanting snares,
The listening heart forgot all duties and all cares.

A certain music, never known before,
Here lull'd the pensive melancholy mind;
Full easily obtain'd. Behoves no more,
But sidelong, to the gently-waving wind,
'To lay the well-tun'd instrument reclin'd;
From which, with airy flying fingers light,
Beyond each mortal touch the most refin'd,
The god of winds drew sounds of deep delight:
Whence, with just cause, the harp of Æolus it hight.

Ah me! what hand can touch the string so fine?
Who up the lofty diapason roll
Such sweet, such sad, such solemn airs divine,
Then let them down again into the soul?

Now rising love they fann'd; now pleasing dol^e
They breath'd, in tender musings, through the heart;

And now a graver sacred strain they stole,
As when seraphic hands an hymn impart:
Wild-warbling nature all, above the reach of art!

Such the gay splendor, the luxurious state,
Of Caliphs old, who on the Tygris' shore,
In mighty Bagdat, populous and great,
Held their bright court, where was of ladies
store;

And verse, love, music, still the garland wore:
When sleep was coy, the bard in waiting there,
Chear'd the lone midnight with the muse's love:
Composing music bade his dreams be fair,
And music lent new gladness to the morning air.

Near the pavilions where we slept, still ran
Soft-tinkling streams, and dashing waters fell,
And sobbing breezes sigh'd, and oft began
(So work'd the wizard) wintery storms to swell,
As heaven and earth they would together mell:
At doors and windows, threatening seem'd to call

The demons of the tempest, growling fell,
Yet the least entrance found they none at all;
Whence sweeter grew our sleep, secure in massy hall.

And hither Morpheus sent his kindest dreams,
Raising a world of gayer tinct and grace;
O'er which were shadowy cast Elysian gleams,
That play'd, in waving lights, from place to place,

And shed a roseate smile on nature's face.
Not Titian's pencil e'er could so array,
So fierce with clouds the pure ethereal space;
Ne could it e'er such melting forms display,
As loose on flowery beds all languishingly lay.

No, fair illusions! artful phantoms, no!
My muse will not attempt your fairy-land:
She has no colours that like you can glow:
To catch your vivid scenes too gross her hand.
But sure it is, was ne'er a subtler band
Than these same guileful angel-seeming sprights,
Who thus in dreams, voluptuous, soft, and bland,
Pour'd all th' Arabian Heaven upon her nights,
And blest'd them oft besides with more refin'd delights.

They were in sooth a most enchanting train,
Ev'n feigning virtue; skilful to unite
With evil good, and strew with pleasure pain.
But for those fiends, whom blood and broils delight;
Who hurl the wretch, as if to hell outright,
Down, down black gulfs, where fullen waters
sleep,
Or hold him clambering all the fearful night
On beetling cliffs, or pent in ruins deep;
They, till due time should serve, were bid far
hence to keep.

Ye guardian spirits, to whom man is dear,
From these foul demons shield the midnight
gloom:
Angels of fancy and of love, be near,
And o'er the blank of sleep diffuse a bloom;

Evoke the sacred shades of Greece and Rome,
And let them virtue with a look impart:
But chief, a while, O! lend us from the tomb
These long-lost friends for whom in love we smart,
And fill with pious awe and joy-mixt woe the heart.

Or are you sportive—Bid the morn of youth
Rise to new light, and beam afresh the days
Of innocence, simplicity, and truth;
To cares estrang'd, and manhood's thorny ways.
What transport, to retrace our boyish plays,
Our easy bliss, when each thing joy supply'd;
The woods, the mountains, and the warbling maze
Of the wild brooks!—But, fondly wandering
 wide,
My muse, resume the task that yet doth thee abide.

One great amusement of our household was,
In a huge crystal magic globe to spy,
Still as you turn'd it, all things that do pass
Upon this ant-hill earth; where constantly
Of idly-busy men the restless fry
Run bustling to and fro with foolish haste,
In search of pleasure vain that from them fly,
Or which obtain'd the caitiffs dare not taste:
When nothing is enjoy'd, can there be greater waste?

"Of vanity the mirror" this was call'd.
Here you a muckworm of the town might see,
At his dull desk, amid his legers stall'd,
Eat up with carking care and penurie;
Most like to carcase parch'd on gallow-tree.
"A penny saved is a penny got;"
Firm to this scoundrel maxim keepeth he,
Ne of its rigour will he bate a jot,
Till it has quench'd his fire, and banish'd his pot.

Strait from the filth of this low grub, behold!
Comes fluttering forth a gaudy spendthrift heir,
All glossy gay, enamel'd all with gold,
The silly tenant of the summer-air,
In folly lost, of nothing takes he care;
Pimps, lawyers, stewards, harlots, flatterers vile,
And thieving tradesmen him among them share:
His father's ghost from limbo-lake, the while,
Sees this, which more damnation doth upon him pile.

This globe pourtray'd the race of learned men,
Still at their books, and turning o'er the page,
Backwards and forwards: oft they snatch the pen,
As if inspir'd, and in a Thespian rage;
Then write, and blot, as would your ruth engage.
Why, authors, all this scrawl and scribbling fore?
To lose the present, gain the future age,
Praised to be when you can hear no more,
And much enrich'd with fame, when useless worldly store.

Then would a splendid city rise to view,
With carts, and cars, and coaches, roaring all;
Wide pour'd abroad behold the giddy crew;
See how they dash along from wall to wall!
At every door, hark how they thundering call!
Good Lord! what can this giddy rout excite?

Why, on each other with fell tooth to fall;
A neighbour's fortune, fame, or peace, to blight,
And make new tiresome parties for the coming night.

The puzzling sons of party next appear'd,
In dark cabals and nightly juntos met;
And now they whisper'd close, now shrugging,
 rear'd

Th' important shoulder; then, as if to get
New light, their twinkling eyes were inward set.
No sooner Lucifer recalls affairs,
Than forth they various rush in mighty fret;
When, lo! push'd up to power, and crown'd
 their cares, [stairs.

In comes another sett, and kicketh them down

But what most shew'd the vanity of life,
Was to behold the nations all on fire,
In cruel broils engag'd, and deadly strife:
Most Christian kings, inflam'd by black desire,
With honourable ruffians in their hire,
Cause war to rage, and blood around to pour:
Of this sad work when each begins to tire,
They sit them down just where they were before, [restore.

Till for new scenes of woe peace shall their force

To number up the thousands dwelling here,
An useless were, and eke an endless task;
From kings, and those who at the helm appear,
To gypsies brown in summer-glades who bask.
Yea many a man perdie I could unmask,
Whose desk and table make a solemn show,
With tape-ty'd trash, and suits of fools that ask
For place or pension laid in decent row;
But these I passen by, with nameless numbers moe.

Of all the gentle tenants of the place,
There was a man of special grave remark:
A certain tender gloom o'erspread his face,
Pensive, not sad, in thought involv'd, not dark,
As soon this man could sing as morning-lark,
And teach the noblest morals of the heart:
But these his talents were yburied stark;
Of the fine stores he nothing would impart,
Which or boon Nature gave, or nature-painting
 Art.

To noontide shades incontinent he ran,
Where purls the brook with sleep-inviting sound;
Or when Dan Sol to slope his wheels began,
Amid the broom he bask'd him on the ground,
Where the wild thyme and camomil are found:
There would he linger, till the latest ray
Of light sat trembling on the welkin's bound;
Then homeward through the twilight shadows
 stray,

Sauntering and slow. So had he pass'd many a day.

Yet not in thoughtless slumber were they past:
For oft the heavenly fire, that lay conceal'd
Beneath the sleeping embers, mounted fast,
And all its native light anew reveal'd:
Oft as he travers'd the cerulean field,
And markt the clouds that drove before the
 wind,
Ten thousand glorious systems would he build,
Ten thousand great ideas fill'd his mind;
But with the clouds they fled, and left no trace behind.

With him was sometimes join'd, in silent walk,
 (Profoundly silent, for they never spoke)
 One shyer still, who quite detested talk:
 Oft, stung by spleen, at once away he broke,
 To groves of pine, and broad o'ershadowing
 There, inly thrill'd, he wander'd all alone, [oak;
 And on himself his pensive fury wroke,
 Ne ever utter'd word, save when first shone
 The glittering star of eve—"Thank heaven! the "day is done."

Here lurk'd a wretch, who had not crept abroad
 For forty years, ne face of mortal seen;
 In chamber brooding like a loathly toad:
 And sure his linen was not very clean. [been Through secret loop-holes, that had practis'd
 Near to his bed, his dinner vile he took;
 Unkempt, and rough, of squalid face and mien,
 Our castle's shame! whence, from his filthy nook,
 We drove the villain out for fitter lair to look.

One day there chaunc'd into these halls to rove
 A joyous youth who took you at first sight;
 Him the wild wave of pleasure hither drove,
 Before the sprightly tempest tossing light:
 Certes, he was a most engaging wight,
 Of social glee, and wit humane, though keen,
 Turning the night to day, and day to night:
 For him the merry bells had rung, I ween,
 If in this nook of quiet bells had ever been.

But not ev'n pleasure to excess is good:
 What most elates then sinks the soul as low:
 When spring-tide joy pours in with copious flood,
 The higher still th' exulting billows flow,
 The farther back again they flagging go,
 And leave us groveling on the dreary shore:
 Taught by this son of joy we found it so;
 Who, whilst he staid, kept in a gay uproar
 Our madden'd castle all, th' abode of sleep no
 more.

As when in prime of June a burnish'd fly, [along,
 Sprung from the meads, o'er which he sweeps
 Cheer'd by the breathing bloom and vital sky,
 Tunes up amid these airy halls his song,
 Soothing at first the gay reposing throng:
 And oft he sips their bowl; or, nearly drown'd,
 He, thence recovering, drives their beds among,
 And scares their tender sleep, with trump pro-
 found;

Then out again he flies, to wing his mazy round.

Another guest there was, of sense refin'd,
 Who felt each worth, for every worth he had;
 Serene, yet warm, humane, yet firm his mind,
 As little touch'd as any man's with bad:
 Him through their inmost walks the muses lad,
 To him the sacred love of nature lent,
 And sometimes would he make our valley glad
 When as we found he would not here be pent,
 To him the better sort this friendly message sent.

"Come, dwell with us! true son of virtue,
 "come!

"But if, alas! we cannot thee persuade,

"To lie content beneath our peaceful dome,

"Ne ever more to quit our quiet glade;

"Yet when at last thy toils but ill apaid [spark,

"Shall dead thy fire, and damp its heavenly

"Thou wilt be glad to seek the rural shade,
 "There to indulge the muse, and nature mark:
 "We then a lodge for thee will rear in Hagley-
 "Park."

Here whilom ligg'd th' Esopus* of the age;
 But call'd by Fame, in soul ypricked deep,
 A noble pride restor'd him to the stage,
 And rous'd him like a giant from his sleep.
 Ev'n from his slumbers we advantage reap:
 With double force th' enliven'd scene he wakes,
 Yet quits not nature's bounds. He knows to keep

Each due decorum: now the heart he shakes,
 And now with well-urg'd sense th' enlighten'd judgment takes.

A bard hear dwelt, more fat than bard beseems;
 † Who, void of envy, guile, and lust of gain,
 On virtue still, and nature's pleasing themes,
 Pour'd forth his unpremeditated strain:
 The world forsaking with a calm disdain
 Here laugh'd he careless in his easy seat;
 Here quaff'd encircled with the joyous train,
 Oft moralizing sage; his ditty sweet
 He loathed much to write, ne cared to repeat.

Full oft by holy feet our ground was trod,
 Of clerks good plenty here you mote espy.
 A little, round, fat, oily man of God,
 Was one I chiefly mark'd among the fry:
 He had a roguish twinkle in his eye,
 And shone all glittering with ungodly dew,
 If a tight damsel chaunc'd to trippen by;
 Which when observ'd, he shrunk into his mew,
 And strait would recollect his piety anew.

Nor he forgot a tribe, who minded nought
 (Old inmates of the place) but state affairs:
 They look'd, perdie, as if they deeply thought;
 And on their brow sat every nation's cares.
 The world by them is parcell'd out in shares,
 When in the hall of smoke they congress hold,
 And the sage berry fun-burnt Mocha bears
 Has clear'd their inward eye: then, smoke-en-
 roll'd,

Their oracles break forth mysterious as of old.

Here languid beauty kept her pale-fac'd court:
 Bevy of dainty dames, of high degree,
 From every quarter hither made resort;
 Where, from gross mortal care and business
 free,
 They lay, pour'd out in ease and luxury:
 Or should they a vain show of work assume,
 Alas! and well-a-day! what can it be?
 To knot, to twist, to range the vernal bloom;
 But far is cast the distaff, spinning-wheel, and loom.

Their only labour was to kill the time;
 And labour dire it is, and weary woe.
 They sit, they loll, turn o'er some idle rhyme;
 Then, rising sudden, to the glass they go,
 Or saunter forth, with tottering step and flow.
 This soon too rude an exercise they find;
 Strait on the couch their limbs again they throw.

* Mr. Quin.

† This character of Mr. Thomson was written by Lord Lyttleton.

Where hours and hours they fighting lie reclin'd,
And court the vapoury god soft-breathing in the wind.

Now must I mark the villany we found,
But ah! too late, as shall oftsoons be shewn.
A place here was, deep, dreary, under ground;
Where still our inmates, when unpleasing grown,
Diseas'd, and loathsome, privily were thrown,
Far from the light of heaven, they languish'd
Unpity'd uttering many a bitter groan; [there,
For of these wretches taken was no care:
Fierce fiends, and hags of hell, their only nurses were.

Alas! the change! from scenes of joy and rest,
To this dark den, where sickness toils'd alway.
Here lethargy, with deadly sleep oppress'd,
Stretch'd on his back, a mighty lubbard, lay,
Heaving his sides, and snored night and day;
To stir him from his traunce it was not eath,
And his half-open'd eyne he shut straitway:
He led, I wot, the softest way to death,
And taught withouten pain and strife to yield the breath.

Of limbs enormous, but withal unsound,
Soft swoln and pale, here lay the hydropsy:
Unwieldy man; with belly monstrous round,
For ever fed with watery supply:
For still he drank, and yet he still was dry,
And moping here did Hypochondria sit,
Mother of spleen, in robes of various dye,
Who vexed was full oft with ugly fit;
And some her frantic deem'd, and some her
deem'd a wit.

A lady proud she was, of ancient blood,
Yet oft her fear her pride made crouchen low:
She felt, or fancy'd in her fluttering mood,
All the diseases which the spittles know,
And fought all physic which the shops bestow,
And still new leaches and new drugs would try,
Her humour ever wavering to and fro; [cry,
For sometimes she would laugh, and sometimes
Then sudden waxed wroth, and all she knew not why.

Fast by her side a listless maiden pin'd,
With aching head, and squeamish heart-burnings;
Pale, bloated, cold, she seem'd to hate mankind,
Yet lov'd in secret all forbidden things.
And here the tertian shakes his chilling wings;
The sleepless gout here counts the crowing
cocks,
A wolf now gnaws him, now a serpent stings;
Whilst apoplexy cramm'd intemperance knocks
Down to the ground at once, as butcher felleth ox.

CANTO II.

The knight of arts and industry,
And his achievements fair;
That by his castle's overthrow,
Secur'd and crowned were.

ESCAP'D the castle of the fire of sin,
Ah! where shall I so sweet a dwelling find?
For all around, without, and all within,

Nothing save what delightful was and kind,
Of goodness favouring and a tender mind,
E'er rose to view. But now another strain,
Of doleful note, alas! remains behind:
I now must sing of pleasure turn'd to pain,
And of the false enchanter Indolence complain.

Is there no patron to protect the muse,
And fence for her Parnassus' barren soil?
To every labour its reward accrues,
And they are sure of bread who swink and moil;
But a fell tribe th' Aonian hive despoil,
As ruthless wasps oft rob the painful bee:
Thus while the laws not guard that noblest toil,
Ne for the other Muses meed decree,
They praised are alone, and starve right merrily.

I care not, Fortune, what you me deny:
You cannot rob me of free Nature's grace;
You cannot shut the windows of the sky,
Through which Aurora shows her brighten
ing face;
You cannot bar my constant feet to trace
The woods and lawns, by living stream, at eve:
Let health my nerves and finer fibres brace,
And I their toys to the great children leave:
Of fancy, reason, virtue, nought can me bereave.

Come then, my muse, and raise a bolder song:
Come, lig no more upon the bed of sloth,
Dragging the lazy languid line along,
Fond to begin, but still to finish loth,
Thy half-wit scrolls all eaten by the moth:
Arise, and sing that generous imp of fame,
Who with the sons of softness nobly wroth,
To sweep away this human lumber came,
Or in a chosen few to rouse the slumbering flame.

In Fairy-land there liv'd a knight of old,
Of feature stern, Selvaggio well yclep'd,
A rough unpolish'd man, robust and bold,
But wondrous poor: he neither sow'd nor reap'd,
Ne stores in summer for cold winter heap'd;
In hunting all his days away he wore;
Now scorched by June, now in November steep'd,
Now pinch'd by biting January fore,
He still in woods pursued the libbard and the boar.

As he one morning, long before the dawn,
Prick'd through the forest to dislodge his prey,
Deep in the winding bosom of a lawn,
With wood wild-fring'd, he mark'd a taper's
ray,
That from the beating rain, and wintery fray,
Did to a lonely cot his steps decoy;
There, up to earn the needments of the day,
He found dame poverty, nor fair nor coy:
Her he compress'd, and fill'd her with a lusty boy.

Amid the green-wood shade this boy was bred,
And grew at last a knight of muchel fame,
Of active mind and vigorous lustyhed,
The Knight of Arts and Industry by name.
Earth was his bed, the boughs his roof did
frame;
He knew no beverage but the flowing stream;
His tasteful well-earn'd food the sylvan game,
Or the brown fruit with which the woodlands
teem:

The same to him glad summer, or the winter
breme.

So pass'd his youthly morning, void of care,
Wild as the colts that through the commons run;
For him no tender parents troubled were,
He of the forest seem'd to be the son,
And certes had been utterly undone;
But that Minerva pity of him took,
With all the gods that love the rural wonne,
That teach to tame the soil and rule the crook;
Ne did the sacred nine disdain a gentle look.

Of fertile genius him they nurtur'd well,
In every science, and in every art,
By which mankind the thoughtless brutes excel,
That can or use, or joy, or grace impart,
Disclosing all the powers of head and heart:
Ne were the goodly exercises spar'd,
That brace the nerves, or make the limbs alert,
And mix elastic force with firmness hard:
Was never knight on ground mote be with him
compar'd.

Sometimes, with early morn, he mounted gay
The hunter-steed, exulting o'er the dale,
And drew the roseat breath of orient day;
Sometimes, retiring to the secret vale,
Yclad in steel, and bright with burnish'd mail,
He strain'd the bow, or tofs'd the sounding spear,
Or darting on the goal outstripp'd the gale,
Or wheel'd the chariot in its mid-career,
Or strenuous wrestled hard with many a tough compeer.

At other times he pry'd through Nature's store,
Whate'er she in th' ethereal round contains,
Whate'er she hides beneath her verdant floor,
The vegetable and the mineral reigns; [mains,
Or else he scann'd the globe, those small do-
Where restless mortals such a turmoil keep,
Its seas, its floods, its mountains, and its plains;
But more he search'd the mind, and rous'd from
sleep,

Those moral seeds whence we heroic actions reap.

Nor would he scorn to stoop from high pursuits
Of heavenly truth, and practise what she taught,
Vain is the tree of knowledge without fruits.
Sometimes in hand the spade or plough he caught,
Forth-calling all with which boon earth is fraught;

Sometimes he ply'd the strong mechanic tool,
Or rear'd the fabric from the finest draught;
And oft he put himself to Neptune's school,
Fighting with winds and waves on the vext
ocean pool.

To solace then these rougher toils, he try'd
To touch the kindling canvas into life;
With nature his creating pencil vy'd,
With nature joyous at the mimic strife:
Or, to such shapes as grac'd Pygmalion's wife
He hew'd the marble; or, with varied fire,
He rous'd the trumpet and the martial fife,
Or bade the lute sweet tenderness inspire, [lyre.
Or verses fram'd that well might wake Apollo's

Accomplish'd thus he from the woods issued,
Full of great aims, and bent on bold emprise;
The work, which long he in his breast had brew'd.

Now to perform he ardent did devise;

To wit, a barbarous world to civilize.
Earth was till then a boundless forest wild;
Nought to be seen but savage wood, and skies;
No cities nourish'd arts, no culture smil'd,
No government, no laws, no gentle manners mild.

A ragged wight, the worst of brutes, was man;
On his own wretched kind he, ruthless, prey'd:
The strongest still the weakest over-ran;
In every country mighty robbers sway'd,
And guile and ruffian force were all their trade.
Life was a scene of rapine, want, and woe;
Which this brave knight, in noble anger, made
To swear, he would the rascal rout o'erthrow,
For, by the powers divine, it should no more be so!

It would exceed the purport of my song,
To say how this best sun from orient climes
Came beaming life and beauty all along,
Before him chasing indolence and crimes.
Still as he pass'd, the nations he sublimed,
And calls forth arts and virtues with his ray:
Then Egypt, Greece, and Rome, their golden times

Successive had; but now in ruins gray
They lie, to slavish sloth and tyranny a prey.

To crown his toils, Sir Industry then spread
The swelling sail, and made for Britain's coast.
A sylvan life till then the natives led,
In the brown shades and green-wood forest lost,
All careless rambling where it lik'd them most:
Their wealth the wild-deer bouncing through the glade;
They lodg'd at large, and liv'd at nature's cost;
Save spear, and bow, withouten other aid;
Yet not the Roman steel their naked breast dis-
may'd.

He lik'd the soil, he lik'd the clement skies,
He lik'd the verdant hills and flowery plains.
Be this my great, my chosen isle (he cries),
This, whilst my labours liberty sustains,
This queen of ocean all assault disdains.
Nor lik'd he less the genius of the land,
To freedom apt, and persevering pains,
Mild to obey, and generous to command,
Temper'd by forming Heaven with kindest firmest
hand.

Here, by degrees, his master-work arose,
Whatever arts and industry can frame:
Whatever finish'd agriculture knows,
Fair queen of arts! from heaven itself who came,
When Eden flourish'd in unspotted fame:
And still with her sweet innocence we find,
And tender peace, and joys without a name,
That, while they ravish, tranquillize the mind:
Nature and art at once, delight and use combin'd.

The towns he quicken'd by mechanic arts,
And bade the fervent city glow with toil;
Bade social commerce raise renowned marts,
Join land to land, and marry soil to soil,
Unite the poles, and without bloody spoil
Bring home of either Ind the gorgeous stores;
Or, should despotic rage the world embroil,
Bade tyrants tremble on remotest shores,
While o'er th' encircling deep Britannia's thunder roars.

The drooping muses then he westward call'd,
 From the fam'd city by Propontic sea,
 What time the Turk th' enfeebled Grecian
 thrall'd; [free,
 Thence from their cloister'd walks he set them
 And brought them to another Castalie,
 Where Isis many a famous nourling breeds;
 Or where old Cam soft-paces o'er the lea
 In pensive mood, and tun'd his Doric reeds,
 The whilst his flocks at large the lonely shepherd feeds.

Yet the fine arts were what he finish'd least.
 For why? They are the quintessence of all,
 The growth of labouring time, and slow increase;
 Unless, as seldom chances, it should fall,
 That mighty patrons the coy sisters call
 Up to the sunshine of uncumber'd ease, [thrall,
 Where no rude care the mounting thought may
 And where they nothing have to do but please:
 Ah! gracious God! thou know'st they ask no
 other fees.

But now, alas! we live too late in time:
 Our patrons now ev'n grudge that little claim,
 Except to such as seek the soothing rhyme;
 And yet, forsooth, they wear Mæcena's name,
 Poor sons of puffed-up vanity, not fame.
 Unbroken spirits, cheer! still, still remains
 Th' Eternal Patron, Liberty; whose flame,
 While she protects! inspires the noblest strains.
 The best, and sweetest far, are toil-created gains.

When as the knight had fram'd, in Britain-land
 A matchless form of glorious government,
 In which the sovereign laws alone command,
 Laws 'stablish'd by the public free consent,
 Whose majesty is to the sceptre lent;
 When this great plan, with each dependent art,
 Was settled firm, and to his heart's content,
 Then sought he from the toilsome scene to part,
 And let life's vacant eve breathe quiet through the heart.

For this he chose a farm in Deva's vale,
 Where his long allies peep'd upon the main.
 In this calm seat he drew the healthful gale,
 Here mix'd the chief, the patriot, and the swain.
 The happy monarch of his sylvan train,
 Here, sided by the guardians of the fold,
 He walk'd his rounds, and cheer'd his blest
 domain:

His days, the days of unstain'd nature, roll'd,
 Replete with peace and joy, like patriarchs of old.

Witness, ye lowing herds, who gave him milk;
 Witness, ye flocks, whose woolly vestments far
 Exceed soft India's cotton, or her silk;
 Witness, with autumn charg'd, the nodding car,
 That homeward came beneath sweet evening's star,

Or of September moons the radiance mild.

O, hide thy head, abominable war:

Of crimes and ruffian idleness the child!

From heaven this life ysprung, from hell thy glories wild!

Nor from this deep retirement banish'd was
 Th' amusing care of rural industry.

Still, as with grateful change, the seasons pass,

New scenes arise, new landscips strike the eye,
 And all th' enliven'd country beautify:
 Gay plains extend where marshes slept before;
 O'er recent meads th' exulting streamlets fly;
 Dark frowning heaths grow bright with Ceres'
 store,
 And woods imbrown the steep, or wave along the shore.

As nearer to his farm you made approach,
 He polish'd nature with a finer hand:
 Yet on her beauties durst not art incroach:
 'Tis art's alone these beauties to expand.
 In graceful dance immingled, o'er the land,
 Pan, Paleas, Flora, and Pomona play'd:
 Here too brisk gales the rude wild common fand
 An happy place; where free, and unafraid,
 Amid the flowering brakes each coyer creature
 stray'd.

But in prime vigour what can last for ay?
 That soul-enfeebling wizard Indolence,
 I whilom sung, wrought in his works decay:
 Spread far and wide was his curs'd influence;
 Of public virtue much he dull'd the sense,
 Ev'n much of private; ate our spirit out,
 And fed our rank luxurious vices: whence
 The land was overlaid with many a lout;
 Not, as old fame reports, wise, generous, bold,
 and stout.

A rage of pleasure madden'd every breast,
 Down to the lowest lees the ferment ran:
 To his licentious wish each must be blest,
 With joy be fever'd; snatch it as he can.
 Thus vice the standard rear'd; her arrier-ban
 Corruption call'd, and loud she gave the word,
 "Mind, mind yourselves! why should the vulgar man,
 "The lacquey be more virtuous than his lord?"
 "Enjoy this span of life! 'tis all the gods afford."
 The tidings reach'd to where in quiet hall,
 The good old knight enjoy'd well-earn'd repose.
 "Come, come, Sir Knight! thy children on thee call:
 "Come, save us yet, ere ruin round us close!
 "The demon indolence thy toils o'erthrows."
 On this the noble colour stain'd his cheeks,
 Indignant, glowing through the whitening snows
 Of venerable eld; his eye full-speaks
 His ardent soul, and from his couch at once he breaks.

I will (she cry'd), so help me, God! destroy
 That villain, Archimage.—His page then strait
 He to him call'd, a fiery-footed boy,
 Benempt dispatch. "My steed be at the gate;
 "My bard attend; quick, bring the net of fate."
 This net was twisted by the sisters three;
 Which when once cast o'er harden'd wretch, too
 late

Repentance comes: replevy cannot be
 From the strong iron grasp of vengeful destiny.

He came, the bard, a little druid-wight,
 Of wither'd aspect; but his eye was keen,
 With sweetness mix'd. In russet brown bedight,
 As is his * sister of the copses green,

* The nightingale.

He crept along, unpromising of mien.
Gross he who judges so. His soul was fair,
Bright as the children of yon azure sheen.
True comeliness, which nothing can impair,
Dwells in the mind: all else is vanity and glare.

Come, (quoth the knight) a voice has reach'd mine ear:

The demon Indolence threatens overthrow
To all that to mankind is good and dear:
Come, Philomelus; let us instant go,
O'erturn his bowers, and lay his castle low.
Those men, those wretched men! who will be slaves,

Must drink a bitter wrathful cup of woe:
But some there be, thy song, as from their graves,

Shall raise. Thrice happy he! who without rigour lives.

Issuing forth, the knight bestrode his steed,
Of ardent bay, and on whose front a star
Shone blazing bright: sprung from the generous breed

That whirl of active day the rapid car,
He pranc'd along, disdain'g gate or bar.
Meantime, the bard on milk-white palfrey rode;
An honest sober beast, that did not mar
His meditations, but full softly trode;
And much they moraliz'd as thus yfere they yode.

They talk'd of virtue, and of human bliss.
What else so fit for man to settle well?

And still their long researches met in this,
This truth of truths, which nothing can refel:

"From virtue's fount the purest joys out-well,
"Sweet rills of thought that cheer the conscious soul;

"While vice pours forth the troubled streams
of hell,

"The which, howe'er disguis'd, at last with dole
Will, through the tortur'd breast, their fiery torrent roll."

At length it dawn'd, that fatal valley gay,
O'er which high wood-crown'd hills their summits rear.

On the cool height awhile our palmers stay,
And spite ev'n of themselves their senses cheer;
Then to the vizard's wonne their steps they steer.
Like a green isle, it broad beneath them spread,
With gardens round, and wandering currents clear,
And tufted groves to shade the meadow bed,
Sweet airs and song; and without hurry all seem'd glad.

"As God shall judge me, knight, we must forgive

(The half-enraptur'd Philomelus cry'd)

"The frail good man deluded here to live,
"And in these groves his musing fancy hide.

"Ah! nought is pure. It cannot be deny'd,

"That virtue still some tincture has of vice,

"And vice of virtue. What should then betide

"But that our charity be not too nice?

"Come, let us those we can to real bliss entice.

"Ay, sicker (quoth the knight) all flesh is frail,

"To pleasant sin and joyous dalliance bent;

"But let not brutish vice of this avail,

"And think to 'scape deserved punishment.

"Justice were cruel weakly to relent;
"From mercy's self she got her sacred glaive;
"Grace be to those who can, and will, repent;
"But penance long, and dreary, to the slave,
"Who must in floods of fire his gross foul spirit
"lave."

Thus, holding high discourse, they came to where
The curfed carle was at his wonted trade;
Still tempting heedless men into his snare,
In witching wise, as I before have said.
But when he saw, in goodly geer array'd,
The grave majestic knight approaching nigh,
And by his side the bard so sage and staid,
His countenance fell; yet oft his anxious eye
Mark'd them, like wily fox who roosted cock doth spy.

Nathless, with feign'd respect, he bade give back
The rabble-rout, and welcom'd them full kind;
Struck with the noble twain, they were not slack
His orders to obey, and fall behind.

Then he resum'd his song; and unconfin'd,
Pour'd all his music, ran through all his strings:
With magic dust their eyne he tries to blind,
And virtue's tender airs o'er weakness flings.
What pity bese his song who so divinely sings!

Elate in thought, he counted them his own,
They listen'd so intent with fix'd delight:
But they instead, as if transmew'd to stone,
Marvell'd he could with such sweet art unite
The lights and shades of manners, wrong and right.

Meantime, the silly crowd the charm devour,
Wide pressing to the gate. Swift, on the knight
He darted fierce, to drag him to his bower,
Who backening shunn'd his touch, for well he knew its power.

As in throng'd amphitheatre, of old,
The wary Retiarius trap'd his foe:
Ev'n so the knight, returning on him bold,
At once involv'd him in the net of woe,
Whereof I mention made not long ago.
Enrag'd at first, he scorn'd so weak a jail,
And leapt, and flew, and flounced to and fro;
But when he found that nothing could avail,
He set him felly down and gnaw'd his bitter nail.

Alarm'd, th' inferior demons of the place
Rais'd rueful shrieks and hideous yells around;
Black stormy clouds deform'd the welkin's face,
And from beneath was heard a wailing sound,
As of infernal sprites in cavern bound;
A solemn sadness every creature strook,
And lightnings flash'd, and horror rock'd the ground: [mish'd look,

Huge crowds on crowds out-pour'd, with ble-
As if on time's last verge this frame of things had shook.

Soon as the short liv'd tempest was yspent,
Steam'd from the jaws of vext Avernus' hole,
And hush'd the hubbub of the rabblement,
Sir Industry the first calm moment stole.

"There must (he cry'd), amidst so vast a shoal,

"Be some who are not tainted at the heart,

"Not poison'd quite by this same villain's bowl:

"Come then, my bard, thy heavenly fire impart;

"Touch soul with soul, till forth the latent spirit
"start."

The bard obey'd; and taking from his side,
Where it in seemly sort depending hung,
His British harp, its speaking strings he try'd,
The which with skilful touch he deffly strung,
Till tinkling in clear symphony they rung.
Then, as he felt the muses come along,
Light o'er the chords his raptur'd hand he flung,
And play'd a prelude to his rising song:
The whilst, like midnight mute, ten thousands round him throng.

Thus, ardent, burst his strain.—

“ Ye helpless race,
“ Dire-labouring here to smother reason's ray,
“ That lights our Maker's image in our face,
“ And gives us wide o'er earth unquestion'd sway;
“ What is th' ador'd Supreme Perfection, say?
“ What, but eternal never-resting soul,
“ Almighty power, and all-directing day;
“ By whom each atom stirs, the planets roll;
“ Who fills, surrounds, informs, and agitates the “ whole.
“ Come, to the beaming God your hearts unfold!
“ Draw from its fountain life! 'Tis thence, alone,
“ We can excel. Up from unfeeling mold,
“ To seraphs burning round th' Almighty's
“ throne,
“ Life rising still on life, in higher tone,
“ Perfection forms, and with perfection bliss.
“ In universal nature this clear shown,
“ Nor needeth proof: to prove it were, I wis,
“ To prove the beauteous world excels the brute
“ abyss.
“ Is not the field, with lively culture green,
“ A sight more joyous than the dead morass?
“ Do not the skies, with active ether clean,
“ And fann'd by sprightly zephyrs, far surpass
“ The foul November fogs and slumberous mists,
“ With which sad nature veils her drooping face?
“ Does not the mountain-stream, as clear as glass,
“ Gay-dancing on, the putrid pool disgrace?
“ The same in all holds true, but chief in human-race.
“ It was not by vile loitering in ease,
“ That Greece obtain'd the brighter palm of art,
“ That soft yet ardent Athens learn'd to please,
“ To keen the wit, and to sublime the heart,
“ In all supreme! complete in every part!
“ It was not thence majestic Rome arose,
“ And o'er the nations shook her conquering dart:
“ For sluggard's brow the laurel never grows;
“ Renown is not the child of indolent repose.
“ Had unambitious mortals minded nought,
“ But in loose joy their time to wear away;
“ Had they alone the lap of dalliance sought,
“ Pleas'd on her pillow their dull heads to lay,
“ Rude Nature's state had been our state to-day;
“ No cities e'er their towery fronts had rais'd,
“ No arts had made us opulent and gay;
“ With brother-brutes the human race had “ graz'd;
“ None e'er had soar'd to fame, none honour'd
“ been, none prais'd.
“ Great Homer's song had never fir'd the breast
“ To thirst of glory, and heroic deeds;
“ Sweet Maro's muse, sunk in inglorious rest,
“ Had silent slept amid the Mincian reeds:

“ The wits of modern time had told their beads,
“ And monkish legends been their only strains;
“ Our Milton's Eden had lain wrapt in weeds,
“ Our Shakspeare stroll'd and laugh'd with “ Warwick swains,
“ Ne had my master Spenser charm'd his Mulla's “ plains.
“ Dumb too had been the sage historic muse,
“ And perish'd all the sons of ancient fame;
“ Those starry lights of virtue, that diffuse
“ Through the dark depth of time their vivid “ flame,
“ Had all been lost with such as have no name.
“ Who then had scorn'd his ease for others' good?
“ Who then had toil'd rapacious men to tame?
“ Who in the public breach devoted stood,
“ And for his country's cause been prodigal of blood?
“ But should your hearts to fame unfeeling be,
“ If right I read, your pleasure all require:
“ Then hear how best may be obtain'd this fec,
“ How best enjoy'd this nature's wide desire.
“ Toil, and be glad! let industry inspire
“ Into your quicken'd limbs her buoyant breath!
“ Who does not act is dead; absorpt entire
“ In miry sloth, no pride, no joy he hath:
“ O leaden-hearted men, to be in love with death!
“ Ah! what avail the largest gifts of heaven,
“ When drooping health and spirits go amiss?
“ How tasteless then whatever can be given?
“ Health is the vital principle of bliss,
“ And exercise of health. In proof of this,
“ Behold the wretch, who flugs his life away,
“ Soon swallow'd in disease's sad abyss;
“ While he whom toil has brac'd, or manly play,
“ Has light as air each limb, each thought as clear
“ as day.
“ O, who can speak the vigorous joy of health!
“ Unclogg'd the body, unobscur'd the mind:
“ The morning rises gay, with pleasing stealth,
“ The temperate evening falls serene and kind.
“ In health the wiser brutes true gladness find.
“ See! how the younglings frisk along the meads,
“ As May comes on, and wakes the balmy wind;
“ Rampant with life, their joy all joy exceeds:
“ Yet what but high-strung health this dancing
“ pleasaunce breeds?
“ But here, instead, is foster'd every ill,
“ Which or distemper'd minds or bodies know.
“ Come then, my kindred spirits! do not spill
“ Your talents here. This place is but a show,
“ Whose charms delude you to the den of woe:
“ Come, follow me, I will direct you right,
“ Where pleasure's roses, void of serpent's, grow,
“ Sincere as sweet; come, follow this good knight,
“ And you will bless the day that brought him to “ your sight.
“ Some he will lead to courts, and some to camps;
“ To senates some, and public sage debates,
“ Where, by the solemn gleam of midnight-lamps,
“ The world is pois'd, and manag'd mighty states;
“ To high discovery some, that new-creates
“ The face of earth; some to the thriving mart;
“ Some to the rural reign, and softer fates;
“ To the sweet muses some, who raise the heart;
“ All glory shall be yours, all nature, and all art.

" There are, I see, who listen to my lay,
 " Who wretched sigh for virtue, but despair.
 " All may be done, (methinks I hear them say)
 " Ev'n death despis'd by generous actions fair;
 " All, but for those who to these bowers repair,
 " Their every power dissolv'd in luxury,
 " To quit of torpid sluggishness the lair,
 " And from the powerful arms of sloth get free.
 " 'Tis rising from the dead—Alas!—It cannot be!

" Would you then learn to dissipate the band
 " Of these huge threatening difficulties dire,
 " That in the weak man's way like lions stand,
 " His soul appall, and damp his rising fire?
 " Resolve, resolve, and to be men aspire.
 " Exert that noblest privilege, alone,
 " Here to mankind indulg'd: control desire:
 " Let godlike reason, from her sovereign throne,
 " Speak the commanding word—I will—and it is " done.

" Heavens! can you then thus waste, in shame-
 " ful wife,
 " Your few important days of trial here?
 " Heirs of eternity! yborn to rise
 " Through endless states of being, still more near
 " To bliss approaching, and perfection clear,
 " Can you renounce a fortune so sublime,
 " Such glorious hopes, your backward steps to
 " steer, [and flume?
 " And roll, with vilest brutes, through mud
 " No! no!—Your heaven-touch'd heart disdains
 " the fordid crime!"

" Enough! enough!" they cry'd—strait from the crowd,
 The better sort on wings of transport fly:
 As when amid the lifeless summits proud
 Of Alpine cliffs, where to the gelid sky
 Snows pil'd on snows in wintery torpor lie,
 The rays divine of vernal Phœbus play;
 Th' awaken'd heaps, in streamlets from on high,
 Rous'd into action, lively leap away, [ing gay.
 Glad warbling through the vales, in their new be-
 Not less the life, the vivid joy serene,
 That lighted up these new-created men,
 Than that which wings th' exulting spirit clean,
 When, just deliver'd from his fleshly den,
 It soaring seeks its native skies agen:
 How light its essence! how unclogg'd its powers,
 Beyond the blazon of my mortal pen!
 Ev'n so we glad forsook these sinful bowers,
 Ev'n such enraptur'd life, such energy was ours.

But far the greater part, with rage inflam'd,
 Dire-mutter'd curses, and blasphem'd high Jove.
 " Ye sons of hate! (they bitterly exclaim'd)
 " What brought you to this seat of peace and love?
 " While with kind nature, here amid the grove,
 " We pass'd the harmless sabbath of our time,
 " What to disturb it could, fell men, remove
 " Your barbarous hearts? Is happiness a crime?
 " Then do the fiends of hell rule in yon heaven
 " sublime.

" Ye impious wretches," (quoth the knight in wrath)
 " Your happiness behold!"—Then strait a wand
 He wav'd, an anti-magic power that hath,
 Truth from illusive falsehood to command.

Sudden the landscape sinks on every hand;
 The pure quick streams are marshy puddles found;
 On baleful heaths the groves all blacken'd stand;
 And, o'er the weedy foul abhorred ground,
 Snakes, adders, toads, each loathsome creature crawls
 around.

And here and there, on trees by lightning scath'd,
 Unhappy wights who loathed life yhung;
 Or, in fresh gore and recent murder bath'd,
 They weltering lay; or else, infuriate flung
 Into the gloomy flood, while ravens sung
 The funeral dirge, they down the torrent roll'd:
 These, by distemper'd blood to madness stung,
 Had doom'd themselves; whence oft, when night
 control'd

The world, returning hither their sad spirits howl'd.

Meantime a moving scene was open laid;
 That lazarus-house, I whilom in my lay
 Depainted have, its horrors deep-display'd,
 And gave unnumber'd wretches to the day,
 Who tossing there in squalid misery lay.
 Soon as of sacred light th' unwonted simile
 Pour'd on these living catacombs its ray,
 Through the drear caverns stretching many a mile, [woes awhile.
 The sick up-rais'd their heads, and dropp'd their

" O, heaven! (they cry'd) and do we once
 " more see
 " Yon blessed sun, and this green earth so fair?
 " Are we from noisome damps of pest-house free?
 " And drink our souls the sweet ethereal air?
 " O, thou! or knight, or god! who holdest there
 " That fiend, oh, keep him in eternal chains!
 " But what for us, the children of despair,
 " Brought to the brink of hell, what hope re-
 " mains?

" Repentance does itself but aggravate our pains."

The gentle knight, who saw their rueful case,
 Let fall adown his silver beard some tears.
 " Certes (quoth he), it is not ev'n in grace,
 " T' undo the past, and eke your broken years:
 " Nathless, to nobler worlds repentance rears,
 " With humble hope, her eye; to her is given
 " A power the truly contrite heart that cheers;
 " She quells the brand by which the rocks are
 " riven; [ven.

" She more than merely softens, she rejoices hea-

" Then patient bear the sufferings you have
 " earn'd,

" And by these sufferings purify the mind;
 " Let wisdom be by past misconduct learn'd:
 " Or pious die, with penitence resign'd,
 " And to a life more happy and refin'd,
 " Doubt not, you shall, new creatures, yet arise.
 " Till then, you may expect in me to find
 " One who will wipe your sorrow from your " eyes,

" One who will soothe your pangs, and wing you
 " to the skies.

They silent heard, and pour'd their thanks in " tears. [tone)

" For you (resum'd the knight, with sterner
 " Whose hard dry hearts th' obdurate demon
 " fears,

" That villain's gifts will cost you many a groan;

" In dolorous mansion long you must bemoan
 " His fatal charms, and weep your stains away:
 " Till, soft and pure as infant goodness grown,
 " You feel a perfect change: then, who can say,
 " What grace may yet shine forth in heaven's eter-
 " nal day?"

This said, his powerful wand he wav'd anew:
 Instant, a glorious angel-train descends,
 The charities, to-wit, of rosy hue;
 Sweet love their looks a gentle radiance lends,
 And with seraphic flame compassion blends.
 At once, delighted, to their charge they fly:
 When, lo! a goodly hospital ascends;
 In which they bade each lenient aid be nigh,
 That could the sick-bed smoothe of that sad company.

It was a worthy edifying sight,
 And gives to human-kind peculiar grace,
 To see kind hands attending day and night,
 With tender ministry, from place to place.
 Some prop the head; some from the pallid face
 Wipe off the faint cold dews weak nature sheds;
 Some reach the healing draught: the whilst, to chafe
 The fear supreme, around their soften'd beds,
 Some holy man by prayer all opening heaven
 dispreds.

Attended by a glad acclaiming train,
 Of those he rescued had from gaping hell,
 Then turn'd the knight; and, to his hall again
 Soft-pacing, sought of peace the mossy cell:
 Yet down his cheeks the gems of pity fell,
 To see the helpless wretches that remain'd,
 There left through delves and deserts dire to yell;
 Amaz'd, their looks with pale dismay were stain'd,
 And spreading wide their hands they meek repentance feign'd.

But, ah! their scorned day of grace was past:
 For (horrible to tell!) a desert wild
 Before them stretch'd, bare, comfortless, and vast;
 With gibbets, bones, and carcases defil'd.
 There nor trim field, nor lively culture smil'd;
 Nor waving shade was seen, nor fountain fair;
 But sands abrupt on sands lay loosely pil'd,
 Through which they floundering toil'd with painful care,
 Whilst Phœbus smote them fore, and fir'd the cloudless air.

Then, varying to a joyless land of bogs,
 The sadden'd country a gray waste appear'd;
 Where nought but putrid streams and noisome
 For ever hung on drizzly Auster's beard; [fogs
 Or else the ground by piercing Caurus fear'd,
 Was jagg'd with frost, or heap'd with glazed
 snow:
 Through these extremes a ceaseless round they steer'd,
 By cruel fiends still hurry'd to and fro,
 Gaunt beggary, and scorn, with many hell-hounds
 moe.

The first was with base dunghill rags yclad,
 Tainting the gale, in which they flutter'd light;
 Of morbid hue his features, funk, and sad;
 His hollow eyne shook forth a sickly light;

And o'er his lank jaw-bone, in piteous plight,
 His black rough beard was matted rank and vile;
 Direful to see! an heart-appalling sight!
 Meantime foul scurf and blotches him defile;
 And dogs, where-e'er he went, still barked all the while.

The other was a fell despightful fiend:
 Hell holds none worse in baleful bower below:
 By pride, and wit, and rage, and rancour,
 keen'd;
 Of man alike, if good or bad, the foe:
 With nose up-turn'd, he always made a show
 As if he smelt some nauseous scent; his eye
 Was cold, and keen, like blast from boreal snow;
 And taunts he casten forth most bitterly.
 Such were the twain that off drove this ungodly fry.

Ev'n so through Brentford town, a town of mud,
 An herd of brisly swine is prick'd along;
 The filthy beasts, that never chew the cud,
 Still grunt, and squeak, and sing their troub-
 lous song,
 And oft they plunge themselves the mire among:
 But ay the ruthless driver goads them on,
 And ay of barking dogs the bitter throng
 Makes them renew their unmelodious moan;
 Ne ever find they rest from their unresting sone.

TO MR. THOMSON,

*On his unfinished plan of a Poem, called the CASTLE
 OF INDOLENCE, in Spenser's style.*

BY DR. MORELL.

As when the silk-worm, erst the tender care
 Of Syrian maidens, 'gins for to unfold
 From his sleek sides, that now much sleeker are
 The glossy treasure, and soft threads of gold;
 In various turns, and many a winding fold,
 He spins his web, and as he spins decays;
 Till, within circles infinite enroll'd,
 He rests supine, imprison'd in the maze,
 The which himself did make, the gathering of his days.

So thou, they say, from thy prolific brain,
 A castle, hight of indolence, didst raise;
 Where listless sprites, withouten care or pain,
 In idle pleasure spend their jocund days,
 Nor heed rewardful toil, nor seeken praise.
 Thither thou didst repair in luckless hour;
 And lulled with thine own enchanting lays,
 Didst lie adown, entranced in the bower,
 The which thyself didst make, the gathering of thy power.

But Venus, suffering not her favourite worm
 For ay to sleepen in his silky tomb,
 Instructs him to throw off his pristine form,
 And the gay features of a fly assume;
 When, lo! eftsoons from the surrounding gloom,
 He vigorous breaks, forth issuing from the wound
 His horny beak had made, and finding room,
 On new plum'd pinions flutters all around,
 And buzzing speaks his joy in most expressive sound.

So may the god of science and of wit,
With pitying eye ken thee his darling son;
Shake from thy fatty sides the slumberous fit,
In which, alas! thou art so woe begun!
Or with his pointed arrows goad thee on;

Till thou reseelest life in all thy veins;
And, on the wings of resolution,
Like thine own hero dight, fliest o'er the plains,
Chauncing his peerless praise in never-dying strains.

As on the sea-beat shore Britannia sat,
Of her degenerate sons the faded fame,
Deep in her anxious heart, revolving sad :
Bare was her throbbing bosom to the gale,
That hoarse, and hollow, from the bleak surge blew ;
Loose flow'd her tresses ; rent her azure robe.
Hung o'er the deep from her majestic brow
She tore the laurel, and she tore the bay.
Nor ceas'd the copious grief to bathe her cheek ;
Nor ceas'd her sobs to murmur to the main.
Peace discontented nigh, departing, stretch'd
Her dove-like wings. And war, though greatly rous'd, [queen
Yet mourns his fetter'd hands. While thus the
Of nations spoke : and what she said the muse
Recorded, faithful, in unbidden verse.

Ev'n not yon sail, that, from the sky-mixt wave,
Dawns on the sight, and wafts the royal youth*,
A freight of future glory to my shore ;
Ev'n not the flattering view of golden days,
And rising periods yet of bright renown,
Beneath the parents, and their endless line
Through late revolving time, can sooth my rage ;
While, unchastis'd, th' insulting Spaniard dares
Infest the trading flood, full of vain war
Despise my navies, and my merchants seize ;
As, trusting to false peace, they fearless roam
The world of waters wild ; made, by the toil,
And liberal blood of glorious ages, mine :
Nor bursts my sleeping thunder on their head.
Whence this unwonted patience ? this weak doubt ?
This tame beseeching of rejected peace ?
This meek forbearance ? this unnative fear,
To generous Britons never known before ?
And sail'd my fleets for this ; on Indian tides
To float, inactive, with the veering winds ?
The mockery of war ! while hot disease,
And sloth distemper'd, swept off burning crowds,
For action ardent ; and amid the deep,
Inglorious, sunk them in a watery grave.

* Frederick.

There now they lie beneath the rolling flood,
Far from their friends, and country unaveng'd ;
And back the drooping war-ship comes again,
Dispirited, and thin ; her sons asham'd
Thus idly to review their native shore ;
With not one glory sparkling in their eye,
One triumph on their tongue. A passenger,
The violated merchant comes along ;
That far-sought wealth, for which the noxious gale
He drew, and sweet beneath equator suns,
By lawless force detain'd ; a force that soon
Would melt away, and every spoil resign,
Were once the British lion heard to roar.
Whence is it that the proud Iberian thus,
In their own well-asserted element,
Dares rouse to wrath the masters of the main ?
Who told him, that the big incumbent war
Would not, ere this, have roll'd his trembling
In smoky ruin ? and his guilty stores, [ports
Won by the ravage of a butcher'd world,
Yet unaton'd, sunk in the swallowing deep,
Or led the glittering prize into the Thames ?

There was a time (oh, let my languid sons Resume their spirit at the rousing thought !)
When all the pride of Spain, in one dread fleet,
Swell'd o'er the labouring surge ; like a whole heaven
Of clouds, wide-roll'd before the boundless breeze.
Gaily the splendid armament along
Exultant plough'd, reflecting a red gleam,
As sunk the sun, o'er all the flaming vast ;
Tall, gorgeous, and elate ; drunk with the dream
Of easy conquest : while their bloated war,
Stretch'd out from sky to sky, the gather'd force
Of ages held in its capacious womb.
But soon, regardless of the cumbersome pomp,
My dauntless Britons came, a gloomy few,
With tempest black, the goodly scene deform'd,
And laid their glory waste. The bolts of fate
Resistless thunder'd through their yielding sides ;
Fierce o'er their beauty blaz'd the lurid flame ;
And seiz'd in horrid grasp, or shatter'd wide,
Amid the mighty waters deep they sunk.

" In dolorous mansion long you must bemoan

Resistless thunder'd through their yielding sides;
Fierce o'er their beauty blaz'd the lurid flame;
And seiz'd in horrid grasp, or shatter'd wide,
Amid the mighty waters deep they sunk.

Then too from every promontary chill,
Rank fen, and cavern where the wild wave works,
I swept confederate winds, and swell'd a storm.
Round the glad isle, snatch'd by the vengeful blast,
The scatter'd remnants drove; on the blind shelve,
And pointed rock, that marks th' indented shore,
Relentless dash'd, where loud the northern main
Howls through the fractur'd Caledonian isles.

Such were the dawns of my watery reign;
But since how vast it grew, how absolute,
Ev'n in those troubled times, when dreadful Blake
Aw'd angry nations with the British name,
Let every humbled state, let Europe say,
Sustain'd, and balanc'd, by my naval arm.
Ah, what must those immortal spirits think
Of your poor shifts? Those, for their country's good

Who fac'd the blackest danger, knew no fear,
No mean submission, but commanded peace.
Ah! how with indignation must they burn!
(If aught, but joy, can touch ethereal breasts)
With shame! with grief! to see their feeble sons
Shrink from that empire o'er the conquer'd seas,
For which their wisdom plann'd, their councils
glow'd,

And their veins bled through many a toiling age!

Oh, first of human blessings! and supreme!
Fair peace! how lovely, how delightful thou!
By whose wide tie, the kindred sons of men
Like brothers live, in amity combin'd,
And unsuspecting faith; while honest toil
Gives every joy, and to those joys a right,
Which idle, barbarous rapine but usurps.
Pure is thy reign; when, unaccurs'd by blood,
Nought, save the sweetness of indulgent showers,
Trickling distils into the vernal glebe;
Instead of mangled carcases, sad-seen,
When the blithe sheaves lie scatter'd o'er the field;
When only shining shares, the crooked knife,
And hooks imprint the vegetable wound;
When the land blushes with the rose alone,
The falling fruitage and the bleeding vine.
Oh, peace! thou source, and soul of social life;
Beneath whose calm inspiring influence,
Science his views enlarges, art refines,
And swelling commerce opens all her ports;
Blest be the man divine, who gives us thee!
Who bids the trumpet hush his horrid clang,
Nor blow the giddy nations into rage;
Who sheaths the murderous blade; the deadly gun
Into the well-pil'd armory returns;
And, every vigour from the work of death,
To grateful industry converting, makes
The country flourish, and the city smile.
Unviolated, him the virgin sings:
And him the smiling mother to her train.
Of him the shepherd, in the peaceful dale,
Chaunts; and, the treasures of his labour sure,
The husbandman of him, as at the plough,
Or team, he toils. With him the sailor sooths,
Beneath the trembling moon, the midnight wave;
And the full city, warm, from street to street,
And shop to shop, responsive, sings of him:
Nor joys one land alone; his praise extends
Far as the sun rolls the diffusive day;
Far as the breeze can bear the gifts of peace,
Till all the happy nations catch the song.
What would not, peace! the patriot bear for thee?

What painful patience? what incessant care?
What mixt anxiety? what sleepless toil?

Ev'n from the rash protect'd what reproach?
For he thy value knows; thy friendship he
To human nature: but the better thou,
The richer of delight, sometimes the more
Inevitable war; when Russian force
Awakes the fury of an injur'd state.
Ev'n the good patient man, whom reason rules,
Rous'd by bold insult, and injurious rage,
With sharp and sudden check, th' astonish'd sons
Of violence confounds; firm as his cause
His bolder heart; in awful justice clad;
His eyes effulging a peculiar fire;
And, as he charges through the prostrate war,
His keen air teaches faithless men, no more
To dare the sacred vengeance of the just.

And what, my thoughtless sons, should fire you
more,

Than when your well-earn'd empire of the deep
The least beginning injury receives!

What better cause can call your lightning forth?
Your thunder wake? your dearest life demand?
What better cause, than when your country sees
The fly destruction at her vitals aim'd?

For, oh, it much imports you, 'tis your all,
To keep your trade entire, entire the force,
And honour of your fleets: o'er that to watch,
Ev'n with a hand severe, and jealous eye.
In intercourse be gentle, generous, just,
By wisdom polish'd, and of manners fair;
But on the sea be terrible, untam'd,
Unconquerable still; let none escape,
Who shall but aim to touch your glory there.
Is there the man, into the lion's den
Who dares intrude, to snatch his young away?
And is a Briton seiz'd? and seiz'd beneath
The slumbering terrors of a British fleet?
Then ardent rise! Oh, great in vengeance rise!
O'erturn the proud, teach rapine to restore:
And as you ride sublimely round the world,
Make every vessel stoop, make every state
At once their welfare and their duty know.
This is your glory: this your wisdom; this
The native power for which you were design'd
By fate, when fate design'd the firmest state,
That e'er was seated on the subject sea;
A state, alone, where liberty should live,
In these late times, this evening of mankind,
When Athens, Rome, and Carthage are no more,
The world almost in slavish sloth dissolv'd.
For this, these rocks around your coast were thrown,
For this, your oaks, peculiar harden'd, shoot
Strong into sturdy growth; for this, your hearts
Swell with a fullen courage, growing still
As danger grows; and strength, and toil for this
Are liberal pour'd o'er all the fervent land.
Then cherish this, this unexpansive power,
Undangerous to the public, ever prompt,
By lavish nature thrust into your hand:
And, unincumber'd with the bulk immense
Of conquest, whence huge empires rose, and fell
Self-crush'd, extend your reign from shore to shore,
Where-e'er the wind your high behests can blow;
And fix it deep on this eternal base.
For should the sliding fabric once give way,
Soon slacken'd quite, and past recovery broke,
It gathers ruin as it rolls along,

Steep rushing down to that devouring gulf,
Where many a mighty empire buried lies.
And should the big redundant flood of trade,
In which ten thousand thousand labours join
Their several currents, till the boundless tide
Rolls in a radiant deluge o'er the land;
Should this bright stream, the least inflected, point
Its course another way, o'er other lands
The various treasure would resistless pour,
Ne'er to be won again; its ancient tract
Left a vile channel, desolate and dead,
With all around a miserable waste.

Not Egypt, were, her better heaven, the Nile
Turn'd in the pride of flow; when o'er his rocks,
And roaring cataracts, beyond the reach
Of dizzy vision pil'd, in one wide flash
An Ethiopian deluge foams amain
(Whence wondering fable trac'd him from the sky);
Ev'n not that prime of earth, where harvests crowd
On untill'd harvests, all the teeming year,
If of the fat o'erflowing culture robb'd,
Were then a more uncomfortable wild,
Sterile, and void; than, of her trade depriv'd,
Britons, your boar'd isle: her princes sunk;
Her high-built honour moulder'd to the dust;
Unnerv'd her force; her spirit vanish'd quite;
With rapid wing her riches fled away;
Her unfrequented ports alone the sign
Of what she was; her merchants scatter'd wide;
Her hollow shops shut up; and in her streets,
Her fields, woods, markets, villages, and roads,
The cheerful voice of labour heard no more.

Oh, let not then waste luxury impair
That manly soul of toil, which strings your nerves,
And your own proper happiness creates!
Oh, let not the soft, penetrating plague
Creep on the free-born mind; and working there,
With the sharp tooth of many a new-form'd want,
Endless, and idle all, eat out the heart
Of liberty; the high conception blast;
The noble sentiment, th' impatient scorn
Of base subjection, and the swelling wish

For general good, crazing from the mind:
While nought save narrow selfishness succeeds,
And low design, the sneaking passions all
Let loose, and reigning in the rankled breast.
Induc'd at last, by scarce-perceiv'd degrees,
Sapping the very frame of government,
And life, a total dissolution comes;
Sloth, ignorance, dejection, flattery, fear.
Oppression raging o'er the waste he makes;
The human being almost quite extinct;
And the whole state in broad corruption sinks.
Oh, shun that gulf: that gaping ruin shun!
And countless ages roll it far away
From you, ye heaven-belov'd! may liberty,
The light of life, the sun of human-kind!
Whence heroes, bards, and patriots borrow flame,
Ev'n where the keen depressive north descends,
Still spread, exalt, and actuate your powers!
While slavish southern climates beam in vain!
And may a public spirit from the throne,
Where every virtue sits, go copious forth,
Live o'er the land, the finer arts inspire,
Make thoughtful science raise his pensive head,
Blow the fresh bay, bid industry rejoice,
And the rough sons of lowest labour smile.
As when, profuse of spring, the loosen'd west
Lifts up the pining year, and balmy breathes
Youth, life, and love, and beauty o'er the world.

But haste we from these melancholy shores,
Nor to deaf winds and waves our fruitless plaint
Pour weak; the country claims our active aid;
That let us roam; and where we find a spark
Of public virtue, blow it into flame.

Lo! now my sons, the sons of freedom! meet
In awful senate; thither let us fly;
Burn in the patriot's thought, flow from his tongue
In fearless truth; myself, transform'd, preside,
And shed the spirit of Britannia round.

This said; her fleeting form, and airy train,
Sunk in the gale; and nought but ragged rocks
Rush'd on the broken eye; and nought was heard
But the rough cadence of the dashing wave.

LIBERTY, A POEM,

IN FIVE PARTS.

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS FREDERICK
PRINCE OF WALES.

SIR,

WHEN I reflect upon that ready condescension, that preventing generosity, with which your Royal Highness received the following poem under your protection; I can alone ascribe it to the recommendation, and influence of the subject. In you the cause and concerns of Liberty have so zealous a patron, as entitles whatever may have the least tendency to promote them, to the distinction of your favour. And who can entertain this delightful reflection, without feeling a pleasure far superior to that of the fondest author; and of which all true lovers of their country must participate? To behold the noblest dispositions of the prince, and of the patriot, united: an overflowing benevolence, generosity, and candour of heart, joined to an enlightened zeal for Liberty, an intimate persuasion that on it depends the happiness and glory both of kings and people: to see these shining out in public virtues, as they have hitherto smiled in all the social lights and private accomplishments of life, is a prospect that cannot but inspire a general sentiment of satisfaction and gladness, more easy to be felt than expressed.

If the following attempt to trace Liberty, from the first ages down to her excellent establishment in Great Britain, can at all merit your approbation, and prove an entertainment to your Royal Highness; if it can in any degree answer the dignity of the subject, and of the name under which I presume to shelter it; I have my best reward: particularly as it affords me an opportunity of declaring that I am, with the greatest zeal and respect,

SIR,

Your Royal Highness's

Most obedient

and most devoted servant,

JAMES THOMSON.

PART I.

ANCIENT AND MODERN ITALY COMPARED.

Contents.

The following Poem is thrown into the form of a Poetical vision. Its scene the ruins of ancient Rome. The Goddess of Liberty, who is supposed to speak through the whole, appears, characterised as British Liberty; to ver. 44. Gives a view of ancient Italy, and particularly of republican Rome, in all her magnificence and glory; to ver. 112. This contrasted by modern Italy; its vallies, mountains, culture, cities, people: the difference appearing strongest in the capital city Rome; to ver. 234. The ruins of the great works of Liberty more magnificent than the borrowed pomp of Oppression; and from them revived Sculpture, Painting, and Architecture; to ver. 256. The old Romans apostrophized, with regard to the several melancholy changes in Italy: Horace, Tully, and Virgil, with regard to their Tibur, Tusculum, and Naples; to ver. 287. That once finest and most ornamented part of Italy, all along the coast of Baiæ, how changed; to ver. 321. This desolation of Italy applied to Britain; to ver. 344. Address to the Goddess of Liberty, that she would deduce from the first ages, her chief establishments, the description of which constitute the subject of the following parts of this Poem. She assents, and commands what she says to be sung in Britain; whose happiness, arising from freedom, and a limited monarchy, she marks; to ver. 391. An immediate Vision attends, and paints her words. Invocation.

O MY lamented Talbot! while with thee
The muse gay rov'd the glad Hesperian round,
And drew th' inspiring breath of ancient arts;
Ah! little thought she her returning verse
Should sing our darling subject to thy shade. 5
And does the mystic veil, from mortal beam,
Involve those eyes where every virtue smil'd,

And all thy father's candid spirit shone?
The light of reason, pure, without a cloud;
Full of the generous heart, the mild regard; 10
Honour disdaining blemish, cordial faith,
And limpid truth, that looks the very soul.
But to the death of mighty nations turn,
My strain; be there: absorb the private tear.

Musing, I lay; warm from the sacred walks, 15
Where at each step imagination burns:
While scatter'd wide around, awful, and hoar,
Lies, a vast monument, once-glorious Rome,
The tomb of empire! ruins! that efface
Whate'er, of finish'd, modern pomp can boast. 20

Snatch'd by these wonders to that world where Unfetter'd ranges, fancy's magic hand [thought
Led me anew o'er all the solemn scene,
Still in the mind's pure eye more solemn drest. 24
When strait, methought, the fair majestic power
Of Liberty appear'd. Not, as of old,
Extended in her hand the cap, and rod,
Whose slave-enlarging touch gave double life:
But her bright temples bound with British oak,
And naval honours nodded on her brow. 30

Sublime of port: loose o'er her shoulder flow'd
Her sea-green robe, with constellations gay.
An island-goddes now; and her high care
The queen of isles, the mistress of the main.
My heart beat filial transport at the sight; 35
And, as she mov'd to speak, th' awakened muse
Listen'd intense. A while she look'd around,
With mournful eye the well-known ruins mark'd,
And then, her sighs repressing, thus began. 39

Mine are these wonders, all thou see'st is mine;
But, ah, how chang'd; the falling poor remains
Of what exalted once th' Ausonian shore. [gloom,
Look back through time; and, rising from the
Mark the dread scene, that paints whate'er I say.

The great republic see! that glow'd, sublime, 45
With the mixt freedom of a thousand states;
Rais'd on the thrones of kings her Curule Chair,
And by her Fasces aw'd the subject world.
See busy millions quickening all the land,
With cities throng'd, and teeming culture high: 50
For Nature then smil'd on her free-born sons,
And pour'd the plenty that belongs to men:
Behold, the country cheering, villas rise,
In lively prospect; by the secret lapse

Of brooks now lost and streams renown'd in song: 55
In Umbria's closing vales, or on the brow
Of her brown hills that breathe the scented gale:
On Baia's viny coast; where peaceful seas,
Fann'd by kind zephyrs, ever kiss the shore;
And suns unclouded shine, through purest air: 60
Or in the spacious neighbourhood of Rome;
Far-shining upward to the Sabine hills,
To Anio's roar, and Tibur's olive shade;
To where Preneste lifts her airy brow;
Or downward spreading to the sunny shore, 65
Where Alba breathes the freshness of the main.

See distant mountains leave their vallies dry,
And o'er the proud Arcade their tribute pour,
To lave imperial Rome. For ages laid,
Deep, massy, firm, diverging every way, 70
With tombs of heroes sacred, see her roads:
By various nations trod, and suppliant kings;
With legions flaming, or with triumph gay.

Full in the centre of these wondrous works,
The pride of earth! Rome in her glory see! 75

Behold her demi-gods, in senate met;
All head to counsel, and all heart to act:
The common-weal inspiring every tongue
With fervent eloquence, unbrib'd, and bold;
Ere tame corruption taught the servile herd 80
To rank obedient to a master's voice.

Her forum see, warm, popular, and loud,
In trembling wonder hush'd, when the two fires,
As they the private father greatly quell'd,
Stood up the public fathers of the state. 85
See justice judging there, in human shape.
Hark! how with freedom's voice it thunders high,
Or in soft murmurs sinks to Tully's tongue.

Her tribes, her census, see; her generous troops,
Whose pay was glory, and their best reward. 90
Free for their country and for me to die;
Ere mercenary murder grew a trade.

Mark, as the purple triumph waves along,
The highest pomp and lowest fall of life.

Her festive games, the school of heroes, see; 95
Her circus, ardent with contending youth;
Her streets, her temples, palaces, and baths,
Full of fair forms, of beauty's eldest-born,
And of a people cast in virtue's mould.
While sculpture lives around, and Asian hills 100
Lend their best stores to heave the pillar's dome:
All that to Roman strength the softer touch
Of Grecian art can join. But language fails
To paint this sun, this centre of mankind;
Where every virtue, glory, treasure, art, 105
Attracted strong, in heighten'd lustre met.

Need I the contrast mark? unjoyous view!
A land in all, in government, in arts,
In virtue, genius, earth and heaven, revers'd,
Who but, these far-fam'd ruins to behold, 110
Proofs of a people, whose heroic aims
Soar'd far above the little selfish sphere
Of doubting modern life; who but, inflam'd
With classic zeal, these consecrated scenes
Of men and deeds to trace, unhappy land, 115
Would trust thy wilds, and cities loose of sway?

Are these the vales, that, once, exulting states
In their warm bosom fed? the mountains these,
On whose high-blooming sides my sons, of old,
I bred to glory? the dejected towns, 120
Where, mean, and fordid, life can scarce subsist,
The scenes of ancient opulence, and pomp?

Come! by whatever sacred name disguis'd,
Oppression, come! and in thy works rejoice!
See nature's richest plains to putrid fens 125
Turn'd by thy fury. From their cheerful bounds,
See raz'd th' enlivening village, farm, and seat.
First, rural toil, by thy rapacious hand
Robb'd of his poor reward, resign'd the plough;
And now he dares not turn the noxious glebe. 130
'Tis thine entire. The lonely swain himself,
Who loves at large along the grassy downs
His flocks to pasture, thy drear champain flies.
Far as the sickening eye can sweep around,
'Tis all one desert, desolate, and gray, 135
Graz'd by the sullen buffalo alone;
And where the rank uncultivated growth
Of rotting ages taints the passing gale.
Beneath the baleful blast the city pines,
Or sinks enfeebled, or infected burns. 140
Beneath it mourns the solitary road,
Roll'd in rude mazes o'er th' abandon'd waste;
While ancient ways, ingulf'd, are seen no more.

Such thy dire plains, thou self-destroyer! foe
 To human kind! Thy mountains too, profuse, 145
 Where savage nature blooms, seem their sad plaint
 To raise against thy desolating rod.
 There on the breezy brow, where thriving states,
 And famous cities, once, to the pleas'd fun,
 Far other scenes of rising culture spread, 150
 Pale shine thy ragged towns. Neglected round,
 Each harvest pines; the livid, lean produce
 Of heartless labour: while thy hated joys,
 Not proper pleasure, lift the lazy hand.
 Better to sink in sloth the woes of life, 155
 Than wake their rage with unavailing toil.
 Hence drooping art almost to nature leaves
 The rude unguided year. Thin wave the gifts
 Of yellow Ceres, thin the radiant blush
 Of orchard reddens in the warmest ray. 160
 To weedy wildness run, no rural wealth
 (Such as dictators fed) the garden pours.
 Crude the wild olive flows, and foul the vine;
 Nor juice Cœcubian, nor Falernian, more,
 Streams life and joy, save in the muse's bowl. 165
 Unseconded by art, the spinning race
 Draw the bright thread in vain, and idly toil.
 In vain, forlorn in wilds, the citron blows;
 And flowering plants perfume the desert gale.
 Through the vile thorn the tender myrtle twines.
 Inglorious droops the laurel, dead to song, 171
 And long a stranger to the hero's brow. [fields,
 Nor half thy triumph this: cast, from brute
 Into the haunts of men thy ruthless eye.
 There buxom plenty never turns her horn; 175
 The grace and virtue of exterior life,
 No clean convenience reigns; ev'n sleep itself,
 Least delicate of powers, reluctant, there,
 Lays on the bed impure his heavy head.
 Thy horrid walk! dead, empty, unadorn'd, 180
 See streets whose echoes never know the voice
 Of cheerful hurry, commerce many-tongu'd,
 And art mechanic at his various task,
 Fervent, employ'd. Mark the desponding race,
 Of occupation void, as void of hope; 185
 Hope, the glad ray, glanc'd from Eternal Good,
 That life enlivens, and exalts its powers,
 With veils of fortune—madness all to them!
 By thee relentless seiz'd their betters joys,
 To the soft aid of cordial airs they fly, 190
 Breathing a kind oblivion o'er their woes,
 And love and music melt their souls away.
 From feeble justice see how rash revenge,
 Trembling, the balance snatches; and the sword,
 Fearful himself, to venal ruffians gives. 195
 See where God's altar, nursing murder, stands,
 With the red touch of dark assassins stain'd.
 But chief let Rome, the mighty city! speak
 The full-exerted genius of thy reign.
 Behold her rise amid the lifeless waste, 200
 Expiring nature all corrupted round;
 While the lone Tyber, through the desert plain,
 Winds his waste stores, and sullen sweeps along.
 Patch'd from my fragments, in unsolid pomp,
 Mark how the temple glares; and, artful drest, 205
 Amusive, draws the superstitious train.
 Mark how the palace lifts a lying front,
 Concealing often, in magnific jail,
 Proud want; a deep unanimated gloom!
 And oft adjoining to the drear abode 210
 Of misery, whose melancholy walls

Seem its voracious grandeur to reproach.
 Within the city bounds, the desert see.
 See the rank vine o'er subterranean roofs,
 Indecent, spread; beneath whose fretted gold 215
 It once, exulting, flow'd. The people mark,
 Matchless, while fir'd by me; to public good
 Inexorably firm, just, generous, brave,
 Afraid of nothing but unworthy life,
 Elate with glory, an heroic soul 220
 Known to the vulgar breast: behold them now
 A thin despairing number, all-subdued,
 The slaves of slaves, by superstition fool'd,
 By vice unmann'd and a licentious rule,
 In guile ingenious, and in murder brave. 225
 Such in one land, beneath the same fair clime,
 Thy sons, oppression, are; and such were mine.
 Ev'n with thy labour'd pomp, for whose vain show
 Deluded thousands starve; all age-begrin'd,
 Torn, robb'd and scatter'd in unnumber'd facks, 230
 And by the tempest of two thousand years
 Continual shaken, let my ruins vie.
 These roads that yet the Roman hand assert,
 Beyond the weak repair of modern toil,
 These fractur'd arches, that the chiding stream 235
 No more delighted hear; these rich remains
 Of marbles now unknown, where shines imbib'd
 Each parent ray; these massy columns, hew'd
 From Afric's farthest shore: one granite all,
 These obelisks high-towering to the sky, 240
 Mysterious mark'd with dark Egyptian lore;
 These endless wonders that this hallowed way
 Illumine still, and consecrate to fame;
 These fountains, vases, urns, and statues, charg'd
 With the fine stores of art-completing Greece. 245
 Mine is, besides, thy every later boast:
 Thy Buonarotis, thy Palladios mine;
 And mine the fair designs, which Raphael's soul
 O'er the live canvas, emanating, breath'd.
 What would you say, ye conquerors of earth! 250
 Ye Romans! could you raise the laurel'd head;
 Could you the country see, by seas of blood,
 And the dread toil of ages, won so dear;
 Your pride, your triumph, and supreme delight!
 For whose defence oft, in the doubtful hour, 255
 You rush'd with rapture down the gulf of fate,
 Of death ambitious! till by awful deeds,
 Virtues, and courage, that amaze mankind,
 The queen of nations rose; possessor of all
 Which nature, art, and glory could bestow: 260
 What would you say, deep in the last abyss
 Of slavery, vice, and unambitious want,
 Thus to behold her sunk? Your crowded plains,
 Void of their cities; unadorn'd your hills; 264
 Ungrac'd your lakes; your ports to ships unknown;
 Your lawless floods, and your abandon'd streams:
 These could you know? these could ye love again?
 Thy Tibur, Horace, could it now inspire
 Content, poetic ease, and rural joy, 269
 Soon bursting into song; while through the groves
 Of headlong Anio, dashing to the vale,
 In many a tortur'd stream, you mus'd along?
 Yon wild retreat, where superstition dreams,
 Could, Tully, you your Tusculum believe?
 And could you deem yon naked hills, that form, 275
 Fam'd in old song, the ship-forsaken bay,
 Your Formian shore? Once the delight of earth,
 Where art and nature, ever-smiling, join'd
 On the gay land to lavish all their stores. 279

How chang'd, how vacant, Virgil, wide around,
 Would now your Naples seem? Disaster'd less
 By black Vefuvius thundering o'er the coast,
 His midnight earthquakes, and his mining fires,
 Than by despotic rage: that inward gnaws,
 A native foe: a foreign, tears without. 285
 First from your flatter'd Cæsars this began:
 Till, doom'd to tyrants an eternal prey,
 Thin-peopled spreads, at last, the tyren plain,
 That the dire soul of Hannibal disarm'd;
 And wrapt in weeds the shore of Venus lies. 290
 There Baiæ sees no more the joyous throng;
 Her bank all beaming with the pride of Rome:
 No generous vines now bask along the hills,
 Where sport the breezes of the Tyrrhene main;
 With baths and temples mix'd, no villas rise; 295
 Nor, art sustain'd amid reluctant waves,
 Draw the cool murmurs of the breathing deep.
 No spreading ports their sacred arms extend:
 No mighty moles the big intrusive storm,
 From the calm station, roll resounding back. 300
 An almost total desolation fits,
 A dreary stillness, saddening o'er the coast;
 Where, when soft suns and tepid winters rose,
 Rejoicing crowds inhal'd the balm of peace;
 Where city'd hill to hill reflected blaze; 305
 And where with Ceres, Bacchus wont to hold
 A genial strife. Her youthful form, robust,
 Ev'n nature yields; by fire and earthquake rent:
 Whose stately cities in the dark abrupt
 Swallow'd at once, or vile in rubbish laid, 310
 A nest for serpents; from the red abyss
 New hills, explosive thrown; the Lucrine lake
 A reedy pool; and all to Cuma's point,
 The sea recovering his usurp'd domain,
 And pour'd triumphant o'er the bury'd dome. 315
 Hence, Britain, learn; my best-established, last,
 And more than Greece, or Rome, my steady reign;
 The land where, king and people equal bound
 By guardian laws, my fullest blessings flow;
 And where my jealous unsubmitting soul, 320
 The dread of tyrants! burns in every breast:
 Learn hence, if such the miserable fate
 Of an heroic race, the masters once
 Of human-kind; what, when depriv'd of me,
 How grievous must be thine? In spite of climes, 325
 Whose sun-enliven'd ether wakes the soul
 To higher powers; in spite of happy soils,
 That, but by labour's slightest aid impell'd,
 With treasures teem to thy cold clime unknown;
 If there desponding fail the common arts, 330
 And sustenance of life: could life itself,
 Far less a thoughtless tyrant's hollow pomp,
 Subsist with thee? Against depressing skies,
 Join'd to full-spread oppression's cloudy brow,
 How could thy spirits hold? where vigour find, 335
 Forc'd fruits to tear from their unnative soil?
 Or, storing every harvest in thy ports,
 To plough the dreadful all-producing wave?
 Here paus'd the goddess. By the pause assur'd,
 In trembling accents thus I mov'd my prayer. 340
 "Oh, first, and most benevolent of powers!
 "Come from eternal splendors, here on earth,
 "Against despotic pride, and rage, and lust,
 "To shield mankind; to raise them to assert
 "The native rights and honour of their race: 345
 "Teach me thy lowest subject, but in zeal
 "Yielding to none, the progress of thy reign,

"And with a strain from thee enrich the muse.
 "As thee alone she serves, her patron, thou,
 "And great inspirer be! then will she joy, 350
 "Through narrow life her lot and private shade:
 "And when her venal voice she barters vile,
 "Or to thy open or thy secret foes:
 "May ne'er those sacred raptures touch her more,
 "By slavish hearts unfelt! and may her song 355
 "Sink in oblivion with the nameless crew!
 "Vermin of state! to thy o'erflowing light
 "That owe their being, yet betray thy cause."
 Then, condescending kind, the heavenly power
 Return'd,—"What here, suggested by the scene,
 "I slight unfold, record and sing at home, 361
 "In that best isle, where (so we spirits move)
 "With one quick effort of my will I am.
 "There truth, unlicens'd, walks; and dares accost
 "Ev'n kings themselves, the monarchs of the free!
 "Fix'd on my rock, there, an indulgent race
 "O'er Britons wield the sceptre of their choice:
 "And there, to finish what his fires began,
 "A prince behold! for me who burns sincere,
 "Ev'n with a subject's zeal. He my great work
 "Will parent like sustain; and added give 371
 "The touch, the graces and the muses owe.
 "For Britain's glory swells his panting breast;
 "And ancient arts he emulous revolves:
 "His pride to let the smiling heart abroad; [man;
 "Through clouds of pomp, that but conceal the
 "To please his pleasure; bounty his delight;
 "And all the soul of Titus dwells in him."
 Hail, glorious theme! but how, alas! shall verse,
 From the crude stores of mortal language drawn, 380
 How faint and tedious, sing, what, piercing deep,
 The goddesses flash'd at once upon my soul.
 For, clear precision all, the tongue of gods,
 Is harmony itself; to every ear
 Familiar known, like light to every eye. 385
 Meantime disclosing ages, as she spoke,
 In long succession pour'd their empires forth;
 Scene after scene, the human drama spread;
 And still th' embodied picture rose to sight.
 Oh thou, to whom the muses owe their flame;
 Who bid'st, beneath the pole, Parnassus rise, 391
 And Hippocrenè flow; with thy bold ease,

 While I, to nobler than poetic fame
 Aspiring, thy commands to Britons bear.

Notes on the preceding Poem.

Ver. 83. L. J. Brutus, and Virginus.

Ver. 242. Via Sacra.

Ver. 247. M. Angelo Buonaroti, Palladio, and Raphael d'Urbino; the three great modern masters in sculpture, architecture, and painting.

Ver. 273. Tusculum is reckoned to have stood at a place now called Grotta Ferrata, a convent of monks.

Ver. 276. The bay of Mola (anciently Formiæ) into which Homer brings Ulysses and his companions. Near Formiæ Cicero had a villa.

Ver. 284. Naples then under the Austrian government.

Such thy dire plains, thou self-destroyer! foe
 To human kind! Thy mountains too, profuse, 145
 Where savage nature blooms, seem their sad plaint
 To raise against thy desolating rod.
 There on the breezy brow, where thriving states,
 And famous cities, once, to the pleas'd sun,
 Far other scenes of rising culture spread, 150
 Pale shine thy ragged towns. Neglected round,
 Each harvest pines; the livid, lean produce
 Of heartless labour: while thy hated joys,
 Not proper pleasure, lift the lazy hand.
 Better to sink in sloth the woes of life, 155
 Than wake their rage with unavailing toil.
 Hence drooping art almost to nature leaves
 The rude unguided year. Thin wave the gifts
 Of yellow Ceres, thin the radiant blush
 Of orchard reddens in the warmest ray. 160
 To weedy wildness run, no rural wealth
 (Such as dictators fed) the garden pours.
 Crude the wild olive flows, and foul the vine;
 Nor juice Cœcubian, nor Falernian, more,
 Streams life and joy, save in the muse's bowl. 165
 Unseconded by art, the spinning race
 Draw the bright thread in vain, and idly toil.
 In vain, forlorn in wilds, the citron blows;
 And flowering plants perfume the desert gale.
 Through the vile thorn the tender myrtle twines.
 Inglorious droops the laurel, dead to song, 171
 And long a stranger to the hero's brow. [fields,
 Nor half thy triumph this: cast, from brute
 Into the haunts of men thy ruthless eye.
 There buxom plenty never turns her horn; 175
 The grace and virtue of exterior life,
 No clean convenience reigns; ev'n sleep itself,
 Least delicate of powers, reluctant, there,
 Lays on the bed impure his heavy head.
 Thy horrid walk! dead, empty, unadorn'd, 180
 See streets whose echoes never know the voice
 Of cheerful hurry, commerce many-tongu'd,
 And art mechanic at his various task,
 Fervent, employ'd. Mark the desponding race,
 Of occupation void, as void of hope; 185
 Hope, the glad ray, glanc'd from Eternal Good,
 That life enlivens, and exalts its powers,
 With veils of fortune—madness all to them!
 By thee relentless seiz'd their betters joys,
 To the soft aid of cordial airs they fly, 190
 Breathing a kind oblivion o'er their woes,
 And love and music melt their souls away.
 From feeble justice see how rash revenge,
 Trembling, the balance snatches; and the sword,
 Fearful himself, to venal ruffians gives. 195
 See where God's altar, nursing murder, stands,
 With the red touch of dark assassins stain'd.
 But chief let Rome, the mighty city! speak
 The full-exerted genius of thy reign.
 Behold her rise amid the lifeless waste, 200
 Expiring nature all corrupted round;
 While the lone Tyber, through the desert plain,
 Winds his waste stores, and sullen sweeps along.
 Patch'd from my fragments, in unsolid pomp,
 Mark how the temple glares; and, artful drest, 205
 Amusive, draws the superstitious train.
 Mark how the palace lifts a lying front,
 Concealing often, in magnificent jail,
 Proud want; a deep unanimated gloom!
 And oft adjoining to the drear abode 210
 Of misery, whose melancholy walls

Seem its voracious grandeur to reproach.
 Within the city bounds, the desert see.
 See the rank vine o'er subterranean roofs,
 Indecent, spread; beneath whose fretted gold 215
 It once, exulting, flow'd. The people mark,
 Matchless, while fir'd by me; to public good
 Inexorably firm, just, generous, brave,
 Afraid of nothing but unworthy life,
 Elate with glory, an heroic soul 220
 Known to the vulgar breast: behold them now
 A thin despairing number, all-subdued,
 The slaves of slaves, by superstition fool'd,
 By vice unmann'd and a licentious rule,
 In guile ingenious, and in murder brave. 225
 Such in one land, beneath the same fair clime,
 Thy sons, oppression, are; and such were mine.
 Ev'n with thy labour'd pomp, for whose vain show
 Deluded thousands starve; all age-begrim'd,
 Torn, robb'd and scatter'd in unnumber'd flocks, 230
 And by the tempest of two thousand years
 Continual shaken, let my ruins vie.
 These roads that yet the Roman hand assert,
 Beyond the weak repair of modern toil,
 These fractur'd arches, that the chiding stream 235
 No more delighted hear; these rich remains
 Of marbles now unknown, where shines imbib'd
 Each parent ray; these massy columns, hew'd
 From Afric's farthest shore: one granite all,
 These obelisks high-towering to the sky, 240
 Mysterious mark'd with dark Egyptian lore;
 These endless wonders that this sacred way
 Illumine still, and consecrate to fame;
 These fountains, vases, urns, and statues, charg'd
 With the fine stores of art-completing Greece. 245
Mine is, besides, thy every later boast:
Thy Buonarotis, thy Palladios mine;
 And mine the fair designs, which Raphael's soul
 O'er the live canvas, emanating, breath'd.
 What would you say, ye conquerors of earth! 250
 Ye Romans! could you raise the laurel'd head;
 Could you the country see, by seas of blood,
 And the dread toil of ages, won so dear;
 Your pride, your triumph, and supreme delight!
 For whose defence oft, in the doubtful hour, 255
 You rush'd with rapture down the gulf of fate,
 Of death ambitious! till by awful deeds,
 Virtues, and courage, that amaze mankind,
 The queen of nations rose; possess'd of all
 Which nature, art, and glory could bestow: 260
 What would you say, deep in the last abyss
 Of slavery, vice, and unambitious want,
 Thus to behold her sunk? Your crowded plains,
 Void of their cities; unadorn'd your hills; 264
 Ungrac'd your lakes; your ports to ships unknown;
 Your lawless floods, and your abandon'd streams:
 These could you know? these could ye love again?
 Thy Tibur, Horace, could it now inspire
 Content, poetic ease, and rural joy, 269
 Soon bursting into song; while through the groves
 Of headlong Anio, dashing to the vale,
 In many a tortur'd stream, you mus'd along?
 Yon wild retreat, where superstition dreams,
 Could, Tully, you your Tusculum believe?
 And could you deem yon naked hills, that form, 275
 Fam'd in old song, the ship-forsaken bay,
 Your Formian shore? Once the delight of earth,
 Where art and nature, ever-smiling, join'd
 On the gay land to lavish all their stores. 279

How chang'd, how vacant, Virgil, wide around,
 Would now your Naples seem? Disaster'd less
 By black Vefuvius thundering o'er the coast,
 His midnight earthquakes, and his mining fires,
 Than by despotic rage: that inward gnaws,
 A native foe: a foreign, tears without. 285
 First from your flatter'd Cæsars this began:
 Till, doom'd to tyrants an eternal prey,
 Thin-peopled spreads, at last, the syren plain,
 That the dire soul of Hannibal disarm'd;
 And wrapt in weeds the shore of Venus lies. 290
 There Baïæ sees no more the joyous throng;
 Her bank all beaming with the pride of Rome:
 No generous vines now bask along the hills,
 Where sport the breezes of the Tyrrhene main;
 With baths and temples mix'd, no villas rise; 295
 Nor, art sustain'd amid reluctant waves,
 Draw the cool murmurs of the breathing deep.
 No spreading ports their sacred arms extend:
 No mighty moles the big intrusive storm,
 From the calm station, roll resounding back. 300
 An almost total desolation sits,
 A dreary stillness, saddening o'er the coast;
 Where, when soft suns and tepid winters rose,
 Rejoicing crowds inhal'd the balm of peace;
 Where city'd hill to hill reflected blaze; 305
 And where with Ceres, Bacchus wont to hold
 A genial strife. Her youthful form, robust,
 Ev'n nature yields; by fire and earthquake rent:
 Whose stately cities in the dark abrupt
 Swallow'd at once, or vile in rubbish laid, 310
 A nest for serpents; from the red abyss
 New hills, explosive thrown; the Lucrine lake
 A reedy pool; and all to Cuma's point,
 The sea recovering his usurp'd domain,
 And pour'd triumphant o'er the bury'd dome. 315
 Hence, Britain, learn; my best-established, last,
 And more than Greece, or Rome, my steady reign;
 The land where, king and people equal bound
 By guardian laws, my fullest blessings flow;
 And where my jealous unsubmitting soul, 320
 The dread of tyrants! burns in every breast:
 Learn hence, if such the miserable fate
 Of an heroic race, the masters once
 Of human-kind; what, when depriv'd of me,
 How grievous must be thine? In spite of climes, 325
 Whose sun-enliven'd ether wakes the soul
 To higher powers; in spite of happy soils,
 That, but by labour's slightest aid impell'd,
 With treasures teem to thy cold clime unknown;
 If there desponding fail the common arts, 330
 And sustenance of life: could life itself,
 Far less a thoughtless tyrant's hollow pomp,
 Subsist with thee? Against depressing skies,
 Join'd to full-spread oppression's cloudy brow,
 How could thy spirits hold? where vigour find, 335
 Forc'd fruits to tear from their unnative soil?
 Or, storing every harvest in thy ports,
 To plough the dreadful all-producing wave?
 Here paus'd the goddess. By the pause assur'd,
 In trembling accents thus I mov'd my prayer. 340
 "Oh, first, and most benevolent of powers!
 "Come from eternal splendors, here on earth,
 "Against despotic pride, and rage, and lust,
 "To shield mankind; to raise them to assert
 "The native rights and honour of their race: 345
 "Teach me thy lowest subject, but in zeal
 "Yielding to none, the progress of thy reign,

"And with a strain from thee enrich the muse.
 "As thee alone she serves, her patron, thou,
 "And great inspirer be! then will she joy, 350
 "Through narrow life her lot and private shade:
 "And when her venal voice she barter's vile,
 "Or to thy open or thy secret foes:
 "May ne'er those sacred raptures touch her more,
 "By slavish hearts unfelt! and may her song 355
 "Sink in oblivion with the nameless crew!
 "Vermin of state! to thy o'erflowing light
 "That owe their being, yet betray thy cause."
 Then, condescending kind, the heavenly power
 Return'd,—"What here, suggested by the scene,
 "I slight unfold, record and sing at home, 361
 "In that best isle, where (so we spirits move)
 "With one quick effort of my will I am.
 "There truth, unlicens'd, walks; and dares accost
 "Ev'n kings themselves, the monarchs of the free!
 "Fix'd on my rock, there, an indulgent race
 "O'er Britons wield the sceptre of their choice:
 "And there, to finish what his fires began,
 "A prince behold! for me who burns sincere,
 "Ev'n with a subject's zeal. He my great work
 "Will parent like sustain; and added give 371
 "The touch, the graces and the muses owe.
 "For Britain's glory swells his panting breast;
 "And ancient arts he emulous revolves:
 "His pride to let the smiling heart abroad; [man;
 "Through clouds of pomp, that but conceal the
 "To please his pleasure; bounty his delight;
 "And all the soul of Titus dwells in him."
 Hail, glorious theme! but how, alas! shall verse,
 From the crude stores of mortal language drawn, 380
 How faint and tedious, sing, what, piercing deep,
 The goddesses flash'd at once upon my soul.
 For, clear precision all, the tongue of gods,
 Is harmony itself; to every ear
 Familiar known, like light to every eye. 385
 Meantime disclosing ages, as she spoke,
 In long succession pour'd their empires forth;
 Scene after scene, the human drama spread;
 And still th' embodied picture rose to sight.
 Oh thou, to whom the muses owe their flame;
 Who bid'st, beneath the pole, Parnassus rise, 391
 And Hippocrenè flow; with thy bold ease,

PART II. GREECE.

Contents.

Liberty traced from the pastoral ages, and the first uniting of neighbouring families into civil government; to ver. 47. The several establishments of Liberty, in Egypt, Persia, Phœnicia, Palestine, slightly touched upon, down to her great establishment in Greece; to ver. 91. Geographical description of Greece; to ver. 113. Sparta and Athens, the two principal states of Greece, described; to ver. 164. Influence of Liberty over all the Grecian states; with regard their government, their politeness, their virtues, their arts and sciences. The vast superiority it gave them, in point of force and bravery, over the Persians, exemplified by the action of Thermopylæ, the battle of Marathon, and the retreat of the ten thousand. Its full exertion, and most beautiful effects in Athens; to ver. 216. Liberty the source of free philosophy. The various schools which took their rise from, ver. 257. Enumeration of fine arts: eloquence, poetry, music, sculpture, painting, and architecture; the effects of Liberty in Greece, and brought to their utmost perfection there; to ver. 381. Transition to the modern state of Greece; to ver. 411. Why Liberty declined, and was at last entirely lost among the Greeks; to ver. 472. Concluding reflection.

Thus spoke the goddess of the fearless eye;
And at her voice, renew'd, the vision rose.

First, in the dawn of time, with eastern swains,
In woods, and tents, and cottages, I liv'd;
While on from plain to plain they led their flocks,
In search of clearer spring, and fresher field.
These, as increasing families disclos'd
The tender state, I taught an equal sway,
Few were offences, properties, and laws.
Beneath the rural portal, palm o'erspread, 10
The father-senate met. There justice dealt,
With reason then and equity the same,
Free as the common air, her prompt decree;
Nor yet had stain'd her sword with subject's blood.
The simpler arts were all their simple wants 15
Had urg'd to light. But instant, these supply'd,
Another set of sonder wants arose,
And other arts with them of finer aim;
Till, from refining want to want impell'd,
The mind by thinking push'd her latent powers,
And life began to glow, and arts to shine. 21

At first, on brutes alone the rustic war
Launch'd the rude spear; swift, as he glar'd along,
On the grim lion, or the robber-wolf.
For then young sportive life was void of toil, 25

Demanding little, and with little pleas'd:
But when to manhood grown, and endless joys,
Led on by equal toils, the bosom fir'd;
Lewd lazy rapine broke primeval peace,
And, hid in caves and idle forests drear, 30
From the lone pilgrim and the wandering swain,
Seiz'd what he durst not earn. Then brother's blood
First, horrid, smok'd on the polluted skies.
Awful in justice, then the burning youth,
Led by their temper'd fires, on lawless men, 35
The last worst monsters of the shaggy wood,
Turn'd the keen arrow, and the sharpen'd spear.
Then war grew glorious. Heroes then arose;
Who, scorning coward self, for others liv'd,
Toil'd for their ease, and for their safety bled. 40

West with the living day to Greece I came:
Earth smil'd beneath my beam: the muse before
Sonorous flew, that low till then in woods
Had tun'd the reed, and sigh'd the shepherds pain;
But now, to sing heroic deeds, she swell'd 45
A nobler note, and bade the banquet burn.

For Greece my sons of Egypt I forsook:
A boastful race, that in the vain abyss
Of fabling ages lov'd to lose their source,
And with their river trac'd it from the skies. 50
While there my laws alone despotic reign'd,
And king, as well as people, proud obey'd;
I taught them science, virtue, wisdom, arts:
By poets, sages, legislators sought;
The school of polish'd life, and human-kind. 55
But when mysterious superstition came,
And, with her civil sister leagu'd, involv'd
In study'd darkness the desponding mind;
Then tyrant power the righteous scourge unloos'd:
For yielded reason speaks the soul a slave. 60
Instead of useful works, like nature's, great,
Enormous, cruel wonders crush'd the land;
And round a tyrant's tomb, who none deserv'd,
For one vile carcase perish'd countless lives.
Then the great dragon, couch'd amid his floods, 65
Swell'd his fierce heart, and cry'd—"This flood is " mine,

" 'Tis I that bid it flow."—But, undeceiv'd,
His phrenzy soon the proud blasphemer felt;
Felt that, without my fertilizing power,
Suns lost their force, and Niles o'erflown in vain.
Nought could retard me: nor the frugal state 71
Of rising Persia, sober in extreme,
Beyond the pitch of man, and thence revers'd
Into luxurious waste: nor yet the ports
Of old Phœnicia; first for letters fam'd, 75
That paint the voice, and silent speak to fight,
Of arts prime source, and guardian! by fair stars,
First tempted out into the lonely deep;
To whom I first disclos'd mechanic arts,
The winds to conquer, to subdue the waves, 80
With all the peaceful power of ruling trade;
Earnest of Britain. Nor by these retain'd;
Nor by the neighbouring land, whose palmy shore
The silver Jordan laves. Before me lay
The promis'd land of arts, and urg'd my flight. 85
Hail nature's utmost boast, unrivall'd Greece!
My fairest reign! where every power benign
Conspir'd to blow the flower of human-kind,
And lavish'd all that genius can inspire.
Clear sunny climates, by the breezy main, 90
Ionian or Ægean, temper'd kind,
Light, airy soils. A country rich, and gay;

Broke into hills with balmy odours crown'd,
And, bright with purple harvest, joyous vales, 94
Mountains and streams, where verse spontaneous
flow'd :

Whence deem'd by wondering men the feat of gods,

And still the mountains and the streams of song.

All that boon nature could luxuriant pour
Of high materials, and my restless arts
Frame into finish'd life. How many states, 100
And clustering towns, and monuments of fame,
And scenes of glorious deeds, in little bounds!
From the rough tract of bending mountains, beat
By Adria's here, there by Ægean waves;
To where the deep adorning Cyclade Isles 105
In shining prospect rise, and on the shore
Of farthest Crete resounds the Libyan main.

O'er all two rival cities rear'd the brow,
And balanc'd all. Spread on Eurota's bank,
Amid a circle of soft-rising hills, 110
The patient Sparta one: the sober, hard,
And man-subduing city; which no shape
Of pain could conquer, nor of pleasure charm.
Lycurgus there built, on the solid base
Of equal life, so well a temper'd state; 115
Where mix'd each government, in such just poise;
Each power so checking, and supporting, each;
That firm for ages, and unmov'd, it stood,
The fort of Greece! without one giddy hour,
One shock of faction, or of party-rage. 120

For, drain'd the springs of wealth, corruption there
Lay wither'd at the root. Thrice happy land!
Had not neglected art, with weedy vice Confounded, sunk. But if Athenian arts
Lov'd not the soil; yet there the calm abode 125
Of wisdom, virtue, philosophic ease,
Of manly sense and wit, in frugal phrase
Confin'd, and press'd into laconic force.
There too, by rooting there still treacherous self,
The public and the private grew the same. 130
The children of the nursing public hall,
And at its table fed, for that they toil'd,
For that they liv'd entire, and ev'n for that
The tender mother urg'd her son to die.

Of softer genius, but not less intent 135
To seize the palm of empire, Athens rose:
Where, with bright marbles big and future pomp,
Hymettus spread, amid the scented sky,
His thymy treasures to the labouring bee,
And to botanic hand the stores of health; 140
Wrapt in a soul-attenuating clime,
Between Ilyssus and Cephissus glow'd
This hive of science, shedding sweets divine,
Of active arts, and animated arms.

There, passionate for me, an easy-mov'd, 145
A quick, refin'd, a delicate, humane,
Enlighten'd people reign'd. Oft on the brink
Of ruin, hurry'd by the charm of speech,
Enforcing hasty counsel immature,
Totter'd the rash democracy; unpois'd, 150
And by the rage devour'd, that ever tears
A populace unequal; part too rich,
And part or fierce with want or abject grown.
Solon, at last, their mild restorer, rose:
Allay'd the tempest; to the calm of laws 155
Reduc'd the settling whole; and, with the weight
Which the two senates to the public lent,
As with an anchor fix'd the driving state.

Nor was my forming care to these confin'd,

For emulation through the whole I pour'd, 160
Noble contention! who should most excel
In government well-pois'd, adjusted best
To public weal: in countries cultur'd high:

In ornamented towns, where order reigns,
Free social life, and polish'd manners fair: 165

In exercise, and arms; arms only drawn

For common Greece, to quell the Persian pride;

In moral science, and in graceful arts.

Hence, as for glory peacefully they strove,

The prize grew greater, and the prize of all. 170

By contest brighten'd, hence the radiant youth

Pour'd every beam; by generous pride inflam'd,

Felt every ardour burn: their great reward

The verdant wreath, which sounding Pifa gave.

Hence flourish'd Greece: and hence a race of

As gods by conscious future times ador'd: [men,

In whom each virtue wore a smiling air,

Each science shed o'er life a friendly light,

Each art was nature. Spartan valour hence,

At the fam'd pass, firm as an isthmus stood; 180

And the whole eastern ocean, waving far

As eye could dart its vision, nobly check'd,

While in extended battle, at the field

Of Marathon, my keen Athenians drove

Before their ardent band, an host of slaves. 185

Hence through the continent ten thousand

Urg'd a retreat, whose glory not the prime [Greeks

Of victories can reach. Deserts, in vain, [known;

Oppos'd their course; and hostile lands, un-

And deep rapacious floods, dire-bank'd with death;

And mountains, in whose jaws destruction grin'd

Hunger, and toil; Armenian snows, and storms;

And circling myriads still of barbarous foes. 190

Greece in their view, and glory yet untouch'd,

Their steady column pierc'd the scattering herds,

Which a whole empire pour'd; and held its way

Triumphant, by the Sage-exalted Chief

Fir'd and sustain'd. Oh, light and force of mind,

Almost almighty in severe extremes!

The sea at last from Colchian mountains seen, 200

Kind-hearted transport round their captains threw

The soldiers fond embrace; o'erflow'd their eyes

With tender floods, and loos'd the general voice

To cries resounding loud—The sea! the sea!

In Attic bounds hence heroes, sages, wits, 205

Shone thick as stars, the milky way of Greece!

And though gay wit, and pleasing grace, was theirs,

All the soft modes of elegance and ease;

Yet was not courage less, the patient touch

Of toiling art, and disquisition deep. 210

My spirit pours a vigour through the soul,

Th' unfetter'd thought with energy inspires,

Invincible in arts, in the bright field

Of nobler science, as in that of arms.

Athenians thus not less intrepid burst 215

The bonds of tyrant darkness, than they spurn'd

The Persian chains: while through the city, full

Of mirthful quarrel and of witty war,

Incessant struggled taste refining taste,

And friendly free discussion, calling forth 220

From the fair-jewel truth its latent ray.

O'er all shone out the great Athenian Sage,

And father of philosophy: the sun,

From whose white blaze emerg'd each various sect

Took various tints, but with diminish'd beam. 225

Tutor of Athens! he, in every street,

Dealt priceless treasure: goodness his delight,

Wisdom his wealth, and glory his reward

Influence of Liberty over all the Grecian states; with regard to their government, their politeness, their virtues, their arts and sciences. The vast superiority it gave them, in point of force and bravery, over the Persians, exemplified by the action of Thermopylæ, the battle of Marathon, and the retreat of the ten thousand. Its full exertion, and most beautiful effects in Athens; to ver. 216. Liberty the source of free philosophy. The various schools which took their rise from, ver. 257. Enumeration of fine arts: eloquence, poetry, music, sculpture, painting, and architecture; the effects of Liberty in Greece, and brought to their utmost perfection there; to ver. 381. Transition to the modern state of Greece; to ver. 411. Why Liberty declined, and was at last entirely lost among the Greeks; to ver. 472. Concluding reflection.

Thus spoke the goddess of the fearless eye;
And at her voice, renew'd, the vision rose.
First, in the dawn of time, with eastern swains,
In woods, and tents, and cottages, I liv'd;
While on from plain to plain they led their flocks,
In search of clearer spring, and fresher field.
These, as increasing families disclos'd
The tender state, I taught an equal sway.
Few were offences, properties, and laws.
Beneath the rural portal, palm o'erspread,
The father-senate met. There justice dealt,
With reason then and equity the same,
Free as the common air, her prompt decree;
Nor yet had stain'd her sword with subject's blood.
The simpler arts were all their simple wants
Had urg'd to light. But instant, these supply'd,
Another set of fonder wants arose,
And other arts with them of finer aim;
Till, from refining want to want impell'd,
The mind by thinking push'd her latent powers,
And life began to glow, and arts to shine.
At first, on brutes alone the rustic war
Launch'd the rude spear; swift, as he glar'd along,
On the grim lion, or the robber-wolf.
For then young sportive life was void of toil,

Demanding little, and with little pleas'd:
But when to manhood grown, and endless joys,
Led on by equal toils, the bosom fir'd;
Lewd lazy rapine broke primeval peace,
And, hid in caves and idle forests drear,

Tutor of Athens! he, in every street,
Dealt priceless treasure: goodness his delight,

Wisdom his wealth, and glory his reward

Deep through the human heart, with playful art,
 His simple question stole: as into truth, 230
 And serious deeds, he smil'd the laughing race;
 Taught moral happy life, whate'er can bless,
 Or grace mankind; and what he taught he was.
 Compounded high, though plain, his doctrine
 In different schools. The bold poetic phrase [broke
 Of figur'd Plato; Xenophon's pure strain, 236
 Like the clear brook that steals along the vale;
 Dissecting truth, the Stagyrte's keen eye;
 Th' exalted Stoic pride; the Cynic sneer;
 The slow-consenting Academic doubt; 240
 And, joining bliss to virtue, the glad ease
 Of Epicurus, seldom understood.
 They, ever candid, reason still oppos'd
 To reason; and, since virtue was their aim,
 Each by sure practice try'd to prove his way 245
 The best. Then stood untouch'd the solid base
 Of Liberty, the liberty of mind:
 For systems yet, and soul-enslaving creeds,
 Slept with the monsters of succeeding times. 249
 From priestly darkness sprung th' enlightning arts
 Of fire, and sword, and rage, and horrid names.
 O, Greece! thou sapient nurse of finer arts!
 Which to bright science blooming fancy bore,
 Be this thy praise, that thou, and thou alone,
 In these hast led the way, in these excell'd, 255
 Crown'd with the laurel of assenting time.
 In thy full language, speaking mighty things;
 Like a clear torrent close, or else diffus'd
 A broad majestic stream, and rolling on
 Through all the winding harmony of sound: 260
 In it the power of eloquence, at large,
 Breath'd the persuasive or pathetic soul;
 Still'd by degrees the democratic storm,
 Or bade it threatening rise, and tyrants shook,
 Flush'd at the head of their victorious troops. 265
 In it the Muse, her fury never quench'd,
 By mean unyielding phrase, or jarring sound,
 Her unconfin'd divinity display'd;
 And, still harmonious, form'd it to her will;
 Or soft depress'd it to the shepherd's moan, 270
 Or rais'd it swelling to the tongue of gods.
 Heroic song was thine; the Fountain-Bard,
 Whence each poetic stream derives its course.
 Thine the dread moral scene, thy chief delight!
 Where idle fancy durst not mix her voice, 275
 When reason spoke august; the fervent heart
 Or plain'd, or storm'd; and in th' impassion'd
 Concealing art with art, the poet sunk. [man,
 This potent school of manners, but when left
 To loose neglect, a land-corrupting plague, 280
 Was not unworthy deem'd of public care,
 And boundless cost, by thee; whose every son,
 Ev'n last mechanic, the true taste possess'd
 Of what had flavour to the nourish'd soul.
 The sweet enforcer of the poet's strain, 285
 Thine was the meaning music of the heart.
 Not the vain trill, that, void of passion, runs
 In giddy mazes, tickling idle ears;
 But that deep-searching voice, and artful hand,
 To which respondent shakes the varied soul. 290
 Thy fair ideas, thy delightful forms,
 By love imagin'd, by the graces touch'd,
 The boast of well-pleas'd nature! Sculpture seiz'd,
 And bade them ever smile in Parian stone.
 Selecting beauty's choice, and that again 295
 Exalting, blending in a perfect whole,

Thy workmen left ev'n nature's self behind.
 From those far different, whose prolific hand
 Peoples a nation; they for years on years,
 By the cool touches of judicious toil, 300
 Their rapid genius curbing, pour'd at all
 Through the live features of one breathing stone.
 There, beaming full, it shone; expressing gods:
 Jove's awful brow, Apollo's air divine,
 The fierce atrocious frown of sinew'd Mars, 305
 Or the sly graces of the Cyprian queen.
 Minutely perfect all! Each dimple sunk,
 And every muscle swell'd, as nature taught.
 In tresses, braided gay, the marble wav'd;
 Flow'd in loose robes, or thin transparent veils;
 Sprung into motion; soften'd into flesh; 310
 Was fir'd to passion, or refin'd to soul.
 Nor less thy pencil, with creative touch,
 Shed mimic life, when all thy brightest dames,
 Assembled, Zeuxis in his Helen mix'd. 315
 And when Apelles, who peculiar knew
 To give a grace that more than mortal smil'd,
 The soul of beauty! call'd the queen of love,
 Fresh from the billows, blushing orient charms.
 Ev'n such enchantment then thy pencil pour'd,
 That cruel-thoughted war th' impatient torch
 Dash'd to the ground; and, rather than destroy
 The patriot picture, let the city 'scape.
 First elder sculpture taught her sister art
 Correct design; where great ideas shone, 325
 And in the secret trace expression spoke:
 Taught her the graceful attitude; the turn,
 And beauteous airs of head; the native act,
 Or bold, or easy; and, cast free behind,
 The swelling mantle's well-adjusted flow. 330
 Then the bright muse, their eldest sister, came;
 And bade her follow where she led the way:
 Bade earth, and sea, and air, in colours rise;
 And copious action on the canvas glow;
 Gave her gay fable; spread invention's store; 335
 Enlarg'd her view; taught composition high,
 And just arrangement, circling round one point,
 That starts to fight, binds and commands the whole.
 Caught from the heavenly muse a nobler aim,
 And, scorning the soft trade of mere delight, 340
 O'er all thy temples, porticos, and schools,
 Heroic deeds she trac'd, and warm display'd
 Each moral beauty to the ravish'd eye.
 There, as th' imagin'd presence of the God,
 Arous'd the mind, or vacant hours induc'd 345
 Calm contemplation, or assembled youth
 Burn'd in ambitious circle round the sage,
 The living lesson stole into the heart,
 With more prevailing force than dwells in words.
 These rouse to glory; while, to rural life, 350
 The softer canvas oft repos'd the soul.
 There gayly broke the sun-illumin'd cloud;
 The lessening prospect, and the mountain blue,
 Vanish'd in air; the precipice frown'd, dire; 354
 White, down the rock, the rushing torrent dash'd;
 The sun shone, trembling, o'er the distant main;
 The tempest foam'd, immense; the driving storm
 Sadden'd the skies, and, from the doubling gloom,
 On the scath'd oak the ragged lightning fell;
 In closing shades, and where the current strays,
 With peace, and love, and innocence around, 361
 Pip'd the lone shepherd to his feeding flock:
 Round happy parents smil'd younger their selves;

And friends convers'd, by death divided long.
 To public virtue thus the smiling arts, 365
 Unblemish'd handmaids, serv'd! the graces they
 To dress this fairest Venus. Thus rever'd,
 And plac'd beyond the reach of sordid care,
 The high awarders of immortal fame,
 Alone for glory thy great masters strove; 370
 Courted by kings, and by contending states
 Assum'd the boasted honour of their birth.
 In architecture too thy rank supreme!
 That art where most magnificent appears
 The little builder man; by thee refin'd, 375
 And, smiling high, to full perfection brought.
 Such thy sure rules, that Goths of every age,
 Who scorn their aid, have only loaded earth
 With labour'd heavy monuments of shame.
 Not those gay domes that o'er thy splendid shore
 Shot, all proportion, up. First unadorn'd, 381
 And nobly plain, the manly Doric rose;
 Th' Ionic then, with decent matron grace,
 Her airy pillar heav'd; luxuriant last,
 The rich Corinthian spread her wanton wreath.
 The whole so measur'd true, so lessen'd off 386
 By fine proportion, that the marble pile,
 Form'd to repel the still or stormy waste
 Of rolling ages, light as fabrics look'd
 That from the magic wand aerial rise. 390
 These were the wonders that illumin'd Greece,
 From end to end—Here interrupting warm,
 Where are they now? (I cry'd) say, goddess,
 where?
 And what the land thy darling thus of old?
 Sunk! she resum'd: deep in the kindred gloom 395
 Of superstition, and of slavery sunk!
 No glory now can touch their hearts, benumb'd
 By loose dejected sloth and servile fear;
 No science pierce the darkness of their minds;
 No nobler art the quick ambitious soul 400
 Of imitation in their breast awake.
 Ev'n, to supply the needful arts of life,
 Mechanic toil denies the hopeless hand.
 Scarce any trace remaining, vestige gray,
 Or nodding column on the desert shore, 405
 To point where Corinth, or where Athens stood.
 A faithless land of violence, and death!
 Where commerce parleys, dubious, on the shore;
 And his wild impulse curious search restrains,
 Afraid to trust th' inhospitable clime. 410
 Neglected nature fails; in sordid want
 Sunk, and debas'd, their beauty beams no more.
 The sun himself seems angry, to regard,
 Of light unworthy, the degenerate race;
 And fires them oft with pestilential rays: 415
 While earth, blue poison steaming on the skies,
 Indignant, shakes them from her troubled sides.
 But as from man to man, fate's first decree,
 Impartial death the tide of riches rolls,
 So states must die, and liberty go round. 420
 Fierce was the stand, ere virtue, value, arts,
 And the soul fir'd by me (that often, stung
 With thoughts of better times and old renown,
 From hydra-tyrants try'd to clear the land)
 Lay quite extinct in Greece, their works effac'd
 And gross o'er all unfeeling bondage spread. 426
 Sooner I mov'd my much reluctant flight,
 Pois'd on the doubtful wing; when Greece with Greece
 Embroil'd in foul contention fought no more

For common glory, and for common weal: 430
 But, false to freedom, sought to quell the free;
 Broke the firm band of peace, and sacred love,
 That lent the whole irrefragable force;
 And, as around the partial trophy blush'd,
 Prepar'd the way for total overthrow. 435
 Then to the Persian power, whose pride they scorn'd,
 When Xerxes pour'd his millions o'er the land,
 Sparta, by turns, and Athens, vilely sued;
 Sued to be venal parricides, to spill
 Their country's bravest blood, and on themselves
 To turn their matchless mercenary arms. 441
 Peaceful in Susa, then, sat the great king;
 And by the trick of treaties, the still waste
 Of sly corruption, and barbaric gold,
 Effected what his steel could ne'er perform. 445
 Profuse he gave them the luxurious draught,
 Inflaming all the land: unbalanc'd wide
 Their tottering states; their wild assemblies rul'd,
 As the winds turn at every blast the seas:
 And by their list'd orators, whose breath 450
 Still with a factious storm infested Greece
 Rous'd them to civil war, or dash'd them down
 To sordid peace.—Peace! that, when Sparta shook
 Astonish'd Artaxerxes on his throne,
 Gave up, fair-spread o'er Asia's sunny shore, 455
 Their kindred cities to perpetual chains.
 What could so base, so infamous a thought
 In Spartan hearts inspire? Jealous, they saw
 Respiring Athens rear again her walls;
 And the pale fury fir'd them, once again 460
 To crush this rival city to the dust.
 For now no more the noble social soul
 Of Liberty my families combin'd;
 But by short views, and selfish passions, broke,
 Dire as when friends are rankled into foes, 465
 They mix'd severe, and wag'd eternal war;
 Nor felt they, furious, their exhausted force;
 Nor, with false glory, discord, madness blind,
 Saw how the blackening storm from Thracia
 came. 469
 Long years roll'd on, by many a battle stain'd,
 The blush and boast of Fame, where courage, art,
 And military glory, shone supreme:
 But let detesting ages, from the scene
 Of Greece self-mangled, turn the sickening eye.
 At last, when bleeding from a thousand wounds,
 She felt her spirits fail; and in the dust 476
 Her latest heroes, Nicias, Conon, lay,
 Agesilaus, and the Theban Friends:
 The Macedonian vulture mark'd his time,
 By the dire scent of Cheronæa lur'd, 480
 And, fierce-descending, seiz'd his hapless prey.
 Thus tame submitted to the victor's yoke
 Greece, once the gay, the turbulent, the bold;
 For every grace, and muse, and science born;
 With arts of war, of government, elate; 485
 To tyrants dreadful, dreadful to the best;
 Whom I myself could scarcely rule: and thus
 The Persian fetters, that inthrall'd the mind,
 Were turn'd to formal and apparent chains.
 Unless corruption first deject the pride, 490
 And guardian vigour of the free-born soul,
 All crude attempts of violence are vain;
 For, firm within, and while at heart untouch'd,
 Ne'er yet by force was freedom overcome.
 But soon as independence stoops the head, 495

To vice enslav'd, and vice-created wants;
Then to some foul corrupting hand, whose waste
These heighten'd wants with fatal bounty feeds.
From man to man the slackening ruin runs,
Till the whole state unnerv'd in slavery sinks. 500

PART III. ROME.

Contents.

As this part contains a description of the establishment of Liberty in Rome, it begins with a view of the Grecian colonies settled in the southern parts of Italy, which with Sicily constituted the Great Greece of the ancients. With these colonies the spirit of Liberty, and of republics, spreads over Italy, to ver. 32. Transition to Pythagoras, and his philosophy, which he taught through those free states and cities, to ver. 71. Amidst the many small republics in Italy, Rome the destin'd seat of Liberty. Her establishment there dated from the expulsion of the Tarquins, How differing from that in Greece, to ver. 88. Reference to a view of the Roman republic given in the first part of this poem: to mark its rise and fall, the peculiar purport of this. During its first ages, the greatest force of Liberty and virtue exerted, to ver. 103. The source whence derived the heroic virtues of the Romans. Enumeration of these virtues. Thence their security at home; their glory, success, and empire abroad, to ver. 226. Bounds of the Roman empire geographically described, to ver. 257. The states of Greece restored to Liberty by Titus Quintus Flaminius, the highest instance of public generosity and beneficence, to ver. 328. The loss of Liberty in Rome. Its causes, progress, and completion, in the death of Brutus, to ver. 485. Rome under the emperors, to ver. 513. From Rome the Goddess of Liberty goes among the northern nations; where, by infusing into them her spirit and general principles, she lays the ground-work of her future establishments; sends them in vengeance on the Roman empire, now totally enslaved; and then, with arts and sciences in her train, quits earth during the dark ages, to ver. 550. The celestial regions, to which Liberty retired, not proper to be opened to the view of mortals.

HERE melting mix'd with air th' ideal forms,
That painted still whate'er the goddess sung.
Then I, impatient: "From extinguish'd Greece,
"To what new region stream'd the human day?"
She softly sighing, as when zephyr leaves 5
Resign'd to Boreas, the declining year,
Resum'd: Indignant, these last scenes I fled;
And long ere then, Leucadia's cloudy cliff,
And the Ceraunian hills behind me thrown,
All Latium stood arous'd. Ages before, 10
Great mother of republics! Greece had pour'd,
Swarm after swarm, her ardent youth around,
On Asia, Afric, Sicily, they stoop'd,
But chief on fair Hesperia's winding shore;
Where, from Lacinium to Etrurian vales, 15
They roll'd increasing colonies along,
And lent materials for my Roman reign.
With them my spirit spread; and numerous states
And cities rose, on Grecian models form'd;
As its parental policy, and arts, 20
Each had imbib'd. Besides to each assign'd
A guardian genius, o'er the public weal,
Kept an unclosing eye; try'd to sustain,
Or more sublime, the soul infus'd by me:
And strong the battle rose, with various wave, 25
Against the tyrant demons of the land.
Thus they their little wars and triumphs knew;
Their flows of fortune, and receding times,
But almost all below the proud regard
Of story vow'd to Rome, on deeds intent 30
That truth beyond the flight of fable bore.
Not so the Samian sage; to him belongs
The brightest witness of recording fame.
For these free states his native isle forsook,
And a vain tyrant's transitory smile, 35
He sought Crotona's pure salubrious air, [taught;
And through great Greece his gentle wisdom
Wisdom that calm'd for listening years the mind,

Nor ever heard amid the storm of zeal,
His mental eye first launch'd into the deeps 40
Of boundless ether; where unnumber'd orbs,
Myriads on myriads, through the pathless sky
Unerring roll, and wind their steady way.
There he the full consenting choir beheld;
There first discern'd the sacred band of love, 45
The kind attraction, that to central suns
Binds circling earths, and world with world unites.
Instructed thence, he great ideas form'd
Of the whole-moving, all-informing God,
The sun of beings! beaming unconfin'd 50
Light, life, and love, and ever-active power:
Whom nought can image, and who best approves
The silent worship of the moral heart,
That joys in bounteous heaven, and spreads the joy.
Nor scorn'd the soaring sage to stoop to life, 55
And bound his reason to the sphere of man.
He gave the four yet reigning virtues name;
Inspir'd the study of the finer arts,
That civilize mankind, and laws devis'd
Where with enlighten'd justice mercy mix'd. 60
He ev'n, into his tender system, took
Whatever shares the brotherhood of life:
He taught that life's indissoluble flame,
From brute to man, and man to brute again,
For ever shifting, runs th' eternal round; 65
Thence try'd against the blood-polluted meal,
And limbs yet quivering with some kindred soul,
To turn the human heart. Delightful truth!
Had he beheld the living chain ascend,
And not a circling form, but rising whole. 70
Amid these small republics one arose,
On yellow Tyber's bank, almighty Rome,
Fated for me. A nobler spirit warm'd
Her sons; and, rous'd by tyrants, nobler still
It burn'd in Brutus; the proud Tarquins chas'd, 75
With all their crimes; bade radiant eras rise,
And the long honours of the consul-line.
Here, from the fairer, not the greater plan
Of Greece I vary'd; whose unmixing states,
By the keen soul of emulation pierc'd, 80
Long wag'd alone the bloodless war of arts,
And their best empire gain'd. But to diffuse
O'er men an empire was my purpose now:
To let my martial majesty abroad;
Into the vortex of one state to draw 85
The whole mix'd force, and liberty, on earth;
To conquer tyrants, and set nations free.
Already have I given, with flying touch,
A broken view of this my amplest reign.
Now, while its first, last, periods you survey, 90
Mark how it labouring rose, and rapid fell.
When Rome in noon-tide empire grasp'd the
And, soon as her resistless legions shone, [world,
The nations stoop'd around; though then appear'd
Her grandeur most, yet in her dawn of power, 95
By many a jealous equal people press'd,
Then was the toil, the mighty struggle then:
Then for each Roman I an hero told;
And every passing fun, and Latian scene,
Saw patriot virtues then, and awful deeds, 100
That or surpass the faith of modern times,
Or, if believ'd, with sacred horror strike.
For then, to prove my most exalted power,
I to the point of full perfection push'd,
To fondness or enthusiastic zeal, 105
The great, the reigning passion of the free.

That godlike passion; which, the bounds of self Divinely bursting, the whole public takes
Into the heart, enlarg'd, and burning high
With the mix'd ardor of unnumber'd selves; 110
Of all who safe beneath the voted laws
Of the same parent state, fraternal, live.
From this kind son of moral nature flow'd
Virtues, that shine the light of human kind,
And, ray'd through story, warm remotest time. 115
These virtues too, reflected to their source,
Increas'd its flame. The social charm went round,
The fair idea, more attractive still,
As more by virtue mark'd; till Romans, all
One band of friends, unconquerable grew. 120
Hence, when their country rais'd her plaintiff
The voice of pleading nature was not heard; [voice,
And in their hearts the fathers throb'd no more:
Stern to themselves, but gentle to the whole.
Hence sweeten'd pain, the luxury of toil; 125
Patience, that baffled fortune's utmost rage;
High-minded hope, which at the lowest ebb,
When Brennus conquer'd, and when Cannæ bled,
The bravest impulse felt, and scorn'd despair.
Hence moderation a new conquest gain'd; 130
As on the vanquish'd, like descending heaven,
Their dewy mercy dropp'd, their bounty beam'd,
And by the labouring hand were crowns bestow'd.
Fruitful of men, hence hard laborious life,
Which no fatigue can quell, no season pierce. 135
Hence, Independence, with his little pleas'd,
Serene, and self-sufficient, like a god;
In whom corruption could not lodge one charm,
While he his honest roots to gold prefer'd;
While truly rich, and by his Sabine field, 140
The man maintain'd, the Roman's splendor all
Was in the public wealth and glory plac'd:
Or ready, a rough swain, to guide the plough;
Or else, the purple o'er his shoulder thrown,
In long majestic flow, to rule the state, 145
With wisdom's purest eye; or, clad in steel,
To drive the steady battle on the foe.
Hence every passion, ev'n the proudest, stoop'd,
To common good: Camillus, thy revenge;
Thy glory, Fabius. All submissive hence, 150
Consuls, dictators, still resign'd their rule,
The very moment that the laws ordain'd. [wings,
Though conquest o'er them clapp'd her eagle-
Her laurels wreath'd, and yok'd her snowy steeds
To the triumphal car; soon as expir'd 155
The latest hour of sway, taught to submit
(A harder lesson than to command)
Into the private Roman sunk the chief.
If Rome was serv'd, and glorious, careless they 159
By whom, their country's fame they deem'd their
And, above envy, in a rival's train, [own;
Sung the loud lōs-by themselves deserv'd.
Hence matchless courage. On Cremera's bank,
Hence fell the Fabii; hence the Decii dy'd;
And Curtius plung'd into the flaming gulf. 165
Hence Regulus the wavering fathers firm'd,
By dreadful counsel never given before;
For Roman honour sued, and his own doom.
Hence he sustain'd to dare a death prepar'd
By Punic rage. On earth his manly look 170
Relentless fix'd, he from a last embrace,
By chains polluted, put his wife aside,
His little children climbing for a kiss; [friends,
Then dumb through rows of weeping wondering

A new illustrious exile ! press'd along. 175
 Nor less impatient did he pierce the crowds
 Opposing his return, than if, escap'd
 From long litigious suits, he glad forsook
 The noisy town a while, and city cloud
 To breathe Venafrian, or Tarentine air. 180
 Need I these high particulars recount ?
 The meanest bosom felt a thirst for fame ?
 Flight their worst death, and shame their only fear.
 Life had no charms, nor any terrors fate, [185
 When Rome and glory call'd. But, in one view,
 Mark the rare boast of these unequal'd times.
 Ages revolv'd unfully'd by a crime :
 Aстреa reign'd, and scarcely needed laws
 To bind a race elated with the pride
 Of virtue, and disdaining to descend 190
 To meanness, mutual violence, and wrongs.
 While war around them rag'd, in happy Rome
 All peaceful smil'd, all save the passing clouds
 That often hang on freedom's jealous brow !
 And fair unblemish'd centuries elaps'd, 195
 When not a Roman bled but in the field.
 Their virtue such, that an unbalanc'd state,
 Still between noble and plebeian tost,
 As flow'd the wave of fluctuating power, [199
 Was thence kept firm, and with triumphant prow
 Rode out the storms. Oft though the native feuds,
 That from the first their constitution shook,
 (A latent ruin, growing as it grew)
 Stood on the threatening point of civil war
 Ready to rush : yet could the lenient voice 205
 Of wisdom, soothing the tumultuous soul,
 Those sons of virtue calm. Their generous hearts,
 Unpetrify'd by self, so naked lay,
 And sensible to truth, that o'er the rage
 Of giddy faction, by oppression swell'd, 210
 Prevail'd a simple fable, and at once
 To peace recover'd the divided state.
 But if their often-cheated hopes refus'd
 The soothing touch ; still, in the love of Rome,
 The dread dictator found a sure resource. 215
 Was she assaulted ? was her glory stain'd ?
 One common quarrel wide inflam'd the whole.
 Foes in the forum in the field were friends.
 By social danger bound ; each fond for each,
 And for their dearest country all, to die. 220
 Thus up the hill of empire slow they toil'd :
 Till, the bold summit gain'd, the thousand states
 Of proud Italia blended into one ;
 Then o'er the nations they resistless rush'd,
 And touch'd the limits of the failing world. 225
 Let Fancy's eye the distant lines unite.
 See that which borders wild the western main,
 Where storms at large resound, and tides immense :
 From Caledonia's dim cerulean coast,
 And moist Hibernia, to where Atlas, lodg'd 230
 Amid the restless clouds, and leaning heaven,
 Hangs o'er the deep that borrows thence its name.
 Mark that oppos'd, where first the springing morn
 Her roses sheds, and shakes around her dews :
 From the dire deserts by the Caspian lav'd, 235
 To where the Tigris and Euphrates, join'd,
 Impetuous tear the Babylonian plain ;
 And blest Arabia aromatic breathes.
 See that dividing far the watery north,
 Parent of floods ! from the majestic Rhine, 240
 Drunk by Batavian meads, to where, seven-mouth'd,

In Euxine waves the flashing Danube roars ;
 To where the frozen Tanais scarcely stirs
 The dead Meotic pool, or the long Rha,
 In the black Scythian sea his torrent throws. 245
 Last, that beneath the burning zone behold,
 See where it runs, from the deep-loaded plains
 Of Mauritania to the Libyan sands,
 Where Ammon lifts amid the torrid waste
 A verdant isle, with shade and fountain fresh : 250
 And farther to the full Egyptian shore,
 To where the Nile from Ethiopian clouds,
 His never-drain'd ethereal urn, descends.
 In this vast space what various tongues, and states !
 What bounding rocks, and mountains, floods and seas ! 255
 What purple tyrants quell'd, and nations freed !
 O'er Greece descended chief, with stealth divine,
 The Roman bounty in a flood of day :
 As at her Isthmian games, a fading pomp !
 Her full-assembled youth innumerable swarm'd. 260
 On a tribunal rais'd Flaminius sat ;
 A victor he, from the deep phalanx pierc'd
 Of iron-coated Macedon, and back
 The Grecian tyrant to his bounds repell'd.
 In the high thoughtless gaiety of game, 265
 While sport alone their unambitious hearts
 Possess'd ; the sudden trumpet, sounding hoarse,
 Bade silence o'er the bright assembly reign.
 Then thus a herald :—" To the states of Greece
 " The Roman people, unconfin'd, restore 270
 " Their countries, cities, liberties, and laws :
 " Taxes remit, and garrisons withdraw."
 The crowd astonish'd half, and half inform'd,
 Star'd dubious round ; some question'd, some ex-
 claim'd, 274
 (Like one who dreaming, between hope and fear,
 Is lost in anxious joy) Be that again,
 Be that again proclaim'd, distinct, and loud.
 Loud, and distinct, it was again proclaim'd ;
 And still as midnight in the rural shade,
 When the gale slumbers, they the words devour'd.
 A while severe amazement held them mute, 280
 Then, bursting broad, the boundless shout to heaven
 From many a thousand hearts ecstatic sprung.
 On every hand rebellow'd to their joy
 The swelling sea, the rocks, and vocal hills : 285
 Through all her turrets stately Corinth shook ;
 And, from the void above of shatter'd air,
 The flitting bird fell breathless to the ground.
 What piercing bliss ! how keen a sense of fame,
 Did then, Flaminius, reach thy inmost soul ! 290
 And with what deep-felt glory didst thou then
 Escape the fondness of transported Greece !
 Mix'd in a tempest of superior joy,
 They left the sports ; like Bacchanals they flew,
 Each other straining in a strict embrace, 295
 Nor strain'd a slave ; and loud acclaims till night
 Round the proconsul's tent repeated rung.
 Then, crown'd with garlands, came the festive hours ;
 And music, sparkling wine, and converse warm,
 Their raptures wak'd anew.—" Ye gods ! they
 cry'd, 300
 " Ye guardian gods of Greece ! And are we free ?
 " Was it not madness deem'd the very thought ?
 " And is it true ? How did we purchase chains ?

" At what a dire expence of kindred blood?
 " And are they now dissolv'd? And scarce one
 " drop. 305
 " For the fair first of blessings have we paid?
 " Courage, and conduct, in the doubtful field,
 " When rages wide the storm of mingling war,
 " Are rare indeed; but how to generous ends
 " To turn success, and conquest, rarer still: 310
 " That the great gods and Romans only know.
 " Lives there on earth, almost to Greece unknown,
 " A people so magnanimous, to quit
 " Their native soil, traverse the stormy deep,
 " And by their blood and treasure, spent for us, 315
 " Redeem our states, our liberties, and laws!
 " There does! there does! oh, saviour Titus!
 " Rome!" [souls, 320
 Thus through the happy night they pour'd their
 And in my last reflected beams rejoic'd.
 As when the shepherd, on the mountain brow, 320
 Sits piping to his flocks, and gamefome kids;
 Meantime the sun, beneath the green earth sunk,
 Slants upward o'er the scene a parting gleam:
 Short is the glory that the mountain gilds,
 Plays on the glittering flocks, and glads the swain;
 To western worlds irrevocable roll'd, 326
 Rapid, the source of light recalls his ray.
 Here interposing I.—" Oh, queen of men!
 " Beneath whose sceptre in essential rights
 " Equal they live; though plac'd, for common
 " good, 330
 " Various, or in subjection, or command;
 " And that by common choice: alas! the scene,
 " With virtue, freedom, and with glory bright,
 " Streams into blood, and darkens into woe."
 Thus she pursued.—Near this great era, Rome 335
 Began to feel the swift approach of fate,
 That now her vitals gain'd: still more and more
 Her deep divisions kindling into rage,
 And war with chains and desolation charg'd.
 From an unequal balance of her sons 340
 These fierce contentions sprung; and, as increas'd
 This hated inequality, more fierce
 They flam'd to tumult. Independence fail'd;
 Here by luxurious wants, by real there;
 And with this virtue every virtue sunk, 345
 As, with the sliding rock, the pile sustain'd.
 A last attempt, too late, the Gracchi made,
 To fix the flying scale, and poise the state.
 On one side swell'd aristocratic pride;
 With usury, the villain! whose fell gripe 350
 Bends by degrees to baseness the free soul;
 And luxury rapacious, cruel, mean,
 Mother of vice! while on the other crept
 A populace in want, with pleasure fir'd;
 Fit for proscriptions, for the darkest deeds, 355
 As the proud feeder bade: inconstant, blind,
 Deserting friends at need, and dup'd by foes;
 Loud and seditious, when a chief inspir'd
 Their headlong fury, but, of him depriv'd,
 Already slaves that lick'd the scourging hand. 360
 This firm republic, that against the blast
 Of opposition rose; that (like an oak,
 Nurs'd on ferocious Algidum, whose boughs
 Still stronger shoot beneath the rigid ax)
 By loss, by slaughter, from the steel itself, 365
 Ev'n force and spirit drew; smit with the calm,
 The dead serene of prosperous fortune, pin'd.
 Nought now her weighty legions could oppose;

Her terror once on Afric's tawny shore, 369
 Now smok'd in dust, a stabling now for wolves;
 And every dreaded power receiv'd the yoke.
 Besides, destructive, from the conquer'd east,
 In the soft plunder came that worst of plagues,
 That pestilence of mind, a fever'd thirst
 For the false joys which luxury prepares, 373
 Unworthy joys! that wasteful leave behind
 No mark of honour, in reflecting hour,
 No secret ray to glad the conscious soul;
 At once involving in one ruin wealth,
 And wealth acquiring powers: while stupid self,
 Of narrow gust, and hebetating sense 382
 Devour the nobler faculties of bliss.
 Hence Roman virtue slacken'd into sloth;
 Security relax'd the softening state;
 And the broad eye of government lay clos'd
 No more the laws inviolable reign'd,
 And public weal no more: but party rag'd; 385
 And partial power, and licence unrestrain'd,
 Let discord through the deathful city loose.
 First, mild Tiberius, on thy sacred head 390
 The fury's vengeance fell; the first whose blood
 Had since the consul's stain'd contending Rome.
 Of precedent pernicious! with thee bled
 Three hundred Romans; with thy brother, next,
 Three thousand more; till, into battles turn'd 395
 Debates of peace, and forc'd the trembling laws,
 The forum and comitia horrid grew,
 A scene of barter'd power, or reeking gore.
 When, half-asham'd, corruption's thievish arts,
 And ruffian force began to sap the monnds 400
 And majesty of laws; if not in time
 Repress'd severe, for human aid too strong
 The torrent turns, and overbears the whole.
 Thus luxury, dissension, a mix'd rage
 Of boundless pleasure and of boundless wealth, 405
 Want wishing change, and waste repairing war,
 Rapine for ever lost to peaceful toil,
 Guilt unaton'd, profuse of blood revenge,
 Corruption all avow'd, and lawless force,
 Each heightening each, alternate shook the state,
 Meantime ambition, at the dazzling head 411
 Of hardy legions, with the laurels heap'd
 And spoil of nations, in one circling blast
 Combin'd in various storm, and from its base
 The broad republic tore. By virtue built, 415
 It touch'd the skies, and spread o'er shelter'd earth
 An ample roof: by virtue too sustain'd,
 And balanc'd steady, every tempest sung
 Innoxious by, or bade it firmer stand.
 But when, with sudden and enormous change, 420
 The first of mankind sunk into the last,
 As once in virtue, so in vice extreme,
 This universal fabric yielded loose,
 Before ambition still; and thundering down,
 At last, beneath its ruins crush'd a world. 425
 A conquering people, to themselves a prey,
 Must ever fall; when their victorious troops,
 In blood and rapine savage grown, can find
 No land to sack and pillage but their own.
 By brutal Marius, and keen Sylla, first 430
 Effus'd the deluge dire of civil blood,
 Unceasing woes began, and this, or that,
 (Deep-drenching their revenge) nor virtue spar'd,
 Nor sex, nor age, nor quality, nor name;
 Till Rome, into an human shambles turn'd, 435
 Made deserts lovely.—Oh, to well-earn'd chains

Devoted race!—If no true Roman then,
 No Scævola there was, to raise for me
 A vengeful hand: was there no father, robb'd
 Of blooming youth to prop his wither'd age? 440
 No son, a witness to his hoary fire
 In dust and gore defil'd? no friend forlorn?
 No wretch that doubtful trembled for himself?
 None brave, or wild, to pierce a monster's heart,
 Who, heaping horror round, no more deserv'd 445
 The sacred shelter of the laws he spurn'd?
 No. Sad o'er all profound dejection sat;
 And nerveless fear. The slave's asylum theirs:
 Or flight, ill-judging, that the timid back
 Turns weak to slaughter; or partaken guilt. 450
 In vain from Sylla's vanity I drew
 An unexampled deed. The power resign'd,
 And all unhop'd the common-wealth restor'd,
 Amaz'd the public, and effac'd his crimes:
 Through streets yet streaming from his murderous
 hand 455
 Unarm'd he stray'd, unguarded, unassail'd,
 And on the bed of peace his ashes laid;
 A grace, which I to his demission gave.
 But with him dy'd not the despotic soul.
 Ambition saw that stooping Rome could bear 460
 A master, nor had virtue to be free.
 Hence, for succeeding years, my troubled reign
 No certain peace, no spreading prospect knew.
 Destruction gather'd round. Still the black soul,
 Or of a Cataline, or Rullus, swell'd 465
 With fell designs; and all the watchful art
 Of Cicero demanded, all the force,
 All the state-wielding magic of his tongue;
 And all the thunder of my Cato's zeal.
 With these I linger'd; till the flame anew 470
 Burst out in blaze immense, and wrapt the world.
 The shameful contest sprung; to whom mankind
 Should yield the neck: to Pompey, who conceal'd
 A rage impatient of an equal name;
 Or to the nobler Cæsar, on whose brow 475
 O'er daring vice deluding virtue smil'd,
 And who no less a vain superior scorn'd.
 Both bled, but bled in vain. New traitors rose,
The venal WILL be bought, the base have lords.
 To these vile wars I left ambitious slaves; 480
 And from Philippi's field, from where in dust
 The last of Romans, matchless Brutus! lay,
 Spread to the north untam'd a rapid wing.
 What though the first smooth Cæsar's arts ca-
 refs'd,
 Merit and virtue, simulating me? 485
 Severely tender! cruelly humane!
 The chain to clinch, and make it softer fit
 On the new-broken still ferocious state.
 From the dark third, succeeding, I beheld
 Th' imperial monsters all.—A race on earth 490
 Vindictive, sent the scourge of human kind!
 Whose blind profusion drain'd a bankrupt world;
 Whose lust to forming nature seems disgrace;
 And whose infernal rage bad every drop
 Of ancient blood, that yet retain'd my flame, 495
 To that of Pætus, in the peaceful bath,
 Or Rome's affrighted streets, inglorious flow.
 But almost just the meanly-patient death,
 That waits a tyrant's unprevented stroke.
 Titus indeed gave one short evening gleam; 500

More cordial felt, as in the midst it spread
 Of storm, and horror. The delight of men!
 He who the day, when his o'erflowing hand
 Had made no happy heart, concluded lost;
 Trajan and he, with the mild fire and son, 505
 His son of virtue! eas'd awhile mankind;
 And arts reviv'd beneath their gentle beam.
 Then was their last effort: what sculpture rais'd
 To Trajan's glory, following triumphs stole; 509
 And mix'd with Gothic forms, (the chissel's shame)
 On that triumphal arch, the forms of Greece.
 Meantime o'er rocky Thrace, and the deep vales
 Of gelid Hemus, I pursued my flight;
 And, piercing farthest Scythia, westward swept
 Sarmatia, travers'd by a thousand streams. 515
 A fullen land of lakes, and fens immense,
 Of rocks, resounding torrents, gloomy heaths,
 And cruel deserts black with sounding pine;
 Where nature frowns: though sometimes into smiles
 She softens; and immediate, at the touch 520
 Of southern gales, throws from the sudden glebe
 Luxuriant pasture, and a waste of flowers.
 But, cold-compress'd, when the whole loaded heaven
 Descends in snow, lost in one white abrupt,
 Lies undistinguish'd earth; and, seiz'd by frost, 525
 Lakes, headlong streams, and floods, and oceans—
 sleep,
 Yet there life glows; the furry millions there,
 Deep-dig their dens beneath the sheltering snows:
 And there a race of men prolific swarms,
 To various pain, to little pleasure us'd; 530
 On whom, keen parching, beat Riphæan winds;
 Hard like their soil, and like their climate fierce,
 The nursery of nations!—These I rous'd,
 Drove land on land, on people people pour'd;
 Till from almost perpetual night they broke, 535
 As if in search of day; and o'er the banks
 Of yielding empire, only slave-sustain'd,
 Resistless rag'd, in vengeance urg'd by me.
 Long in the barbarous heart the bury'd seeds
 Of freedom lay, for many a wintery age; 540
 And though my spirit work'd by slow degrees,
 Nought but its pride and fierceness yet appear'd.
 Then was the night of time, that parted worlds.
 I quitted earth the while. As when the tribes
 Aërial, warn'd of rising winter, ride 545
 Autumnal winds, to warmer climates borne?
 So, arts and each good genius in my train,
 I cut the closing gloom, and soar'd to heaven.
 In the bright regions there of purest day,
 Far other scenes, and palaces, arise, 550
 Adorn'd profuse with other arts divine.
 All beauty here below, to them compar'd,
 Would, like a rose before the mid-day sun,
 Shrink up its blossom; like a bubble, break
 The passing poor magnificence of kings. 555
 For there the King of Nature, in full blaze,
 Calls every splendor forth, and there his court
 Amid ethereal powers, and virtues, holds:
 Angel, archangel, tutelary gods,
 Of cities, nations, empires, and of worlds. 560
 But sacred be the veil, that kindly clouds
 A light too keen for mortals: wraps a veil
 Too softening fair, for those that here in dust
 Must cheerful toil out their appointed years.
 A sense of higher life would only damp 565

The school-boy's task, and spoil his playful hours.
Nor could the child of reason, feeble man,
With vigour through this infant being drudge;
Did brighter worlds, their unimagined bliss
Disclosing, dazzle and dissolve his mind. 570

PART IV. BRITAIN.

Contents.

Difference betwixt the ancients and moderns slightly touched upon, to ver. 30. Description of the dark ages. The Goddess of Liberty, who during these is supposed to have left earth, returns, attended with Arts and Science, to ver. 100. She first descends on Italy. Sculpture, Painting, and Architecture fix at Rome, to revive their several arts by the great models of antiquity there, which many barbarous invasions had not been able to destroy. The revival of these arts marked out. That sometimes arts may flourish for a while under despotic governments, though never the natural and genuine production of them, to ver. 254. Learning begins to dawn.

The Muse and Science attend Liberty, who in her progress towards Great Britain raises several free states and cities. These enumerated, to ver. 381. Author's exclamation of joy, upon seeing the British seas and coasts rise in the vision, which painted whatever the Goddess of Liberty said. She resumes her narration. The Genius of the Deep appears, and, addressing Liberty, associates Great Britain into his dominion, to ver. 451. Liberty received and congratulated by Britannia, and the Native Genii or Virtues of the island. These described. Animated by the presence of Liberty, they begin their operations. Their beneficent influence contrasted with the works and delusions of opposing demons, to ver. 626. Concludes with an abstract of the English history, marking the several advances of Liberty, down to her complete establishment at the Revolution.

STRUCK with the rising scene, thus I amaz'd:
"Ah, Goddess, what a change! Is earth the same?
"Of the same kind the ruthless race she feeds?
"And does the same fair sun and ether spread
"Round this vile spot their all-enlivening soul?
"Lo! beauty fails; lost in unlovely forms
"Of little pomp, magnificence no more
"Exalts the mind, and bids the public smile:
"While to rapacious interest glory leaves
"Mankind, and every grace of life is gone." 10
To this the power, whose vital radiance calls
From the brute mass of man an order'd world,
"Wait till the morning shines, and from the
"Of Gothic darkness springs another day. [depth
"True genius droops; the tender ancient taste 15
"Of beauty, then fresh-blooming in her prime,
"But faintly trembles through the callous soul;
"And grandeur, or of morals, or of life,
"Sinks into safe pursuits, and creeping cares.
"Ev'n cautious virtue seems to stoop her flight, 20
"And aged life to deem the generous deeds
"Of youth romantic. Yet in cooler thought
"Well-reason'd, in researches piercing deep
"Through nature's works, in profitable arts,
"And all that calm experience can disclose, 25
"(Slow guide, but sure) behold the world anew
"Exalted rise, with other honours crown'd;
"And, where my spirit wakes the finer powers,
"Athenian laurels still afresh shall bloom."
Oblivious ages pass'd; while earth, forsook, 30
By her best genii, lay to demons foul,
And unchain'd furies, an abandon'd prey.
Contention led the van; first small of size,
But soon dilating to the skies she towers:
Then, wide as air, the livid fury spread, 35
And high her head above the stormy clouds,
She blaz'd in omens, swell'd the groaning winds,
With wild surmises, battlings, sounds of war:
From land to land the maddening trumpet blew,
And pour'd her venom through the heart of man. 40
Shook to the pole, the north obey'd her call.
Forth rush'd the bloody power of Gothic war,
War against human kind: Rapine, that led
Millions of raging robbers in his train:
Unlistening, barbarous force, to whom the sword 45
Is reason, honour, law: the foe of arts
By monsters follow'd, hideous to behold, [these
That claim'd their place. Outrageous mix'd with Another species of tyrannic rule,

 Unknown before, whose cancrus shackles seiz'd 50
 Th' envenom'd soul; a wilder fury, she
 Ev'n o'er her elder sister tyranniz'd;
 Or, if perchance agreed, inflam'd her rage.
 Dire was her train, and loud; the fable band,
 Thundering,—Submit, ye laity! ye profane! 55
 "Earth is the Lord's, and therefore ours; let kings
 "Allow the common claim, and half be theirs;
 "If not, behold! the sacred lightning flies:"
 Scholastic discord, with an hundred tongues.
 For science uttering jangling words obscure, 60
 Where frighted reason never yet could dwell:
 Of peremptory feature, cleric pride.
 Whose reddening cheek no contradiction bears;
 And holy slander, his associate firm,
 On whom the lying spirit still descends: 65
 Mother of tortures! persecuting zeal,
 High-flashing in her hand the ready torch,
 Or poniard bath'd in unbelieving blood;
 Hell's fiercest fiend! of faintly brow demure,
 Assuming a celestial seraph's name, 70
 While she beneath the blasphemous pretence
 Of pleasing Parent Heaven, the source of love!
 Has wrought more horrors, more detested deeds,
 Than all the rest combin'd. Led on by her,
 And wild of head to work her fell designs, 75
 Came idiot superstition; round with ears
 Innumeros strow'd, ten thousand monkish forms
 With legends ply'd them, and with tenets, meant
 To charm or scare the simple into slaves,
 And poison reason; gross, she swallows all, 80
 The most absurd believing ever most.
 Broad o'er the whole her universal night,
 The gloom still doubling, ignorance diffus'd.
 Nought to be seen, but visionary monks
 To councils strolling, and embroiling creeds; 85
 Banditti saints, disturbing distant lands;
 And unknown nations, wandering for a home.
 All lay revers'd: the sacred arts of rule
 Turn'd to flagitious leagues against mankind,
 And arts of plunder more and more avow'd; 90
 Pure plain devotion to a solemn farce;
 To holy dotage virtue, ev'n to guile,
 To murder, and a mockery of oaths;
 Brave ancient freedom to the rage of slaves,
 Proud of their state, and fighting for their chains;
 Dishonour'd courage to the bravo's trade, 96
 To civil broil; and glory to romance.
 Thus human life unhing'd to ruin reel'd,
 And giddy reason totter'd on her throne.
 At last Heaven's best inexplicable scheme, 100
 Disclosing, bade new brightening eras smile.
 The high command gone forth, Arts in my train,
 And azure-mantled science, swift we spread
 A sounding pinion. Eager pity, mixt
 With indignation, urg'd her downward flight. 105
 On Latium first we stoop'd, for doubtful life
 That panted, sunk beneath unnumber'd woes.
 Ah, poor Italia! what a bitter cup
 Of vengeance hast thou drain'd! Goths, Vandals,
 Huns,
 Lombards, barbarians broke from every land, 110
 How many a ruffian form hast thou beheld!
 What horrid jargons heard, where rage alone
 Was all thy frighted ear could comprehend!
 How frequent by the red inhuman hand, [blood,
 Yet warm with brother's, husband's, father's Hast thou thy matrons and thy virgins seen

To violation dragg'd, and mingled death!
 What conflagrations, earthquakes, ravage, floods,
 Have turn'd thy cities into stony wilds;
 And succourless, and bare, the poor remains 120
 Of wretches forth to nature's common cast!
 Added to these, the still continued waste
 Of inbred foes, that on thy vitals prey,
 And, double tyrants, seize the very soul.
 Where hadst thou treasures for this rapine all?
 These hungry myriads that thy bowels tore,
 Heap'd sack on sack, and bury'd in their rage
 Wonders of art; whence this grey scene a mine
 Of more than gold becomes and orient gems, 129
 Where Egypt, Greece, and Rome, united glow.
 Here sculpture, painting, architecture, bent
 From ancient models to restore their arts,
 Remain'd. A little trace we how they rose.
 Amid the hoary ruins sculpture first, 134
 Deep-digging, from the cavern dark and damp,
 Their grave for ages, bid her marble race
 Spring to new light. Joy sparkled in her eyes,
 And old remembrance thrill'd in every thought,
 As she the pleasing resurrection saw.
 In leaning site, respicing from his toils 140
 The well-known hero, who deliver'd Greece,
 His ample chest, all tempest'd with force,
 Unconquerable rear'd. She saw the head,
 Breathing the hero, small, of Grecian size,
 Scarce more extensive than the sinewy neck; 145
 The spreading shoulders, muscular, and broad;
 The whole a mass of swelling sinews, touch'd
 Into harmonious shape; she saw, and joy'd.
 The yellow hunter, Meleager, rais'd
 His beauteous front, and through the finish'd whole
 Shows what ideas smil'd of old in Greece. 151
 Of raging aspect, rush'd impetuous forth
 The Gladiator. Pityless his look,
 And each keen sinew brac'd, the storm of war,
 Ruffling, o'er all his nervous body frowns. 155
 The Dying Other from the gloom she drew.
 Supported on his shorten'd arm he leans,
 Prone agonizing; with incumbent fate,
 Heavy declines his head; yet dark beneath 159
 The suffering feature fullen vengeance lowers,
 Shame, indignation, unaccomplish'd rage,
 And still the cheated eye expects his fall.
 All conquest-flush'd, from prostrate Python, came
 The quiver'd god. In graceful act he stands,
 His arm extended with the slacken'd bow. 165
 Light flows his easy robe, and fair displays
 A manly soften'd form. The bloom of gods
 Seems youthful o'er the beardless cheek to wave.
 His features yet heroic ardour warms;
 And sweet subsiding to a native smile, 170
 Mixt with the joy elating conquest gives,
 A scatter'd frown exalts his matchless air.
 On Flora mov'd; her full-proportion'd limbs
 Rise through the mantle fluttering in the breeze.
 The queen of love arose, as from the deep 179
 She sprung in all the melting pomp of charms.
 Bashful she bends, her well-taught look aside
 Turns in enchanting guise, where dubious mix
 Vain conscious beauty, a dissembled sense
 Of modest shame, and slippery looks of love, 180
 The gazer grows enamour'd, and the stone,
 As if exulting in its conquest, smiles.
 So turn'd each limb, so swell'd with softening art,
 That the deluded eye the marble doubts.
 At last her utmost master-piece she found, 185

That Maro fir'd; the miserable fire,
 Wrapt with his sons in fates severest grasp.
 The serpents, twisting round their stringent folds
 Inextricable tie. Such passion here,
 Such agonies, such bitterness of pain, 190
 Seem so to tremble through the tortur'd stone,
 That the touch'd heart engrosses all the view.
 Almost unmark'd the best proportions pass,
 That ever Greece beheld; and, seen alone,
 On the rapt eye th' imperious passions seize: 195
 The father's double pangs, both for himself
 And sons convuls'd; to heaven his rueful look,
 Imploring aid, and half-accusing, cast;
 His fell despair with indignation mixt.
 As the strong curling monsters from his side 200
 His full extended fury cannot tear.
 More tender touch'd, with varied art, his sons
 All the soft rage of younger passions show.
 In a boy's helpless fate one sinks oppress'd;
 While, yet unpierc'd, the frighted other tries 205
 His foot to steal out of the horrid twine.
 She bore no more, but strait from Gothic rust
 Her chisel clear'd, and dust and fragments drove Impetuous round. Successive as it went,
 From son to son, with more enlivening touch, 210
 From the brute rock it call'd the breathing form;
 Till, in a legislator's awful grace
 Dress'd, Buonaroti bid a Moses rise,
 And, looking love immense, a Saviour-God.
 Of these observant, painting felt the fire 215
 Burn inward. Then ecstatic she diffus'd
 The canvas, seiz'd the pallet, with quick hand
 The colours brew'd; and on the void expanse
 Her gay creation pour'd, her mimic world.
 Poor was the manner of her eldest race, 220
 Barren, and dry; just struggling from the taste,
 That had for ages scar'd in cloysters dim
 The superstitious herd: yet glorious then
 Were deem'd their works; where undevelop'd lay
 The future wonders that enrich'd mankind, 225
 And a new light and grace o'er Europe cast,
 Arts gradual gather streams. Enlarging this
 To each his portion of her various gifts
 The goddess dealt, to none indulging all;
 No, not to Raphael. At kind distance still 230
 Perfection stands, like happiness, to tempt
 Th' eternal chase. In elegant design
 Improving nature; in ideas fair,
 Or great, extracted from the fine antique;
 In attitude, expression, airs divine; 235
 Her sons of Rome and Florence bore the prize.
 To those of Venice she the magic art
 Of colours melting into colours gave.
 Theirs too it was by one embracing mass 239
 Of light and shade that settles round the whole,
 Or varies tremulous from part to part,
 O'er all a binding harmony to throw,
 To raise the picture, and repose the sight.
 The Lombard school succeeding, mingled both,
 Meantime dread fanes, and palaces, around, 245
 Rear'd the magnific front. Music again
 Her universal language of the heart
 Renew'd; and, rising from the plaintive vale,
 To the full concert spread, and solemn quire. 249
 Ev'n bigots smil'd; to their protection took Arts not their own, and from them borrow'd pomp:

For in a tyrant's garden these a while
 May bloom, though freedom be their parent soil.
 And now confess, with gently-growing gleam,
 The morning shone, and westward stream'd its
 light, 255
 The muse awoke. Not sooner on the wing
 Is the gay bird of dawn. Artless her voice.
 Untaught and wild, yet warbling through the woods
 Romantic lays. But as her northern course
 She, with her tutor science, in my train, 260
 Ardent pursu'd, her strains more noble grew:
 While reason drew the plan, the heart inform'd
 The moral page, and fancy lent it grace.
 Rome and her circling deserts cast behind,
 I pass'd not idle to my great sojourn. 265
 On Arno's fertile plain, where the rich vine
 Luxuriant o'er Etrurian mountains roves,
 Safe in the lap repos'd of private bliss,
 I small republics rais'd. Thrice happy they! 269
 Had social freedom bound their peace, and arts,
 Instead of ruling power, ne'er meant for them,
 Employed their little cares, and sav'd their fate.
 Beyond the rugged Apennines, that roll
 Far through Italian bounds their wavy tops,
 My path too I with public blessings strow'd; 275
 Free states and cities, where the Lombard plain,
 In spite of culture negligent and gross,
 From her deep bosom pours unbidden joys,
 And green o'er all the land a garden spreads.
 The barren rocks themselves beneath my foot
 Relenting bloom'd on the Ligurian shore. 281
 Thick swarming people there, like emmets, seiz'd
 Amid surrounding cliffs, the scatter'd spots,
 Which nature left in her destroying rage,
 Made their own fields, nor sigh'd for other lands.
 There, in white prospect, from the rocky hill, 286
 Gradual descending to the shelter'd shore,
 By me proud Genoa's marble turrets rose.
 And while my genuine spirit warm'd her sons,
 Beneath her Dorias, not unworthy, she 290
 Vy'd for the trident of the narrow seas,
 Ere Britain yet had open'd all the main.
 Nor be the then triumphant state forgot; [still,
 Where, push'd from plunder'd earth, a remnant
 Inspir'd by me, through the dark ages kept 295
 Of my old Roman flame some sparks alive:
 The seeming god-built city! which my hand
 Deep in the bosom fix'd of wondering seas.
 Astonish'd mortals sail'd, with pleasing awe,
 Around the sea-girt walls, by Neptune fenc'd, 300
 And down the briny street; where on each hand,
 Amazing seen amid unstable waves,
 The splendid palace shines; and rising tides,
 The green steps marking, murmur at the door.
 To this fair queen of Adria's stormy gulf, 305
 The mart of nations! long, obedient seas
 Roll'd all the treasure of the radiant East;
 But now no more. Than one great tyrant worse
 (Whose shar'd oppression lightens as diffus'd)
 Each subject tearing, many tyrants rose. 310
 The least the proudest. Join'd in dark cabal,
 They jealous, watchful, silent, and severe,
 Cast o'er the whole indissoluble chains:
 The softer shackles of luxurious ease
 They likewise added, to secure their sway. 315
 Thus Venus fainter shines; and commerce thus,
 Of toil impatient, flags the drooping sail.

Bursting, besides, his ancient bounds, he took
A larger circle; found another seat,
Opening a thousand ports, and charm'd with toil, 320

Whom nothing can dismay, far other sons.
The mountains then, clad with eternal snow,
Confess'd my power. Deep as the rampant rocks,
By nature thrown insuperable round,
I planted there a league of friendly states, 325
And bade plain freedom their ambition be.

There in the vale, where rural plenty fills, [horn,
From lakes, and meads, and furrow'd fields, her
Chief, where the Leman pure emits the Rhone,
Rare to be seen! unguilty cities rise, 330

Cities of brothers form'd: while equal life,
Accorded gracious with revolving power,
Maintains them free; and in their happy streets,
Nor cruel deed nor misery is known,

For valour, faith, and innocence of life, 335
Renown'd, a rough laborious people, there,
Not only give the dreadful Alps to smile,
And press their culture on retiring snows;

But, to firm order train'd and patient war,
They likewise know, beyond the nerve reminds
Of mercenary force, how to defend 341
The tasteful little their hard toil has earn'd,
And the proud arm of Bourbon to defy.

Ev'n, cheer'd by me, their shaggy mountains
More than or Gallic, or Italian plains; [charm
And sickening fancy oft, when absent long, 346
Pines to behold their Alpine views again:

The hollow-winding stream: the vale, fair spread,
Amid an amphitheatre of hills; [springs:
Whence, vapour-wing'd, the sudden tempest
From steep to steep ascending, the gay train 351
Of fogs, thick-roll'd into romantic shapes:

The flitting cloud, against the summit dash'd;
And, by the sun illumin'd, pouring bright
A gemmy shower: hung o'er amazing rocks, 355
The mountain ash, and solemn-sounding pine:

The snow-fed torrent, in white mazes tost,
Down to the clear ethereal lake below:
And, high o'er-topping all the broken scene,
The mountain fading into sky; where shines 360
On winter winter shivering, and whose top
Licks from their cloudy magazine the snows.

From these descending, as I wav'd my course
O'er vast Germania, the ferocious nurse
Of hardy men and hearts affronting death, 365
I gave some favour'd cities there to lift
A nobler brow, and through their swarming streets,
More busy, wealthy, cheerful, and alive,
In each contented face to look my soul. 369

Thence the loud Baltic passing, black with storm,
To wintry Scandinavia's utmost bound;
There, I the manly race, the parent-hive
Of the mix'd kingdom's, form'd into a state
More regularly free. By keener air 374
Their genius purg'd, and temper'd hard by frost,
Tempest, and toil their nerves, the sons of those Whose only terror was a bloodless death,
They wise, and dauntless, still sustain my cause.
Yet there I fix'd not. Turning to the south,
The whispering zephyrs sigh'd at my delay. 380
Here with the shifted vision, burst my joy.

"O the dear prospect! O majestic view!
See Britain's empire! lo! the watery vast Wide-waves, diffusing the cerulean plain. 384

"And now, methinks, like clouds at distance seen,
Emerging white from deeps of æther, dawn
My kindred cliffs; whence, wafted in the gale,
Ineffable, a secret sweetness breathes. [flows
"Goddeffs, forgive!—My heart, surpris'd o'er-
"With filial fondness for the land you bless." 390
As parents to a child complacent deign
Approvance, the celestial brightness smil'd;
Then thus: As o'er the wave-resounding deep,
To my near reign, the happy isle, I steer'd
With easy wing; behold! from surge to surge, 395
Stalk'd the tremendous genius of the deep.

Around him clouds, in mingled tempest, hung;
Thick-flashing meteors crown'd his starry head;
And ready thunder redden'd in his hand, 399
Or from it stream'd compressed the gloomy cloud.
Where-e'er he look'd, the trembling waves recoil'd.
He needs but strike the conscious flood, and shook
From shore to shore, in agitation dire,
It works his dreadful will. To me his voice
(Like that hoarse blast that round the cavern howls, Mixt with the murmurs of the falling main)
Address'd, began—By fate commission'd, go,
"My sister-goddeffs now, to yon blest isle,
"Henceforth the partner of my rough domain,
"All my dread walks to Britons open lie. 410
"Those that refulgent, or with rosy morn,
"Or yellow evening, flame; those that, profuse
"Drunk by equator-suns, severely shine;
"Or those that, to the poles approaching, rise
"In billows rolling into Alps of ice. 415
"Ev'n yet untouch'd by daring keel, be theirs
"The vast Pacific; that on other worlds,
"Their future conquest rolls resounding tides.
"Long I maintain'd inviolate my reign;
"Nor Alexander's me, nor Cæsars brav'd. 420
"Still, in the crook of shore, the coward fail
"Till now low-crept; and peddling commerce ply'd
"Between near-joining lands. For Briton's, chief,
"It was reserv'd, with star-directed prow,
"To dare the middle-deep, and drive assur'd 425
"To distant nations through the pathless main,
"Chief, for their fearless hearts the glory waits,
"Long months from land, while the black stormy
"Around them rages, on the groaning mast [night
"With unshook knee to know their giddy way;
"To sing, unquell'd, amid the lashing wave; 431
"To laugh at danger. Theirs the triumph be,
"By deep invention's keen pervading eye,
"The heart of courage, and the hand of toil,
"Each conquer'd ocean staining with their blood,
"Instead of treasure robb'd by ruffian war, 436
"Round social earth to circle fair exchange,
"And bind the nations in a golden chain,
"To these I honour'd stoop. Rushing to light,
"A race of men behold! whose daring deeds 440
"Will in renown exalt my nameless plains
"O'er those of fabling earth, as her's to mine
"In terror yield. Nay, could my savage heart
"Such glories check, their unsubmitting soul
"Would all my fury brave, my tempest climb, 445
"And might in spite of me my kingdom force."
Here, waiting no reply, the shadowy power
Eas'd the dark sky, and to the deeps return'd:
While the loud thunder rattling from his hand,
Auspicious, shook opponent Gallia's shore. 450
Of this encounter glad, my way to land

I quick pursued, that from the smiling sea
 Receiv'd me joyous. Loud acclaims were heard;
 And music, more than mortal, warbling, fill'd
 With pleas'd astonishment the labouring hind, 455
 Who for a while th' unfinish'd furrow left,
 And let the listening steer forget his toil.
 Unseen by grosser eye, Britannia breath'd,
 And her aerial train, these sounds of joy,
 Full of old time, since first the rushing flood, 460
 Urg'd by almighty power, this favour'd isle
 Turn'd flashing from the continent aside,
 Indented shore to shore responsive still,
 Its guardian she—The goddess, whose staid eye
 Beams the dark azure of the doubtful dawn. 465
 Her tresses, like a flood of soften'd light,
 Through clouds imbrown'd, in waving circles play.
 Warm on her cheek sits beauty's brightest rose.
 Of high demeanour, stately, shedding grace
 With every motion. Full her rising chest; 470
 And new ideas, from her finish'd shape,
 Charm'd sculpture taking might improve her art.
 Such the fair guardian of an isle that boasts,
 Profuse as vernal blooms, the fairest dames.
 High-shining on the promontory's brow, 475
 Awaiting me, she stood; with hope inflam'd,
 By my mixt spirit burning in her sons,
 To firm, to polish, and exalt the state.

The native Genii, round her, radiant smil'd.
 Courage of soft deportment, aspect calm, 480
 Unboasting, suffering long, and, till provok'd,
 As mild and harmless as the sporting child;
 But, on just reason, once his fury rous'd,
 No lion springs more eager to his prey:
 Blood is a pastime: and his heart, elate, 485
 Knows no depress — fear. That virtue known
 By the relenting look, whose equal heart
 For others feels, as for another self:
 Of various name, as various objects wake,
 Warm into action, the kind sense within: 490
 Whether the blameless poor, the nobly maim'd,
 The lost to reason, the declin'd in life,
 The helpless young that kiss no mother's hand,
 And the gray second infancy of age,
 She gives in public families to live, 495
 A sight to gladden heav'n! whether she stands
 Fair beckoning at the hospitable gate,
 And bids the stranger take repose and joy:
 Whether, to solace honest labour, she
 Rejoices those that make the land rejoice; 500
 Or whether to philosophy, and arts,
 (At once the basis and the finish'd pride
 Of government and life) she spreads her hand;
 Nor knows her gift profuse, nor seems to know,
 Doubling her bounty, that she gives at all. 505
 Justice to these her awful presence join'd,
 The mother of the state! No low revenge,
 No turbid passions in her breast ferment:
 Tender, serene, compassionate of vice,
 As the last woe that can afflict mankind. 510
 She punishment awards; yet of the good
 More piteous still, and of the suffering whole,
 Awards it firm. So fair her just decree,
 That, in his judging peers, each on himself
 Pronounces his own doom. O, happy land! 515
 Where reigns alone this justice of the free!
 'Mid the bright groupe sincerity his front,
 Diffusive, rear'd; his pure untroubled eye
 The fount of truth. The thoughtful power apart,

Now, pensive, cast on earth his fix'd regard, 520
 Now touch'd celestial, launch'd it on the sky.
 The genius he whence Britain shines supreme,
 The land of light, and rectitude of mind.
 He too the fire of fancy feeds intense,
 With all the train of passions thence deriv'd. 525
 Not kindling quick, a noisy transient blaze,
 But gradual, silent, lasting, and profound.
 Near him retirement, pointing to the shade;
 And independence stood: the generous pair,
 That simple life, the quiet-whispering grove, 530
 And the still raptures of the free-born soul
 To cates prefer by virtue bought, not earn'd,
 Proudly prefer them to the servile pomp,
 And to the heart-embitter'd joys of slaves.
 Or should the latter, to the public scene 535
 Demanded, quit his sylvan friend a while;
 Nought can his firmness shake, nothing seduce
 His zeal, still active for the commonweal;
 Nor stormy tyrants, nor corruption's tools,
 Foul minister's dark-working by the force 540
 Of secret-lapping gold. All their vile arts,
 Their shameful honours, their perfidious gifts,
 He greatly scorns; and, if he must betray
 His plunder'd country, or his power resign,
 A moment's parley were eternal shame: 545
 Illustrious into private life again,
 From dirty levees he unstain'd ascends,
 And firm in senates stands the patriot's ground,
 Or draws new vigour in the peaceful shade.
 Aloof the bashful virtue hover'd coy, 550
 Proving by sweet distrust distrust'd worth.
 Rough labour clos'd the train: and in his hand
 Rude, callous, sinew-swell'd, and black with toil,
 Came manly indignation. Sour he seems,
 And more than seems, by lawful pride assail'd: 555
 Yet kind at heart, and just, and generous, there
 No vengeance lurks, no pale insidious gall:
 Ev'n in the very luxury of rage,
 He softening can forgive a gallant foe;
 The nerve, support, and glory of the land! 560
 Nor be religion, rational and free,
 Here pass'd in silence; whose enraptur'd eye
 Sees heaven with earth connected, human things
 Link'd to divine: who not from servile fear,
 By rites for some weak tyrant incense fit, 565
 The god of love adores, but from a heart
 Effusing gladness, into pleasing awe
 That now astonish'd swells, now in a calm
 Of fearless confidence that smiles serene;
 That lives devotion, one continual hymn, 570
 And then most grateful, when Heav'n's bounty
 Is right enjoy'd. This ever-cheerful power [most O'er the rais'd circle ray'd superior day.

I joy'd to join the virtues whence my reign
 O'er Albion was to rise. Each cheering each, 575
 And, like the circling planets from the sun,
 All borrowing beams from me, a heighten'd zeal
 Impatient fir'd us to commence our toils,
 Or pleasures rather. Long the pungent time
 Pass'd not in mutual hails: but, through the land
 Darting our light, we shone the fogs away. 581
 The virtues conquer with a single look.
 Such grace, such beauty, such victorious light,
 Live in their presence, stream in every glance,
 That the soul won, enamour'd, and refin'd, [585
 Grows their own image, pure ethereal flame.
 Hence the soul demons, that oppose our reign,

Would still from us deluded mortals wrap;
 Or in gross shades they drown the visual ray,
 Or by the fogs of prejudice, where mix. 590
 Falseness and truth confounded, foil the sense
 With vain refracted images of bliss.
 But chief around the court of flatter'd kings
 They roll the dusky rampart, wall o'er wall
 Of darkness pile, and with their thickest shade 595
 Secure the throne. No savage Alp, the den [scene,
 Of wolves, and bears, and monstrous things ob-
 That vex the swain, and waste the country round,
 Protected lies beneath a deeper cloud.
 Yet there we sometimes send a searching ray. 600
 As, at the sacred opening of the morn,
 The prowling race retire; so, pierc'd severe,
 Before our potent blaze these demons fly,
 And all their works dissolve.—The whisper'd tale,
 That, like the fabling Nile, no fountain knows. 605
 Fair-fac'd deceit, whose wily conscious eye
 Ne'er looks direct. The tongue that licks the dust,
 But, when it safely dares, as prompt to sting:
 Smooth crocodile destruction, whose fell tears
 Ensnare. The Janus face of courtly pride; 610
 One to superiors heaves submissive eyes,
 On hapless worth the other souls disdain.
 Cheeks, that for some weak tenderness, alone,
 Some virtuous slip, can wear a blush. The laugh
 Profane, when midnight bowls disclose the heart,
 At starving virtue, and at virtue's fools. 616
 Determin'd to be broke, the plighted faith:
 Nay more, the godless oath, that knows no ties.
 Soft-buzzing slander; silky moths, that eat
 An honest name. The harpy hand, and maw, 620
 Of avaricious luxury; who makes
 The throne his shelter, venal laws his fort,
 And, by his service, who betrays his king. [night
 Now turn your view, and mark from Celtic
 To present grandeur how my Britain rose. 625
 Bold were those Britons, who, the careless sons
 Of nature, roam'd the forest-bounds, at once
 Their verdant city, high-embowering fane,
 And the gay circle of their wood-land wars:
 For by the Druid taught, that death but shifts 630
 The vital scene, they that prime fear despis'd;
 And, prone to rush on steel, disdain'd to spare
 An ill-fav'd life that must again return.
 Erect from nature's hand, by tyrant force,
 And still more tyrant custom, unsubdued. 635
 Man knows no master save creating Heaven,
 Or such as choice and common good ordain.
 This general sense, with which the nations I
 Promiscuous fire, in Britons burn'd intense,
 Of future times prophetic. Witness, Rome, 640
 Who saw't thy Cæsar, from the naked land,
 Whose only fort was British hearts, repell'd,
 To seek Pharsalian wreaths. Witness, the toil,
 The blood of ages, bootless to secure,
 Beneath an empire's yoke, a stubborn isle, 645
 Disputed hard, and never quite subdued. [scorn'd
 The north remain'd untouch'd, where those who
 To stoop, retir'd; and to their keen effort
 Yielding at last, recoil'd the Roman power.
 In vain, unable to sustain the shock, 650
 From sea to sea desponding legions rais'd
 The wall immense, and yet, on summer's eve,
 While sport his lambskins round, the shepherd's
 Continual o'er it burst the northern storm, [gaze,
 As often, check'd, receded; threatening hoar'd 655

A swift return. But the devouring flood
 No more endur'd control, when, to support
 The last remains of empire, was recall'd
 The weary Roman, and the Briton lay
 Unnerv'd, exhausted, spiritless, and sunk. 660
 Great proof! how men enfeeble into slaves.
 The sword behind him flash'd; before him roar'd,
 Deaf to his woes, the deep. Forlorn, around,
 He roll'd his eye, not sparkling ardent flame,
 As when Caractacus to battle led 665
 Silurian swains, and Boadicea taught,
 Her raging troops the miseries of slaves. [hears
 Then (lad relief!) from the bleak coast, that
 The German ocean roar, deep-blooming, strong,
 And yellow-hair'd, the blue-ey'd Saxon came. 670
 He came implor'd, but came with other aim
 Than to protect. For conquest and defence
 Suffices the same arm. With the fierce race
 Pour'd in a fresh invigorating stream;
 Blood, where unquell'd a mighty spirit glow'd. 675
 Rash war, and perilous battle, their delight;
 And immature, and red with glorious wounds
 Unpeaceful death their choice; deriving thence
 A right to feast, and drain immortal bowls
 In Odin's hall; whose blazing roof resounds 680
 The genial uproar of those shades, who fall
 In desperate fight, or by some brave attempt;
 And though more polish'd times the martial creed
 Disown, yet still the fearless habit lives.
 Nor were the surly gifts of war their all. 685
 Wisdom was likewise theirs, indulgent laws,
 The calm gradations of art-nursing peace,
 And matchless orders, the deep basis still
 On which ascends my British reign. Untam'd
 To the refining subtleties of slaves, 690
 They brought an happy government along;
 Form'd by that freedom, which, with secret voice,
 Impartial nature teaches all her sons,
 And which of old through the whole Scythian mass
 I strong inspir'd. Monarchical their state, 695
 But prudently confin'd, and mingled wise
 Of each harmonious pow'r: only, too much
 Imperious war into their rule infus'd,
 Prevail'd their general-king, and chieftain-thanes.
 In many a field, by civil fury stain'd, 700
 Bled the discordant heptarchy; and long
 (Educing good from ill); the battle groan'd;
 Ere, blood-cemented, Anglo-Saxons saw
 Egbert and peace on one united throne.
 No sooner dawn'd the fair disclosing calm 705
 Of brighter days, when, low! the north anew,
 With stormy nations black, on England pour'd
 Woes the severest e'er a people felt.
 The Danish raven, lur'd by annual prey,
 Hung o'er the land incessant. Fleet on fleet 710
 Of barbarous pirates unremitting tore
 The miserable coast. Before them stalk'd,
 Far seen, the demon of devouring flame;
 Rapine, and murder, all with blood besmear'd,
 Without or ear, or eye, or feeling heart; 715
 While close behind them march'd the fallow power
 Of desolating famine who delights
 In grass-grown cities, and in desert fields;
 And purple-spotted pestilence, by whom
 Ev'n friendship scar'd, in sickening horror sinks
 Each social sense and tenderness of life. 721
 Fixing at last, the sanguinary race
 Spread from the Humber's loud-resounding shore,

To where the Thames devolves his gentle maze,
And with superior arm the Saxon aw'd. 725
But superstition first, and monkish dreams,
And monk-directed cloyster-seeking kings,
Had ate away his vigour, ate away
His edge of courage, and depress'd the soul
Of conquering freedom, which he once respir'd.
Thus cruel ages pass'd; and rare appear'd 731
White-mantled peace, exulting o'er the vale,
As when, with Alfred, from the wilds she came
To polic'd cities and protected plains.
Thus by degrees the Saxon empire sunk, 735
Then set entire in Hastings bloody field.

Compendious war! (on Britain's glory bent,
So fate ordain'd) in that decisive day,
The haughty Norman seiz'd at once an isle,
For which, through many a century, in vain, 740
The Roman, Saxon, Dane, had toil'd and bled.
Of Gothic nations this the final burst;
And, mix'd the genius of these people all,
These virtues mix'd in one exalted stream,
Here the rich tide of English blood grew full. 745

Awhile my spirit slept; the land a while,
Affrighted, droop'd beneath despotic rage.
Instead of Edward's equal gentle laws,
The furious victor's partial will prevail'd.
All prostrate lay; and, in the secret shade, 750
Deep-sung, but fearful, indignation gnash'd
His teeth. Of freedom, property, despoil'd,
And of their bulwark, arms; with castles crush'd,
With Russian's quarter'd o'er the bridled land;
The shivering wretches, at the curfew sound, 755
Dejected shrunk into their fordid beds,
And, through the mournful gloom, of ancient times
Muss'd sad, or dreamt of better. Ev'n to feed
A tyrant's idle sport, the peasants starv'd:
To the wild herd, the pasture of the tame, 760
The cheerful hamlet, spiry town, was giv'n,
And the brown forest roughen'd wide around.

But this so dead, so vile submission, long
Endur'd not. Gathering force, my gradual flame
Shook of the mountain of tyrannic sway, 765
Unus'd to bend, impatient of control,
Tyrants themselves the common tyrant check'd.
The church, by kings intractable and fierce,
Deny'd her portion of the plunder'd state,
Or tempted, by the timorous and weak, 770
To gain new ground, first taught their rapine law,
The barons next a nobler league began,
Both those of English and of Norman race,
In one fraternal nation blended now,
The nation of the free! press'd by a band 775
Of patriots, ardent as the summer's noon
That looks delighted on, the tyrant see!
Mark! how with feign'd alacrity he bears
His strong reluctance down, his dark revenge,
And gives the charter, by which life indeed 780
Becomes of price, a glory to be man. [affirm'd]

Through this and through succeeding reigns
These long contested rights, the wholesome winds
Of opposition hence began to blow,
And often since have lent the country life. 785
Before their breath corruptions infect-blights,
The darkening clouds of evil counsel, fly;
Or, should they sounding swell, a putrid court,
A pestilential ministry, they purge, 789
And ventilated states renew their bloom. [mix'd]

Though with the temper'd monarchy here

Aristocratic sway, the people still,
Flatter'd by this or that, as interest lean'd,
No full perfection knew. For me reserv'd,
And for my commons, was that glorious turn. 795
They crown'd my first attempt, in senates rose,
The fort of freedom! flow till then, alone,
Had work'd that general liberty, that soul, [left
Which generous nature breathes, and which when
By me to bondage was corrupted Rome, 800
I through the northern nations wide diffus'd.
Hence many a people, fierce with freedom, rush'd
From the rude iron regions of the north,
To Libyan deserts swarm protruding swarm, 804
And pour'd new spirit through a slavish world.
Yet, o'er these Gothic states, the king and chiefs
Retain'd the high prerogative of war,
And with enormous property engros'd
The mingled power. But on Britannia's shore
Now present, I to raise my reign began 810
By raising the democracy, the third
And broadest bulwark of the guarded state.
Then was the full, the perfect plan disclos'd
Of Britain's matchless constitution, mixt
Of mutual checking and supporting powers, 815
King, Lords, and Commons; nor the name of free
Deserving, while the vassal-many droop'd:
For since the moment of the whole they form,
So, as depress'd or rais'd, the balance they
Of public welfare and of glory cast. 820
Mark from this period the continual proof.

When kings of narrow genius, minion-rid,
Neglecting faithful worth for fawning slaves;
Proudly regardless of their people's plaints,
And poorly passive of insulting foes; 825
Double, not prudent, obstinate, not firm,
Their mercy fear, necessity their faith;
Instead of generous fire, presumptuous, hot,
Rash to resolve, and slothful to perform;
Tyrants at once and slaves, imperious, mean, 830
To want rapacious joining shameful waste;
By counsels weak and wicked, easy rous'd
To paltry schemes of absolute command,
To seek their splendor in their sure disgrace,
And in a broken ruin'd people wealth: 835
When such o'ercast the state, no bond of love,
No heart, no soul, no unity, no nerve,
Combin'd the loose disjointed public, lost
To fame abroad, to happiness at home. 839

But when an Edward and an Henry breath'd
Through the charm'd whole one all exerting soul:
Drawn sympathetic from his dark retreat,
When wide-attracted merit round them glow'd:
When counsels just, extensive, generous, firm,
Amid the maze of state, determin'd kept 845
Some ruling point in view: when on the stock
Of public good and glory grafted, spread
Their palms, their laurels; or, if thence they stray'd,
Swift to return, and patient of restraint:
When regal state, pre-eminence of place, 850
They scorn'd to deem pre-eminence of ease,
To be luxurious drones, that only rob
The busy hive: as in distinction, power,
Indulgence, honour, and advantage, first;
When they too claim'd in virtue, danger, toil, 855
Superior rank; with equal hand, prepar'd
To guard the subject, and to quell the foe:
When such with me their vital influence shed,
No mutter'd grievance, hopeless sigh was heard;

No foul distrust through wary senates ran, 860
 Confin'd their bounty, and their ardour quench'd:
 On aid, unquestion'd, liberal aid was given:
 Safe in their conduct, by their valour fir'd,
 Fond where they led victorious armies rush'd;
 And Cressly, Poitiers, Agincourt proclaim 865
 What kings supported by almighty love,
 And people fir'd with liberty, can do.
 Be veil'd the savage reigns, when kindred rage
 The numerous once Plantagenets devour'd,
 A race to vengeance vow'd! and when, oppress'd
 By private feuds, almost extinguish'd lay 871
 My quivering flame. But, in the next, behold!
 A cautious tyrant lend it oil anew.

Proud, dark, suspicious, brooding o'er his gold,
 As how to fix his throne he jealous cast 875
 His crafty views around; pierc'd with a ray,
 Which on his timid mind I darted full.
 He mark'd the barons of excessive sway,
 At pleasure making and unmaking kings;
 And hence, to crush these petty tyrants, plann'd 880
 A law, that let them, by the silent waste
 Of luxury, their landed wealth diffuse,
 And with that wealth their implicated power.
 By soft degrees a mighty change ensued, 884
 Ev'n working to this day. With streams, deduc'd
 From these diminish'd floods, the country smil'd.
 As when impetuous from the snow-heap'd Alps,
 To vernal suns relenting, pours the Rhine;
 While undivided, oft, with wasteful sweep,
 He foams along; but, through Batavian meads 890
 Branch'd into fair canals, indulgent flows;
 Waters a thousand fields; and culture, trade,
 Towns, meadows, gliding ships, and villas mix'd,
 A rich, a wondrous landskip rises round.

His furious son the soul-enslaving chain, 895
 Which many a doating venerable age
 Had link by link strong-twisted round the land,
 Shook off. No longer could be borne a power;
 From heaven pretended, to deceive, to void
 Each solemn tie, to plunder without bounds, 900
 To curb the generous soul, to fool mankind;
 And, wild at last, to plunge into a sea
 Of blood and horror. The returning light,
 That first through Wickliff streak'd the priestly
 Now burst in open day. Bar'd to the blaze, [gloom,
 Forth from the haunts of superstition crawl'd 906
 Her motly sons, fantastic figures all;
 And, wide-dispers'd, their useless fetid wealth
 In graceful labour bloom'd, and fruits of peace.

Trade, join'd to these, on every sea display'd
 A daring canvas, pour'd with every tide 911
 A golden flood. From other worlds were roll'd
 The guilty glittering stores, whose fatal charms,
 By the plain Indian happily despis'd,
 Yet work'd his woe; and to the blissful groves,
 Where nature liv'd herself among her sons 916
 And innocence and joy for ever dwelt,
 Drew rage unknown to Pagan climes before,
 The worst the zeal inflam'd barbarian drew.
 Be no such horrid commerce, Britain, thine! 920
 But want for want, with mutual aid, supply.

The commons thus enrich'd, and powerful
 Against the barons weigh'd. Eliza then, [grown,
 Amid these doubtful motions, steady, gave
 The beam to fix. She! like the secret eye 925
 That never closes on a guarded world,
 Se sought, so mark'd, so seiz'd the public good,

That self-supported, without one ally,
 She aw'd her inward, quell'd her circling foes.
 Inspir'd by me, beneath her sheltering arm, 930
 In spite of raging universal sway,
 And raging seas repress'd, the Belgic states,
 My bulwark on the continent, arose.
 Matchless in all the spirit of her days!
 With confidence, unbounded, fearless love 935
 Elate, her fervent people waited gay,
 Cheerful demanded the long-threaten'd fleet,
 And dash'd the pride of Spain around their isle.
 Nor ceas'd the British thunder here to rage:
 The deep, reclaim'd, obey'd its awful call; 940
 In fire and smoke Iberian ports involv'd,
 The trembling foe ev'n to the centre shook
 Of their new-conquer'd world, and skulking stole
 By veering winds their Indian treasure home.
 Meantime, peace, plenty, justice, science, arts, 945
 With softer laurels crown'd her happy reign.

As yet uncircumscrib'd the regal power,
 And wild and vague prerogative remain'd,
 A wide voracious gulf, where swallow'd oft
 The helpless subject lay. This to reduce 950
 To the just limit was my great effort.

By means, that evil seem to narrow man,
 Superior beings work their mystic will;
 From storm and trouble thus a settled calm,
 At last, effulgent, o'er Britannia smil'd. 955

The gathering tempest, heaven-commission'd,
 Came,
 Came in the prince, who, drunk with flattery,
 His vain pacific counsels rul'd the world; [dreamt
 Though scorn'd abroad, bewilder'd in a maze
 Of fruitless treaties; while at home enslav'd, 960
 And by a worthless crew insatiate drain'd,
 He lost his people's confidence and love:
 Irreparable loss! whence crowns become
 An anxious burden. Years inglorious pass'd:
 Triumphant Spain the vengeful draught enjoy'd:
 Abandon'd Frederick pin'd, and Raleigh bled. 966
 But nothing that to these internal broils,
 That rancour, he began; while lawless sway
 He, with his slavish doctors, try'd to rear
 On metaphysic, on enchanted ground 970
 And all the mazy quibbles of the schools:
 As if for one, and sometimes for the worst,
 Heaven had mankind in vengeance only made.
 Vain the pretence! not so the dire effect,
 The fierce, the foolish discord thence deriv'd 975
 That tears the country still, by party-rage
 And ministerial clamour kept alive.

In action weak, and for the wordy war
 Best fitted, faint this prince pursued his claim:
 Content to teach the subject-herd, how great, 980
 How sacred he! how despicable they!

But his unyielding son these doctrines drank,
 With all a bigot's rage (who never damps
 By reasoning his fire); and what they taught
 Warm, and tenacious, into practice push'd. 985
 Senates, in vain, their kind restraint apply'd:
 The more they struggled to support the laws,
 His justice-dreading ministers the more [check
 Drove him beyond their bounds. Tir'd with the
 Of faithful love, and with the flattery pleas'd 990
 Of false-designing guilt, the fountain he
 Of public wisdom and of justice shut.
 Wide mourn'd the land. Strait to the voted aid
 Free, cordial, large, of never-failing source,

'Th' illegal imposition follow'd harsh, 995
 With execration given, or ruthless squeeze'd
 From an insulted people, by a band
 Of the worst ruffians, those of tyrant power.
 Oppression walk'd at large, and pour'd abroad
 Her unrelenting train: informers, spies, 1000
 Blood-hounds, that sturdy freedom to the grove
 Pursue; projectors of aggrrieving schemes
 Commerce to load for unprotected seas,
 To sell the starving many to the few, 1004
 And drain a thousand ways th' exhausted land.
 Ev'n from that healing place, whence peace should
 And gospel truth, inhuman bigots shed [flow,
 Their poison round; and on the venal bench,
 Instead of justice, party held the scale,
 And violence the sword. Afflicted years, 1010
 Too patient, felt at last their vengeance full.
 Mid the low murmurs of submissive fear
 And mingled rage, my Hambden rais'd his voice,
 And to the laws appeal'd; the laws no more
 In judgment sat, behov'd some other ear. 1015
 When instant from the keen resentive north,
 By long oppression by religion rous'd,
 The guardian army came. Beneath its wing
 Was call'd, though meant to furnish hostile aid,
 The more than Roman senate. There a flame 1020
 Broke out, that clear'd, consum'd, renew'd the land.
 In deep emotion hurl'd, nor Greece, nor Rome,
 Indignant bursting from a tyrant's chain,
 While, full of me, each agitated soul
 Strung every nerve, and flam'd in every eye, 1025
 Had e'er beheld such light and heat combin'd!
 Such heads and hearts! such dreadful zeal, led on
 By calm majestic wisdom, taught its course
 What nuisance to devour; such wisdom fir'd
 With unabating zeal, and aim'd sincere 1030
 To clear the weedy state, restore the laws,
 And for the future to secure their sway.

This then the purpose of my mildest sons.
 But man is blind. A nation once inflam'd
 (Chief, should the breath of factious fury blow,
 With the wild rage of mad enthusiast swell'd) 1036
 Not easy cools again. From breast to breast,
 From eye to eye, the kindling passions mix
 In heighten'd blaze; and, ever wise and just,
 High Heaven to gracious ends directs the storm.
 Thus to one conflagration Britain wrapt, 1041
 And by confusion's lawless sons despoil'd, [ground,
 King, Lords, and Commons, thundering to the Successive, rush'd—Lo! from their ashes rose,
 Gay-beaming radiant youth, the Phoenix-state.

The grievous yoke of vassalage, the yoke 1046
 Of private life, lay by those flames dissolv'd;
 And, from the wasteful, the luxurious king, [bend.
 Was purchas'd that which taught the young to Stronger restor'd, the Commons tax'd the whole,
 And built on that eternal rock their power. 1051
 The crown, of its hereditary wealth
 Despoil'd, on senates more dependent grew,
 And they more frequent, more assur'd. Yet liv'd,
 And in full vigour spread that bitter root, 1055
 The passive doctrines, by their patrons first
 Oppos'd ferocious, when they touch themselves.
 This wild delusive cant; the rash cabal
 Of hungry courtiers, ravenous for prey;
 The bigot, restless in a double chain 1060
 To bind anew the land; the constant need
 Of finding faithless means, of shifting forms,

And flattering senates, to supply his waste;
 These tore some moments from the careless prince,
 And in his breast awak'd the kindred plan. 1065
 By dangerous softness long he min'd his way;
 By subtle arts, dissimulation deep;
 By sharing what corruption shower'd, profuse;
 By breathing wide the gay licentious plague;
 And pleasing manners, fitted to deceive. 1070

At last subsided the delirious joy,
 On whose high billow, from the faintly reign
 The nation drove too far. A pension'd king,
 Against his country brib'd by Gallic gold;
 The port pernicious fold, the Scylla since, 1075
 And fell Charybdis of the British seas;
 Freedom attack'd abroad, with suter blow
 To cut it off at home; the saviour-league
 Of Europe broke; the progress ev'n advanc'd
 Of universal sway, which to reduce 1080
 Such seas of blood and treasure Britain cost;
 The millions, by a generous people given,
 Or squander'd vile, or to corrupt, disgrace,
 And awe the land with forces not their own, 1084
 Employ'd; the darling church herself betray'd;
 All these, broad glaring, op'd the general eye,
 And wak'd my spirit, the resisting soul.

Mild was, at first, and half asham'd, the check
 Of senates, shook from the fantastic dream
 Of absolute submission, tenets vile! 1090
 Which slaves would blush to own, and which,
 To practice, always honest nature shock. [reduc'd
 Not ev'n the mask remov'd, and the fierce front
 Of tyranny disclos'd; nor trampled laws;
 Nor seiz'd each badge of freedom through the land;
 For Sidney bleeding for th' unpublish'd page;
 Nor on the bench avow'd corruption plac'd,
 And murderous rage itself, in Jefferies' form;
 Nor endless acts of arbitrary power,
 Cruel and false, could raise the public arm. 1100
 Distrustful, scatter'd, of combining chiefs
 Devoid, and dreading blind rapacious war,
 The patient public turns not till impell'd
 To the near verge of ruin. Hence I rous'd
 The bigot king, and hurried fated on 1105
 His measures immature. But chief his zeal,
 Out-flaming Rome herself, portentous fear'd
 The troubled nation: Mary's horrid days
 To fancy bleeding rose, and the dire glare
 Of Smithfield lighten'd in its eyes anew. 1110
 Yet silence reign'd. Each on another scowl'd
 Rueful amazement, pressing down his rage:
 As, mustering vengeance, the deep thunder frowns,
 Awfully still, waiting the high command
 To spring. Strait from his country Europe sav'd,
 To save Britannia, lo! my darling son, 1116
 Than hero more! the patriot of mankind!
 Immortal Nassau came. I hush'd the deep,
 By demons rous'd, and bade the lifted winds,
 Still shifting as behov'd, with various breath, 1120
 Waft the deliverer to the longing shore.
 See! wide alive, the foaming channel bright
 With swelling sails, and all the pride of war,
 Delightful view! when justice draws the sword:
 And, mark! diffusing ardent soul around, 1125
 And sweet contempt of death, my streaming flag.
 Ev'n adverse navies bless'd the binding gale,
 Kept down the glad acclaim, and silent joy'd.
 Arriv'd, the pomp, and not the waste of arms
 His progress mark'd. The faint opposing host 1130

For once, in yielding, their best victory found,
And by desertion prov'd exalted faith;
While his the bloodless conquest of the heart,
Shouts without groan, and triumph without war.

Then dawn'd the period destin'd to confine
The surge of wild prerogative, to raise 1136
A mound restraining its imperious rage,
And bid the raving deep no farther flow.
Nor were, without that fence, the swallow'd state
Better than Belgian plains without their dikes,
Sustaining weighty seas. This, often sav'd 1141
By more than human hand, the public saw, [yield
And seiz'd the white-wing'd moment. Pleas'd to Destructive power, a wise heroic prince
Ev'n lent his aid—Thrice happy! did they know
Their happiness, Britannia's bounded kings. 1146
What though not theirs the boast, in dungeon
glooms,

To plunge bold freedom; or, to cheerless wilds,
To drive him from the cordial face of friend;
Or fierce to strike him at the midnight hour, 1150
By mandate blind, not justice, that delights
To dare the keenest eye of open day.

What though no glory to controul the laws,
And make injurious will their only rule, [power,
They deem it! what though, tools of wanton
Pestiferous armies swarm not at their call! 1156
What though they give not a relentless crew
Of civil furies, proud oppression's fangs!

To tear at pleasure the dejected land,
With starving labour pampering idle waste. 1160

To clothe the naked, feed the hungry, wipe
The guiltless tear from lone affliction's eye;
To raise hid merit, set th' alluring light

Of virtue high to view; to nourish arts,
Direct the thunder of an injur'd state, 1165

Make a whole glorious people sing for joy,
Bless human kind, and through the downward
Of future times to spread that better sun [depth

Which lights up British soul! for deeds like these,
The dazzling fair career unbounded lies; 1170

While, (still superior bliss!) the dark abrupt
Is kindly barr'd, the precipice of ill.

Oh, luxury divine! O, poor to this,
Ye giddy glories of despotic thrones!

By this, by this indeed, is imagin'd Heaven, 1175
By boundless good, without the power of ill.

And now behold! exalted as the cope
That swells immense o'er many peopled earth,
And like it free, my fabric stands complete,

The palace of the laws. To the four heavens 1180
Four gates impartial thrown, unceasing crowds,
With kings themselves the hearty peasant mix'd

Pour urgent in. And though to different ranks
Responsive place belongs, yet equal spreads 1184

The sheltering roof o'er all; while plenty flows,
And glad contentment echoes round the whole,

Ye floods, descend! ye winds, confirming, blow!
Nor outward tempest, nor corrosive time,

Nought but the felon undermining hand
Of dark corruption, can its frame dissolve, 1190

And lay the toil of ages in the dust.

On the contrary, all who gave themselves to warlike actions and enterprises, to the conquest of their neighbours and the slaughter of their enemies, and died in battle, or of violent deaths upon bold adventures or resolutions, went immediately to the vast hall or palace of Odin, their god of war, who eternally kept open house for all such guests, where they were entertained at infinite tables, in perpetual feasts and mirth, carousing in bowls made of the skulls of their enemies they had slain; according to the number of whom, every one in these mansions of pleasure was the most honoured and best entertained.

The whole concluded with a prospect of future times, given by the Goddess of Liberty: this described by the Author, as it passes in vision before him.

HERE interposing, as the goddesses paused;—

" Oh, blest Britannia! in thy presence blest,
" Thon guardian of mankind! whence spring
" alone,

" All human grandeur, happiness, and fame:

" For toil, by thee protected, feels no pain;

" The poor man's lot with milk and honey flows:

" And, gilded with thy rays, ev'n death looks gay.

" Let other lands the potent blessing boast

" Of more exalting funs. Let Asia's woods,

" Untended, yield the vegetable fleece: 10

" And let the little insect-artist form,

" On higher life intent, its filken tomb.

" Let wondering rocks, in radiant birth, disclose,

" The various-tinctur'd children of the sun.

" From the prone beam let more delicious fruits 15

" A flavour drink, that in one piercing taste

" Bids each combine. Let Gallic vineyards burst

" With floods of joy; with mild balsamic juice

" The Tuscan olive. Let Arabia breathe

" Her spicy gales, her vital gums distil. 20

" Turbid with gold let southern rivers flow; [maze.

" And orient floods draw soft, o'er pearls, their

" Let Africa vaunt her treasures; let Peru

" Deep in her bowels her own ruin breed

" The yellow traitor that her bliss betray'd,— 25

" Unequall'd bliss!—and to unequall'd rage!

" Yet nor the gorgeous east, nor golden south,

" Nor, in full prime, that new-discover'd world,

" Where flames the falling day, in wealth and

" praise,

" Shall with Britannia vie, while, Goddess, she 30

" Derives her praise from thee, her matchless

" charms.

" Her hearty fruits the hand of freedom own;

" And, warm with culture, her thick clustering

" fields

" Prolific teem. Eternal verdure crowns

" Her meads; her gardens smile eternal spring. 35

" She gives the hunter-horse, unquell'd by toil,

" Ardent, to rush into the rapid chase:

" She, whitening o'er her downs, diffusive, pours

" Unnumber'd flocks: she weaves the fleecy robe,

" That wraps the nations: she, to lusty droves, 40

" The richest pasture spreads; and, hers, deep-

" wave

" Autumnal seas of pleasing plenty round.

" These her delights: and by no baneful herb,

" No darting tiger, no grim lion's glare,

" No fierce-descending wolf, no serpent roll'd 45

" In spires immense progressive o'er the land,

" Disturb'd. Enlivening these, add cities, full

" Of wealth, of trade, of cheerful toiling crowds;

" Add thriving towns; add villages and farms,

PART V. THE PROSPECT.

Contents.

THE Author addresses the Goddess of Liberty, marking the happiness and grandeur of Great Britain, as arising from her influence; to ver. 58. She resumes her discourse, and points out the chief virtues which are necessary to maintain her establishment there; to ver. 374. Re-

" Wind through the mead ; and those of modern
 " hand,
 " More pompous, add, that splendid shine afar. 55
 " Need I her limpid lakes, her rivers name,
 " Where swarm the finny race ? Thee, chief, O
 " Thames !
 " On whose each tide, glad with returning sails,
 " Flows in the mingled harvest of mankind ? 59
 " And thee, thou Severn, whose prodigious swell,
 " And waves, resounding, imitate the main ?
 " Why need I name her deep capacious ports,
 " That point around the world ? and why her seas ?
 " All ocean is her own, and every land
 " To whom her ruling thunder ocean bears. 65
 " She too the mineral feeds : th' obedient lead,
 " The warlike iron, nor the peaceful less,
 " Forming of life art-civiliz'd the bond ;
 " And that the Tyrian merchant sought of old,
 " Not dreaming then of Britain's brighter fame.
 " She rears to freedom an undaunted race : 71
 " Compatriot, zealous, hospitable, kind,
 " Hers the warm Cambrian : hers the lofty Scot,
 " To hardship tam'd, active in arts and arms,
 " Fir'd with a restless, an impatient flame, 75
 " That leads him raptur'd where ambition calls :
 " And English merit hers ; where meet, combin'd,
 " Whate'er high fancy, sound judicious thought,
 " An ample generous heart, undrooping soul,
 " And firm tenacious valour can bestow. 80
 " Great nurse of fruits, of flocks, of commerce,
 " She ! [taught,
 " Great nurse of men ! By thee, O Goddess,
 " Her old renown I trace, disclose her source
 " Of wealth, of grandeur, and to Britons sing
 " A strain the muses never touch'd before." 85
 " But how shall this thy mighty kingdom stand ?
 " On what unyielding base ? how finish'd shine ?"
 " At this her eye, collecting all its fire,
 " Beam'd more than human ; and her awful voice,
 " Majestic thus she rais'd—" To Britons bear 90
 " This closing strain, and with intenser note
 " Loud let it sound in their awaken'd ear."
 " On virtue can alone my kingdom stand,
 " On public virtue, every virtue join'd.
 " For, lost this social cement of mankind, 95
 " The greatest empires, by scarce-felt degrees,
 " Will moulder soft away ; till, tottering loose,
 " They prone at last to total ruin rush.
 " Unblest by virtue, government a league
 " Becomes, a circling junto of the great, 100
 " To rob by law ; religion mild a yoke
 " To tame the stooping soul, a trick of state
 " To mask their rapine, and to share the prey.
 " What are without it senates, save a face
 " Of consultation deep and reason free, 105
 " While the determin'd voice and heart are sold ?
 " What boasted freedom, save a sounding name ?
 " And what election, but a market vile
 " Of slaves self-barter'd ? Virtue ! without thee,
 " There is no ruling eye, no nerve, in states ; 110
 " War has no vigour, and no safety peace :
 " Ev'n justice warps to party, laws oppress,
 " Wide through the land their weak protection fails,
 " First broke the balance, and then scorn'd the
 " sword.
 " Thus nations sink, society dissolves ; 115
 " Rapine and guile and violence break loose,

Everting life, and turning love to gaul ;
 Man hates the face of man, and Indian woods
 And Libya's hissing sands to him are tame.
 By those three virtues be the frame sustain'd
 Of British freedom : Independent life ; 121
 Integrity in office ; and o'er all
 Supreme, a passion for the commonweal. [gift
 Hail ! Independence, hail ! Heaven's next best
 To that of life and an immortal soul ! 125
 The life of life ! that to the banquet high
 And sober meal gives taste ; to the bow'd roof
 Fair-dream'd repose, and to the cottage charms.
 Of public freedom, hail, thou secret source !
 Whose streams, from every quarter confluent, form
 My better Nile, that nurses human life. 131
 By rills from thee deduc'd, irriguous, fed,
 The private field looks gay, with nature's wealth
 Abundant flows, and blooms with each delight
 That nature craves. Its happy master there, 135
 The only free-man, walks his pleasing round :
 Sweet-featur'd peace attending ; fearless truth ;
 Firm resolution ; goodness, blessing all
 That can rejoice ; contentment, surest friend ;
 And, still fresh stores from nature's book deriv'd,
 Philosophy, companion ever-new. 141
 These cheer his rural, and sustain or fire,
 When into action call'd, his busy hours.
 Meantime true judging moderate desire,
 Oeconomy and taste, combin'd, direct 145
 His clear affairs, and from debauching fiends
 Secure his little kingdom. Nor can those Whom fortune heaps, without these virtues, reach
 That truce with pain, that animated ease,
 That self enjoyment springing from within ; 150
 That independence, active, or retir'd,
 Which make the soundest bliss of man below :
 But, lost beneath the rubbish of their means,
 And drain'd by wants to nature all unknown,
 A wandering, tasteless, gaily-wretched train, 155
 Though rich, are beggars, and, though noble,
 slaves.
 Lo ! damn'd to wealth, at what a gross expence,
 They purchase disappointment, pain, and shame.
 Instead of hearty, hospitable cheer,
 See how the hall with brutal riot flows ; 160
 While in the foaming flood, fermenting, steep'd,
 The country maddens into party-rage.
 Mark those disgraceful piles of wood and stone ;
 Those parks and gardens, where, his haunts betrimm'd,
 And nature by presumptuous art oppress'd, 165
 The woodland genius mourns. See ! the full board
 That steams disgust, and bowls that give no joy ;
 No truth invited there, to feed the mind ;
 Nor wit, the wine rejoicing reason quaffs.
 Hark ! how the dome with insolence resounds, 170
 With those retain'd by vanity to scare
 Repose and friends. To tyrant fashion mark
 The costly worship paid, to the broad gaze
 Of fools. From still delusive day to day,
 Led an eternal round of lying hope, 175
 See ! self-abandon'd, how they roam adrift,
 Dash'd o'er the town, a miserable wreck !
 Then to adore some warbling eunuch turn'd,
 With Midas' ears they crowd ; or to the buz
 Of masquerade unblushing ; or, to show 180
 Their scorn of nature, at the tragic scene

They mirthful sit, or prove the comic true.
 But, chief, behold ! around the rattling board,
 The civil robbers rang'd ; and ev'n the fair,
 The tender fair, each sweetness laid aside, 185
 As fierce for plunder as all-licens'd troops
 In some sack'd city. Thus dissolv'd their wealth,
 Without one generous luxury dissolv'd,
 Or quarter'd on it many a needless want,
 At the throng'd levee bends the venal tribe : 190
 With fair but faithless smiles each varnish'd o'er,
 Each smooth as those that mutually deceive,
 And for their falsehood each despising each ;
 Till shook their patron by the wintry winds,
 Wide flies the wither'd shower, and leaves him bare.
 O, far superior Afric's sable sons, 196
 By merchant pilfer'd, to these willing slaves !
 And, rich, as unsqueez'd favourite, to them,
 Is he who can his virtue boast alone !
 Britons ! be firm !—nor let corruption fly 200
 Twine round your heart indissoluble chains !
 The steel of Brutus burst the grosser bonds
 By Cæsar cast o'er Rome ; but still remain'd
 The soft enchanting fetters of the mind,
 And other Cæsars rose. Determin'd, hold 205
 Your independence ; for, that once destroy'd,
 Unfounded, freedom is a morning dream,
 That flits aerial from the spreading eye.
 Forbid it Heaven ! that ever I need urge
 Integrity in office on my sons ! 210
 Inculcate common honour—not to rob—
 And whom ?—The gracious, the confiding hand,
 That lavishly rewards ; the toiling poor,
 Whose cup with many a bitter drop is mixt ;
 The guardian public : every face they see, 215
 And every friend ; nay, in effect, themselves.
 As in familiar life, the villain's fate
 Admits no cure ; so, when a desperate age
 At this arrives, I the devoted race
 Indignant spurn, and hopeless soar away. 220
 But, ah, too little known to modern times !
 Be not the noblest passion past unsung ;
 That ray peculiar from unbounded love
 Effus'd, which kindles the heroic soul ;
 Devotion to the public. Glorious flame ! 225
 Celestial ardour ! in what unknown worlds,
 Profusely scatter'd through the blue immense,
 Hast thou been blessing myriads, since in Rome,
 Old virtuous Rome, so many deathless names
 From thee their lustre drew ? since, taught by thee, 230
 Their poverty put splendor to the blush,
 Pain grew luxurious, and ev'n death delight ?
 O, wilt thou ne'er, in thy long period, look,
 With blaze direct, on this my last retreat ?
 'Tis not enough, from self right understood 235
 Reflected, that thy rays inflame the heart :
 Though virtue not disdains appeals to self,
 Dreads not the trial ; all her joys are true,
 Nor is there any real joy save hers.
 Far less the tepid, the declaiming race, 240
 Foes to corruption, to its wages friends,
 Or those whom private passions, for a while,
 Beneath my standard list, can they suffice
 To raise and fix the glory of my reign ?
 An active flood of universal love 245
 Must swell the breast. First, in effusion wide,
 The restless spirit roves creation round,

And seizes every being : stronger then
 It tends to life, whate'er the kindred search
 Of bliss allys : then, more collected still, 250
 It urges human-kind : a passion grown,
 At last, the central parent-public calls
 Its utmost effort forth, awakes each sense,
 The comely, grand, and tender. Without this,
 This awful pant, shook from sublimer powers 255
 Than those of self, this heaven-infus'd delight,
 This mortal gravitation, rushing prone
 To press the public good, my system soon,
 Traverse, to several selfish centres drawn,
 Will reel to ruin : while for ever shut 260
 Stand the bright portals of desponding fame.
 From sordid self shoot up no shining deeds,
 None of those ancient lights, that gladden earth,
 Give grace to being, and arouse the brave
 To just ambition, virtue's quickening fire ! 265
 Life tedious grows, an idly-bustling round,
 Fill'd up with actions animal and mean,
 A dull gazette ! Th' impatient reader scorns
 The poor historic page ; till kindly comes
 Oblivion, and redeems a people's shame. 270
 Not so the times, when, emulation-stung,
 Greece shone in genius, science, and in arts,
 And Rome in virtues dreadful to be told !
 To live was glory then ! and charm'd mankind
 Through the deep periods of devolving time, 275
 Those, raptur'd, copy ; these, astonish'd, read.
 True, a corrupted state, with every vice
 And every meanness foul, this passion damps.
 Who can, unshock'd, behold the cruel eye ?
 The pale inveigling smile ? the ruffian front ? 280
 The wretch abandon'd to relentless self,
 Equally vile if miser or profuse ?
 Powers not of God, assiduous to corrupt ?
 The fell deputed tyrant, who devours
 The poor and weak at distance from redress ? 285
 Delirious faction bellowing loud my name ?
 The false fair-seeming patriot's hollow boast ?
 A race resolv'd on bondage, fierce for chains,
 My sacred rights a merchandise alone
 Esteeming, and to work their feeder's will 290
 By deeds, a horror to mankind, prepar'd,
 As were the dregs of Romulus of old ?
 Who these indeed can undetesting see !—
 But who unpitying ? To the generous eye
 Distress is virtue ; and, though self-betray'd, 295
 A people struggling with their fate must rouse
 The hero's throb. Nor can a land, at once
 Be lost to virtue quite. How glorious then !
 Fit luxury for gods ! to save the good,
 Protect the feeble, dash bold vice aside, 300
 Depress the wicked, and restore the frail.
 Posterity, besides, the young are pure,
 And sons may tinge their father's cheek with shame.
 Should then the times arrive (which heaven avert !)
 That Britons bend unnerv'd, not by the force 305
 Of arms, more generous, and more manly quell'd,
 But by corruption's soul-dejecting arts,
 Arts impudent and gross ! by their own gold,
 In part bestow'd, to bribe them to give all.
 With party raging, or immers'd in sloth, 310
 Should they Britannia's well-fought laurels yield
 To sily-conquering Gaul ; ev'n from her brow
 Let her own naval oak be basely torn,

By such as tremble at the stiffening gale,
 And nerveless sink while others sing rejoic'd. 315
 Or (darker prospect! scarce one gleam behind Disclosing) should the broad corruptive plague
 Breathe from the city to the farthest hut,
 That sits serene within the forest-shade;
 The fever'd people fire, inflame their wants, 320
 And their luxurious thirst, so gathering rage,
 That, were a buyer found, they stand prepar'd
 To sell their birthright for a cooling draught.
 Should shameless pens for plain corruption plead;
 The hir'd assassins of the commonweal! 325
 Deem'd the declaiming rant of Greece and Rome,
 Should public virtue grow the public scoff,
 Till private, failing, staggers through the land:
 Till round the city loose mechanic want,
 Dire-prowling nightly, makes the cheerful haunts
 Of men more hideous than Numidian wilds, 331
 Nor from its fury sleeps the vale in peace;
 And murders, horrors, perjuries abound:
 Nay, till to lowest deeds the highest stoop;
 The rich, like starving wretches, thirst for gold;
 And those, on whom the vernal showers of heaven
 All bounteous fall, and that prime lot bestow,
 A power to live to nature and themselves,
 In sick attendance wear their anxious days,
 With fortune, joyless, and with honours, mean.
 Meantime, perhaps, profusion flows around, 341
 The waste of war, without the works of peace;
 No mark of millions in the gulf absorpt
 Of uncreating vice, none but the rage
 Of rous'd corruption still demanding more. 345
 That very portion, which (by faithful skill
 Employ'd) might make the smiling public rear
 Her ornamented head, drill'd through the hands
 Of mercenary tools, serves but to nurse
 A locust-band within, and in the bud 350
 Leaves starv'd each work of dignity and use.

I paint the worst. But should these times arrive,
 If any nobler passion yet remain,
 Let all my sons all parties sling aside,
 Despise their nonsense, and together join; 355
 Let worth and virtue scorning low despair,
 Exerted full, from every quarter shine,
 Commix'd in heighten'd blaze. Light flash'd to Moral, or intellectual, more intense [light,
 By giving glows. As on pure winter's eve, 360
 Gradual, the stars effulge; fainter, at first,
 They, straggling, rise; but when the radiant host,
 In thick profusion pour'd, shine out immense,
 Each casting vivid influence on each,
 From pole to pole a glittering deluge plays, 365
 And worlds above rejoice, and men below.

But why to Britons this superfluous strain?—
 Good-nature, honest truth ev'n somewhat blunt,
 Of crooked baseness and indignant scorn,
 A zeal unyielding in their country's cause, 370
 And ready bounty, wont to dwell with them—
 Nor only want—Wide o'er the land diffus'd,
 In many a blest retirement still they dwell.

To softer prospect turn we now the view,
 To laurell'd science, arts, and public works, 375
 That lend my finish'd fabric comely pride,
 Grandeur, and grace. Of sullen genius he!
 Curs'd by the muses! by the graces loath'd!
 Who deems beneath the public's high regard
 These last enlivening touches of my reign. 380

However puff'd with power, and gorg'd with
 A nation be; let trade enormous rise, [wealth,
 Let east and south their mingled treasure pour,
 Till, swell'd impetuous, the corrupting flood
 Burst o'er the city, and devour the land: 385
 Yet these neglected, these recording arts,
 Wealth rots, a nuisance; and, oblivious sunk,
 That nation must another Carthage lie.
 If not by them, on monumental brass,
 On sculptur'd marble, on the deathless page, 390
 Imprest, renown had left no trace behind:
 In vain, to future times, the sage had thought,
 The legislator plann'd, the hero found
 A beauteous death, the patriot toil'd in vain.
 Th' awarders they of fame's immortal wreath, 395
 They rouse ambition, they the mind exalt,
 Give great ideas, lovely forms infuse,
 Delight the general eye, and, dress'd by them,
 The moral Venus glows with double charms.

Science, my close associate, still attends 400
 Where'er I go. Sometimes, in simple guise,
 She walks the furrow with the consul swain,
 Whispering unletter'd wisdom to the heart,
 Direct; or, sometimes, in the pompous robe
 Of fancy dress'd, she charms Athenian wits, 405
 And a whole sapient city, round her burns.
 Then o'er her brow Minerva's terrors nod:
 With Xenophon, sometimes, in dire extremes,
 She breathes deliberate soul, and makes retreat
 Unequall'd glory: with the Theban sage, 410
 Epaminondas, first and best of men!

Sometimes she bids the deep-embattled host,
 Above the vulgar reach, resistless form'd,
 March to sure conquest—never gain'd before!
 Nor on the treacherous seas of giddy state 415
 Unskillful she: when the triumphant tide
 Of high-swoln empire wears one boundless smile,
 And the gale tempts to new pursuits of fame,
 Sometimes, with Scipio, she collects her sail,
 And seeks the blissful shore of rural ease, 420
 Where, but th' Aonian maids, no syrens sing;
 Or should the deep-brew'd tempest muttering rise,
 While rocks and shoals perfidious lurk around,
 With Tully she her wide-reviving light
 To senates holds, a Cataline confounds, 425
 And saves a while from Cæsar, sinking Rome.

Such the kind power, whose piercing eye dissolves
 Each mental fetter, and sets reason free;
 For me inspiring an enlighten'd zeal,
 The more tenacious as the more convinc'd 430
 How happy freemen, and how wretched slaves,
 To Britons not unknown, to Britons full
 The goddess spreads her stores, the secret soul
 That quickens trade, the breath unseen that wafts
 To them the treasures of a balanc'd world. 435
 But finer arts (save what the muse has sung
 In daring flight, above all modern wing)
 Neglected droop the head; and public works,
 Broke by corruption into private gain,
 Not ornament, disgrace; not serve, destroy. 440

Shall Britons, by their own joint wisdom rul'd
 Beneath one royal head, whose vital power
 Connects, enlivens, and exerts the whole;
 In finer arts, and public works, shall they
 To Gallia yield? yield to a land that bends, 445
 Depress'd, and broke, beneath the will of one?
 Of one who, should th' unkingly thirst of gold,

Or tyrant passions, or ambition, prompt,
 Calls locust-armies o'er the blasted land: 449
 Drains from its thirsty bounds the springs of
 His own insatiate reservoir to fill: [wealth,
 To the lone desert patriot-merit frowns,
 Or into dungeons arts, when they, their chains,
 Indignant, bursting, for their nobler works
 All other licence scorn but truth's and mine. 455
 Oh, shame to think! shall Britons, in the field
 Unconquer'd still, the better laurel lose?
 Ev'n in that monarch's reign, who vainly dreamt,
 By giddy power, betray'd, and flatter'd pride, 459
 To grasp unbounded sway; while, swarming
 His armies dar'd all Europe to the field; [round,
 To hostile hands while treasure flow'd profuse,
 And, that great source of treasure, subject's blood,
 Inhuman squander'd, sicken'd every land;
 From Britain, chief, while my superior sons, 465
 In vengeance rushing, dash'd his idle hopes,
 And bade his agonizing heart be low:
 Ev'n then, as in the golden calm of peace!
 What public works at home, what arts arose!
 What various science shone! what genius glow'd!
 'Tis not for me to paint, diffusive shot 471
 O'er fair extents of land, the shining road;
 The flood-compelling arch; the long canal,
 Through mountains piercing, and uniting seas;
 The dome resounding sweet with infant joy, 475
 From famine sav'd, or cruel-handed shame,
 And that where valour counts his noble scars;
 The land were social pleasure loves to dwell,
 Of the fierce demon, Gothic duel freed;
 The robber from his farthest forest chas'd; 480
 The turbid city clear'd, and, by degrees,
 Into sure peace the best police refin'd,
 Magnificence, and grace, and decent joy.
 Let Gallic bards record, how honour'd arts,
 And science, by despotic bounty bless'd, 485
 At distance flourish'd from my parent-eye,
 Restoring ancient taste, how Boileau rose.
 How the big Roman soul shook, in Corneille,
 The trembling stage. In elegant Racine; 489
 How the more powerful, tho' more humble voice
 Of nature-painting Greece, resistless breath'd
 The whole-awaken'd heart. How Moliere's scene,
 Chastis'd and regular, with well-judg'd wit,
 Not scatter'd wild, and native humour, grac'd,
 Was life itself. To public honours rais'd, 495
 How learning in warm seminaries spread;
 And, more for glory than the small reward,
 How emulation strove. How their pure tongue
 Almost obtain'd what was deny'd their arms.
 From Rome, awhile, how painting, courted long,
 With Poussin came; ancient design, that lifts 501
 A fairer front, and looks another soul.
 How the kind art, that, of unvalued price,
 The fam'd and only picture, easy, gives,
 Refin'd her touch, and, thro' the shadow'd piece,
 All the live spirit of the painter pour'd. 506
 Coyest of arts, how sculpture norward deign'd
 A look, and bade her Girardon arise.
 How lavish'd grandeur blaz'd; the barren waste,
 Astonish'd, saw the sudden palace swell, 510
 And fountains spout amid its arid shades.
 For leagues, bright vistas opening to the view,
 How forests in majestic gardens smil'd.
 How menial arts, by their gay sisters taught,

Wove the deep flower, the blooming foliage train'd
 In joyous figures o'er the silky lawn, 516
 The palace cheer'd, illum'd the story'd wall,
 And with the pencil vy'd the glowing loom.
 These laurels, Louis, by the droppings rais'd
 Of thy profusion, its dishonour shade, 520
 And, green thro' future times, shall bind thy brow;
 While the vain honours of perfidious war
 Wither abhorr'd, or in oblivion lost.
 With what prevailing vigour had they shot,
 And stole a deeper root, by the full tide 525
 Of war-sunk millions fed? Superior still,
 How had they branch'd luxuriant to the skies,
 In Britain planted, by the potent juice
 Of freedom swell'd? Forc'd is the bloom of arts,
 A false uncertain spring, when bounty gives, 530
 Weak without me, a transitory gleam.
 Fair shine the slippery days, enticing skies
 Of favour smile, and courtly breezes blow;
 Till arts, betray'd, trust to the flattering air
 Their tender blossom: then malignant rise 535
 The blights of envy, of those insect-clouds,
 That, blasting merit, often cover courts:
 Nay, should, perchance, some kind Mæcenæ aid
 The doubtful beamings of his prince's soul,
 His wavering ardour fix, and unconfin'd 540
 Diffuse his warm beneficence around;
 Yet death, at last, and wintery tyrants come,
 Each sprig of genius killing at the root.
 But when with me imperial bounty joins,
 Wide o'er the public blows eternal spring: 545
 While mingled autumn every harvest pours
 Of every land; whate'er invention, art,
 Creating toil and nature can produce.
 Here ceas'd the goddess; and her ardent wings,
 Dipt in the colours of the heavenly bow, 550
 Stood waving radiance round, for sudden flight
 Prepar'd, when thus, impatient, burst my prayer.
 "Oh, forming light of life! O, better sun!
 "Sun of mankind! by whom the cloudy north,
 "Sublim'd, not envies Languedocian skies, 555
 "That, unstain'd ether all, diffusive smile,
 "When shall we call these ancient laurels ours?
 "And when Thy work complete?" Straight with her hand,
 Celestial red, she touch'd my darken'd eyes.
 As at the touch of day the shades dissolve, 560
 So quick, methought, the misty circle clear'd,
 That dims the dawn of being here below:
 The future shone disclos'd, and, in long view,
 Bright rising æras instant rush'd to light. [hold!
 "They come! great goddess! I the times be-
 "The times our fathers, in the bloody field, 566
 "Have earn'd so dear, and, not with less renown,
 "In the warm struggles of the senate fight.
 "The times I see! whose glory to supply,
 "For toiling ages, commerce round the world
 "Has wing'd unnumber'd sails, and from each land [Rome
 "Materials heap'd, that, well-employ'd, with
 "Might vie our grandeur, and with Greece our
 "Lo! Princes I behold! contriving still, [art.
 "And still conducting firm some brave design;
 "Kings! that the narrow joyless circle scorn,
 "Burst the blockade of false designing men, 577
 "Of treacherous smiles, of adulation sell,
 "And of the blinding clouds around them thrown:

" Their court rejoicing millions; worth alone,
 " And virtue dear to them; their best delight,
 " In just proportion, to give general joy;
 " Their jealous care thy kingdom to maintain;
 " The public glory theirs; unsparing love 584
 " Their endless treasure; and their deeds their praise, [force.
 " With thee they work. Nought can resist your " Life feels it quickening in her dark retreats;
 " Strong spread the blooms of genius, science, art;
 " His bashful bounds disclosing merit breaks;
 " And, big with fruits of glory, virtue blows 590
 " Expansive o'er the land. Another race
 " Of generous youth, of patriot fires, I see!
 " Not those vain insects fluttering in the blaze
 " Of court, and ball and play; those venal souls,
 " Corruption's veteran unrelenting bands, 595
 " That, to their vices slaves, can ne'er be free.
 " I see the fountain's purg'd? whence life derives
 " A clear or turbid flow; see the young mind
 " Not fed impure by chance, by flattery fool'd,
 " Or by scholastic jargon bloated proud. 600
 " But fill'd and nourish'd by the light of truth.
 " Then, beam'd through fancy the refining ray,
 " And pouring on the heart the passions feel
 " At once informing light and moving flame;
 " Till moral, public, graceful action crowns 605
 " The whole. Behold! the fair contention glows,
 " In all that mind our body can adorn,
 " And form to life. Instead of barren heads,
 " Barbarian pedants, wrangling sons of pride,
 " And truth-perplexing metaphysic wits, 610
 " Men, patriots, chiefs, and citizens are form'd.
 " Lo! justice, like the liberal light of Heaven,
 " Unpurchas'd shines on all, and from her beam,
 " Appalling guilt, retire the savage crew,
 " That prowl amid the darkness they themselves 615
 " Have thrown around the laws. Oppression grieves,
 " See! how her legal furies bite the lip, [tect,
 " While Yorks and Talbots their deep snares de-
 " And seize swift justice through the clouds they raise.
 " See! social labour lifts his guarded head, 620
 " And men not yield to government in vain.
 " From the sure land is rooted ruffian force,
 " And, the lewd nurse of villains, idle waste;
 " Lo! raz'd their haunts, down dash'd their mad-
 dening bowl,
 " A nation's poison! beauteous order reigns! 625
 " Manly submission, unimposing toil,
 " Trade without guile, civility that marks
 " From the foul herd of brutal slaves thy sons,
 " And fearless peace: Or should affronting war
 " To slow but dreadful vengeance rouse the just, 630
 " Unfailing fields of freemen I behold!
 " That know, with their own proper arm, to guard
 " Their own blest isle against a leaguering world.
 " Despairing Gaul her boiling youth restrains,
 " Dissolv'd her dream of universal sway: 635
 " The winds and seas are Britain's wide domain;
 " And not a sail, but by permission, spreads.
 " Lo! swarming southward on rejoicing sons,
 " Gay colonies extend; the calm retreat
 " Of undeserv'd distress, the better home 640

" Of those whom bigots chase from foreign lands.
 " Not built on rapine, servitude, and woe,
 " And in their turn some petty tyrant's prey;
 " But, bound by social freedom, firm they rise;
 " Such as, of late, an Oglethorpe has form'd, 645
 " And, crowding round, the charm'd Savannah fees.
 " Horrid with want and misery, no more
 " Our streets the tender passenger afflict.
 " Nor shivering age, nor sickness without friend,
 " Or home, or bed to bear his burning load, 650
 " Nor agonizing infant, that ne'er earn'd
 " Its guiltless pangs, I see! The stores, profuse,
 " Which British bounty has to these assign'd,
 " No more the sacrilegious riot swell
 " Of cannibal devourers! Right apply'd, 655
 " No starving wretch the land of freedom stains:
 " If poor, employment finds; if old, demands,
 " If sick, if maim'd, his miserable due;
 " And will, if young, repay the fondest care.
 " Sweet sets the sun of stormy life, and sweet 660
 " The morning shines, in mercy's dews array'd.
 " Lo! how they rise! these families of Heaven!
 " That! chief, (but why—ye bigots!—why so late?)
 " Where blooms and warbles glad a rising age:
 " What smiles of praise! and, while their song
 ascends, 665
 " The listening seraph lays his lute aside.
 " Hark! the gay muses raise a nobler strain,
 " With active nature, warm impassion'd truth,
 " Engaging fable, lucid order, notes
 " Of various string, and heart-felt image fill'd. 670
 " Behold! I see the dread delightful school
 " Of temper'd passions, and of polish'd life,
 " Restor'd: behold! the well-dissembled scene
 " Calls from embellish'd eyes the lovely tear,
 " Or lights up mirth in modest cheeks again. 675
 " Lo! vanish'd monster-land: Lo! driven away
 " Those that Apollo's sacred walls profane:
 " Their wild creation scatter'd, where a world
 " Unknown to nature, chaos more confus'd,
 " O'er the brute scene its ouran-outangs pours; 680
 " Detested forms! that, on the mind impress,
 " Corrupt, confound, and barbarise an age.
 " Behold! all thine again the sister-arts,
 " Thy graces they, knit in harmonious dance.
 " Nurs'd by the treasure from a nation drain'd 685
 " Their works to purchase, they to nobler rouse
 " Their untam'd genius, their unfetter'd thought;
 " Of pompous tyrants, and of dreaming monks,
 " The gaudy tools, and prisoners, no more.
 " Lo! numerous domes a Burlington confess: 690
 " For kings and senates fit, the palace see!
 " The temple breathing a religious awe;
 " Ev'n fram'd with elegance the plain retreat,
 " The private dwelling. Certain in his aim,
 " Taste, never idly working, saves expence. 695
 " See! Sylvan scenes, where art, alone, pretends
 " To dress her mistress, and disclose her charms:
 " Such as a Pope in miniature has shown;
 " A Bathurst o'er the widening forest spreads;
 " And such as form a Richmond, Chiswick,
 Stowe. 700
 " August, around, what public works I see!
 " Lo! stately streets, lo! squares that court the breeze,

" In spite of those to whom pertains the care,
 " Ingulfing more than founded Roman ways,
 " Lo! ray'd from cities o'er the brighten'd land, 705
 " Connecting sea to sea, the solid road.
 " Lo! the proud arch (no vile exactor's stand)
 " With easy sweep bestrides the chafing flood.
 " See! long canals, and deepen'd rivers join
 " Each part with each, and with the circling
 " main 710
 " The whole enliven'd isle. Lo! ports expand,
 " Free as the winds and waves, their sheltering
 " arms.
 " Lo! streaming comfort o'er the troubled deep,
 " On every pointed coast the light-house towers;
 " And, by the broad imperious mole repell'd, 715
 " Hark! how the baffled storm indignant roars."
 As thick to view these varied wonders rose,
 Shook all my soul with transport, unassur'd,
 The vision broke; and, on my waking eye,
 Rush'd the still ruins of dejected Rome. 720

ELEGY ON THE DEATH OF HIS MOTHER.

From a MS. in the collection of the Earl of Buchan.

YE fabled muses, I your aid disclaim,
 Your airy raptures, and your fancied flame:
 True genuine woe my throbbing breast inspires,
 Love prompts my lays, and filial duty fires;
 The soul springs instant at the warm design,
 And the heart dictates every flowing line.
 See! where the kindest, best of mothers lies,
 And death has shut her ever-weeping eyes;
 Has lodg'd at last peace in her weary breast,
 And lull'd her many piercing cares to rest.
 No more the orphan train around her stands,
 While her full heart upbraids her needy hands!
 No more the widow's lonely fate she feels,
 The shock severe that modest want conceals,
 Th' oppressor's scourge, the scorn of wealthy pride,
 And poverty's unnumber'd ills beside.
 For see! attended by th' angelic throng,
 Through yonder worlds of light she glides along,
 And claims the well earn'd raptures of the sky.—
 Yet fond concern recalls the mother's eye;
 She seeks the helpless orphans left behind;
 So hardly left! so bitterly resign'd!
 Still, still! is she my soul's divinest theme,
 The waking vision, and the wailing dream:
 Amid the ruddy sun's enliv'ning blaze
 O'er my dark eyes her dewy image plays,
 And in the dread dominion of the night
 Shines out again the sadly pleasing sight.
 Triumphant virtue all around her darts,
 And more than volumes ev'ry look imparts—

Looks, soft, yet awful, melting, yet serene,
 Where both the mother and the saint are seen.
 But ah! that night—that torturing night remains;
 May darkness dye it with its deepest stains,
 May joy on it forsake her rosy bow'rs,
 And screaming sorrow blast its baleful hours,
 When on the margin of the briny flood *
 Chill'd with a sad presaging damp I stood,
 Took the last look, ne'er to behold her more,
 And mix'd our murmurs with the wavy roar,
 Heard the last words fall from her pious tongue,
 Then, wild into the bulging vessel flung,
 Which soon, too soon convey'd me from her sight,
 Dearer than life, and liberty and light!
 Why was I then, ye powers, reserv'd for this?
 Nor sunk that moment in the vast abyss?
 Devour'd at once by the relentless wave,
 And whelm'd for ever in a watery grave?—
 Down, ye wild wishes of unruly woe!—
 I see her with immortal beauty glow,
 The early wrinkle care-contracted gone,
 Her tears all wip'd, and all her sorrows flown;
 Th' exalting voice of Heav'n I hear her breathe,
 To soothe her soul in agonies of death.
 I see her through the mansions blest above,
 And now she meets her dear expecting love.
 Heart-cheering sight! but yet, alas! o'erspread
 By the damp gloom of grief's uncheerful shade,
 Come then of reason the reflecting hour,
 And let me trust the kind o'er-ruling power,

* On the shore of Leith, when he embarked for London.

Who from the right commands the shining day,
The poor man's portion, and the orphan's stay!

ELEGY ON THE DEATH OF MR. AIKMAN
THE PAINTER *.

From a MS. in the collection of the Earl of Buchan.

OH could I draw, my friend, thy genuine mind,
Just, as the living form's by thee design'd,
Of Raphael's figures none should fairer shine,
Nor Titian's colours longer last than mine.
A mind in wisdom old, in lenience young,
From fervant truth where every virtue sprung;
Where all was real, modest, plain, sincere;
Worth above show, and goodness unsevere:
View'd round and round, as lucid diamonds throw
Still as you turn them a revolving glow:
So did his mind reflect with secret ray,
In various virtues, heav'n's internal day,
Whether in high discourse it soar'd sublime,
And sprung impatient o'er the bounds of time,
Or wand'ring nature through with raptur'd eye,
Ador'd the band that turn'd yon azure sky:
Whether to social life he bent his thought,
And the right poise of mingling passions sought,
Gay converse bless'd; or in the thoughtful grove
Bid the heart open every source of love.
New varying lights still set before your eyes
The just, the good, the social, or the wise.
For such a death who can, who would, refuse
The friend a tear, a verse the mournful muse?
Yet pay we just acknowledgment to Heaven,
Though snatch'd so soon, that Aikman e'er was given.

*A friend, when dead, is but remov'd from sight,
Hid in the lustre of eternal light:
Oft with the mind he wonted converse keeps
In the lone walk, or when the body sleeps
Lets in a wand'ring ray, and all elate
Wings and attracts her to another state †;
And when the parting storms of life are o'er,
May yet rejoin him on a happier shore.
As those we love decay, we die in part,
String after string is sever'd from the heart;
Till loosen'd life at last—but breathing clay,
Without one pang, is glad to fall away.
Unhappy he who latest feels the blow,
Whose eyes have wept o'er ev'ry friend laid low,
Dragg'd ling'ring on from partial death to death,
And dying, all he can resign is breath.*

S O N G.

WRITTEN IN HIS EARLY YEARS, AND AFTER-WARDS SHAPED FOR HIS AMANDA.

From a MS. in the collection of the Earl of Buchan.

For ever, Fortune, wilt thou prove
An unrelenting foe to love;

* Mr. Aikman died at London, on the 7th of June, O. S. 1731, from whence his remains were sent to Scotland, and interred in the Gray-Friars church-yard, close by those of his only son, who had been buried only a few months before.

† This and the three preceding lines, are not in the MS. of Mrs. Forbes Aikman.

And when we meet a mutual heart,
Come in between and bid us part;
Bid us sigh on from day to day,
And wish and wish the soul away;
Till youth and genial years are flown,
And all the life of life is gone?
But busy busy still art thou,
To bind the loveless joyless vow,
The heart from pleasure to delude,
And join the gentle to the rude *;
For pomp, and noise, and senseless show,
To make us nature's joys forego,
Beneath a gay dominion groan,
And put the golden fetter on!

TO DR. DELACOUR, IN IRELAND.

On his prospect of poetry.

HAIL gently-warbling Delacour, whose fame,
Spurning Hibernia's solitary coast,
Where small rewards attend the tuneful throng,
Pervades Britannia's well-discerning isle:
In spite of all the gloomy-minded tribe
That would eclipse thy fame, still shall the muse,
High soaring o'er the tall Parnassian mount
With spreading pinions—sing thy wondrous praise,
In strains attun'd to the seraphic lyre.
Sing unappall'd, though mighty be the theme!
O! could she in thy own harmonious strain,
Where softest numbers smoothly flowing glide
In trickling cadence; where the milky maze
Devolves in silence; by the harsher sound
Of hoarser periods still unruffled, could
Her lines but like thine own Euphrates flow—
Then might she sing in numbers worthy thee.
But what can language do, when fancy finds
Herself unequal to the lovely task?
Can feeble words thy vivid colours paint,
Or show the sweets which inexhaustive flow?
Hearken ye woods, and long-resounding groves;
Listen ye streams, soft purling thro' the meads,
And hymning horrid, all ye tempests roar.
Awake, ye woodlands! sing, ye warbling larks,
In wildly luscious notes! But most of all,
Attend, ye grateful fair, attend the youth
Who sweetly sings of nature and of you:
From you alone his conscious breast expects
Its soft rewards, by sordid love of gain
Unbias'd, undebas'd; to meaner minds
Belong such narrow views; his nobler soul,
Transported with a gen'rous thirst of fame,
Sublimely rises with expanded wings,
And through the lucid empyrean soars.
So the young eagle wings its rapid way [aloft,
Through heaven's broad azure; sometimes springs
Now drops, now cleaves with even-waving wings
The yielding air, nor seas nor mountains stop
Its flight impetuous, gazing at the sun
With irretorted eye, whilst he pervades

* For once, O Fortune! hear my prayer,
And I absolve thy future care:
All other blessings I resign,
Make but the dear Amanda mine!

The original of this also, as prepared for his mistress, is in Lord Buchan's possession.

A trackless void, and unexplor'd before.
 Long had the curious traveller strove to find
 The ruins of aspiring Babylon—
 In vain—for nought the nicest eye could trace
 Save one wide, wat'ry, undistinguish'd waste :
 But you with more than magic art have rais'd
 Semiramis's city from its grave;
 You have revers'd the scripture curse, which said,
 Dragons shall here inhabit; in your page
 We view the rising spires; the hurried eye
 Distracted wanders through the verdant maze;
 In middle air the pendant gardens hang,
 Tremendous ceiling!—whilst no solar beam
 Falls on the lengthen'd gloom beneath; the Project above a steep-alluring shade; [woods
 The finish'd garden opens to the view
 Wide-stretching vistas, while the whispering wind
 Dimples along the breezy-ruffled lake.

Now every tree irregular, and busts
 Are prodigal of harmony: the birds
 Frequent th' aerial wood, and nature blushes,
 Asham'd to find herself outdone by art:
 These and a thousand beauties could I sing,
 Collecting like the ever-toiling bee
 From yonder mingled wilderness of flow'rs
 The aromatic sweets; while you, great youth!
 O'er thy decaying country chief preside;
 Be thou her genius call'd, inspire her youth
 With noble emulation to arrive
 At Helicon's fair font, which few, alas!
 Save you, have tasted of Hibernian youth.
 Thy country, tho' corrupted, brought thee forth,
 And deem'd her greatest ornament; and now
 Regards thee as her brightest northern star.
 Long may you reign as such; and should grim
 time,

With iron teeth, deprive us of our Pope,
 Then we'll transplant thy blooming laurels fresh
 From your bleak shore to Albion's happier coast.

S O N G.

O THOU, whose tender serious eyes
 Expressive speak the mind I love;
 The gentle azure of the skies,
 The pensive shadows of the grove:

O mix their beauteous beams with mine,
 And let us interchange our hearts;
 Let all their sweetness on me shine,
 Pour'd through my soul be all their darts.

Ah! 'tis too much! I cannot bear
 At once so soft, so keen, a ray:
 In pity, then, my lovely fair,
 O turn these killing eyes away!

But what avails it to conceal
 One charm, where nought but charms we see?
 Their lustre then again reveal,
 And let me, Myra, die of thee.

VERSES ADDRESSED TO MISS YOUNG.

AN urge too late! from beauty's bondage free,
 Why did I trust my liberty with thee?
 And thou, why didst thou, with inhuman art,
 If not resolv'd to take, seduce my heart?
 Yes, yes, you said (for lovers eyes speak true);
 You must have seen how fast my passion grew:

And when your glances chanc'd on me to shine,
 How my fond soul ecstatic sprung to thine!

But mark me, fair-one, what I now declare
 Thy deep attention claims, and serious care:
 It is no common passion fires my breast,
 I must be wretched, or I must be blest!
 My woes all other remedy deny;
 Or, pitying, give me hope, or bid me die!

A P O E M,

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

Inscribed to the Right Hon. Sir Robert Walpole.

SHALL the great soul of Newton quit this earth,
 To mingle with his stars; and every muse,
 Astonish'd into silence, shun the weight
 Of honours due to his illustrious name?
 But what can man? Ev'n now the sons of light,
 In strains high warbled to seraphic lyre,
 Hail his arrival on the coast of bliss.
 Yet am I not deterr'd, though high the theme,
 And sung to harps of angels, for with you,
 Ethereal flames! ambitious, I aspire,
 In nature's general symphony to join.

And what new wonders can you show your guest!
 Who, while on this dim spot, where mortals toil
 Clouded in dust, from motions simple laws,
 Could trace the secret hand of Providence,
 Wide-working through this universal frame.

Have ye not listen'd while he bound the suns,
 And planets, to their spheres! th' unequal task
 Of human-kind till then. Oft had they roll'd
 O'er erring man the year, and oft disgrac'd
 The pride of schools, because their course was Full in its causes and effects to him, [known
 All piercing sage! Who sat not down and dream'd
 Romantic schemes, defended by the din
 Of specious words, and tyranny of names;
 But, bidding his amazing mind attend,
 And with heroic patience years on years
 Deep-searching, saw at last the system dawn,
 And shine, of all his race, on him alone.

What were his raptures then! how pure! how strong!

And what the triumphs of old Greece and Rome,
 By his diminish'd, but the pride of boys
 In some small fray victorious! when instead
 Of shatter'd parcels of this earth usurp'd
 By violence unmanly, and sore deeds
 Of cruelty and blood, Nature herself
 Stood all subdued by him, and open laid
 Her every latent glory to his view.

All intellectual eye, our solar round
 First gazing through, he by the blendid power
 Of gravitation and projection saw
 The whole in silent harmony revolve.
 From unassisted vision hid, the moons
 To cheer remoter planets numerous form'd,
 By him in all their mingled tracts were seen.
 He also fix'd our wandering queen of night,
 Whether she wanes into a scanty orb,
 Or, waxing broad, with her pale shadowy light,
 In a soft deluge overflows the sky.
 Her every motion clear-discerning, he
 Adjusted to the mutual main, and taught
 Why now the mighty mass of water swells
 Resistless, heaving on the broken rocks,

And the full river turning : till again
The tide revertive, unattracted, leaves
A yellow waste of idle sands behind.

Then breaking hence, he took his ardent flight
Through the blue infinite ; and every star,
Which the clear concave of a winter's night
Pours on the eye, or astronomic tube,
Far-stretching, snatches from the dark abyss ;
Or such as farther in successive skies
To fancy shine alone, at his approach
Blaz'd into suns, the living centre each
Of an harmonious system : all combin'd,
And rul'd unerring by that single power,
Which draws the stone projected to the ground.

O, unprofuse magnificence divine !
O, wisdom truly perfect ! thus to call
From a few causes such a scheme of things,
Effects so various, beautiful, and great,
An universe complete ! And, O belov'd
Of Heaven ! whose well-purg'd penetrative eye,
The mystic veil transpiercing, inly scann'd
The rising, moving, wide-establish'd frame.

He, first of men, with awful wing pursued
The comet through the long elliptic curve,
As round innumerable worlds he wound his way ;
Till, to the forehead of our evening sky
Return'd, the blazing wonder glares anew,
And o'er the trembling nations shakes dismay.

The heavens are all his own ; from the wild
Of whirling vortices, and circling spheres, [rule
To their first great simplicity restor'd.

The schools astonish'd stood ; but found it vain
To combat still with demonstration strong,
And, unawaken'd dream beneath the blaze
Of truth. At once their pleasing visions fled,
With the gay shadows of the morning mix'd,
When Newton rose, our philosophic sun.

Th' aerial flow of sound was known to him,
From whence it first in wavy circles breaks,
Till the touch'd organ takes the message in.
Nor could the darting beam of speed immense,
Escape his swift pursuit, and measuring eye.
Ev'n light itself, which every thing displays,
Shone undiscover'd, till his brighter mind
Untwisted all the shining robe of day ;
And, from the whitening undistinguish'd blaze,
Collecting every ray into his kind,
To the charm'd eye educ'd the gorgeous train
Of parent-colours. First the flaming red
Sprung vivid forth ; the tawny orange next ;
And next delicious yellow ; by whose side
Fell the kind beams of all-refreshing green.
Then the pure blue, that swells autumnal skies,
Ethereal play'd ; and then, of sadder hue,
Emerg'd the deepen'd indico, as when
The heavy-skirted evening droops with frost.
While the last gleamings of refracted light
Dy'd in the fainting violet away.

These, when the clouds distil the rosy shower,
Shine out distinct adown the watery bow ;
While o'er our heads the dewy vision bends
Delightful, melting on the fields beneath.
Myriads of mingling dyes from these result,
And myriads still remain ; infinite source
Of beauty, ever-blushing, ever-new !

Did ever poet image aught so fair, [brook !
Dreaming in whispering groves, by the hoarse

Or prophet, to whose rapture heaven descends !
Ev'n now the setting sun and shifting clouds,
Seen, Greenwich, from thy lovely heights, declare
How just, how beauteous, the refractive law.

The noiseless tide of time, all bearing down
To vast eternity's unbounded sea,
Where the green islands of the happy shine,
He stemm'd alone ; and to the source (involv'd
Deep in primeval gloom) ascending, rais'd
His lights at equal distances, to guide
Historian, wilder'd on his darksome way.

But who can number up his labours ? who
His high discoveries sing ? when but a few
Of the deep-studying race can stretch their minds
To what he knew : in fancy's lighter thought,
How shall the muse then grasp the mighty theme ?

What wonder thence that his devotion swell'd
Responsive to his knowledge ! For could he,
Whose piercing mental eye diffusive saw
The finish'd universality of things,
In all its order, magnitude, and parts,
Forbear incessant to adore that power
Who fills, sustains, and actuates the whole ?

Say, ye who best can tell, ye happy few,
Who saw him in the softest lights of life,
All unwithheld, indulging to his friends
The vast unborrow'd treasures of his mind,
Oh, speak the wondrous man ! how mild, how calm,
How greatly humble, how divinely good ;
How firm establish'd on eternal truth ;
Fervant in doing well, with every nerve
Still pressing on, forgetful of the past,
And panting for perfection : far above
Those little cares, and visionary joys,
That so perplex the fond impassion'd heart
Of ever-cheated, ever-trusting man.
And you, ye hopeless gloomy-minded tribe,
You who unconscious of those nobler flights
That reach impatient at immortal life,
Against the prime endearing privilege
Of being dare contend, say, can a soul
Of such extensive, deep, tremendous powers,
Enlarging still, be but a finer breath
Of spirits dancing through their tubes awhile,
And then for ever lost in vacant air ?

But, hark ! methinks I hear a warning voice,
Solemn as when some awful change is come,

Sound through the world—'Tis done—The measure's full ;

And I resign my charge.—Ye mouldering stones,
That build the towering pyramid, the proud
Triumphal arch, the monument effac'd
By ruthless ruin, and whate'er supports
The worship name of hoar antiquity,
Down to the dust ! what grandeur can ye boast
While Newton lifts his column to the skies,
Beyond the waste of time. Let no weak drop
Be shed for him. The virgin in her bloom
Cut off, the joyous youth, and darling child,
These are the tombs that claim the tender tear,
And elegiac song. But Newton calls
For other notes of gratulation high,
That now he wanders through those endless worlds
He here so well descried, and wondering talks,
And hymns their Author with his glad compeers.

O, Britain's boast whether with angels thou
Sittest in dread discourse, or fellow-blest,

Who joy to see the honour of their kind ;
 Or whether, mounted on cherubic wing,
 Thy swift career is with the whirling orbs,
 Comparing things with things, in rapture lost,
 And grateful adoration, for that light
 So plenteous ray'd into thy mind below,
 From light himself; oh, look with pity down
 On human-kind, a frail erroneous race !
 Exalt the spirit of a downward world !
 O'er thy dejected country chief preside,
 And be her Genius call'd ! her studies raise,
 Correct her manners, and inspire her youth.
 For, though deprav'd and sunk, she brought thee forth,

And glories in thy name : she points thee out
 To all her sons, and bids them eye thy star :
 While, in expectance of the second life,
 When time shall be no more, thy sacred dust
 Sleeps with her kings, and dignifies the scene.

A P O E M,

To the memory of the Right Hon. Lord Talbot, Lord Chancellor of Great Britain. Addressed to his son.

WHILE, with the public, you, my Lord, lament
 A friend and father lost; permit the muse,
 The muse assign'd of old a double theme,
 To praise dead worth, and humble living pride,
 Whose generous task begins where interest ends,
 Permit her on a Talbot's tomb to lay
 This cordial verse sincere, by truth inspir'd,
 Which means not to bestow, but borrow fame.
 Yes, she may sing his matchless virtues now—
 Unhappy that she may—But where begin?
 How from the diamond single out each ray,
 Where all, though trembling with ten thousand
 Effuse one dazzling undivided light? [hues,

Let the low-minded of these narrow days
 No more presume to deem the lofty tale
 Of ancient times, in pity to their own,
 Romance. In Talbot we united saw
 The piercing eye, the quick enlighten'd soul,
 The graceful ease, the flowing tongue of Greece,
 Join'd to the virtues and the force of Rome.

Eternal Wisdom, that all-quicken'g sun,
 Whence every life, in just proportion, draws
 Directing light and actuating flame,
 Ne'er with a larger portion of its beams
 Awaken'd mortal clay. Hence steady, calm,
 Diffusive, deep, and clear, his reason saw,
 With instantaneous view, the truth of things;
 Chief what to human life and human bliss
 Pertains, that noblest science, fit for man :
 And hence, responsive to his knowledge, glow'd
 His ardent virtue. Ignorance and vice,
 In consort foul agree; each heightening each;
 While virtue draws from knowledge brighter fire.

What grand, what comely, or what tender sense,
 What talent, or what virtue, was not his;
 What that can render man or great, or good,
 Give useful worth, or amiable grace?
 Nor could he brook in studious shade to lie,
 In soft retirement, indolently pleas'd
 With selfish peace. The siren of the wise,
 (Who steals th' Aonian song, and, in the shape
 Of virtue, woos them from a worthless world)

Though deep he felt her charms, could never melt
 His strenuous spirit, recollected, calm,
 As silent night, yet active as the day.
 The more the bold, the bustling, and the bad,
 Press to usurp the reins of power, the more
 Behoves it virtue, with indignant zeal,
 To check their combination. Shall low views
 Of sneaking interest or luxurious vice,
 The villain's passions, quicken more to toil,
 And dart a livelier vigour through the soul,
 Than those that, mingled with our truest good,
 With present honour and immortal fame,
 Involve the good of all? An empty form
 Is the weak virtue, that amid the shade
 Lamenting lies, with future schemes amus'd,
 While wickedness and folly, kindred powers,
 Confound the world. A Talbot's, different far,
 Sprung ardent into action: action, that disdain'd
 To lose in deathlike sloth one pulse of life,
 That might be sav'd; disdain'd for coward ease,
 And her insipid pleasures, to resign
 The prize of glory, the keen sweets of toil,
 And those high joys that teach the truly great
 To live for others, and for others die.

Early, behold! he breaks benign on life.
 Not breathing more beneficence, the spring
 Leads in her swelling train the gentle airs.
 While gay, behind her, smiles the kindling waste
 Of ruffian storms and winter's lawless rage.
 In him Astrea, to this dim abode
 Of ever-wandering men, return'd again:
 To bless them his delight, to bring them back,
 From thorny error, from unjoyous wrong,
 Into the paths of kind primeval faith,
 Of happiness and justice. All his parts,
 His virtues all, collected, sought the good
 Of human-kind. For that he, fervent, felt
 The throb of patriots, when they model states;
 Anxious for that, nor needful sleep could hold
 His still-awaken'd soul; nor friends had charms
 To steal, with pleasing guile, one useful hour;
 Toil knew no languor, no attraction joy.
 Thus with unwearied steps, by virtue led,
 He gain'd the summit of that sacred hill,
 Where, rais'd above black envy's darkening clouds
 Her spotless temple lifts its radiant front.
 Be nam'd, victorious ravagers, no more!
 Vanish, ye human comets! shrink your blaze
 Ye that your glory to your terrors owe,
 As, o'er the gazing desolated earth,
 You scatter'd famine, pestilence, and war;
 Vanish! before this vernal sun of fame;
 Effulgent sweetness! beaming life and joy.

How the heart listen'd while he, pleading spoke!
 While on th' enlighten'd mind, with winning art,
 His gentle reason so persuasive stole,
 That the charm'd hearer thought it was his own.
 Ah! when, ye studious of the laws, again
 Shall such enchanting lessons bless your ear?
 When shall again the darkest truths, perplex,
 Be set in ample day? when shall the harsh
 And arduous open into smiling ease?
 The solid mix with elegant delight?
 His was the talent with the purest light
 At once to pour conviction on the soul,
 And warm with lawful flame th' impassion'd heart,
 That dangerous gift with him was safely lodg'd

By heaven—He, sacred to his country's cause,
To trampled want and worth, to suffering right,
To the lone widow's and her orphan's woes,
Reserv'd the mighty charm. With equal brow,
Despising then the smiles or frowns of power,
He all that noblest eloquence effus'd,
With generous passion, taught by reason, breathes:
Then spoke the man: and, over barren art,
Prevail'd abundant nature. Freedom then
His client was, humanity and truth.

Plac'd on the seat of justice, there he reign'd,
In a superior sphere of cloudless day,
A pure intelligence. No tumult there,
No dark emotion, no intemperate heat
No passion e'er disturb'd the clear serene
That round him spread. A zeal for right alone,
The love of justice, like the steady sun,
Its equal ardour lent; and sometimes rais'd
Against the sons of violence, of pride,
And bold deceit, his indignation gleam'd,
Yet still by sober dignity restrain'd.
As intuition quick, he snatch'd the truth,
Yet with progressive patience, step by step,
Self-diffident, or to the slower kind,
He through the maze of falsehood trac'd it on,
Till, at the last, evolv'd, it full appear'd,
And ev'n the loser own'd the just decree.

But when, in senates, he, to freedom firm,
Enlighten'd freedom, plann'd salubrious laws,
His various learning, his wide knowledge, then,
His insight deep into Britannia's weal,
Spontaneous seem'd from simple sense to flow,
And the plain patriot smooth'd the brow of law.
No specious swell, no frothy pomp of words,
Fell on the cheated ear; no study'd maze
Of declamation, to perplex the right,
He darkening threw around: safe in itself,
In its own force, all-powerful reason spoke;
While on the great, the ruling point, at once,
He stream'd decisive day, and show'd it vain
To lengthen farther out the clear debate.
Conviction breathes conviction; to the heart,
Pour'd ardent forth in eloquence unbid,
The heart attends: for let the venal try
Their every hardening stupifying art,
Truth must prevail, zeal will enkindle zeal,
And nature, skilful touch'd, is honest still.

Behold him in the councils of his prince.
What faithful light he lends! How rare, in courts,
Such wisdom! such abilities! and, join'd
To virtue so determin'd, public zeal,
And honour of such adamant proof,
As ev'n corruption, hopeless, and o'eraw'd,
Durst not have tempted! Yet of manners mild,
And winning every heart, he knew to please,
Nobly to please; while equally he scorn'd
Or adulation to receive, or give.
Happy the state, where wakes a ruling eye
Of such inspection keen, and general care!
Beneath a guard so vigilant, so pure,
Toll may resign his careless head to rest,
And ever-jealous freedom sleep in peace.
Ah! lost untimely! lost in downward days!
And many a patriot counsel with him lost!
Counsels, that might have humbled Britain's foe,
Her native foe, from eldest time by fate
Appointed, as did once a Talbot's arms.

Let learning, arts, let universal worth,
Lament a patron lost, a friend and judge.
Unlike the sons of vanity, that veil'd
Beneath the patron's prostituted name,
Dare sacrifice a worthy man to pride,
And flush confusion o'er an honest cheek.
When he conferr'd a grace, it seem'd a debt
Which he to merit, to the public, paid,
And to the great all-bounteous source of good.
His sympathizing heart itself receiv'd
The generous obligation he bestow'd.
This, this indeed, is patronizing worth.
Their kind protector him the Muses own,
But scorn with noble pride the boasted aid
Of tasteless vanity's insulting hand.
The gracious stream, that cheers the letter'd world,

Is not the noisy gift of summer's noon,
Whose sudden current, from the naked root,
Washes the little soil which yet remain'd,
And only more dejects the blushing flowers:
No, 'tis the soft-descending dews at eve,
The silent treasures of the vernal year,
Indulging deep their stores, the still night long;
Till, with returning morn, the freshen'd world,
Is fragrance all, all beauty, joy, and song.

Still let me view him in the pleasing light
Of private life, where pomp forgets to glare,
And where the plain unguarded soul is seen.
There, with that truest greatness he appear'd,
Which thinks not of appearing; kindly veil'd
In the soft graces of the friendly scene,
Inspiring social confidence and ease.
As free the converse of the wise and good,
As joyous, disentangling every power,
And breathing mix'd improvement with delight,
As when amid the various blossom'd spring,
Or gentle-beaming autumn's pensive shade,
The philosophic mind with nature talks.
Say ye, his sons, his dear remains, with whom
The father laid superfluous state aside,
Yet rais'd your filial duty thence the more,
With friendship rais'd it, with esteem, with love,
Beyond the ties of blood, oh! speak the joy,
The pure serene, the cheerful wisdom mild,
The virtuous spirit, which his vacant hours,
In semblance of amusement, through the breast
Infus'd. And thou, O * Rundle! lend thy strain,
Thou darling friend! thou brother of his soul!
In whom the head and heart their stores unite;
Whatever fancy paints, invention pours,
Judgment digests, the well-tun'd bosom feels,
Truth natural, moral, or divine, has taught,
The Virtues dictate, or the Muses sing.
Lend me the plaint, which, to the lonely main,
With memory conversing, you will pour,
As on the pebbled shore you, pensive, stray.
Where Derry's mountains a bleak crescent form,
And mid their ample round receive the waves,
That from the frozen pole, resounding, rush,
Impetuous. Though from native sun-shine driven,
Driven from your friends, the sun-shine of the soul,
By slanderous zeal, and politics infirm,
Jealous of worth; yet will you bless your lot.

* Dr. Rundle, late Bishop of Derry, in Ireland.

Yet will you triumph in your glorious fate,
Whence Talbot's friendship glows to future times,
Intrepid, warm; of kindred tempers born;
Nurs'd, by experience, into flow esteem,
Calm confidence unbounded, love not blind,
And the sweet light from mingled minds disclos'd,
From mingled chemic oils as bursts the fire.

I too remember well that cheerful bowl,
Which round his table flow'd. The serious there Mix'd with the sportive, with the learn'd the plain;

Mirth soften'd wisdom, candour temper'd mirth;
And wit its honey lent, without the sting.
Not simple nature's unaffected sons,
The blameless Indians, round the forest-cheer,
In sunny lawn or shady covert set,
Hold more unspotted converse: nor, of old,
Rome's awful consuls, her dictator-swains,
As on the product of their Sabine farms
They far'd, with stricter virtue fed the soul:
Nor yet in Athens, at an Attic meal,
Where Socrates presided, fairer truth,
More elegant humanity, more grace,
Wit more refin'd, or deeper science reign'd.

But far beyond the little vulgar bounds,
Of family, or friends, or native land.
By just degrees, and with proportion'd flame,
Extended his benevolence: a friend
To human kind, to parent nature's works.
Of free access, and of engaging grace,
Such as a brother to a brother owes,
He kept an open judging ear for all,
And spread an open countenance, where smil'd
The fair effulgence of an open heart;
While on the rich, the poor, the high, the low,
With equal ray, his ready goodness shone:
For nothing human foreign was to him.

Thus to a dread inheritance, my Lord,
And hard to be supported, you succeed:
But, kept by virtue, as by virtue gain'd,
It will, through latest time, enrich your race,
When grosser wealth shall moulder into dust.
And with their authors in oblivion sunk
Vain titles lie, the servile badges oft
Of mean submission, not the meed of worth.
True genuine honour its large patent holds
Of all mankind, through every land and age,
Of universal reason's various sons,
And ev'n of God himself, sole perfect judge!
Yet know, these noblest honours of the mind
On rigid terms descend: the high-plac'd heir
Scann'd by the public eye, that, with keen gaze,
Malignant seeks our faults, cannot through life,
Amid the nameless insects of a court,
Unheeded steal: but, with his fire compar'd,
He must be glorious, or he must be scorn'd.
This truth to you, who merit well to bear
A name to Britons dear, th' officious Muse
May safely sing, and sing without reserve.

Vain were the plaint, and ignorant the tear,
That should a Talbot mourn. Ourselves, indeed,
Our country robb'd of her delight and strength;
We may lament. Yet let us, grateful, joy,
That we such virtues knew, such virtues felt,
And feel them still, teaching our views to rise
Through ever-brightening scenes of future worlds.
Be dumb, ye worst of zealots! ye that, prone

To thoughtless dust, renounce that generous hope,
Whence every joy below its spirit draws,
And every pain its balm: a Talbot's light,
A Talbot's virtues, claim another source,
Than the blind maze of undesigning blood;
Nor, when that vital fountain plays no more,
Can they be quench'd amid the gelid stream.

Methinks I see his mounting spirit, freed
From tangling earth, regain the realms of day,
Its native country, whence, to bleis mankind,
Eternal goodness, on this darksome spot,
Had ray'd it down a while. Behold! approv'd
By the tremendous judge of heaven and earth,
And to th' Almighty Father's presence join'd,
He takes his rank, in glory, and in bliss,
Amid the human worthies. Glad around
Crowd his compatriot shades, and point him out,
With joyful pride, Britannia's blameless boast.
Ah! who is he, that with a fonder eye
Meets thine enraptur'd?—'Tis the best of sons!
The best of friends!—Too soon is realiz'd
That hope, which once forbade thy tears to flow!
Mean while the kindred souls of every land,
(Howe'er divided in the fretful days
Of prejudice and error) mingled now,
In one selected never-jarring state,
Where God himself their only monarch reigns,
Partake the joy; yet, such the sense that still Remains of earthly woes, for us below,
And for our loss, they drop a pitying tear.
But cease presumptuous Muse, nor vainly strive
To quit this cloudy sphere that binds thee down:
'Tis not for mortal hand to trace these scenes,
Scenes, that our gross ideas groveling cast
Behind, and strike our boldest language dumb.

Forgive, immortal shade! if aught from earth,
From dust low-warbled, to those groves can rise,
Where flows celestial harmony, forgive
This fond superfluous verse. With deep-felt voice,
On every heart impress'd, thy deeds themselves
Attest thy praise. Thy praise the widow's sighs,
And orphan's tears embalm. The good, the bad,
The sons of justice and the sons of strife,
All who or freedom or who interest prize,
A deep-divided nation's parties all,
Conspire to swell thy spotless praise to heaven.
Glad heaven receives it, and seraphic lyres
With songs of triumph thy arrival hail.
How vain this tribute then! this lowly lay!
Yet nought is vain which gratitude inspires.
The Muse, besides, her duty thus approves
To virtue, to her country, to mankind,
To ruling nature, that, in glorious charge,
As to her priestess, gives it her, to hymn,
Whatever good and excellent she forms.

ON HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS
THE PRINCE OF WALES.

WHILE secret-leaguings nations frown around,
Ready to pour the long-expected storm;
While she, who wont the restless Gaul to bound,
Britannia, drooping, grows an empty form;
While on our vitals selfish parties prey,
And deep corruption eats our soul away;

Yet in the Goddess of the Main appears
A gleam of joy, gay-flushing every grace,
As the cordial-voice of millions hears,
Rejoicing, zealous, o'er thy rising race:
Strait her rekindling eyes resume their fire,
The Virtues smile, the Muses tune the lyre.

But more enchanting than the Muse's song,
United Britons thy dear offspring hail:
The city triumphs through her glowing throng;
The shepherd tells his transport to the dale;
The sons of roughest toil forget their pain,
And the glad sailor cheers the midnight main.

Can aught from fair Augusta's gentle blood,
And thine, thou friend of liberty! be born:
Can aught save what is lovely, generous, good;
What will, at once, defend us, and adorn?
From thence prophetic joy new Edwards eyes,
New Henrys, Annas, and Elizas rise.

May fate my fond devoted days extend,
To sing the promis'd glories of thy reign!
What though, by years depress'd, my muse might bend;

My heart will teach her still a nobler strain:
How, with recover'd Britain, will she soar,
When France insults, and Spain shall rob no more.

O D E.

TELL me, thou soul of her I love,
Ah! tell me, whither art thou fled;
To what delightful world above,
Appointed for the happy dead?

Or dost thou, free, at pleasure, roam,
And sometimes share thy lover's woe;
Where, void of thee, his cheerless home
Can now, alas! no comfort know?

Oh! if thou hover'st round my walk,
While, under every well-known tree,
I to thy fancy'd shadow talk,
And every tear is full of thee;

Should then the weary eye of grief,
Beside some sympathetic stream,
In slumber find a short relief,
Oh, visit thou my soothing dream!

EPITAPH ON MISS STANLEY *,

IN HOLYROOD CHURCH, SOUTHAMPTON.

E. S.

Once a lively image of human nature,
Such as God made it
When he pronounced every work of his to be good.
To the memory of Elisabeth Stanley,
Daughter of George and Sarah Stanley;
Who, to all the beauty, modesty,
And gentleness of nature,
That ever adorned the most amiable woman,
Joined all the fortitude, elevation,
And vigour of mind,
That ever exalted the most heroical man;

* See what is said of this lady in "Summer."

Who having lived the pride and delight of her parents,
The joy, the consolation, and pattern of her friends,
A mistress not only of the English and French,
But in a high degree of the Greek and Roman learning,

Without vanity or pedantry,
At the age of eighteen,
After a tedious, painful, desperate illness,
Which, with a Roman spirit,
And a Christian resignation,
She endured so calmly, that she seemed insensible
To all pain and suffering, except that of her friends,
Gave up her innocent soul to her Creator,
And left to her mother, who erected this monument,

The memory of her virtues for her greatest support;

Virtues which, in her sex and station of life,
Were all that could be practised,
And more than will be believed,
Except by those who know what this inscription relates.

Here, Stanley, rest, escap'd this mortal strife,
Above the joys, beyond the woes of life.
Fierce pangs no more thy lively beauties stain,
And sternly try thee with a year of pain:
No more sweet patience, feigning oft relief,
Lights thy sick eye, to cheat a parent's grief:
With tender art, to save her anxious groan,
No more thy bosom presses down its own:
Now well-earn'd peace is thine, and bliss sincere:
Ours be the lenient, not unpleasing tear!

O, born to bloom, then sink beneath the storm,
To show us virtue in her fairest form;
To show us artless reason's moral reign,
What boastful science arrogates in vain;
Th' obedient passions knowing each their part;
Calm light the head, and harmony the heart!
Yes, we must follow soon, will glad obey,
When a few suns have roll'd their cares away,
Tir'd with vain life, will close the willing eye:
'Tis the great birth-right of mankind to die.
Blest be the bark! that wafts us to the shore,
Where death-divided friends shall part no more:
To join thee there, here with thy dust repose,
Is all the hope thy hapless mother knows.

TO THE REVEREND MR. MURDOCH,

Rector of Stradishall, in Suffolk, 1738.

Thus safely low, my friend, thou can'st not fall:
Here reigns a deep tranquillity o'er all;
No noise, no care, no vanity, no strife;
Men, woods, and fields, all breathe untroubled life,
Then keep each passion down, however dear;
Trust me the tender are the most severe.
Guard, while 'tis thine, thy philosophic ease,
And ask no joy but that of virtuous peace;
That bids defiance to the storms of fate:
High bliss is only for a higher state.

A PARAPHRASE

On the latter part of the sixth Chapter of St.
Matthew.

WHEN my breast labours with oppressive care,
And o'er my cheek descends the falling tear;

While all my warring passions are at strife,
O, let me listen to the words of life!
Raptures deep-felt his doctrine did impart,
And thus he rais'd from earth the drooping heart.

Think not, when all your scanty stores afford,
Is spread at once upon the sparing board;
Think not, when worn the homely robe appears,
While, on the roof, the howling tempest bears;
What farther shall this feeble life sustain,
And what shall clothe these shivering limbs again.
Say, does not life its nourishment exceed?
And the fair body its investing weed?

Behold! and look away your low despair—
See the light tenants of the barren air:
To them, nor stores, nor granaries, belong,
Nought, but the woodland, and the pleasing
song;

Yet, your kind heavenly Father bends his eye
On the least wing, that flits along the sky.
To him they sing, when spring renews the plain,
To him they cry in winter's pinching reign;
Nor is their music, nor their plaint in vain:
He hears the gay, and the distressful call,
And with unsparing bounty fills them all.

Observe the rising lily's snowy grace,
Observe the various vegetable race;
They neither toil, nor spin, but careless grow,
Yet see how warm they blush! how bright they glow!

What regal vestments can with them compare!
What king so shining! or what queen so fair!

If, ceaseless, thus the fowls of heaven he feeds,
If o'er the fields such lucid robes he spreads;
Will he not care for you, ye faithless, say?
Is he unwise? or, are ye less than they?

THE INCOMPARABLE SOPORIFIC DOCTOR.

SWEET, sleeky doctor! dear pacific soul!
Lay at the beef, and suck the vital bowl!
Still let the involving smoke around thee fly,
And broad-look'd dulness settle in thine eye.
Ah! soft in down these dainty limbs repose,
And in the very lap of slumber doze;
But chiefly on the lazy day of grace,
Call forth the lambent glories of thy face;
If aught the thoughts of dinner can prevail,
And sure the Sunday's dinner cannot fail.
To the thin church in sleepy pomp proceed,
And lean on the lethargic book thy head.
These eyes wipe often with the hollow'd lawn,
Profoundly nod, immeasurably yawn.
Slow let the prayers by the meek lips be sung,
Nor let thy thoughts be distanc'd by thy tongue;
If ere the fingers are within a call,
Or if on prayers thou deign'st to think at all.
Yet—only yet—the swimming head we bend;
But when serene, the pulpit you ascend,
Through every joint a gentle horror creeps,
And round you the consenting audience sleeps.
So when an ass with sluggish front appears,
The horses start, and prick their quivering ears;
But soon as e'er the sage is heard to bray,
The fields all thunder, and they bound away.

THE HAPPY MAN.

HE's not the happy man, to whom is given
A plenteous fortune by indulgent heaven;
Whose gilded roofs on shining columns rise,
And painted walls enchant the gazer's eyes:
Whose table flows with hospitable cheer,
And all the various bounty of the year;
Whose vallies smile, whose gardens breathe the
spring,

Whose carved mountains bleat, and forests sing;
For whom the cooling shade in summer twines,
While his full cellars give their generous wines;
From whose wide fields unbounded autumn pours
A golden tide into his swelling stores:
Whose winter laughs; for whom the liberal gales
Stretch the big sheet, and toiling commerce sails;
When yielding crowds attend, and pleasure serves;
While youth, and health, and vigour, string his nerves.

Ev'n not all these, in one rich lot combin'd,
Can make the happy man, without the mind;
Where judgment sits clear-sighted, and surveys
The chain of reason with unerring gaze;
Where fancy lives, and to the brightening eyes,
His fairer scenes, and bolder figures rise;
Where social love exerts her soft command,
And plays the passions with a tender hand,
Whence every virtue flows, in rival strife,
And all the moral harmony of life.

Nor canst thou, Dodington, this truth decline,
Thine is the fortune, and the mind is thine.

ON THE REPORT OF A WOODEN BRIDGE

To be built at Westminster.

By Rufus' hall, where Thames polluted flows,
Provok'd, the genius of the river rose,
And thus exclaim'd: "Have I, ye British swains,
"Have I for ages lav'd your fertile plains?
"Giv'n herds, and flocks, and villages increase,
"And fed a richer than a golden fleece?
"Have I, ye merchants, with each swelling tide,
"Pour'd Afric's treasure in, and India's pride?
"Lent you the fruit of every nation's toil?
"Made every climate your's, and every soil?
"Yet pilfer'd from the poor, by gaming base,
"Yet must a wooden bridge my waves disgrace?
"Tell not to foreign streams the shameful tale,
"And be it publish'd in no Gallic vale."
He said; and, plunging to his crystal dome,
While o'er his head the circling waters foam.

S O N G.

ONE day the god of fond desire,
On mischief bent, to Damon said,
Why not disclose your tender fire,
Not own it to the lovely maid?

The shepherd mark'd his treacherous art,
And, softly-sighing, thus reply'd:
'Tis true, you have subdued my heart,
But shall not triumph o'er my pride

The slave, in private only bears
Your bondage, who his love conceals;
But when his passion he declares,
You drag him at your chariot-wheels.

S O N G.

HARD is the fate of him who loves,
Yet dares not tell his trembling pain,
But to the sympathetic groves,
But to the lonely listening plain.

Oh! when she blesses next your shade,
Oh! when her footsteps next are seen
In flowery tracts along the mead,
In fresher mazes o'er the green,

Ye gentle spirits of the vale,
To whom the tears of love are dear,
From dying lilies waft a gale.,
And sigh my sorrows in her ear.

O, tell her what she cannot blame,
Though fear my tongue must ever bind;
Oh, tell her that my virtuous flame
Is as her spotless soul refin'd.

Not her own guardian angel eyes
With chaster tenderness his care,
Not purer her own wishes rise,
Not holier her own sighs in prayer.

But, if, at first, her virgin fear
Should start at love's suspected name,
With that of friendship soothe her ear—
True love and friendship are the same.

S O N G.

UNLESS with my Amanda blest,
In vain I twine the woodbine bower;
Unless to deck her sweeter breast,
In vain I rear the breathing flower:

A waken'd by the genial year,
In vain the birds around me sing;
In vain the freshening fields appear:
Without my love there is no spring.

S O N G.

COME, gentle god of soft desire,
Come and possess my happy breast!
Not, fury-like, in flames and fire,
In rapture, rage, and nonsense drest.

These are the vain disguise of love;
And, or bespeak dissembled pains,
Or else a fleeting passion prove—
The frantic fury of the veins.

But come in friendship's angel-guise:
Yet dearer thou than friendship art:
More tender spirit in thy eyes,
More sweet emotions at the heart,

O, come with goodness in thy train,
With peace, and transport void of storm,
And, would'st thou me for ever gain,
Put on Amanda's winning form.

A NUPTIAL SONG,

Intended to have been inserted in the Fourth Act of Sophonisba, a Tragedy.

COME, gentle Venus! and assuage
A warring world, a bleeding age.

For nature lives beneath thy ray,
The wintery tempests haste away,
A lucid calm invests the sea,
Thy native deep is full of thee;
The flowering earth where-e'er you fly,
Is all o'er spring, all sun the sky.
A genial spirit warms the breeze;
Unseen among the blooming trees,
The feather'd lovers tune their throat,
The desert growls a soften'd note,
Glad o'er the meads the cattle bound,
And love and harmony go round.

But chief into the human heart
You strike the dear delicious dart;
You teach us pleasing pangs to know
To languish in luxurious woe,
To feel the generous passions rise,
Grow good by gazing, mild by sighs;
Each happy moment to improve,
And fill the perfect year with love,
Come, thou delight of heaven and earth!
To whom all creatures owe their birth;
Oh, come, sweet smiling! tender, come!
And yet prevent our final doom.
For long the furious god of war
Has crush'd us with his iron car,
Has rais'd along our ruin'd plains,
Has soil'd them with his cruel stains,
Has sunk our youth in endless sleep,
And made the widow'd virgin weep.
Now let him feel thy wonted charms;
Oh, take him to thy twining arms!
And, while thy bosom heaves on his,
While deep he prints the humid kiss,
Ah, then! his stormy heart control,
And sigh thyself into his soul.

O D E.

O NIGHTINGALE, best poet of the grove,
That plaintive strain can ne'er belong to thee,
Blest in the full possession of thy love:
O lend that strain, sweet nightingale, to me!

'Tis mine, alas! to mourn my wretched fate:
I love a maid who all my bosom charms,
Yet lose my days without this lovely mate;
Inhuman fortune keeps her from my arms.

You, happy birds! by nature's simple laws
Lead your soft lives, sustain'd by nature's fare;
You dwell where-ever roving fancy draws,
And love and song is all your pleasing care:

But we, vain slaves of interest and of pride,
Dare not be blest lest envious tongue should blame:

And hence, in vain I languish for my bride;
O mourn with me, sweet bird, my hapless flame,

'Tis anguish, guilt, and folly join'd;
But Seraphina's eyes dispense
A mild and gracious influence;
Such as in visions angels shed
Around the heaven-illumined head.
To love thee, Seraphina, sure
Is to be tender, happy, pure;
'Tis from low passions to escape,
And woo bright virtue's fairest shape;
'Tis ecstasy with wisdom join'd;
And heaven infus'd into the mind.

ODE ON ÆOLUS'S HARP *.

ETHEREAL race, inhabitants of air,
Who hymn your God amid the secret grove;
Ye unseen beings, to my harp repair,
And raise majestic strains, or melt in love.
Those tender notes, how kindly they upbraid,
With what soft woe they thrill the lover's heart!
Sure from the hand of some unhappy maid,
Who dy'd of love, these sweet complainings part.

But, hark! that strain was of a graver tone,
On the deep strings his hand some hermit
Or he the sacred bard †; who sat alone, [throws;
In the drear waste, and wept his people's woes.

Such was the song which Zion's children sung,
When by Euphrates' stream they made their
And to such sadly solemn notes are strung [plaint;
Angelic harps, to soothe a dying faint.

Methinks I hear the full celestial choir, [raise;
Through heaven's high dome their awful anthem
Now chanting clear, and now they all conspire
To swell the lofty hymn, from praise to praise.

Let me, ye wandering spirits of the wind,
Who, as wild fancy prompts you, touch the string,
Smit with your theme, be in your chorus join'd,
For till you cease, my muse forgets to sing.

HYMN ON SOLITUDE.

HAIL, mildly pleasing solitude,
Companion of the wise and good,
But, from whose holy, piercing eye,
The herd of fools and villains fly.

Oh! how I love with thee to walk,
And listen to thy whisper'd talk,
Which innocence and truth imparts,
And melts the most obdurate hearts.

A thousand shapes you wear with ease,
And still in every shape you please.
Now wrapt in some mysterious dream,
A lone philosopher you seem;

* Æolus's Harp is a musical instrument, which plays with the wind, invented by Mr. Oswald; its properties are fully described in the Castle of Indolence.

† Jeremiah.

Now quick from hill to vale you fly,
And now you sweep the vaulted sky,
A shepherd next, you haunt the plain,
And warble forth your oaten strain.
A lover now, with all the grace
Of that sweet passion in your face:
Then, calm'd to friendship, you assume
The gentle-looking Harford's bloom,
As, with her Musidora, she
(Her Musidora fond of thee)
Amid the long withdrawing vale,
Awakes the rival'd nightingale.

Thine is the balmy breath of morn,
Just as the dew-bent rose is born;
And while meridian fervors beat,
Thine is the woodland dumb retreat;
But chief, when evening scenes decay,
And the faint landscape swims away,
Thine is the doubtful soft decline,
And that best hour of musing thine.

Descending angels bless thy train,
The virtues of the sage, and swain;
Plain innocence in white array'd,
Before thee lifts her fearless head:
Religion's beams around thee shine,
And cheer thy glooms with light divine:
About thee sports sweet liberty;
And wrapt Urania sings to thee.

Oh, let me pierce thy secret cell!
And in thy deep recesses dwell;
Perhaps from Norwood's oak-clad hill,
When meditation has her fill,
I just may cast my careless eyes
Where London's spiry turrets rise,
Think of its crimes, its cares, its pain,
Then shield me in the woods again.

PROLOGUE.

TO MR. MALLET'S MUSTAPHA.

SINCE Athens first began to draw mankind,
To picture life, and show th' impassion'd mind;
The truly wise have ever deem'd the stage
The moral school of each enlighten'd age.
There, in full pomp, the tragic muse appears,
Queen of soft sorrows, and of useful fears.
Faint is the lesson reason'd rules impart:
She pours it strong and instant through the heart.
If virtue is the theme; we sudden glow
With generous flame: and, what we feel, we grow.

If vice she paints; indignant passions rise:
The villain sees himself with loathing eyes.
His soul starts, conscious, at another's groan:
And the pale tyrant trembles on his throne.

To-night our meaning scene attempts to show
What fell events from dark suspicion flow;
Chief when it taints a lawless monarch's mind,
To the false herd of flattering slaves confin'd.
The soul sinks gradual to so dire a state;
Ev'n excellence but serves to feed its hate:
To hate remorseless, cruelty succeeds.
And every worth, and every virtue bleeds.

Behold, our author at your bar appears,
His modest hopes depress'd by conscious fears.
Faults he has many—But to balance those,
His verse with heart-felt love of virtue glows,

All flighter errors let indulgence spare :
And be his equal trial full and fair.
For this best British privilege we call ;
Then—as he merits, let him stand, or fall.

DENNIS TO MR. THOMSON,

Who had procured him a Benefit-Night.

REFLECTING on thy worth, methinks I find,
Thy various Seasons in their author's mind.
Spring opes her blossoms, various as thy muse,
And, like thy soft compassion, sheds her dews.
Summer's hot drought in thy expression glows,
And o'er each page a tawny ripeness throws.
Autumn's rich fruits th' instructed reader gains,
Who tastes the meaning purpose of thy strains,
Winter—but that no semblance takes from thee ;
That hoary season yields a type of me.

Shatter'd by time's bleak storms I withering lay,
Leafless, and whitening in a cold decay !
Yet shall my prople's ivy, pale and bent,
Bless the short sunshine which thy pity lent.

EPITAPH ON MR. THOMSON.

OTHERS to marble may their glory owe,
And boast those honours sculpture can bestow ;
Short-liv'd renown ! that every moment must
Sink with its emblem, and consume to dust !
But Thomson needs no artist to engrave,
From dumb oblivion no device to save ;
Such vulgar aids let names inferior ask ;
Nature for him assumes herself the task ;
The Seasons are his monuments of fame,
With them to flourish, as from them it came.

THE LIFE OF WATTS.

OF the life of WATTS the memorials are not so copious as might be expected; "not because there was no friend," says Dr. Gibbons, "who would willingly pay that respect to his memory as to write the history of his life, but because he himself disapproved it; for when he has been desired to leave some memoirs that might furnish such a history, he absolutely declined it, and desired that his character might stand in the world merely as it would appear in his works."

In compliance, however, with custom, "as well as to preserve the memory of so respectable a character, some brief memoirs of his life" were given to the world by Dr. Jennings, in his funeral sermon, preached December 11. 1748; which, with some additions, were prefixed by Dr. Gibbons to the collection of his works, in 6 vol. 4to. 1754.

The facts stated in the present account are chiefly taken from the "Memoirs" of Dr. Jennings, and the subsequent narratives of Dr. Gibbons and Dr. Johnson, by whose recommendation his poems and those of Pomfret, Yalden, and Blackmore, were inserted in the Collection of "The English Poets," 1779.

Isaac Watts was born at Southampton, July 17. 1674, of parents who were eminent for religion, and considerable sufferers, for conscience sake, in the persecution of the Protestant dissenters in the reign of Charles II. His father, Isaac Watts, is said to have kept a boarding-school for young gentlemen in the town of Southampton, and appears, from the narrative of Dr. Gibbons, to have been neither indigent nor illiterate.

He was the eldest of nine children, and, from his infancy, discovered a remarkable propensity to learning; and was early distinguished for the sprightliness and vivacity of his wit, which, even in the years of younger life, was regulated by a deep sense of religion. He began, we are told, to learn Latin when he was four years old, probably at home. He was afterwards taught Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, by the Rev. Mr. Pinhorne, master of the free school at Southampton, to whom he afterwards gratefully inscribed a Latin Ode in his Hore Lyricæ.

His proficiency at school was so conspicuous, that a subscription was proposed to support him at the University; but he declared his resolution of adhering to the dissenters, among whom he had been educated. "Such he was," says Dr. Johnson, "as every Christian church would rejoice to have adopted."

In 1690, he was sent to an academy in London, taught by Mr. Rowe, where he had for his fellow students in logic and philosophy, Hughes, Mr. Samuel Say, and Dr. Horte, afterwards archbishop of Tuam. His gratitude has inscribed an Ode to his tutor in his Hore Lyricæ.—With Hughes he maintained a friendly and poetical correspondence till the death of that amiable poet in 1720. Mr. Say, after having been some years pastor of a dissenting congregation at Ipswich, succeeded Dr. Calamy in Westminster in 1733. Soon after his death, which happened April 12. 1743, his "Poems," and two Essays in prose, were published, in 1 vol. 4to. by subscription. The essays, one of which is "on the harmony, variety, and power of numbers in general," and the other "on those of Paradise Lost in particular," have been much admired.—Some Latin essays, supposed to have been written as exercises at this academy, shew a degree of knowledge both philosophical and theological, such as very few attain by a longer course of study.

He was, as he himself informs us, addicted to versifying from the age of fifteen; and in his youth he appears to have cultivated Latin poetry. His verses to his brother, in the Glyconic measure, written when he was seventeen, are remarkably easy and elegant. His method of study was to impress the contents of his books upon his memory, by abridging them, and by interleaving them, to amplify one system with supplements from another.

While he was under the tuition of Mr. Rowe, his behaviour was not only so inoffensive, that he declared he never once gave him occasion for reproof, but so exemplary, that he often proposed him as a pattern to his other pupils.

In 1693, in his nineteenth year, he joined in communion with the congregation of which Mr. Rowe was pastor.

The year following, he left the academy, and spent two years in study and devotion at the house of his father, who treated him with great tenderness, and had the happiness indulged to few parents, of living to see his son eminent for literature, and venerable for piety.

In 1696, he was invited by Sir John Hartopp, Bart. to reside in his family at Stoke Newington, as tutor to his son; where he continued about four years, and acquitted himself with fidelity and reputation.

In that time he applied himself to the study of the Holy Scriptures, and to the reading of the best commentators, both critical and practical, preparatory to his undertaking the pastoral office, to which he was determined to devote his life, and of the importance of which he had a deep sense upon his mind.

He began to preach on his birth-day 1698, when he had completed his thirty-fourth year; and was the same year chosen assistant to Dr. Isaac Chauncy, and met with general acceptance.

In March 1702, he succeeded Dr. Chauncy in his ministerial office; but soon after his entrance on his charge, he was seized by a dangerous illness, which sunk him to such weakness that the congregation thought an assistant necessary, and appointed Mr. Samuel Price, in July 1703.

His health then returned gradually, and he performed his duty till September 1712, when he was seized by a fever of such violence and continuance, that, from the feebleness which it brought upon him, he never perfectly recovered. It was not till October 1716 that he was able to return to his public ministry. In the mean time, his assistant Mr. Price, was, at his desire, and by his recommendation, chosen by the congregation to be joint pastor with him.

The languishing state of his health drew upon him the attention of Sir Thomas Abney, who received him into his house; where, with a constancy of friendship and uniformity of conduct not often to be found, he was treated for thirty-six years with all the kindness that friendship could prompt, and all the attention that respect could dictate. Sir Thomas died about eight years afterwards; but he continued with Lady Abney and her daughter to the end of his life. The Lady died about a year after him.

A connection like this, in which the notions of patronage and dependence were overpowered by the perception of reciprocal benefits, deserves a particular memorial: and if the following quotation from Dr. Gibbons's narrative appear long, let it be considered, that it comprises an account of thirty-six years.

"Our next observation shall be made upon that remarkably kind providence which brought the Doctor into Sir Thomas Abney's family, and continued him there till his death, a period of no less than thirty-six years. In the midst of his sacred labours for the glory of God, and good of his generation, he is seized with a most violent and threatening fever, which leaves him oppressed with great weakness, and puts a stop at least to his public services for four years. In this distressing season, doubly so to his active and pious spirit, he is invited to Sir Thomas Abney's family; nor ever removes from it till he had finished his days. Here he enjoyed the uninterrupted demonstrations of the truest friendship. Here, without any care of his own, he had every thing which could contribute to the enjoyment of life, and favour the unwearied pursuits of his studies. Here he dwelt in a family which, for piety, order, harmony, and every virtue, was an house of God. Here he had the privilege of a country recess, the fragrant bower, the spreading lawn, the flowery garden, and other advantages, to soothe his mind and aid his restoration to health; to yield him whenever he chose them, most grateful intervals from his laborious studies, and enable him to return to them with redoubled vigour and delight. Had it not been for this happy event, he might, as to outward view, have feebly, it may be painfully, dragged on through many more years of languor and inability for public service, and even for profitable study, or perhaps might have sunk into his grave under the overwhelming load of infirmities in the midst of his days; and thus the church and the world would have been deprived of those many excellent sermons and works which he drew up and published during his long residence in this family. In a few years after his coming hither, Sir Thomas Abney dies: but his amiable consort survives, who shows the Doctor the same respect and friendship as before; and most happily for him, and great numbers besides; for, as her riches were great, her generosity and munificence were in full proportion. Her thread of life was drawn out to a great age, even beyond that of the Doctor's; and thus this excellent man, through her kindness, and that of her daughter, the present Mrs. Elizabeth Abney, who, in a like degree, esteemed and honoured him, enjoyed all the benefits and felicities he experienced at his first entrance into this family, till his days were numbered and finished, and, like a shock of corn in its season, he ascended into the regions of perfect and immortal life and joy."

From the time of his reception into this family, his life was no otherwise diversified than by successive public avocations; the number and variety of which show the intenseness of his industry, and the extent of his capacity.

In 1728, the universities of Edinburgh and Aberdeen, with great propriety, and without his knowledge, conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Academical honours, Dr. Johnson observes, would have more value if they were always bestowed with equal judgment.

He continued many years to study and to preach, and to do good by his instruction and example, till at last the infirmities of age disabled him from the more laborious part of his ministerial functions; and being no longer capable of public duty, he offered to remit the salary appendant to it; but his congregation would not accept the resignation.

By degrees his weakness increased, and at last confined him to his chamber and his bed, where he was worn gradually away without pain, till he expired November 25. 1748, in the 75th year of his age.

He left his brother, Mr. Enoch Watts, and Nathaniel Neal, Esq. an eminent attorney in London, son of the Rev. Daniel Neal, author of the "History of the Puritans," and nephew of Dr. Lardner, his joint executors. His manuscripts, by the direction of his will, were committed to the care of Dr. Doddridge and Dr. Jennings. The latter writes Dr. Doddridge, Jan. 5. 1748-9. "I believe we shall not have near so much trouble in publishing the Doctor's manuscripts as I expected. I learn from Mr. Parker [Watts' Amanuensis] there is little, if any thing more, remaining of that sort than the second part of the Improvement of the Mind. He tells me there are also some miscellaneous things in the manner of his Reliquiæ Juveniles. If I should be engaged" he adds "in drawing up the Doctor's character, I am much obliged to you for the judicious hints you have furnished me with for that purpose." His funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Jennings, December 11. 1748.

His Works, in prose and verse, published by himself, together with his manuscripts, revised and corrected by Dr. Jennings and Dr. Doddridge, were collected and published in 6 vol. 4to. 1754, by Dr. Gibbons, who prefixed a short account of his life and character.

A summary account of the contents of the several volumes, pointing out the dates of the more considerable pieces, and interspersing such remarks as may serve to delineate his character as a writer, may enable the reader to form a consistent idea of his extensive genius, accomplished learning, and truly amiable and benevolent temper.

The First Volume contains, Forty-four Sermons on various subjects, divine and moral, with Hymns annexed, suited to each subject. They were first published in three separate volumes 12mo. in 1721, 1723, and 1727. In the 5th edition they were reduced to 2 vol. 8vo.—The World to come, or Discourses on the Joys or Sorrows of Departed Souls at Death, and the Glory or Terror of the Resurrection, published in 2 vol. 8vo. 1739 and 1745. To these discourses is prefixed an Essay towards a proof of a separate state of Souls between Death and the Resurrection, and the commencement of the Rewards of Virtue and Vice immediately after Death; first printed in 1732, without his name.—Nine Sermons upon some of the principal heads of the Christian Religion, preached at the Lecture in Berry-street, 1733, and printed in 1735.

The Second Volume contains, Twelve Evangelical Discourses on several subjects, with an Essay on the Powers of Flesh and Spirit.—Death and Heaven, in two funeral discourses in memory of Sir John Hartopp and his Lady, first printed in 1722.—The Strength and Weakness of Human Reason, in four conferences, without his name.—Humility represented in the character of St. Paul, 1737, with some additional observations from his MS.—A Defence against the Temptations to Self-murder, 1726.—The Holiness of Times, and Places, and People, 1738.—A Caveat against Infidelity, or the Danger of Apostacy from the Christian Faith, composed in 1722, but not printed till 1729.—The Harmony of all the Religions which God ever revealed, 1742.—The Doctrine of the Passions explained and improved, which at first stood as an introduction to the Discourses of the Love of God, &c. 1729, but was enlarged and published separately, 1734.—Discourses of the Love of God, and its Influence on all the Passions, with a Devout Meditation annexed to each subject, 1729, 1734.—An Essay towards the encouragement of Charity Schools, 1728.—A Sermon for the Reformation of Manners, 1707.—A Sermon on the death of George I. 1727.

The Third Volume contains, A Humble Attempt towards the Revival of Practical Religion, 1731.—A Guide to Prayer, or a Free and Rational Account of the Gift, Grace, and Spirit of Prayer.—A Discourse on Catechisms, with Catechisms adapted to the various ages and capacities of Children and Youth, 1730.—A Short View of the whole Scripture History.—Prayers composed for the Use and Imitation of Children, 1728. Questions proper for Students in Divinity, Candidates of the Ministry, and Young Christians.—Orthodoxy and Charity United, in several Reconciling Essays on the Law and Gospel, Faith and Works.—Self-love and Virtue reconciled only by Religion.—An Essay to prove that the only effectual obligation of Mankind to practise Virtue depends on the Existence and Will of God, with an occasional proof of the Necessity of Revelation.—The Redeemer and the Sanctifier, or the Sacrifice of Christ, and the Operation of the Spirit Vindicated, without his name, 1736.

The Fourth Volume contains chiefly Poetical Compositions. The Psalms of David imitated in the language of the New Testament, 1718.—Hymns and Spiritual Songs, in Three Books, 1707.—A Short Essay towards the Improvement of Psalmody, 1707.—Divine Songs and Hymns attempted in easy language, for the use of children, 1715.—Horæ Lyricæ, poems chiefly of the Lyric kind, in Three Books, 1706; reprinted with the Divine and Moral Songs, in the collection of "the English Poets," 1779 and 1790, and inserted in the present collection. The preface contains an interesting account of his poetical studies, and an animated defence of sacred poetry.—Reliquiæ Juveniles, Miscellaneous Thoughts, in prose and verse, on Natural, Moral, and Divine Subjects, 1734.—Remnants of Time employed in Prose and Verse; printed from his MS.—The Art of Reading and Writing English, 1720.

The Fifth Volume comprises his Philosophical Writings. Logic, or the Right Use of Reason in the Inquiry after Truth.—The Improvement of the Mind, or a Supplement to the Art of Logic, in Two Parts, the second printed from his MS.—A Discourse on the Education of Children and Youth; printed from his MS.—The Knowledge of the Heavens and Earth made easy, or the First Principles of Astronomy and Geography explained by the use of Globes and Maps, 1725.—Philosophical Essays on Various Subjects, Air, Space, Substance, Body, Spirit, Innate Ideas, &c.; with Remarks on Mr. Locke's "Essay on the Human Understanding."—A Brief Scheme of Ontology, or the Science of Being in general, annexed to the Philosophical Essays, and in the first edition, 1733.

The Sixth Volume contains his Controversial Writings. The Rational Foundation of a Christian Church, and the terms of Christian Communion, 1747.—A New Essay on Civil Power in Things sacred, occasioned by the application to parliament for the Explication or Repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, and printed without his name, 1739.—The Ruin and Recovery of Mankind, or an Attempt to vindicate the Scriptural Account of these great events, upon the plain Principles of Reason, occasioned by Dr. Taylor's "Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin," and Dr. Balguy's "Essay on Redemption," printed without his name.—An Essay on the Freedom of Will in God, and the Creatures, and on various subjects connected therewith, printed without his name, 1733.—The Christian Doctrine of the Trinity, &c. 1722.—Seven Dissertations relating to the Christian Doctrine of the Trinity, 1724.—Useful and important questions concerning Jesus the Son of God, freely proposed; printed without his name, 1746. And the Glory of Christ, as God-man, displayed, in Three Discourses; printed without his name, 1746.

In an assemblage of writings, both in prose and verse, of such uncommon variety, the attentive and judicious will certainly discern the marks of eminent capacity, and assiduous application, and will be disposed to make candid allowances for some instances of peculiar sentiments and language, which may not so exactly correspond with their own judgment and taste. His early relish for poetry may probably have occasioned such a florid diction, such a diffusive and pathetic style, as some critics of a severer turn of thought may be ready to object to, as not so properly adapted to theological discourses, whether popular or polemical; but, when every deduction is made which criticism requires, very considerable supplies of instruction and entertainment will be communicated to those who carefully peruse, and thoroughly digest, his more elaborate and judicious compositions.

An opinion has obtained, that in his latter days he changed his sentiments concerning the Trinity. In his MS. correspondence with the Rev. Martin Tomkins, on the worship of the Holy Spirit, published by the Rev. S. Palmer, 1793, he confesses, that "he wished some things were corrected."

concerning the Trinitarian doxologies in his books of Hymns; but then, he continues, "the question with me is this: as I wrote them in sincerity at that time, is it not more for the edification of Christians, and the glory of God, to let them stand, than to ruin the usefulness of the whole work by correcting them now, and perhaps bring further and false suspicions on my present opinions? Besides, I might tell you I sold the copy to Mr. Laurence, and his posterity make money of it to this day, and I can scarce claim a right to make any alteration in the book which would injure the sale of it."

On this passage it is obvious to remark, that he wished that some things in his doxologies were corrected; but how far he changed his sentiments with respect to the Trinity, before his death, cannot, perhaps, be fully ascertained, though it is probable he died in the faith for which he so zealously contended in his writings.

His intellectual and moral accomplishments are universally allowed to have been, in the highest degree, respectable and amiable. The natural strength of his genius, which he cultivated and improved by a very considerable acquaintance with the most celebrated writers, both ancient and modern, enriched his mind with a large and uncommon store of just sentiments and useful knowledge of various kinds. The extent and sublimity of his imagination, a quickness of apprehension, and solidity of judgment, together with a faithful memory, gave him a remarkable pre-eminence. As a Christian, he was eminent for pure and undissembled piety, humility, candour, and charity. He maintained a free and friendly correspondence with Christians of different parties and denominations. He engaged in controversy with a pacific view to heal, and reconcile disputes among Christians, rather than to make proselytes to any party; and wrote with such a spirit of meekness and love, as is truly instructive and exemplary. The goodness of his heart was displayed in liberal and beneficent actions: and during the last thirty years of his life, he constantly devoted a fifth part of his income, which did not exceed a hundred a-year, to charitable uses. His patience and resignation to the will of God, in seasons of affliction, were eminently approved.

As a poet, his compositions are characterised by a happy, and sometimes an incomparable freedom of versification, of spirit, and of piety; and it may be said, in his own words, in the Two Happy Rivals, that, in his Odes,

A thousand loose Pindaric plumes fly scattering down the wind.

His poetry is chiefly devotional; in regard to which Dr. Johnson affirms, that "it is sufficient for Watts to have done better than others, what no man has done well." He had alleged just before, that "the paucity of topics of devotional poetry enforces perpetual repetition," which is indeed not void of truth, and that the "sanctity of the matter rejects the ornaments of the figurative diction;" but he must have confessed, that the psalmist and prophets seem to have afforded examples to the contrary.

Watts, it may be worth remembering, was "a gentleman of the first edition" of the "Dunciad," on account of his Psalms, which are deservedly in great estimation; but observing to Mr. Richardson the painter, that Pope professed to satirize none but those who attacked him, which he never had; and this being represented to the satirist, in the next edition his name was omitted.

With Dr. Johnson, the leading feature of whose mind was religion, Watts may be expected to have been a favourite; and it is but doing him justice to acknowledge, that though he is not remarkable for paying compliments to the dissenters, he has delineated his character with liberality and candour. To his opinion of Watts's poetry the present writer has little to object; and most of those, he believes, who interest themselves in the poetical reputation of Watts, will be inclined to forgive his biographer for some asperities, in consideration of the unqualified applause bestowed on his "piety and innocence," his "fidelity and diligence," his "gentleness and modesty," his "charity and moderation."

"He was one of the first authors that taught the dissenters to court attention by the graces of language. He shewed them that zeal and purity might be expressed and enforced by polished diction."

"In the pulpit, though his low stature, which very little exceeded five feet, graced him with no advantage of appearance, yet the gravity and propriety of his utterance made his discourses very efficacious. Such was his flow of thoughts, and such his promptitude of language, that in the

The preface contains an interesting account of his poetical studies, and an animated defence of sacred poetry.—Reliquiæ Juveniles, Miscellaneous Thoughts, in prose and verse, on Natural, Moral, and Divine Subjects, 1734.—Remnants of Time employed in Prose and Verse; printed from his MS.—The Art of Reading and Writing English, 1720.

The Fifth Volume comprises his Philosophical Writings. Logic, or the Right Use of Reason in the Inquiry after Truth.—The Improvement of the Mind, or a Supplement to the Art of Logic, in Two Parts, the second printed from his MS.—A Discourse on the Education of Children and Youth; printed from his MS.—The Knowledge of the Heavens and Earth made easy, or the First Principles of Astronomy and Geography explained by the use of Globes and Maps, 1725.—Philosophical Essays on Various Subjects, Air, Space, Substance, Body, Spirit, Innate Ideas, &c.; with Remarks on Mr. Locke's "Essay on the Human Understanding."—A Brief Scheme of Ontology, or the Science of Being in general, annexed to the Philosophical Essays, and in the first edition, 1733.

The Sixth Volume contains his Controversial Writings. The Rational Foundation of a Christian Church, and the terms of Christian Communion, 1747.—A New Essay on Civil Power in Things sacred, occasioned by the application to parliament for the Explication or Repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, and printed without his name, 1739.—The Ruin and Recovery of Mankind, or an Attempt to vindicate the Scriptural Account of these great events, upon the plain Principles of Reason, occasioned by Dr. Taylor's "Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin," and Dr. Balguy's "Essay on Redemption," printed without his name.—An Essay on the Freedom of Will in God, and the Creatures, and on various subjects connected therewith, printed without his name, 1733.—The Christian Doctrine of the Trinity, &c. 1722.—Seven Dissertations relating to the Christian Doctrine of the Trinity, 1724.—Useful and important questions concerning Jesus the Son of God, freely proposed; printed without his name, 1746. And the Glory of Christ, as God-man, displayed, in Three Discourses; printed without his name, 1746.

In an assemblage of writings, both in prose and verse, of such uncommon variety, the attentive and judicious will certainly discern the marks of eminent capacity, and assiduous application, and will be disposed to make candid allowances for some instances of peculiar sentiments and language, which may not so exactly correspond with their own judgment and taste. His early relish for poetry may probably have occasioned such a florid diction, such a diffusive and pathetic style, as some critics of a severer turn of thought may be ready to object to, as not so properly adapted to theological discourses, whether popular or polemical; but, when every deduction is made which criticism requires, very considerable supplies of instruction and entertainment will be communicated to those who carefully peruse, and thoroughly digest, his more elaborate and judicious compositions.

An opinion has obtained, that in his latter days he changed his sentiments concerning the Trinity. In his MS. correspondence with the Rev. Martin Tomkins, on the worship of the Holy Spirit, published by the Rev. S. Palmer, 1793, he confesses, that "he wished some things were corrected"

concerning the Trinitarian doxologies in his books of Hymns; but then, he continues, "the question with me is this: as I wrote them in sincerity at that time, is it not more for the edification of Christians, and the glory of God, to let them stand, than to ruin the usefulness of the whole work by correcting them now, and perhaps bring further and false suspicions on my present opinions? Besides, I might tell you I sold the copy to Mr. Laurence, and his posterity make money of it to this day, and I can scarce claim a right to make any alteration in the book which would injure the sale of it."

On this passage it is obvious to remark, that he wished that some things in his doxologies were corrected; but how far he changed his sentiments with respect to the Trinity, before his death, cannot, perhaps, be fully ascertained, though it is probable he died in the faith for which he so zealously contended in his writings.

His intellectual and moral accomplishments are universally allowed to have been, in the highest degree, respectable and amiable. The natural strength of his genius, which he cultivated and improved by a very considerable acquaintance with the most celebrated writers, both ancient and modern, enriched his mind with a large and uncommon store of just sentiments and useful knowledge of various kinds. The extent and sublimity of his imagination, a quickness of apprehension, and solidity of judgment, together with a faithful memory, gave him a remarkable pre-eminence. As a Christian, he was eminent for pure and undissembled piety, humility, candour, and charity. He maintained a free and friendly correspondence with Christians of different parties and denominations. He engaged in controversy with a pacific view to heal, and reconcile disputes among Christians, rather than to make proselytes to any party; and wrote with such a spirit of meekness and love, as is truly instructive and exemplary. The goodness of his heart was displayed in liberal and beneficent actions: and during the last thirty years of his life, he constantly devoted a fifth part of his income, which did not exceed a hundred a-year, to charitable uses. His patience and resignation to the will of God, in seasons of affliction, were eminently approved.

As a poet, his compositions are characterised by a happy, and sometimes an incomparable freedom of versification, of spirit, and of piety; and it may be said, in his own words, in the Two Happy Rivals, that, in his Odes,

A thousand loose Pindaric plumes fly scattering down the wind.

His poetry is chiefly devotional; in regard to which Dr. Johnson affirms, that "it is sufficient for Watts to have done better than others, what no man has done well." He had alleged just before, that "the paucity of topics of devotional poetry enforces perpetual repetition," which is indeed not void of truth, and that the "sanctity of the matter rejects the ornaments of the figurative diction;" but he must have confessed, that the psalmist and prophets seem to have afforded examples to the contrary.

Watts, it may be worth remembering, was "a gentleman of the first edition" of the "Dunciad," on account of his Psalms, which are deservedly in great estimation; but observing to Mr. Richardson the painter, that Pope professed to satirize none but those who attacked him, which he never had; and this being represented to the satirist, in the next edition his name was omitted.

With Dr. Johnson, the leading feature of whose mind was religion, Watts may be expected to have been a favourite; and it is but doing him justice to acknowledge, that though he is not remarkable for paying compliments to the dissenters, he has delineated his character with liberality and candour. To his opinion of Watts's poetry the present writer has little to object; and most of those, he believes, who interest themselves in the poetical reputation of Watts, will be inclined to forgive his biographer for some asperities, in consideration of the unqualified applause bestowed on his "piety and innocence," his "fidelity and diligence," his "gentleness and modesty," his "charity and moderation."

"He was one of the first authors that taught the dissenters to court attention by the graces of language. He shewed them that zeal and purity might be expressed and enforced by polished diction."

"In the pulpit, though his low stature, which very little exceeded five feet, graced him with no advantage of appearance, yet the gravity and propriety of his utterance made his discourses very efficacious. Such was his flow of thoughts, and such his promptitude of language, that in the latter part of his life he did not precompose his cursory sermons; but having adjusted the heads, and sketched out some particulars, trusted for success to his extemporary powers.

“ To stated and public instruction, he added familiar visits and personal application; and was careful to improve the opportunities which conversation offered, of diffusing and increasing the influence of religion.

“ By his natural temper, he was quick of resentment; but by his established and habitual practice, he was gentle, modest, and inoffensive. He condescended to lay aside the scholar, the philosopher, and the wit, to write little poems of devotion, and systems of instruction, adapted to the wants and capacities of children, from the dawn of reason, through its gradations of advance in the morning of life. Every man, acquainted with the common principles of human actions, will look with veneration on the writer, who is at one time combating Locke, and at another time making a Catechism for children in their fourth year.

“ As his mind was capacious, his curiosity excursive, and his industry continual, his writings are very numerous, and his subjects various. With his theological works, I am only enough acquainted to admire his meekness of opposition, and his mildness of censure. It was not only in his books, but in his mind, that orthodoxy was united with charity.

“ Of his philosophical pieces, his Logic has been received into the universities, and therefore wants no private recommendation: if he owes part of it to Le Clerc, it must be considered that no man who undertakes merely to methodize or illustrate a system, pretends to be the author.

“ Few books have been perused by me with greater pleasure than his Improvement of the Mind, of which the radical principle may indeed be found in Locke's “ Conduct of the Understanding ;” but they are so expanded and ramified by Watts, as to confer upon him the merit of a work in the highest degree useful and pleasing. Whoever has the care of instructing others, may be charged with deficiency in his duty if this book is not recommended.

“ As piety predominated in his mind, it is diffused over his works: Under his direction it may be truly said Theologia Philosophia ancillatur, philosophy is subservient to evangelical instruction: it is difficult to read a page without learning, or at least wishing to be better. The attention is caught by indirect instruction; and he that sat down only to reason, is in a sudden compelled to pray.

“ Few men have left behind such purity of character, or such monuments of laborious piety. He has provided instruction for all ages, from those who are lisping their first lessons, to the enlightened readers of Malbranche and Locke. He has left neither corporeal nor spiritual nature unexamined; he has taught the art of reasoning and the science of the stars.

“ His character, therefore, must be formed from the multiplicity and diversity of his attainments rather than from any single performance: for it would not be safe to claim for him the highest rank in any single denomination of literary dignity; yet perhaps there was nothing in which he would not have excelled, if he had not divided his powers to different pursuits.

“ As a poet, had he been only a poet, he would probably have stood high among the authors with whom he is now associated. For his judgment was clear, and he noted beauties and faults with very nice discernment; his imagination, as the Dacian Battle proves, was vigorous and active, and the stores of knowledge were large by which his fancy was to be supplied. His ear was well tuned, and his diction was elegant and copious. But his devotional poetry is like that of others, unsatisfactory. The paucity of its topics enforces perpetual repetition, and the sanctity of the matter rejects the ornaments of figurative diction. It is sufficient for Watts to have done better than others, what no man has done well.

“ His poems on other subjects seldom rise higher than might be expected from the amusements of a man of letters, and have different degrees of value as they are more or less laboured, or as the occasion was more or less favourable to invention.

“ He writes too often without regular measure, and too often in blank verse: the rhymes are not always sufficiently correspondent. He is particularly unhappy in coining names expressive of characters. His lines are commonly smooth and easy, and his thoughts always religiously pure; but who is there that to so much piety and innocence does not wish for a greater measure of sprightliness and vigour? He is at least one of the few poets with whom youth and ignorance may safely be pleased; and happy will be that reader whose mind is disposed by his verses, or his prose, copy his benevolence to man, and his reverence to God!”

RECOMMENDATORY VERSES.

ON READING MR. WATTS'S POEMS, SACRED TO PIETY AND DEVOTION.

REGARD the man who in seraphic lays,
And flowing numbers, sings his Maker's praise:
He needs invoke no fabled muse's art,
The heavenly song comes genuine from his heart.
From that pure heart, which God has deign'd to inspire
With holy raptures, and a sacred fire.
Thrice happy man! whose soul and guiltless breast,
Are well prepar'd to lodge th' Almighty guest!
'Tis he that lends thy towering thoughts their
wing,
And tunes thy lyre, when thou attempt'st to sing:
He to thy soul lets in celestial day,
Ev'n whilst imprison'd in this mortal clay.
By death's grim aspect thou art not alarm'd,
He, for thy sake, has death itself disarm'd;
Nor shall the grave o'er thee a victory boast;
Her triumph in thy rising shall be lost,
When thou shalt join th' angelic choirs above,
In never-ending songs of praise and love.

EUSEBIA.

TO MR. WATTS, ON HIS POEMS.

To murmuring streams, in tender strains;
My pensive muse no more
Of love's enchanting force complains,
Along the flowery shore.

No more Mirtillo's fatal face
My quiet breast alarms,
His eyes, his air, and youthful grace,
Have lost their usual charms.

No gay ALEXIS in the grove
Shall be my future theme:
I burn with an immortal love,
And sing a purer flame.

Seraphic heights I seem to gain,
And sacred transports feel,
While WATTS, to thy celestial strain,
Surpris'd, I listen still.

The gliding streams their course forbear,
When I thy lays repeat;
The bending forest lends an ear;
The birds their notes forget.

With such a graceful harmony
Thy numbers still prolong;
And let remotest lands reply,
And echo to thy song.

Far as the distant regions, where
The beauteous morning springs,
And scatters odours through the air,
From her resplendent wings;

Unto the new-found realms, which see
The latter sun arise,
When, with an easy progress, he
Rolls down the nether skies.

PHILOMELA *.

TO MR. WATTS, ON READING HIS MORÆ LYRICE.

HAIL, heaven-born Muse! that with celestial
flame,

And high seraphic numbers, durst attempt
To gain thy native skies. No common theme
Merits thy thought, self-conscious of a soul
Superior, though on earth detain'd a while;
Like some propitious angel, that's design'd
A resident in this inferior orb,
To guide the wandering souls to heavenly bliss,
Thou seem'st; while thou their everlasting songs
Hast sung to mortal ears, and down to earth
Transferr'd the work of heaven; with thought
sublime,

And high sonorous words, thou sweetly sing'st
To thy immortal lyre. Amaz'd, we view
The towering height stupendous, while thou soar'st
Above the reach of vulgar eyes or thought,
Hymning th' Eternal Father; as of old
When first th' Almighty from the dark abyss
Of everlasting night and silence call'd
The shining worlds with one creating word,
And rais'd from nothing all the heavenly hosts,
And with external glories fill'd the void,
Harmonious seraphs tun'd their golden harps,
And with their cheerful hallelujahs blest'd
The bounteous author of their happiness;
From orb to orb th' alternate music rang,
And from the crystal arches of the sky
Reach'd our then glorious world, the native seat

Of the first happy pair, who join'd their songs
To the loud echoes of th' angelic choirs,
And fill'd with blissful hymns, terrestrial heaven,
The paradise of God, where all delights
Abounded, and the pure ambrosial air,
Fann'd by mild zephyrs, breath'd eternal sweets,
Forbidding death and sorrow, and bestow'd
Fresh heavenly bloom, and gay immortal youth.

Not so, alas! the vile apostate race,
Who in mad joys their brutal hours employ'd,
Assaulting with their impious blasphemies
The Power supreme that give them life and breath;
Incarnate fiends! outrageous they defy'd
Th' Eternal's thunder and almighty wrath
Fearless provok'd, which all the other devils
Would dread to meet; remembering well the day
When, driven from pure immortal seats above,
A fiery tempest hurl'd them down the skies,
And hung upon the rear, urging their fall
To the dark, deep, unfathomable gulf,
Where bound on sulphurous lakes to glowing rocks
With adamant chains, they wail their woes,
And know Jehovah great as well as good;
And fix'd for ever by eternal fate,
With horror find his arm omnipotent.

Prodigious madness! that the sacred muse,
First taught in heaven to mount immortal heights,
And trace the boundless glories of the sky,
Should now to every idol basely bow,
And curse the Deity she once ador'd,
Erecting trophies to each sordid vice,
And celebrating the infernal praise
Of haughty Lucifer, the desperate foe
Of God and man, and winning every hour
New votaries to hell, while all the fiends
Hear these accursed lays, and, thus outdone,
Raging they try to match the human race,
Redoubling all their hellish blasphemies,
And with loud curses rend the gloomy vault.

Ungrateful mortals! ah! too late you'll find
What 'tis to banter heaven, and laugh at hell;
To dress up vice in false delusive charms,
And with gay colours paint her hideous face,
Leading besotted souls through flowery paths,
In gaudy dreams, and vain fantastic joys,
To dismal scenes of everlasting woe;
When the great Judge shall rear his awful throne,
And raging flames surround the trembling globe,
While the loud thunders roar from pole to pole,
And the last trump awakes the sleeping dead;
And guilty souls to ghastly bodies driven,
Within those dire eternal prisons shut,
Expect their sad inexorable doom.
Say now, ye men of wit! what turn of thought
Will please you then! Alas, how dull and poor,
Ev'n to yourselves, will your lewd flights appear!
How will you envy then the happy fate
Of idiots! and perhaps in vain you'll wish,
You'd been as very fools as once you thought
Others, for the sublimest wisdom scorn'd;
When pointed lightnings from the wrathful Judge
Shall singe your blighted laurels, and the men
Who thought they flew so high, shall fall so low.

No more, my Muse, of that tremendous thought;

Resume thy more delightful theme, and sing
Th' immortal man, that with immortal verie

Rivals the hymns of angels, and like them
Despises mortal critics' idle rules:
While the celestial flame that warms thy soul
Inspires us, and with holy transports moves
Our labouring minds, and nobler scenes presents
Than all the Pagan poets ever sung,
Homer, or Virgil; and far sweeter notes
Than Horace ever taught his sounding lyre,
And purer far, though Martial's self might seem
A modest poet in our Christian days.
May those forgotten and neglected lie,
No more let men be fond of fabulous gods,
Nor Heathen wit debauch one Christian line,
While with the coarse and daubing paint we hide
The shining beauties of eternal truth,
That in her native dress appears most bright,
And charms the eyes of angels.---Oh! like thee
Let every nobler genius tune his voice
To subjects worthy of their towering thoughts.
Let Heaven and Anna then your tuneful art
Improve, and consecrate your deathless lays
To him who reigns above, and her who rules below.

JOSEPH STANDEN.

TO MR. WATTS, ON HIS DIVINE POEMS.

SAY, human seraph, whence that charming force,
That flame! that soul! which animates each line;
And how it runs with such a graceful ease,
Loaded with ponderous sense! Say, did not He,
The lovely Jesus, who commands thy breast,
Inspire thee with himself? With Jesus dwells,
Knit in mysterious bands, the Paraclete,
The breath of God, the everlasting source
Of love: And what is love, in souls like thine,
But air, and incense to the poet's fire?
Should an expiring saint, whose swimming eyes
Mingle the images of things about him,
But hear the least exalted of thy strains,
How greedily he'd drink the music in,
Thinking his heavenly convoy waited near
So great a stress of powerful harmony,
Nature unable to sustain,
Would sink oppress'd with joy to endless rest.

Let none henceforth of providence complain,
As if the world of spirits lay unknown,
Fenc'd round with black impenetrable night;
What though no shining angel darts from thence
With leave to publish things conceal'd from sense,
In language bright as theirs, we are here told,
When life its narrow round of years hath roll'd,
What 'tis employs the blest'd, what makes their bliss;
Songs such as Watt's are, and love like his.

But then, dear Sir, be cautious how you use,
To transports so intensely rais'd your muse,
Lest, whilst th' ecstatic impulse you obey,
The soul leap out, and drop the duller clay.

Sept. 4. 1706.

HENRY GROVE.

TO DR. WATTS,

ON THE FIFTH EDITION OF HIS HORÆ LYRICÆ.

SOVEREIGN of sacred verse! accept the lays
Of a young bard that dares attempt thy praise.

A muse, the meanest of the vocal throng,
New to the bays, nor equal to the song.
Fir'd with the growing glories of thy fame,
Joins all her powers to celebrate thy name.

No vulgar themes thy pious muse engage,
No scenes of lust pollute thy sacred page.
You in majestic numbers mount the skies,
And meet descending angels as you rise,
Whose just applauses charm the crowded groves,
And Addison thy tuneful song approves.
Soft harmony and manly vigour join
To form the beauties of each sprightly line,
For every grace of every muse is thine.
Milton, immortal bard, divinely bright,
Conducts his favourite to the realms of light;
Where Raphael's lyre charms the celestial throng,
Delighted cherubs listening to the song:
From bliss to bliss the happy beings rove,
And taste the sweets of music and of love.
But when the softer scenes of life you paint,
And join the beauteous virgin to the saint,

When you describe how few the happy pairs,
Whose hearts united soften all their cares,
We see to whom the sweetest joys belong,
And Myra's beauties consecrate your song.
Fain the unnumber'd graces I would tell,
And on the pleasing theme for ever dwell;
But the muse faints, unequal to the flight,
And hears thy strains with wonder and delight.
When tombs of princes shall in ruins lie,
And all but heaven-born piety shall die,
When the last trumpet wakes the silent dead,
And each lascivious poet hides his head,
With thee shall thy divine Urania rise,
Crown'd with fresh laurels, to thy native skies:
Great How and Gouge shall hail thee on thy way,
And welcome thee to the bright realms of day,
Adapt thy tuneful notes to heavenly strings,
And join the Lyric Ode while some fair seraph sings.

P R E F A C E.

IT has been a long complaint of the virtuous and refined world, that poesy, whose original is divine, should be enslaved to vice and profaneness; that an art, inspired from heaven, should have so far lost the memory of its birth-place, as to be engaged in the interests of hell. How unhappily is it perverted from its most glorious design! How basely has it been driven away from its proper station in the temple of God, and abused to much dishonour! The iniquity of men has constrained it to serve their vilest purposes, while the sons of piety mourn the sacrilege and the shame.

The eldest song, which history has brought down to our ears, was a noble act of worship paid to the God of Israel, when his "right hand" came glorious in power; when thy right hand, "O Lord, dashed in pieces the enemy: the chariots of Pharaoh and his hosts were cast into the red sea. Thou didst blow with thy wind, the deep covered them, and they sank as lead in the mighty waters." Exod. xv. This art was maintained sacred through the following ages of the church, and employed by kings and prophets, by David, Solomon, and Isaiah, in describing the nature and the glories of God, and in conveying grace or vengeance to the hearts of men. By this method they brought so much of heaven down to this lower world, as the darkness of that dispensation would admit: And now and then a divine and poetic rapture lifted their souls far above the level of that economy of shadows, bore them away far into a brighter region, and gave them a glimpse of evangelic day. The life of angels was harmoniously breathed into the children of Adam, and their minds raised near to heaven in melody and devotion at once.

In the younger days of heathenism, the Muses were devoted to the same service: the language in which old Hesiod addresses them is this:

*Μῦσαι Πιερίηθεν α' οἰδῆσι κλείουσαι,
Δεῦτε, Δῖ' ἐννέπετο οφείτεσθ' πατὴρ' ὑμνεῖν.*

"Pierian Muses, fam'd for heavenly lays,
"Descend, and sing the God your Father's
"praise."

And he pursues the subject in ten pious lines, which I could not forbear to transcribe, if the aspect and sound of so much Greek were not terrifying to a nice reader.

But some of the latter poets of the Pagan world have debased this divine gift; and many of the writers of the first rank, in this our age of national Christians, have, to their eternal shame, surpassed the vilest of the Gentiles. They have not only disrobed religion of all the ornaments of verse, but have employed their pens in impious mischief, to deform her native beauty and defile her honours. They have exposed her most sacred character to drollery, and dressed her up in a most vile and ridiculous disguise, for the scorn of the ruder herd of mankind. The vices have been painted like so many goddesses, the charms of wit have been added to debauchery, and the temptation heightened where nature needs the strongest restraints. With sweetness of sound, and delicacy of expression, they have given a relish to blasphemies of the harshest kind; and when they rant at their Maker in sonorous numbers, they fancy themselves to have acted the hero well.

Thus almost in vain have the throne and the pulpit cried reformation; while the stage and licentious poems have waged open war with the pious design of church and state. The press has spread the poison far, and scattered wide the mortal infection: Unthinking youth have been enticed to sin beyond the vicious propensities of nature, plunged early into diseases and death, and sunk down to damnation in multitudes. Was it for this that poesy was endued with all those allurements that lead the mind away in a pleasing captivity? Was it for this, she was furnished with so many intellectual charms, that she might seduce the heart from God, the original beauty, and the most lovely of beings? Can I ever be persuaded, that those sweet and resistless forces of metaphor, wit, sound, and number, were given with this design, that they should be all ranged under the banner of the great malicious spirit, to invade the rights of heaven, and to bring swift and everlasting destruction upon men? How will these allies of the nether world, the lewd and profane versifiers, stand aghast before the great Judge, when the blood of many souls, whom they never saw, shall be laid to the charge of their writings, and be dreadfully required at their hands? The Reverend Mr. Collier has set this awful scene before them in just and flaming colours. If the application were not too rude and uncivil, that noble stanza of my Lord Roscommon, on Psalm cxlviii. might be addressed to them:

"Ye dragons, whose contagious breath
"Peoples the dark retreats of death,
"Change your dire hissings into heavenly songs,
"And praise your Maker with your forked
"tongues."

This profanation and debasement of so divine an art, has tempted some weaker Christians to imagine that poetry and vice are naturally akin; or at least, that verse is fit only to recommend trifles, and entertain our looser hours; but it is too light and trivial a method to treat any thing that is serious and sacred. They submit, indeed, to use it in divine psalmody; but they love the driest translation of the psalm best. They will venture to sing a dull hymn or two at church, in tunes of equal dulness; but still they persuade themselves, and their children, that the beauties of poetry are vain and dangerous. All that arises a degree above Mr. Sternhold is too airy for worship, and hardly escapes the sentence of "unclean and abominable." It is strange, that persons that have had the Bible in their hands, should be led away by thoughtless prejudices to so wild and rash an opinion. Let me entreat them not to indulge this four, this censorious humour too far, lest the sacred writers fall under the lash of their unlimited and unguarded reproaches. Let me entreat them to look into their Bibles; and remember the style and way of writing that is used by the ancient prophets. Have they forgot, or were they never told, that many parts of the Old Testament are Hebrew verse? and the figures are stronger, and the metaphors bolder, and the images more surprising and strange, than ever I read in any profane writer. When Deborah sings her praises to the God of Israel, while he marched from the field of Edom, she sets the "earth a-trembling, the heavens drop, and the mountains dissolve from before the Lord. They fought from heaven, the stars in their courses fought against Sissera: When the river of Kishon swept them away, that ancient river, the river Kishon. O my soul, thou hast trodden down strength." Judg. v. &c. When Eliphaz, in the book of Job, speaks his sense of the holiness of God, he introduces a machine in a vision: "Fear came upon me, trembling on all my bones; the hair of my flesh stood up; a spirit passed by and stood still, but its form was undiscernible; an image before mine eyes; and silence; Then I heard a voice, saying, Shall mortal man be more just than God?" &c. Job iv. When he describes the safety of the righteous, he "hides him from the scourge of the tongue, he makes him laugh at destruction and famine, he brings the stones of the field into league with him, and makes the brute animals enter into a covenant of peace." Job v. 21, &c. When Job speaks of the grave, how melancholy is the gloom that he spreads over it! "It is a region to which I must shortly go, and whence I shall not return; it is a land of darkness, it is darkness itself, the land of the shadow of death; all confusion and disorder, and where the light is as darkness. This is my house, there have I made my bed: I have said to corruption, Thou art my father; and to the worm, Thou art my mother and my sister: As for my hope, who shall see it? I and my hope go down together to the bars of the pit." Job x. 21, and xvii. 13. When he humbles himself in complainings before the almightiness of God, what contemptible and feeble images doth he use! "Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro? Wilt thou pursue the dry stubble? I consume away like a rotten thing, a garment eaten by the moth." Job xiii. 25, &c. "Thou liftest me up to the wind, thou causest me to ride upon it, and dissolvest my substance." Job xxiii. 22. Can any man invent more despicable ideas, to represent the scoundrel herd and refuse of mankind, than those which Job uses? chap. xxx. and thereby he aggravates his own sorrows and reproaches to amazement: "They that are younger than I have me in derision, whose fathers I would have disdained to have set with the dogs of my flock: for want and famine they were solitary; fleeing into the wilderness desolate and waste: They cut up mallows by the bushes, and juniper-roots for their meat: They were driven forth from among men (they cried after them as after a thief), to dwell in the cliffs of the valleys, in the caves of the earth, and in rocks: Among the bushes they brayed, under the nettles they were gathered together; they were children of fools, yea, children of base men; they were viler than the earth: And now I am their song, yea, I am their by-word," &c. How mournful and dejected is the language of his own sorrows! "Terrors are turned upon him, they pursue his soul as the wind, and his welfare passes away as a cloud; his bones are pierced within him, and his soul is poured out: he goes mourning without the sun, a brother to dragons, and a companion to owls; while his harp and organ are turned into the voice of them that weep." I must transcribe one half of this holy book, if I would show the grandeur, the variety, and the justness of his ideas, or the pomp and beauty of his expression; I must copy out a good part of the writings of David and Isaiah, if I would represent the poetical excellencies of their thoughts and style: nor is the language of the lesser prophets, especially in some paragraphs, much inferior to these.

Now, while they paint human nature in its various forms and circumstances, if their designing be so just and noble, their disposition so artful, and their colouring so bright, beyond the most famed human writers, how much more must their descriptions of God and heaven exceed all that is possible to be said by a meaner tongue? When they speak of the dwelling-place of God, "He inhabits eternity, and sits upon the throne of his holiness, in the midst of light inaccessible." When his holiness is mentioned, "The heavens are not clean in his sight, he charges his angels with folly: He looks to the moon, and it shineth not, and the stars are not pure before his eyes: He is a jealous God, and a consuming fire." If we speak of strength, "Behold, he is strong: He removes the mountains, and they know it not: He overturns them in his anger: He shakes the earth from her place, and her pillars tremble. He makes a path through the mighty waters, he discovers the foundations of the world: The pillars of heaven are astonished at his reproof." And after all, "These are but a portion of his ways: The thunder of his power who can understand?" His sovereignty, his knowledge, and his wisdom, are revealed to us in language vastly superior to all the poetical accounts of heathen divinity. "Let the potsherds strive with the potsherds of the earth; but shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? He bids the heavens drop down from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness. He commands the sun, and it riseth not, and he sealeth up the stars. It is he that saith to the deep, be dry, and he drieth up the rivers. Woe to them that seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord; his eyes are upon all their ways, he understands their thoughts afar off. Hell is naked before him, and destruction hath no covering. He calls out all the stars by their names, he frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and makes the diviners mad: He turns wise men backward, and their knowledge becomes foolish." His transcendent eminence above all things is most nobly represented, when he "sits upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers: All nations before him are as the drop of a bucket, and as the small dust of the balance: He takes up the isles as a very little thing; Lebanon, with all her beasts, is not sufficient for a sacrifice to this God, nor are all her trees sufficient for the burning. This God, before whom the whole creation is as nothing, yea, less than nothing, and vanity. To which of all the heathen gods then will ye compare me, saith the Lord, and what shall I be likened to?" And to which of all the heathen poets shall we liken or compare this glorious orator, the sacred describer of the Godhead? The orators of all nations are as nothing before him, and their words are vanity and emptiness. Let us turn our eyes now to some of the holy writings, where God is creating the world: How meanly do the best of the Gentiles talk and trifle upon this subject, when brought into comparison with Moses, whom Longinus himself, a Gentile critic, cites as a master of the sublime style, when he chose to use it; "And the Lord said, Let there be light, and there was light; Let there be clouds and seas, sun and stars, plants and animals, and behold they are:" He commanded, and they appear and obey: "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth:" This is working like a God, with infinite ease and omnipotence. His wonders of providence for the terror and ruin of his adversaries, and for the succour of his saints, is set before our eyes in the scripture with equal magnificence, and as becomes divinity. When "he arises out of his place, the earth trembles, the foundation of the hills are shaken because he is wroth: There goes a smoke up out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoureth, coals are kindled by it. He bows the heavens, and comes down, and darkness is under his feet. The mountains melt like wax, and flow down at his presence." If Virgil, Homer, or Pindar, were to prepare an equipage for a descending God, they might use thunder and lightnings too, and clouds and fire, to form a chariot and horses for the battle, or the triumph; but there is none of them provides him a flight of cherubs instead of horses, or seats him in "chariots of salvation." David beholds him riding upon the heaven of heavens, by his name JAH: "He was mounted upon a cherub, and did fly; he flew on the wings of the wind;" and Habakkuk sends "the pestilence before him." Homer keeps a mighty stir with his Νέφελη γαργεῖα Ζεύς, and Hesiod with his Ζεὺς ὑψηλομέτης. Jupiter, that raises up the clouds, and that makes a noise, or thunders on high. But a divine poet makes the "clouds but the dust of his feet;" and when the Highest gives his voice in the heavens, "Hail-stones and coals of fire follow." A divine poet discovers the channels of the waters, and lays open the foundations of nature; "at thy rebuke, O Lord, at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils." When the Holy One alighted upon Mount Sinai, "his glory covered the heavens: He stood and measured the earth: He beheld and drove asunder the nations, and the everlasting mountains were scattered: The perpetual hills did bow; his ways are everlasting." Then the prophet "saw the tents of Cushan in affliction, and the curtains of the land of Midian did tremble." Hab. iii. Nor did the blessed Spirit which animated these writers forbid them the use of visions, dreams, the opening of scenes dreadful and delightful, and the introduction of machines upon great occasions: the divine licence in this respect is admirable and surprising, and the images are often too bold and dangerous for an uninspired writer to imitate. Mr. Dennis has made a noble essay to discover how much superior is inspired poetry to the brightest and best descriptions of a mortal pen. Perhaps, if his proposal of criticism had been encouraged and pursued, the nation might have learnt more value for the word of God, and the wits of the age might have been secured from the danger of Deism; while they must have been forced to confess at least the divinity of all the poetical books of Scripture, when they see a genius running through them more than human.

Who is there now will dare to assert, that the doctrines of our holy faith will not indulge or endure a delightful dress? Shall the French poet * affright us, by saying,

"De la foy d'un Chrétien les mysteres terribles,
"D'Ornemens egayez ne sont point susceptibles?"

But the French critic †, in his reflections upon Eloquence, tells us, "That the majesty of our religion, the holiness of its laws, the purity of its morals, the height of its mysteries, and the importance of every subject that belongs to it, requires a grandeur, a nobleness, a majesty, and elevation of style, suited to the theme: sparkling images and magnificent expressions must be used, and are best borrowed from Scripture: let the preacher, that aims at eloquence, read the prophets incessantly, for their writings are an abundant source of all the riches

"and ornaments of speech." And, in my opinion, this is far better counsel than Horace gives us, when he says,

"——— Vos exemplaria Græca
"Nocturnâ versate manu, versate diurnâ."

As, in the conduct of my studies with regard to divinity, I have reason to repent of nothing more than that I have not perused the Bible with more frequency; so if I were to set up for a poet, with a design to exceed all the modern writers, I would follow the advice of Rapiñ, and read the prophets night and day. I am sure, the compositions of the following book would have been filled with much greater sense, and appeared with much more agreeable ornaments, had I derived a larger portion from the Holy Scriptures.

Besides, we may fetch a further answer to Monsieur Boileau's objection, from other poets of his own country. What a noble use have Racine and Corneille made of Christian subjects, in some of their best tragedies! What a variety of divine scenes are displayed, and pious passions awakened, in those poems! The martyrdom of Polyeucte, how doth it reign over our love and pity, and at the same time animate our zeal and devotion! May I here be permitted the liberty to return my thanks to that fair and ingenious hand * that directed me to such entertainments in a foreign language, which I had long wished for, and sought in vain in our own. Yet I must confess, that the Davideis, and the two Arthurs, have so far answered Boileau's objection, in English, as that the obstacles of attempting Christian poetry are broken down, and the vain pretence of its being impracticable, is experimentally confuted †.

It is true indeed, the Christian mysteries have not such need of gay trappings as beautified, or rather composed, the heathen superstition. But this still makes for the greater ease and surer success of the poet. The wonders of our religion, in a plain narration and a simple dress, have a native grandeur, a dignity, and a beauty in them, though they do not utterly disdain all methods of ornament. The book of the Revelation seems to be a prophecy in the form of an opera, or a dramatic poem, where divine art illustrates the subject with many charming glories; but still it must be acknowledged, that the naked themes of Christianity have something brighter and bolder in them, something more surprising and celestial, than all the adventures of gods and heroes, all the dazzling images of false lustre that form and garnish a heathen song: here the very argument would give wonderful aids to the muse, and the heavenly theme would so relieve a dull hour, and a languishing genius, that when the muse nods,

† Sir Richard Blackmore, in his admirable preface to his last poem, entitled Alfred, has more copiously refuted all Boileau's arguments on this subject, and that with great justice and elegance. 1723.—I am persuaded that many persons who despise the poem would acknowledge the just sentiments of that preface.

the sense would burn and sparkle upon the reader, and keep him feelingly awake.

With how much less toil and expence might a Dryden, an Otway, a Congreve, or a Dennis, furnish out a Christian poem, than a modern play! There is nothing among all the ancient fables, or later romances, that have two such extremes united in them, as the eternal God becoming an infant of days; the possessor of the palace of Heaven laid to sleep in a manger; the holy Jesus, who knew no sin, bearing the sins of men in his body on the tree; agonies of sorrow loading the soul of him who was God over all, blessed for ever; and the sovereign of life stretching his arms on a cross, bleeding and expiring: The heaven and the hell in our divinity are infinitely more delightful and dreadful than the childish figments of a dog with three heads, the buckets of the Belides, the Furies with snaky hairs, or all the flowery stories of Elysium. And if we survey the one as themes divinely true, and the other as a medley of fooleries which we can never believe; the advantage for touching the springs of passion will fall infinitely on the side of the Christian poet; our wonder and our love, our pity, delight, and sorrow, with the long train of hopes and fears, must needs be under the command of an harmonious pen, whose every line makes a part of the reader's faith, and is the very life or death of his soul.

If the trifling and incredible tales that furnish out a tragedy, are so armed by wit and fancy, as to become sovereign of the rational powers, to triumph over all the affections, and manage our smiles and our tears at pleasure; how wondrous a conquest might be obtained over a wild world, and reduce it, at least, to sobriety, if the same happy talent were employed in dressing the scenes of religion in their proper figures of majesty, sweetness, and terror! The wonders of creating power, of redeeming love, and renewing grace, ought not to be thus impiously neglected by those whom Heaven has endued with a gift so proper to adorn and cultivate them; an art whose sweet insinuations might almost convey piety in resisting nature, and melt the hardest souls to the love of virtue. The affairs of this life, with their reference to a life to come, would shine bright in a dramatic description; nor is there any need of any reason why we should always borrow the plan or history from the ancient Jews, or primitive martyrs; though several of these would furnish out noble materials for this sort of poetry: but modern scenes would be better understood by most readers, and the application would be much more easy. The anguish of inward guilt, the secret stings and racks and scourges of conscience; the sweet retiring hours, and seraphical joys of devotion; the victory of a resolved soul over a thousand temptations; the inimitable love and passion of a dying God; the awful glories of the last tribunal; the grand decisive sentence, from which there is no appeal; and the consequent transports or horrors of the two eternal worlds; these things may be variously disposed, and form many poems. How might such performances, under a divine blessing, call back the dying piety of the nation to life and beauty? This would make religion appear like itself, and confound the blasphemies of a profligate world, ignorant of pious pleasures.

But we have reason to fear, that the tuneful men of our day have not raised their ambition to so divine a pitch; I should rejoice to see more of this celestial fire kindling within them; for the flashes that break out in some present and past writings betray an infernal source. This the incomparable Mr. Cowley, in the latter end of his preface, and the ingenious Sir Richard Blackmore, in the beginning of his, have so pathetically described and lamented, that I rather refer the reader to mourn with them, than detain and tire him here. These gentlemen, in their large and laboured works of poesy, have given the world happy examples of what they wish and encourage in prose; the one in a rich variety of thought and fancy, the other in all the shining colours of profuse and florid diction.

If shorter sonnets were composed on sublime subjects, such as the Psalms of David, and the holy transports interspersed in the other sacred writings, or such as the moral odes of Horace, and the ancient Lyrics; I persuade myself that the Christian preacher would find abundant aid from the poet, in his design to diffuse virtue, and allure souls to God. If the heart were first inflamed from Heaven, and the muse were not left alone to form the devotion, and pursue a cold scent, but only called-in as an assistant to the worship, then the song would end where the inspiration ceases; the whole composition would be of a piece, all meridian light and meridian fervour; and the same pious flame would be propagated, and kept glowing in the heart of him that reads. Some of the shorter odes of the two poets now mentioned, and a few of the Rev. Mr. Norris's Essays in verse, are convincing instances of the success of this proposal.

It is my opinion also, that the free and unconfined numbers of Pindar, or the noble measures of Milton without rhyme, would best maintain the dignity of the theme, as well as give a loose to the devout soul, nor check the raptures of her faith and love. Though, in my feeble attempts of this kind, I have too often fettered my thoughts in the narrow metre of our Psalm-translators; I have contracted and cramped the sense, or rendered it obscure and feeble, by the two speedy and regular returns of rhyme.

If my friends expect any reason of the following compositions, and of the first or second publication, I entreat them to accept of this account.

The title assures them that poesy is not the business of my life; and if I seized those hours of leisure, wherein my soul was in a more sprightly frame, to entertain them or myself with a divine or moral song, I hope I shall find an easy pardon.

In the First Book are many odes which were written to assist the meditations and worship of vulgar Christians, and with a design to be published in the volume of hymns, which have now passed a second impression: but upon the review, I found some expressions that were not suited to the plainest capacity, and the metaphors are too bold to please the weaker Christian: therefore I have allotted them a place here.

Among the songs that are dedicated to divine love, I think I may be bold to assert, that I never composed one line of them with any other design than what they are applied to here; and I have endeavoured to secure them all from being perverted and debased to wanton passions, by several lines in them that can never be applied to a meaner love. Are not the noblest instances of the grace of Christ represented under the figure of a conjugal state, and described in one of the sweetest odes, and the softest pastoral that ever was written? I appeal to Solomon*, in his Song, and his father David, in Psal. xlv. if David was the author: and I am well assured, that I have never indulged an equal licence: it was dangerous to imitate the sacred writers too nearly, in so nice an affair.

The "Poems sacred to Virtue," &c. were formed when the frame and humour of my soul was just suited to the subject of my verse: the image of my heart is painted in them; and if they meet with a reader whose soul is akin to mine, perhaps they may agreeably entertain him. The dulness of the fancy, and coarseness of expression, will disappear; the sameness of the humour will create a pleasure, and insensibly overcome and conceal the defects of the muse. Young gentlemen and ladies, whose genius and education have given them a relish of oratory and verse, may be tempted to seek satisfaction among the dangerous diversions of the stage, and impure sonnets, if there be no provision of a safer kind made to please them. While I have attempted to gratify innocent fancy in this respect, I have not forgotten to allure the heart to virtue, and to raise it to a disdain of brutal pleasures. The frequent interposition of a devout thought may awaken the mind to a serious sense of God, religion, and eternity. The same duty that might be despised in a sermon, when proposed to their reason, may here, perhaps, seize the lower faculties with surprise, delight, and devotion at once; and thus, by degrees, draw the superior powers of the mind to piety. Among the infinite numbers of mankind, there is not more difference in their outward shape and features, than in their temper and inward inclination. Some are more easily susceptible of religion in a grave discourse and sedate reasoning. Some are best frightened from sin and ruin by terror, threatening, and amazement; their fear is the properest passion to which we can address ourselves, and begin the divine work: others can feel no motive so powerful as that which applies itself to their ingenuity, and their polished imagination. Now I thought it lawful to take hold of any handle of the soul; to lead it away betimes from vicious pleasures; and if I could but make up a composition of virtue and delight, suited to the taste of well-bred youth, and a refined education, I had some hope to allure and raise them thereby above the vile temptations of degenerate nature, and custom that is yet more degenerate. When I have felt a slight inclination to satire or burlesque, I thought it proper to suppress it. The grinning and the growling muse are not hard to be obtained; but I would disdain their assistance, where a manly invitation to virtue, and a friendly smile, may be successfully employed. Could I persuade any man by a kinder method, I should never think it proper to scold or laugh at him.

* Solomon's Song was much more in use among preachers and writers of divinity when these poems were written than it is now, 1736.

Perhaps there are some morose readers, that stand ready to condemn every line that is written upon the theme of love; but have we not the cares and the felicities of that sort of social life represented to us in the sacred writings? Some expressions are there used with a design to give a mortifying influence to our softest affections; others again brighten the character of that state, and allure virtuous souls to pursue the divine advantage of it, the mutual assistance in the way to salvation.

Are not the cxxviiith and cxxviiith Psalms indited on this very subject? Shall it be lawful for the press and the pulpit to treat of it with a becoming solemnity in prose, and must the mention of the same thing in poetry be pronounced for ever unlawful? Is it utterly unworthy of a serious character to write on this argument, because it has been unhappily polluted by some scurrilous pens? Why may I not be permitted to obviate a common and a growing mischief, while a thousand vile poems of the amorous kind swarm abroad, and give a vicious taint to the unwary reader? I would tell the world that I have endeavoured to recover this argument out of the hands of impure writers, and to make it appear, that virtue and love are not such strangers as they are represented. The blissful intimacy of souls in that state will afford sufficient furniture for the gravest entertainment in verse; so that it need not be everlastingly dressed-up in ridicule, nor assumed only to furnish out the lewd sonnets of the times. May some happier genius promote the same service that I proposed, and by superior sense, and sweeter sound, render what I have written contemptible and useless.

The imitations of that noblest Latin poet of modern ages, Casimire Sarbiewski, of Poland, would need no excuse, did they but arise to the beauty of the original. I have often taken the freedom to add ten or twenty lines, or to leave out as many, that I might suit my song more to my own design, or because I saw it impossible to present the force, the fineness, and the fire of his expression in our language. There are a few copies wherein I have borrowed some hints from the same author, without the mention of his name in the title. Methinks I can allow so superior a genius now and then to be lavish in his imagination, and to indulge some excursions beyond the limits of sedate judgment: the riches and glory of his verse make atonement in abundance. I wish some English pen would import more of his treasures, and bless our nation.

The inscriptions to particular friends are warranted and defended by the practice of almost all the Lyric writers. They frequently convey the rigid rules of morality to the mind in the softer method of applause. Sustained by their example, a man will not easily be overwhelmed by the heaviest censures of the unthinking and unknowing; especially when there is a shadow of this practice in the divine Psalmist, while he inscribes to Asaph or Jeduthun his songs that were made for the harp, or (which is all one) his Lyric odes, though they are addressed to God himself.

In the "poems of Heroic measure," I have attempted in rhyme the same variety of cadence, comma and period, which blank verse glories in as its peculiar elegance and ornament. It degrades the excellency of the best versification when the lines run on by couplets, twenty together, just in the same pace, and with the same pauses. It spoils the noblest pleasure of the sound: the reader is tired with the tedious uniformity, or charmed to sleep with the unmanly softness of the numbers, and the perpetual chime of even cadences.

In the "Essays without Rhyme," I have not set up Milton for a perfect pattern; though he shall be for ever honoured as our deliverer from the bondage. His works contain admirable and unequalled instances of bright and beautiful diction, as well as majesty and serenity of thought. There are several episodes in his longer works, that stand in supreme dignity without a rival; yet all that vast reverence with which I read his Paradise Lost, cannot persuade me to be charmed with every page of it. The length of his periods, and sometimes of his parentheses, runs me out of breath: Some of his numbers seem too harsh and uneasy. I could never believe that roughness and obscurity added any thing to the true grandeur of a poem; nor will I ever affect archaisms, exoticisms, and a quaint uncouthness of speech, in order to become perfectly Miltonian. It is my opinion that blank verse may be written with all due elevation of thought, in a modern style, without borrowing any thing from Chaucer's tales, or running back so far as the days of Colin the Shepherd, and the reign of the Faery Queen. The oddness of an antique sound, gives but a false pleasure to the ear, and abuses the true relish, even when it works delight. There were some such judges of poetry among the old Romans; and Martial ingeniously laughs at one of them, that was pleased even to astonishment with obsolete words and figures;

"Attonitusque legis terrai frugiferai."

So the ill-drawn postures and distortions of shape that we meet with in Chinese pictures charm a sickly fancy by their very awkwardness: so a dis-tempered appetite will chew coals and sand, and pronounce it gustful.

In the Pindarics, I have generally conformed my lines to the shorter size of the ancients, and avoided to imitate the excessive lengths to which some modern writers have stretched their sentences, and especially the concluding verse. In these the ear is the truest judge; nor was it made to be enslaved to any precise model of elder or later times.

After all, I must petition my reader to lay aside the sour and sullen air of criticism, and to assume the friend. Let him choose such copies to read at particular hours, when the temper of his mind is suited to the song. Let him come with a desire to be entertained and pleased, rather than to seek his own disgust and aversion, which will not be hard to find. I am not so vain as to think there are no faults, nor so blind as to espy none: though

I hope the multitude of alterations in this second edition are not without amendment. There is so large a difference between this and the former, in the change of titles, lines, and whole poems, as in the various transpositions, that it would be useless and endless, and all confusion, for any reader to compare them throughout. The additions also make up half the book, and some of these have need of as many alterations as the former. Many a line needs the file to polish the roughness of it, and many a thought wants richer language to adorn and make it shine. Wide defects and equal superfluities may be found, especially in the larger pieces; but I have at present neither inclination nor leisure to correct, and I hope I never shall. It is one of the biggest satisfactions I take in giving this volume to the world, that I expect to be for ever free from the temptation of making or mending poems again*. So that my friends may be perfectly secure against this impression's growing waste upon their hands; and useless as the former has done. Let minds that are better furnished for such performances pursue these studies, if they are convinced that poetry can be made serviceable to religion and virtue. As for myself, I almost blush to think that I have read so little, and written so much. The following years of my life shall be more entirely devoted to the immediate and direct labours of my station, excepting those hours that may be employed in finishing my imitation of the Psalms of David, in Christian language, which I have now promised the world †.

I cannot court the world to purchase this book for their pleasure or entertainment, by telling them that any one copy entirely pleases me. The best of them sinks below the idea which I form of a divine or moral ode. He that deals in the mysteries of heaven, or of the muses, should be a genius of no vulgar mould: And as the name Vates belongs to both; so the furniture of both is comprised in that line of Horace,

" — Cui mens divinior, atque os

" Magna sonaturum — "

But what Juvenal spake in his age, abides true in ours: A complete poet or a prophet is such a one;

" — Qualem nequeo monstrare, & sentio tantum."

Perhaps neither of these characters in perfection shall ever be seen on earth, till the seventh angel has sounded his awful trumpet; till the victory be complete over the beast and his image, when the natives of heaven shall join in concert with prophets and saints, and sing to their golden harps "salvation, honour and glory to him that sits upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever."

HORÆ LYRICÆ.

B O O K I.

SACRED TO DEVOTION AND PIETY.

WORSHIPPING WITH FEAR.

Who dares attempt th' eternal Name,
With notes of mortal sound?
Dangers and glories guard the theme,
And spread despair around.

Destruction waits t' obey his frown,
And Heaven attends his smile;
A wreath of lightning arms his crown,
But love adorns it still.

Celestial King, our spirits lie,
Trembling beneath thy feet,
And wish, and cast a longing eye,
To reach thy lofty seat.

When shall we see the Great Unknown,
And in thy presence stand?
Reveal the splendors of thy throne,
But shield us with thy hand.

In thee what endless wonders meet!
What various glory shines!
The crossing rays too fiercely beat
Upon our fainting minds.

Angels are lost in sweet surprise
If thou unvail thy grace;
And humble awe runs through the skies,
When wrath arrays thy face.

When mercy joins with majesty,
To spread their beams abroad,
Not all their fairest minds on high
Are shadows of a God.

Thy works the strongest seraph sings,
In a too feeble strain,
And labours hard on all his strings
To reach thy thoughts in vain.

Created powers, how weak they be!
How short our praises fall!
So much akin to nothing we,
And thou th' eternal All.

ASKING LEAVE TO SING.

Yet, mighty God, indulge my tongue,
Nor let thy thunders roar,
While the young notes and venturous song
To worlds of glory soar.

If thou my daring flight forbid,
The muse folds up her wings;
Or at thy word her slender reed
Attempts almighty things.

Her slender reed, inspir'd by thee,
Bids a new Eden grow,
With blooming life on every tree,
And spreads a heaven below.

She mocks the trumpet's loud alarms,
Fill'd with thy dreadful breath:
And calls the angelic hosts to arms,
To give the nations death.

But when she tastes her Saviour's love,
And feels the rapture strong,
Scarce the divinest harp above
Aims at a sweeter song.

DIVINE JUDGMENTS.

Not from the dust my sorrows spring,
Nor drop my comforts from the lower skies!
Let all the baneful planets shed
Their mingled curses on my head,
How vain their curses, if th' eternal King
Look thro' the clouds and bleis me with his eyes!
Creatures with all their boasted sway
Are but his slaves, and must obey;
They wait their orders from above,
And execute his word, the vengeance, or the love.

'Tis by a warrant from his hand
The gentler gales are bound to sleep:
The north wind blusters, and assumes command
Over the desert and the deep;
Old Boreas with his freezing powers
Turns the earth iron, makes the ocean glass,
Arrest the dancing rivulets as they pass,
And chains them moveless to their shores;
The grazing ox lows to the gelid skies,
Walks o'er the marble meads with withering eyes,
Walks o'er the solid lakes, snuffs up the wind and dies,

Fly to the polar world, my song,
And mourn the pilgrims there (a wretched
Seiz'd and bound in rigid chains, [throng!])
A troop of statues on the Russian plains,
And life stands frozen in the purple veins.

Atheist, forbear: no more blaspheme:
 God has a thousand terrors in his name,
 A thousand armies at command,
 Waiting the signal of his hand,
 And magazines of frost, and magazines of flame.
 Drest thee in steel to meet his wrath;
 His sharp artillery from the north
 Shall pierce thee to the soul, and shake thy mortal
 Sublime on winter's rugged wings [frame.
 He rides in arms along the sky,
 And scatters fate on swains and kings;
 And flocks and herds, and nations die;
 While impious lips, profanely bold,
 Grow pale; and, quivering at his dreadful cold,
 Give their own blasphemies the lie.

The mischiefs that infest the earth,
 When the hot dog-star fires the realms on high,
 Drought and disease, and cruel dearth,
 Are but the flashes of a wrathful eye
 From the incens'd Divinity.
 In vain our parching palates thirst,
 For vital food in vain we cry,
 And pant for vital breath;
 The verdant fields are burnt to dust,
 The sun has drunk the channels dry,
 And all the air is death.
 Ye scourges of our Maker's rod,
 'Tis at his dread command, at his imperial nod,
 You deal your various plagues abroad.
 Hail, whirlwinds, huricanes, and floods,
 That all the leafy standards strip,
 And bear down with a mighty sweep
 The riches of the fields and honours of the woods;
 Storms, that ravage o'er the deep,
 And bury millions in the waves;
 Earthquakes, that in midnight sleep
 Turn cities into heaps, and make our beds our
 While you dispense your mortal harms, [graves;
 'Tis the Creator's voice that sounds your loud
 alarms, [arms.
 When guilt with louder cries provokes a God to O for a message from above
 To bear my spirits up!
 Some pledge of my Creator's love
 To calm my terrors and support my hope!
 Let waves and thunders mix and roar,
 Be thou my God, and the whole world is mine:
 While thou art Sovereign, I'm secure;
 I shall be rich till thou art poor;
 For all I fear, and all I wish, heaven, earth, and hell are thine.

EARTH AND HEAVEN.

HAST thou not seen, impatient boy?
 Hast thou not read the solemn truth,
 That gray experience writes for giddy youth
 On every mortal joy?
 Pleasure must be dash'd with pain:
 And yet, with heedless haste,
 The thirsty boy repeats the taste,
 Nor hearkens to despair, but tries the bowl again.
 The rills of pleasure never run sincere:
 (Earth has no unpolluted spring) [bear;
 From the curs'd soil some dangerous taint they
 So roses grow on thorns, and honey wears a sting.

In vain we seek a heaven below the sky;
 The world has false, but flattering, charms:
 Its distant joys show big in our esteem,
 But lessen still as they draw near the eye;
 In our embrace the visions die.
 And when we grasp the airy forms,
 We lose the pleasing dream.

Earth, with her scenes of gay delight,
 Is but a landskip rudely drawn,
 With glaring colours, and false light;
 Distance commends it to the sight,
 For fools to gaze upon;
 But bring the nauseous daubing nigh,
 Coarse and confus'd the hideous figures lie,
 Dissolve the pleasure, and offend the eye.
 Look up, my soul, pant tow'rd th' eternal hills;
 Those heavens are fairer than they seem;
 There pleasures all sincere glide on in crystal rills,
 There not a dreg of guilt defiles,
 Nor grief disturbs the stream.
 That Canaan knows no noxious thing,
 No cursed soil, no tainted spring,
 Nor roses grow on thorns, nor honey wears a sting.

FELICITY ABOVE.

No, 'tis in vain to seek for bliss;
 For bliss can ne'er be found
 Till we arrive where Jesus is,
 And tread on heavenly ground.
 There's nothing round these painted skies,
 Or round this dusty clod;
 Nothing, my soul, that's worth thy joys,
 Or lovely as thy God.
 'Tis heaven on earth to taste his love,
 To feel his quickening grace;
 And all the heaven I hope above
 Is but to see his face.
 Why move my years in slow delay!
 O God of ages! why?
 Let the spheres cleave, and mark my way
 To the superior sky.
 Dear Sovereign, break these vital strings
 That bind me to my clay;
 Take me, Uriel, on thy wings,
 And stretch and soar away.

GOD'S DOMINION AND DECREES.

KEEP silence, all created things,
 And wait your Maker's nod:
 The muse stands trembling while she sings
 The honours of her God.
 Life, death, and hell, and worlds unknown
 Hang on his firm decree:
 He sits on no precarious throne,
 Nor borrows leave to be.
 Th' Almighty Voice bid ancient night
 Her endless realms resign,
 And lo, ten thousand globes of light
 In fields of azure shine.
 Now Wisdom with superior sway
 Guides the vast moving frame,

While all the ranks of being pay,
Deep reverence to his name.

He spake; the sun obedient stood,
And held the falling day:
Old Jordan backward drives his flood,
And disappoints the sea.

Lord of the armies of the sky,
He marshals all the stars;
Red comets lift their banners high,
And wide proclaim his wars.

Chain'd to his throne a volume lies,
With all the fates of men,
With ev'ry angel's form and size,
Drawn by th' eternal pen.

His providence unfolds the book,
And makes his counsels shine:
Each opening leaf, and every stroke,
Fulfils some deep design.

Here he exalts neglected worms
To sceptres and a crown;
Anon the following page he turns,
And treads the monarch down.

Not Gabriel asks the reason why,
Nor God the reason gives;
Nor dares the favourite angel pry
Between the folded leaves.

My God, I never long'd to see
My fate with curious eyes,
What gloomy lines are writ for me,
Or what bright scenes shall rise.

In thy fair book of life and grace
May I but find my name,
Recorded in some humble place
Beneath my Lord the Lamb!

SELF CONSECRATION.

It grieves me, Lord, it grieves me sore,
That I have liv'd to thee no more,
And wasted half my days;
My inward power shall burn and flame
With zeal and passion for thy name,
I would not speak, but for my God, nor move, but to his praise.

What are my eyes but aids to see
The glories of the Deity
Inscrib'd with beams of light
On flowers and stars? Lord, I behold
The shining azure, green and gold;
But when I try to read thy name, a dimness veils
my sight.

Mine ears are rais'd when Virgil sings
Sicilian swains, or Trojan kings,
And drink the music in:
Why should the trumpet's brazen voice,
Or oaten reed, awake my joys, [begin?
And yet my heart so stupid lie when sacred hymns

Change me, O God; my flesh shall be
An instrument of song to thee,
And thou the notes inspire:

VOL. IX.

My tongue shall keep the heavenly chime,
My cheerful pulse shall beat the time, [spire.

The dearest nerve about my heart,
Should it refuse to bear a part,
With my melodious breath,
I'd tear away the vital chord,
A bloody victim to my Lord,
And live without that impious string, or show my zeal in death.

THE CREATOR AND CREATURES.

God is a name my soul adores,
Th' Almighty Three, th' Eternal One;
Nature and grace, with all their powers,
Confess the Infinite Unknown.

From thy Great Self thy being springs;
Thou art thine own original,
Made up of uncreated things,
And Self-sufficiency bears them all.

Thy voice produc'd the seas and spheres,
Bid the waves roar, and planets shine;
But nothing like thy Self appears,
Through all these spacious works of thine.

Still restless nature dies and grows;
From change to change the creatures run:
Thy being no succession knows,
And all thy vast designs are one:

A glance of thine runs through the globes,
Rules the bright worlds, and moves their frame;
Broad sheets of light compose thy robes;
Thy guards are form'd of living flame.

Thrones and dominions round thee fall,
And worship in submissive forms;
Thy presence shakes this lower ball,
This little dwelling-place of worms.

How shall affrighted mortals dare
To sing thy glory or thy grace,
Beneath thy feet we lie so far,
And see but shadows of thy face?

Who can behold the blazing light?
Who can approach consuming flame?
None but thy wisdom knows thy might;
None but thy word can speak thy name.

Atheist, forbear: no more blaspheme:
 God has a thousand terrors in his name,
 A thousand armies at command,
 Waiting the signal of his hand,
 And magazines of frost, and magazines of flame.
 Dress thee in steel to meet his wrath;
 His sharp artillery from the north
 Shall pierce thee to the soul, and shake thy mortal
 Sublime on winter's rugged wings [frame.
 He rides in arms along the sky,
 And scatters fate on swains and kings;
 And flocks and herds, and nations die;
 While impious lips, profanely bold,
 Grow pale; and, quivering at his dreadful cold,
 Give their own blasphemies the lie.

The mischiefs that infest the earth,
 When the hot dog-star fires the realms on high,
 Drought and disease, and cruel dearth,
 Are but the flashes of a wrathful eye
 From the incens'd Divinity.
 In vain our parching palates thirst,
 For vital food in vain we cry,
 And pant for vital breath;
 The verdant fields are burnt to dust,
 The sun has drunk the channels dry,
 And all the air is death.
 Ye scourges of our Maker's rod,
 'Tis at his dread command, at his imperial nod,
 You deal your various plagues abroad.
 Hail, whirlwinds, hurricanes, and floods,
 That all the leafy standards strip,
 And bear down with a mighty sweep
 The riches of the fields and honours of the woods;
 Storms, that ravage o'er the deep,
 And bury millions in the waves;
 Earthquakes, that in midnight sleep
 Turn cities into heaps, and make our beds our

EARTH AND HEAVEN.

HAST thou not seen, impatient boy?
 Hast thou not read the solemn truth,
 That gray experience writes for giddy youth
 On every mortal joy?
 Pleasure must be dash'd with pain:
 And yet, with heedless haste,
 The thirsty boy repeats the taste,
 Nor hearkens to despair, but tries the bowl again.
 The rills of pleasure never run sincere:

 So roses grow on thorns, and honey wears a sting.

In vain we seek a heaven below the sky;
 The world has false, but flattering, charms:
 Its distant joys show big in our esteem,
 But lessen still as they draw near the eye;
 In our embrace the visions die.
 And when we grasp the airy forms,
 We lose the pleasing dream.

Earth, with her scenes of gay delight,

U

"With tears of joy in all your eyes.
"Go, Shepherds, kiss the Son."

Thus Gabriel sang, and strait around,
The heavenly armies throng,
They tune their harps to lofty sound,
And thus conclude the song:

"Glory to God that reigns above
"Let peace surround the earth;
"Mortals shall know their Maker's love,
"At their Redeemer's birth."

Lord! and shall angels have their songs,
And men no tunes to raise?
O may we lose these useless tongues
When they forget to praise!

Glory to God that reigns above,
That pitied us forlorn,
We join to sing our Maker's love,
For there's a Saviour born.

GOD GLORIOUS, AND SINNERS SAVED.

FATHER, how wide thy glory shines?
How high thy wonders rise!
Known through the earth by thousand signs,
By thousand through the skies.

Those mighty orbs proclaim thy power,
Their motions speak thy skill;
And on the wings of every hour,
We read thy patience still.

Part of thy name divinely stands
On all thy creatures writ,
They show the labour of thine hands,
Or impress of thy feet.

But when we view thy strange design
To save rebellious worms,
Where vengeance and compassion join
In their divinest forms;

Our thoughts are lost in reverend awe:
We love and we adore;
The first arch-angel never saw
So much of God before.

Here the whole Deity is known,
Nor dares a creature guess
Which of the glories brightest shone,
The justice or the grace.

When sinners broke the Father's laws,
The dying Son atones;
Oh, the dear mysteries of his cross!
The triumph of his groans!

Now the full glories of the lamb
Adorn the heavenly plains;
Sweet cherubs learn Immanuel's name,
And try their choicest strains.

O may I bear some humble part
In that immortal song!
Wonder and joys shall tune my heart,
And love command my tongue.

THE HUMBLE INQUIRY.

A French sonnet imitated. 1695.

"Grand Dieu, tes Jugemens," &c.

GRACE rules below, and sits enthron'd above,
How few the sparks of wrath! how slow they move.
And drop and die in boundless seas of love!

But me, vile wretch! should pitying love embrace
Deep in its ocean, hell itself would blaze,
And flash, and burn me through the boundless seas.

Yea, Lord, my guilt to such a vastness grown
Seems to confine thy choice to wrath alone,
And calls thy power to vindicate thy throne.

Thine honour bids, "avenge thine injur'd name,"
Thy slighted loves a dreadful glory claim,
While my moist tears might but incense thy flame.

Should heaven grow black, almighty thunder roar,
And vengeance blast me, I could plead no more,
But own thy justice dying, and adore.

Yet can those bolts of death that cleave the flood
To reach a rebel, pierce this sacred shroud,
Ting'd in the vital stream of my redeemer's blood.

THE PENITENT PARDONED.

HENCE from my soul, my sins, depart,
Your fatal friendship now I see:
Long have you dwelt too near my heart,
Hence, to eternal distance flee.

Ye gave my dying Lord his wound,
Yet I caress'd your viperous brood,
And in my heart-strings lapp'd you round,
You, the vile murderers of my God.

Black heavy thoughts, like mountains, roll
O'er my poor breast, with boding fears,
And, crushing hard my tortur'd soul,
Wring through my eyes the briny tears.

Forgive my treasons, Prince of grace!
The bloody Jews were traitors too,
Yet thou hast pray'd for that curs'd race,
"Father, they know not what they do."

Great advocate, look down and see
A wretch, whose smarting sorrows bleed;
O plead the same excuse for me!
For, Lord, I know not what I did.

Peace, my complaints; let every groan
Be still, and silence wait his love;
Compassions dwell amidst his throne,
And through his inmost bowels move.

Lo, from the everlasting skies,
Gently, as morning-dews distil,
The dove immortal downward flies,
With peaceful olive in his bill.

How sweet the voice of pardon sounds!
Sweet the relief to deep distress!
I feel the balm that heals my wounds,
And all my powers adore the grace.

A HYMN OF PRAISE FOR THREE GREAT SALVATIONS.

VIZ.

1. From the Spanish Invasion, 1588.
2. From the Gun-powder Plot, Nov. 5.
3. From Popery and Slavery by K. WILLIAM of glorious memory, who landed, Nov. 5. 1688.

Composed, Nov. 5. 1695.

INFINITE God, thy counsels stand
Like mountains of eternal brass,
Pillars to prop our sinking land,
Or guardian rocks to break the seas.

From pole to pole thy name is known,
Thee a whole heaven of angels praise;
Our labouring tongues would reach thy throne
With the loud triumphs of thy grace.

Part of thy church, by thy command,
Stands rais'd upon the British isles;
"There," said the Lord, "to ages stand,
"Firm as the everlasting hills."

In vain the Spanish ocean roar'd;
Its billows swell'd against our shore,
Its billows sunk beneath thy word,
With all the floating war they bore.

Come, said the sons of bloody Rome,
Let us provide new arms from hell:
And down they digg'd through earth's dark womb,
And ransack'd all the burning cell.

Old Satan lent them fiery stores,
Infernal coal, and sulphurous flame,
And all that burns, and all that roars,
Outrageous fires of dreadful name.

Beneath the senate and the throne,
Engines of hellish thunder lay;
There the dark seeds of fire were sown,
To spring a bright, but dismal day.

Thy love beheld the black design,
Thy love that guards our island round;
Strange! how it quench'd the fiery mine,
And crush'd the tempest under ground.

THE SECOND PART.

ASSUME, my tongue a nobler strain,
Sing the new wonders of the Lord;
The foes revive their powers again,
Again they die beneath his sword.

Dark as our thoughts our minutes roll,
While tyranny possess'd the throne,
And murderers of an Irish soul
Ran, threatening death, through every town.

The Romish priest, and British prince,
Join'd their best force, and blackest charms,
And the fierce troops of neighbouring France
Offer'd the service of their arms.

'Tis done, they cry'd, and laugh'd aloud,
The courts of darkness rang with joy,

Th' old Serpent hiss'd, and hell grew proud,
While Zion mourn'd her ruin nigh.

But lo, the great deliverer fails,
Commission'd from Jehovah's hand,
And smiling seas, and wishing gale
Convey him to the longing land.

The happy day *, and happy year,
Both in our new salvation meet:
The day † that quench'd the burning snare,
The year that burnt th' invading fleet.

Now did thine arm, O God of Hosts,
Now did thine arm shine dazzling bright,
The sons of might their hands had lost,
And men of blood forgot to fight.

Brigades of angels lin'd the way,
And guarded William to his throne:
There, ye celestial warriors, stay,
And make his palace like your own.

Then, mighty God, the earth shall know
And learn the worship of the sky:
Angels and Britons join below,
To raise their hallelujahs high.

All hallelujah heavenly king;
While distant lands thy victory sing,
And tongues their utmost powers employ,
The world's bright roof repeats the joy.

THE INCOMPREHENSIBLE.

FAR in the heavens my God retires,
My God, the mark of my desires,
And hides his lovely face;
When he descends within my view,
He charms my reason to pursue,
But leaves it tir'd and fainting in the unequal chase.

Or if I reach unusual height
Till near his presence brought,
There floods of glory check my flight,
Cramp the bold pinions of my wit,
And all untune my thought;
Plung'd in a sea of light I roll,
Where wisdom, justice, mercy, shines;
Infinite rays in crossing lines [my soul,
Beat thick confusion on my sight, and overwhelm

Come to my aid, ye fellow-minds,
And help me reach the throne;
(What single strength, in vain designs,
United force hath done;
Thus worms may join, and grasp the poles,
Thus atoms fill the sea)
But the whole race of creature-souls
Stretch'd to their last extent of thought, plunge and are lost in thee.

Great God, behold my reason lies
Adoring; yet my love would rise
On pinions not her own:
Faith shall direct her humble flight,
Through all the trackless seas of light,
To thee, th' eternal fair, the infinite unknown.

DEATH AND ETERNITY.

My thoughts, that often mount the skies,
Go, search the world beneath,
Where nature in all ruin lies,
And owns her sovereign, death.

The tyrant, how he triumphs here !
His trophies spread around !
And heaps of dust and bones appear
Through all the hollow ground.

These skulls, what ghastly figures now !
How loathsome to the eyes !
These are the heads we lately knew
So beauteous and so wise.

But where the souls, those deathless things,
That left his dying clay ?
My thoughts, now stretch out all your wings,
And trace eternity.

O that unfathomable sea !
Those deeps without a shore !
Where living waters gently play,
Or fiery billows roar.

Thus must we leave the banks of life,
And try this doubtful sea ;
Vain are our groans, and dying strife,
To gain a moment's stay.

There we shall swim in heavenly bliss,
Or sink in flaming waves,
While the pale carcass thoughtless lies,
Among the silent graves.

Some hearty friend shall drop his tear
On our dry bones and say,
" These once were strong, as mine appear,
" And mine must be as they."

Thus shall our mouldering members teach
What now our senses learn :
For dust and ashes loudest preach
Man's infinite concern.

A SIGHT OF HEAVEN IN SICKNESS.

Oft have I sat in secret sighs,
To feel my flesh decay,
Then groan'd aloud with frighted eyes,
To view the tottering clay.

But I forbid my sorrows now,
Nor dares the flesh complain ;
Diseases bring their profit too ;
The joy o'ercomes the pain.

My cheerful soul now all the day
Sits waiting here and sings ;
Looks through the ruins of her clay,
And practises her wings.

Faith almost changes into sight,
While from afar she spies,
Her fair inheritance, in light
Above created skies.

Had but the prison walls been strong,
And firm without a flaw,

In darkness she had dwelt too long,
And less of glory saw.

But now the everlasting hills
Through every chink appear,
And something of the joy she feels
While she's a prisoner here.

The shines of heaven rush sweetly in
At all the gaping flaws :
Visions of endless bliss are seen ;
And native air she draws.

O may these walls stand tottering still,
The breaches never close,
If I must here in darkness dwell,
And all this glory lose !

Or rather let this flesh decay,
The ruins wider grow,
Till glad to see th' enlarged way,
I stretch'd my pinions through.

THE UNIVERSAL HALLELUJAH.

Psalms cxlviii. Paraphrased

PRAISE ye the Lord with joyful tongue,
Ye powers that guard his throne ;
Jesus the man shall lead the song,
The God inspire the tune.

Gabriel, and all th' immortal choir
That fill the realms above ;
Sing : for he form'd you of his fire,
And feeds you with his love.

Shine to his praise, ye crystal skies,
The floor of his abode,
Or veil your little twinkling eyes
Before a brighter God.

Thou restless globe of golden light,
Whose beams create our days,
Join with the silver queen of night,
To own your borrow'd rays,

Blush and refund the honours paid
To your inferior names :
Tell the blind world, your orbs are fed
By his o'erflowing flames.

Winds, ye shall bear his name aloud
Through the ethereal blue,
For when his chariot is a cloud,
He makes his wheels of you.

Thunder and hail, and fires and storms,
The troops of his command,
Appear in all your dreadful forms,
And speak his awful hand.

Shout to the Lord, ye surging seas,
In your eternal roar ;
Let wave to wave resound his praise,
And shore reply to shore :

While monsters sporting on the flood,
In scaly silver shine,
Speak terribly their maker-God,
And lash the foaming brine.

But gentler things shall tune his name
To softer notes than these,

Young zephyrs breathing o'er the stream,
Or whispering through the trees.

Wave your tall heads, ye lofty pines,
To him that bid you grow:
Sweet clusters, bend the fruitful vines
On every thankful bough.

Let the shrill birds his honour raise,
And climb the morning-sky:
While groveling beasts attempt his praise
In hoarser harmony.

Thus while the meaner creatures sing,
Ye mortals, take the sound,
Echo the glories of your king,
Through all the nations round.

Th' eternal name must fly abroad
From Britain to Japan;
And the whole race shall bow to God,
That owns the name of man.

THE ATHEIST'S MISTAKE.

LAUGH, ye profane, and swell and burst
With bold impiety:
Yet shall ye live for ever curs'd,
And seek in vain to die.

The gasp of your expiring breath
Consigns your souls to chains,
By the last agonies of death,
Sent down to fiercer pains,

Ye stand upon a dreadful steep,
And all beneath is hell:
Your weighty guilt will sink you deep,
Where the old serpent fell.

When iron slumbers bind your flesh,
With strange surprise you'll find
Immortal vigour spring afresh,
And tortures wake the mind!

Then you'll confess, the frightful names
Of plagues you scorn'd before,
No more shall look like idle dreams,
Like foolish tears no more.

Then shall ye curse that fatal day,
(With flames upon your tongues)
When you exchange'd your souls away
For vanity and songs.

Behold the saints rejoice to die,
For heaven shines round their heads;
And angel-guards, prepar'd to fly,
Attend their fainting beds.

Their longing spirits part, and rise
To their celestial seat;
Above these ruinable skies
They make their last retreat.

Hence, ye profane, I hate your ways,
I walk with pious souls;
There's a wide difference in our race,
And distant are our goals.

THE LAW GIVEN AT SINAI.

ARM thee with thunder, heavenly muse,
And keep th' expecting world in awe;

Oft hast thou sung in gentler mood
The melting mercies of thy God;
Now give thy fiercest fires a loose,
And sound his dreadfull law;
To Israel first the words were spoke,
To Israel freed from Egypt's yoke,
Inhuman bondage! The hard galling load,
Over-press'd their feeble souls,
Bent their knees to senseless bulls,
And broke their ties to God.

Now had they pass'd th' Arabian bay,
And march'd between the cleaving sea;
The rising waves stood guardians of their wondrous
But fell with most impetuous force [way
On the pursuing swarms,
And bury'd Egypt all in arms,
Blending in watery death the rider and the horse:
O'er struggling Pharaoh roll'd the mighty tide,
And sav'd the labours of a pyramid.

Apis and Ore in vain he cries,
And all his horned gods beside,
He swallows fate with swimming eyes,
And curs'd the Hebrews as he dy'd.

Ah! foolish Israel, to comply
With Memphian idolatry!
And bow to brutes (a stupid slave)
To idols impotent to save!

Behold thy God, the sovereign of the sky,
Has wrought salvation in the deep,
Has bound thy foes in iron sleep,
And rais'd thine honours high:
His grace forgives thy follies past,
Behold he comes in majesty,
And Sinai's top proclaims his law:
Prepare to meet thy God in haste;
But keep an awful distance still:
Let Moses round the sacred hill
The circling limits draw.

Hark! The shrill echoes of the trumpet roar,
And call the trembling armies near;
Slow and unwilling they appear,
Rails kept them from the mount before,
Now from the rails their fear:
'Twas the same herald, and the trump the same
Which shall be blown by high command,
Shall bid the wheels of nature stand,
And Heav'n's eternal will proclaim,
That time shall be no more.

Thus while the labouring angel swell'd the sound,
And rent the skies, and shook the ground,
Up rose th' Almighty; round his sapphire seat
Adoring thrones in order fell;
The lesser powers at distance dwell,
And cast their glories down successive at his feet:
Gabriel the great prepares his way,
"Lift up your heads, eternal doors," he cries;
Th' eternal doors his word obey,
Open, and shoot celestial day
Upon the lower skies.
Heav'n's mighty pillars bow'd their head,
As their Creator bid,
And down Jehovah rode from the superior sphere,
A thousand guards before, and myriads in the rear.

His chariot was a pitchy cloud,
The wheels beset with burning gems;
The winds in harness with the flames

Flew o'er th' ethereal road :
 Down through his magazines he past
 Of hail, and ice, and fleecy snow,
 Swift roll'd the triumph, and as fast
 Did hail, and ice, in melted rivers flow.
 The day was mingled with the night,
 His feet on solid darkness trod,
 His radiant eyes proclaim'd the God,
 And scatter'd dreadful light ;
 He breath'd, and sulphur ran, a fiery stream :
 He spoke, and (though with unknown speed he came)
 Chid the slow tempest, and the lagging flame.
 Sinai receiv'd his glorious flight,
 With axle red, and glowing wheel,
 Did the winged chariot light,
 And rising smoke obscur'd the burning hill.
 Lo, it mounts in curling waves,
 Lo, the gloomy pride out-brave's
 The stately pyramids of fire :
 The pyramids to heaven aspire, [higher.
 And mix with stars, but see their gloomy offspring
 So have you seen ungrateful ivy grow
 Round the tall oak that six score years has stood,
 And proudly shoot a leaf or two
 Above its kind supporters utmost bough,
 And glory there to stand the loftiest of the wood
 Forbear, young muse, forbear ;
 The flowery things that poets say,
 The little arts of simile
 Are vain and useless here ;
 Nor shall the burning hills of old
 With Sinai be compar'd,
 Nor all that lying Greece has told,
 Or learn'd Rome has heard ;
 Ætna shall be nam'd no more,
 Ætna the torch of Sicily ;
 Not half so high
 Her lightnings fly ;
 Not half so loud her thunders roar
 Cross the Sicanian sea, to fright th' Italian shore.
 Behold the sacred hill : Its trebling spire
 Quakes at the terrors of the fire,
 While all below its verdant feet
 Stagger and reel under th' Almighty weight :
 Press'd with a greater than feign'd Atlas' load.
 Deep groan'd the mount ; it never bore
 Infinity before,
 It bow'd, and shook beneath the burden of a God.
 Fresh horrors seize the camp ; despair,
 And dying groans, torment the air,
 And shrieks, and swoons, and deaths were there :
 The bellowing thunder, and the lightning's blaze
 Spread through the host a wild amaze ;
 Darkness on every soul, and pale was every face :
 Confus'd and dismal were the cries,
 Let Moses speak, or Israel dies :
 Moses the spreading terror feels,
 No more the Man of God conceals
 His shivering and surprise :
 Yet, with recovering mind, commands [bands.
 Silence, and deep attention, through the Hebrew
 Hark ! from the centre of the flame,
 All arm'd and feather'd with the same,
 Majestic sounds break through the smoky cloud :
 Sent from the All-creating tongue,

A flight of cherubs guard the words along,
 And bear their fiery law to the retreating crowd.

" I am the Lord : 'Tis I proclaim
 " That glorious and that fearful name,
 " Thy God and King : 'Twas I, that broke
 " Thy bondage, and th' Egyptian yoke ;
 " Mine is the right to speak my will,
 " And thine the duty to fulfil.
 " Adore no God beside Me, to provoke mine eyes :
 " Nor worship me in shapes and forms that men
 devise ; [to jest ;
 " With reverence use my name, nor turn my words
 " Observe my sabbath well, nor dare profane my rest ;
 " Honour and due obedience to thy parents give ;
 " Nor spill the guiltless blood, nor let the guilty
 live : [bed ;
 " Preserve thy body chaste, and flee th' unlawful
 " Nor steal thy neighbour's gold, his garment, or his bread ; [ceit ;
 " Forbear to blast his name with falsehood or de-
 " Nor let thy wishes loose upon his large estate."

REMEMBER YOUR CREATOR, &c. Eccl. xiii.

CHILDREN, to your Creator, God,
 Your early honours pay,
 While vanity and youthful blood
 Would tempt your thoughts astray.
 The memory of his mighty name,
 Demands your first regard ;
 Nor dare indulge a meaner flame,
 Till you have lov'd the Lord.
 Be wise, and make his favour sure,
 Before the mournful days,
 When youth and mirth are known no more,
 And life and strength decays.
 No more the blessings of a feast
 Shall relish on the tongue,
 The heavy ear forgets the taste
 And pleasure of a song.
 Old age, with all her dismal train,
 Invades your golden years
 With sighs and groans, and raging pain,
 And death, that never spares.
 What will ye do when light departs,
 And leaves your withering eyes,
 Without one beam to cheer your hearts,
 From the superior skies ?
 How will you meet God's frowning brow,
 Or stand before his seat,
 While nature's old supporters bow,
 Nor bear their tottering weight ?
 Can you expect your feeble arms,
 Shall make a strong defence,
 When death with terrible alarms,
 Summons the prisoner hence ?
 The silver bands of nature burst,
 And let the building fall ;
 The flesh goes down to mix with dust ;
 Its vile original.
 Laden with guilt (a heavy load)
 Uncleans'd and unforgiven,

The soul returns t' an angry God,
To be shut out from heaven.

SUN, MOON, AND STARS, PRAISE YE
THE LORD.

FAIREST of all the lights above,
Thou sun, whose beams adorn the spheres,
And with unweary'd swiftness move,
To form the circles of our years;

Praise the Creator of the skies,
That drest'd thine orb in golden rays;
Or may the sun forget to rise,
If he forget his Maker's praise.

Thou reigning beauty of the night,
Fair queen of silence, silver moon,
Whose gentle beams and borrow'd light
Are softer rivals of the noon;

Arise, and to that Sovereign Power
Waxing and waning honours pay,
Who bade thee rule the dusky hour,
And half supply the absent day.

Ye twinkling stars, who gild the skies
When darkness has its curtains drawn,
Who keep your watch with wakeful eyes,
When business, cares, and day, are gone:

Proclaim the glories of your Lord,
Dispers'd through all the heavenly street,
Whose boundless treasures can afford
So rich a pavement for his feet.

Thou heaven of heavens, supremely bright,
Fair palace of the court divine,
Where, with inimitable light,
The Godhead condescends to shine.

Praise thou thy great inhabitant,
Who scatters lovely beams of grace
On every angel, every saint,
Nor veils the lustre of his face.

O God of glory, God of love,
Thou art the sun that makes our days:
With all thy shining works above,
Let earth and dust attempt thy praise.

THE WELCOME MESSENGER.

LORD, when we see a saint of thine
Lie gasping out his breath,
With longing eyes, and looks divine,
Smiling and pleas'd in death;

How we could ev'n contend to lay
Our limbs upon that bed!
We ask thine envoy to convey
Our spirits in his stead.

Our souls are rising on the wing,
To venture in his place:
For when grim death has lost his sting,
He has an angel's face.

Jesus, then, purge my crimes away,
'Tis guilt creates my fears,
'Tis guilt gives death its fierce array,
And all the arms it bears.

Oh! if my threatening sins were gone,
And death had lost his sting,

I could invite the angel on,
And chide his lazy wing.

Away these interposing days,
And let the lovers meet;
The angel has a cold embrace,
But kind, and soft, and sweet.

I'd leap at once my seventy years
I'd rush into his arms,
And lose my breath, and all my cares
Amidst those heavenly charms.

Joyful I'd lay this body down,
And leave the lifeless clay,
Without a sigh, without a groan,
And stretch and soar away.

SINCERE PRAISE.

ALMIGHTY Maker, God!
How wondrous is thy name!
Thy glories how diffus'd abroad
Through the creation's frame!

Nature in every dress
Her humble homage pays,
And finds a thousand ways t' express
Thine undissembled praise.

In native white and red
The rose and lily stand,
And, free from pride, their beauties spread,
To show thy skilful hand.

The lark mounts up the sky,
With unambitious song,
And bears her Maker's praise on high
Upon her artless tongue.

My soul would rise and sing
To her Creator too,
Fain would my tongue adore my King,
And pay the worship due.

But pride, that busy sin,
Spoils all that I perform;
Curs'd pride, that creeps securely in,
And swells a haughty worm.

Thy glories I abate,
Or praise thee with design;
Some of the favours I forget,
Or think the merit mine.

The very songs I frame
Are faithless to thy cause,
And steal the honours of thy name
To build their own applause.

Create my soul anew,
Else all my worship's vain;
This wretched heart will ne'er be true,
Until 'tis form'd again.

Descend, celestial fire,
And seize me from above;
Melt me in flames of pure desire,
A sacrifice to love.

Let joy and worship spend
The remnant of my days,
And to my God, my soul, ascend,
In sweet perfumes of praise.

TRUE LEARNING.

Partly imitated from a French Sonnet of Mr. Poiret.

HAPPY the feet that shining truth has led
With her own hand to tread the path she please,
To see her native lustre round her spread,

Without a veil, without a shade,
All beauty, and all light, as in herself she is.

Our senses cheat us with the pressing crowds
Of painted shapes they thrust upon the mind:

The truth they show lies wrap'd in sevenfold
Our senses cast a thousand clouds [shrouds,
On unenlighten'd souls, and leave them doubly blind.

I hate the dust that fierce disputers raise,
And lose the mind in a wild maze of thought:
What empty triflings, and what empty ways,

To fence and guard by rule and rote! [not,
Our God will never charge us, that we knew them

'Touch, heavenly Word, O touch these curious souls;

Since I have heard but one soft hint from thee,
From all the vain opinions of the schools

(That pageantry of knowing fools)
I feel my powers releas'd, and stand divinely free.

'Twas this Almighty Word that all things made,
He grasps whole nature in his single hand;

All the eternal truths in him are laid,
The ground of all things, and their head,
The circle where they move, and centre where they stand.

Without his aid I have no sure defence,
From troops of errors that besiege me round;
But he that rests his reason and his sense

Fast here, and never wanders hence,
Unmoveable he dwells upon unshaken ground.

Infinite truth, the life of my desires,
Come from the sky, and join thyself to me;
I'm tir'd with hearing, and this reading tires;

But never tir'd of telling thee,
'Tis thy fair face alone my spirit burns to see.

Speak to my soul, alone, no other hand
Shall mark my path out with delusive art:
All nature silent in his presence stand;

Creatures, be dumb at his command,
And leaves his single voice to whisper to my heart.

Retire, my soul, within thyself retire,
Away from sense and every outward show:
Now let my thoughts to loftier themes aspire,
My knowledge now on wheels of fire
May mount and spread above, surveying all below.

The Lord grows lavish of his heavenly light,
And pours whole floods on such a mind as this:
Fled from the eyes, she gains a piercing sight,
She dives into the infinite,
And sees unutterable things in that unknown abyss.

TRUE WISDOM.

PRONOUNCE him blest, my muse, whom wisdom guides.

In her own path to her own heavenly seat;
'Through all the storms his soul securely glides,

Nor can the tempests, nor the tides,
That rise and roar around, supplant his steady feet:

Earth, you may let your golden arrows fly,
And seek, in vain, a passage to his breast,
Spread all your painted toys to court his eye,
He smiles, and sees them vainly try
To lure his soul aside from her eternal rest.

Our head-strong lusts, like a young fiery horse,
Start, and flee raging in a violent course;
He tames and breaks them, manages and rides
them, [them,

Checks their career, and turns and guides
And bids his reason bridle their licentious force.

Lord of himself, he rules his wildest thoughts,
And boldly acts what calmly he design'd,
While he looks down and pities human faults;

Nor can he think, nor can he find
A plague like reigning passions, and a subject mind.

But oh! 'tis mighty toil to reach this height,
'To vanquish self is a laborious art;

What manly courage to sustain the fight
To bear the noble pain, and part [heart!
With those dear charming tempters rooted in the

'Tis hard to stand when all the passions move,
Hard to awake the eye that passion blinds;
To rend and tear out this unhappy love,

That clings so close about our minds, [finds.
And where th' enchanted soul so sweet a poison

Hard; but it may be done. Come, heavenly fire,
Come to my breast, and with one powerful ray
Melt off my lusts, my fetters: I can bear

A while to be a tenant here,
But not be chain'd and prison'd in a cage of clay.

Heaven is my home, and I must use my wings;
Sublime above the globe my flight aspires:

I have a soul was made to pity kings,
And all their little glittering things;
I have a soul was made for infinite desires.

Loos'd from the earth, my heart is upward flown; [mine;
Farewell, my friends, and all that once was
Now, should you fix my feet on Cæsar's throne,
Crown me, and call the world my own,
The gold that binds my brows could ne'er my soul confine.

I am the Lord's, and Jesus is my love;
He, that dear God, shall fill my vast desire.
My flesh below; yet I can dwell above,
And nearer to my Saviour move; [spire.
There all my soul shall centre, all my powers con-
Thus I with angels live; thus half-divine
I sit on high, nor mind inferior joys:
Fill'd with his love, I feel that God is mine,
His glory is my great design,
That everlasting project all my thoughts employs.

A SONG TO CREATING WISDOM.

PART I.

ETERNAL Wisdom, thee we praise,
Thee the creation sings:
With thy loud name, rocks, hills, and seas,
And heaven's high palace rings.

Place me on the bright wings of day
To travel with the sun;
With what amaze shall I survey
The wonders thou hast done!
Thy hand how wide it spread the sky!
How glorious to behold?
Ting'd with a blue of heavenly dye,
And starr'd with sparkling gold.
There thou hast bid the globes of light
Their endless circles run;
There the pale planet rules the night,
And day obeys the sun.

PART II.

Downward I turn my wondering eyes
On clouds and storms below,
Those under-regions of the skies
Thy numerous glories show.
The noisy winds stand ready there
Thy orders to obey,
With sounding wings they sweep the air,
To make thy chariot way.
There, like a trumpet, loud and strong,
Thy thunder shakes our coast:
While the red lightnings wave along,
The banners of thine host.
On the thin air, without a prop,
Hang fruitful showers around:
At thy command they sink, and drop
Their fatness on the ground.

PART III.

Now to the earth I bend my song,
And cast my eyes abroad,
Glancing the British isles along;
Blest isles, confess your God.
How did his wondrous skill array
Your fields in charming green;
A thousand herbs his art display,
A thousand flowers between!
Tall oaks for future navies grow,
Fair Albion's best defence,
While corn and vines rejoice below,
Those luxuries of sense.
The bleating flocks his pasture feeds:
And herds of larger size,
That bellow through the Lindian meads,
His bounteous hand supplies.

PART IV.

We see the Thames caress the shores,
He guides her silver flood:
While angry Severn swells and roars,
Yet hears her ruler God.
The rolling mountains of the deep
Observe his strong command;
His breath can raise the billows steep,
Or sink them to the sand.
Amidst thy watery kingdoms, Lord,
The finny nations play,
And scaly monsters, at thy word,
Rush through the northern sea.

PART V.

Thy glories blaze all nature round,
And strike the gazing sight,
Through skies, and seas, and solid ground,
With terror and delight.
Infinite strength, and equal skill,
Shine through the worlds abroad,
Our souls with vast amazement fill,
And speak the builder God.
But the sweet beauties of thy grace
Our softer passions move;
Pity divine in Jesus face
We see, adore, and love.

GOD'S ABSOLUTE DOMINION.

LORD, when my thoughtful soul surveys
Fire, air, and earth, and stars and seas,
I call them all thy slaves;
Commission'd by my Father's will,
Poisons shall cure, or balms shall kill;
Vernal suns, or zephyrs breath.
May burn or blast the plants to death
That sharp December saves;
What can winds or planets boast
But a precarious power?
The sun is all in darkness lost,
Frost shall be fire, and fire be frost,
When he appoints the hour.
Lo, the Norwegians near the polar sky
Chafe their frozen limbs with snow,
Their frozen limbs awake and glow,
The vital flame touch'd with a strange supply
Rekindles, for the God of life is nigh;
He bids the vital flood in wonted circles flow.
Cold steel, expos'd to northern air,
Drinks the meridian fury of the midnight bear,
And burns th' unwary stranger there.
Enquire, my soul, of ancient fame,
Look back two thousand years, and see
Th' Assyrian prince transform'd a brute,
For boasting to be absolute:
Once to his court the God of Israel came,
A King more absolute than he.
I see the furnace blaze with rage
Sevenfold: I see amidst the flame
Three Hebrews of immortal name:
They move, they walk across the burning stage
Unhurt, and fearless, while the tyrant stood
A statue; fear congeal'd his blood:
Nor did the raging element dare
Attempt their garments, or their hair:
It knew the Lord of nature there.
Nature compell'd by a superior cause,
Now breaks her own eternal laws,
Now seems to break them, and obeys
Her sovereign king in different ways.
Father, how bright thy glories shine!
How broad thy kingdom, how divine! [thine.
Nature, and miracle, and fate, and chance, are
Hence from my heart, ye idols, flee,
Ye sounding names of vanity:
No more my lips shall sacrifice
To chance and nature, tales and lies:
Creatures without a God can yield me no supplies

What is the sun, or what the shade,
Or frosts, or flames, to kill or save?
His favour is my life, his lips pronounce me dead;
And as his awful dictates bid,
Earth is my mother, or my grave.

CONDESCENDING GRACE.

In Imitation of the cxvth Psalm.

WHEN the eternal bows the skies,
To visit earthy things,
With scorn divine he turns his eyes
From towers of haughty kings:
Rides on a cloud disdainful by
A Sultan, or a Czar,
Laughs at the worms that rise so high,
Or frowns them from afar;
He bids his awful chariot roll
Far downward from the skies.
To visit every humble soul,
With pleasure in his eyes.
Why should the Lord that reigns above
Disdain so lofty kings?
Say, Lord, and why such looks of love
Upon such worthless things?
Mortals, be dumb: what creature dares
Dispute his awful will?
Ask no account of his affairs,
But tremble, and be still.
Just like his nature is his grace,
All sovereign, and all free;
Great God, how searchless are thy ways!
How deep thy judgments be!

THE INFINITE.

SOME seraph, lend your heavenly tongue,
Or harp of golden string.
That I may raise a lofty song
To our Eternal King.
Thy names, how infinite they be!
Great Everlasting One!
Boundless thy might and majesty,
And unconfin'd thy throne.
Thy glories shine of wondrous size,
And wondrous large thy grace;
Immortal day breaks from thine eyes,
And Gabriel veils his face.
Thine essence is a vast abyss,
Which angels cannot sound,
An ocean of infinities
Where all our thoughts are drown'd.
The mysteries of creation lie,
Beneath enlighten'd minds,
Thoughts can ascend above the sky,
And fly before the winds.
Reason may grasp the massy hills,
And stretch from pole to pole,
But half thy name our spirit fills,
And overloads our soul.
In vain our haughty reason swells,
For nothing's found in Thee
But boundless unconceivables,
And vast eternity.

CONFESSION AND PARDON.

ALAS, my aching heart!
Here the keen torment lies;
It racks my waking hours with smart,
And frights my slumbering eyes.
Guilt will be hid no more,
My griefs take vent apace,
The crimes that blot my conscience o'er
Flush crimson in my face.
My sorrows, like a flood,
Impatient of restraint,
Into thy bosom, O my God,
Pour out a long complaint.
This impious heart of mine
Could once defy the Lord,
Could rush with violence on to sin,
In presence of thy sword.
How often have I stood
A rebel to the skies,
The calls, the tenders of a God,
And mercy's loudest cries!
He offers all his grace,
And all his heaven to me;
Offers! but 'tis to senseless brass,
That cannot feel nor see.
Jesus the Saviour stands
To court me from above,
And looks and spreads his wounded hands,
And shows the prints of love.
But I, a stupid fool,
How long have I withstood
The blessings purchas'd with his soul,
And paid for all in blood!
The heavenly Dove came down
And tender'd me his wings
To mount me upward to a crown,
And bright immortal things.
Lord, I'm ashamed to say
That I refus'd thy Dove,
And sent thy Spirit griev'd away,
To his own realms of love.
Not all thine heavenly charms,
Nor terrors of thy hand,
Could force me to lay down my arms,
And bow to thy command.
Lord, 'tis against thy face
My sins like arrows rise,
And yet, and yet (O matchless grace!)
Thy thunder silent lies.
O shall I never feel
The meltings of thy love?
Am I such hell-harden'd steel
That mercy cannot move?
Now for one powerful glance,
Dear Saviour, from thy face:
This rebel-heart no more withstands,
But sinks beneath thy grace.
O'ercome by dying love I fall,
Here at thy cross I lie;
And throw my soul, my flesh, my all,
And weep, and love, and die.

" Rise, says the Prince of Mercy, rise,
 " With joy and pity in his eyes:
 " Rise, and behold my wounded veins,
 " Here flows the blood to wash thy stains.
 " See my great Father reconcil'd:"
 He said. And lo, the Father smil'd:
 The joyful cherubs clap'd their wings,
 And sounded grace on all their strings.

YOUNG MEN AND MAIDENS, OLD MEN
 AND BABES, PRAISE YE THE LORD,
 Psal. cxlviii. 12.

Sons of Adam, bold and young,
 In the wild mazes of whose veins
 A flood of fiery vigour reigns, [strung;
 And wields your active limbs, with hardy sinews
 Fall prostrate at th' eternal throne
 Whence your precarious powers depend;
 Nor swell as if your lives were all your own,
 But choose your Maker for your friend;
 His favour is your life, his arm is your support,
 His hand can stretch your days, or cut your minutes short.

Virgins, who roll your artful eyes,
 And shoot delicious danger thence;
 Swift the lovely lightning flies,
 And melts our reason down to sense;
 Boast not of those withering charms
 That must yield their youthful grace
 To age and wrinkles, earth and worms;
 But love the author of your smiling face; [hours:
 That heavenly bridegroom claims your blooming
 O make it your perpetual care
 To please that Everlasting Fair;
 His beauties are the sun, and but the shade is yours.

Infants, whose different destinies
 Are wove with threads of different size;
 But from the same spring-tide of tears,
 Commence your hopes, and joys, and fears,
 (A tedious train!) and date your following years:
 Break your first silence in his praise
 Who wrought your wondrous frame;
 With sounds of tenderest accent raise
 Your honours to his name;
 And consecrate your early days
 To know the Power supreme.

Ye heads of venerable age,
 Just marching off the mortal stage,
 Fathers, whose vital threads are spun
 As long as e'er the glass of life would run,
 Adore the hand that led your way
 Through flowery fields a fair long summer's day;
 Gasp out your soul in praises to the sovereign power [hour.
 That set your west so distant from your dawning

FLYING FOWL, AND CREEPING THINGS, PRAISE YE THE LORD,
 Psal. cxlviii. 10.

SWEET flocks, whose soft enamell'd wing
 Swift and gently cleaves the sky;
 Whose charming notes address the spring
 With an artless harmony.
 Lovely minstrels of the field,
 Who in leafy shadows sit,
 And your wondrous structures build, [light:
 Awake your tuneful voices with the dawning

To nature's God your first devotions pay,
 Ere you salute the rising day,
 'Tis he calls up the sun, and gives him every ray.
 Serpents, who o'er the meadows slide,
 And wear upon your shining back
 Numerous ranks of gaudy pride,
 Which thousand mingling colours make;
 Let the fierce glances of your eyes
 Rebate their baleful fire:
 In harmless play twist and unfold
 The volumes of your scaly gold:
 That rich embroidery of your gay attire,
 Proclaims your Maker kind and wise.
 Insects and mites, of mean degree,
 That swarm in myriads o'er the land,
 Moulded by Wisdom's artful hand,
 And curl'd and painted with a various die;
 In your innumerable forms
 Praise him that wears th' ethereal crown,
 And bend his lofty counsels down
 To despicable worms.

THE COMPARISON AND COMPLAINT.

INFINITE power, eternal Lord,
 How sovereign is thy hand!
 All nature rose t' obey thy word,
 And moves at thy command.
 With steady course thy shining sun
 Keeps his appointed way;
 And all the hours obedient run
 The circle of the day.

But ah! how wide my spirit flies,
 And wanders from her God!
 My soul forgets the heavenly prize,
 And treads the downward-road.

The raging fire, and stormy sea,
 Perform thine awful will,
 And every beast and every tree,
 Thy great designs fulfil:

While my wild passions rage within,
 Nor thy commands obey;
 And flesh and sense, enslav'd to sin,
 Draw my best thoughts away.

Shall creatures of a meaner frame
 Pay all their dues to thee;
 Creatures, that never knew thy name,
 That never lov'd like me?

Great God, create my soul anew,
 Conform my heart to thine,
 Melt down my will and let it flow,
 And take the mould divine.

Seize my whole frame into thine hand;
 Here all my powers I bring;
 Manage the wheels by thy command,
 And govern every spring.

Then shall my feet no more depart,
 Nor wandering senses rove;
 Devotion shall be all my heart,
 And all my passions love.

Than not the sun shall more than I
 His Maker's law perform,
 Nor travel swifter through the sky,
 Nor with a zeal so warm.

GOD SUPREME AND SELF-SUFFICIENT.

WHAT is our God, or what his name,
Nor men can learn, nor angels teach :
He dwells conceal'd in radiant flame,
Where neither eyes nor thoughts can reach.

The spacious worlds of heavenly light,
Compar'd with him, how short they fall ?
They are too dark, and he too bright.
Nothing are they, and God is all

He spoke the wondrous word, and lo
Creation rose at his command :
Whirlwinds and seas their limits know,
Bound in the hollow of his hand.

There rests the earth, there roll the spheres,
There nature leans, and feels her prop :
But his own Self-sufficiency bears
The weight of his own glories up.

The tide of creatures ebbs and flows,
Measuring the changes by their moon :
No ebb his sea of glory knows,
His age is one eternal moon.

Then fly, my song, an endless round,
The lofty tune let Michael raise ;
All nature dwell upon the sound,
But we can ne'er fulfil the praise.

JESUS THE ONLY SAVIOUR.

ADAM our father and our head,
Transgress ; and justice doom'd us dead :
The fiery law speaks all despair,
There's no reprove, nor pardon there.

Call a bright council in the skies ;
" Seraphs the mighty and the wise,
" Say, what expedient can you give ?
" That sin be damn'd, and sinners live ?
" Speak, are you strong to bear the load,
" The weighty vengeance of a God ?
" Which of you loves our wretched race,
" Or dares to venture in our place ?"

In vain we ask : for all around
Stands silence through the heavenly ground :
There's not a glorious mind above
Has half the strength or half the love.

But, O unutterable grace !
Th' Eternal Son takes Adam's place :
Down to our world the Saviour flies,
Stretches his naked arms, and dies.

Justice was pleas'd to bruise the God,
And pay its wrongs with heavenly blood ;
What unknown racks and pangs he bore !
Then rose : The law could ask no more.

Amazing work ! look down, ye skies,
Wonder and gaze with all your eyes ;
Ye heavenly thrones, stoop from above,
And bow to this mysterious love.

See, how they bend ! See, how they look,
Long they had read th' eternal book,
And studied dark decrees in vain,
The cross and Calvary makes them plain.

Now they are struck with deep amaze,
Each with his wings conceals his face :

Now clap their founding plumes, and cry,
" The wisdom of a Deity !"

Low they adore th' Incarnate Son,
And sing the glories he hath won ;
Sing how he broke our iron chains,
How deep he sunk, how high he reigns.

Triumph and reign, victorious Lord,
By all thy flaming hosts ador'd :
And say, dear Conqueror, say, how long,
Ere we shall rise to join their song.

Lo, from afar the promis'd day
Shines with a well-distinguish'd ray ;
But my wing'd passion hardly bears
These lengths of slow delaying years.

Send down a chariot from above,
With fiery wheels, and pav'd with love ;
Raise me beyond th' ethereal blue,
To sing and love as angels do.

LOOKING UPWARD.

THE heavens invite mine eye,
The stars salute me round ;
Father, I blush, I mourn to lie
Thus groveling on the ground.

My warmer spirits move,
And make attempts to fly ;
I wish aloud for wings of love
To raise me swift and high.

Beyond those crystal vaults,
And all their sparkling balls ;
They're but the porches to thy courts,
And paintings on thy walls.

Vain world, farewell to you ;
Heaven is my native air :
I bid my friends a short adieu,
Impatient to be there.

I feel my powers releas'd
From their old fleshy clod ;
Fair guardian, bear me up in haste,
And set me near my God.

CHRIST DYING, RISING, AND REIGNING

HE dies ! the heavenly lover dies !
The tidings strike a doleful sound
On my poor heart-strings : deep he lies
In the cold caverns of the ground.

Come, faints, and drop a tear or two,
On the dear bosom of your God,
He shed a thousand drops for you,
A thousand drops of richer blood.

Here's love and grief beyond degree,
The Lord of glory dies for men !
But lo, what sudden joys I see !
Jesus the dead revives again.

The rising God forsakes the tomb,
Up to his Father's court he flies ;
Cherubic legions guard him home,
And shout him welcome to the skies.

Break off your tears, ye saints, and tell
How high our Great Deliverer reigns ;

Sing how he spoil'd the hosts of hell,
And led the monster death in chains.

Say live for ever wondrous King!
Born to redeem and strong to save!
Then ask the monster, Where's his sting?
And where's thy victory, boasting grave?

THE GOD OF THUNDER.

O THE immense, th' amazing height,
The boundless grandeur of our God,
Who treads the worlds beneath his feet,
And sways the nations with his nod!

He speaks, and lo, all nature shakes,
Heavens everlasting pillars bow;
He rends the clouds with hideous cracks,
And shoots his fiery arrows through.

Well, let the nations start and fly
At the blue light'ning's horrid glare,
Atheists and emperors shrink and die,
When flame and noise torment the air.

Let noise and flame confound the skies,
And drown the spacious realms below,
Yet will we sing the Thunderer's praise,
And send our loud hosannas through.

Celestial King, thy blazing power
Kindles our hearts to flaming joys,
We shout to hear thy thunders roar,
And echo to our Father's voice.

Thus shall the God our Saviour come,
And lightnings round his chariot play:
Ye light'nings, fly to make him room,
Ye glorious storms prepare his way!

THE DAY OF JUDGMENT.

AN ODE.

Attempted in English Sapphick.

WHEN the fierce north wind with his airy forces
Rears up the Baltic to a foaming fury;
And the red lightning with a storm of hail comes
Rushing amain down.

How the poor sailors stand amaz'd and tremble!
While the hoarse thunder, like a bloody trumpet,
Roars a loud onset to the gaping waters
Quick to devour them.

Such shall the noise be, and the wild disorder,
(If things eternal may be like these earthly)
Such the dire terror when the great Archangel
Shakes the creation;

Tears the strong pillars of the vault of heaven,
Breaks up old marble, the repose of princes;
See the graves open, and the bones arising,
Flames all around them.

Hark the shrill outcries of the guilty wretches!
Lively bright horror, and amazing anguish,
Stare through their eye-lids, while the living worm lies
Gnawing within them.

Thoughts, like old vultures, prey upon their heart-
strings,
And the smart tinges, when the eye beholds the

Lofty Judge frowning, and a flood of vengeance
Rolling afore him.

Hopeless immortals! how they scream and shiver
While devils push them to the pit wide-yawning
Hideous and gloomy to receive them headlong
Down to the centre.

Stop here, my fancy: (all away, ye horrid
Doleful ideas!) come, arise to Jesus,
How he sits God-like! and the saints around him
Thron'd, yet adoring!

O may I sit there when he comes triumphant,
Dooming the nations! then ascend to glory,
While our hosannas all along the passage
Shout the Redeemer.

THE SONG OF ANGELS ABOVE.

EARTH has detain'd me prisoner long,
And I'm grown weary now;
My heart, my hand, my ear, my tongue,
There's nothing here for you.

Tir'd in my thoughts, I stretch me down,
And upward glance mine eyes.
Upward (my Father) to thy throne,
And to my native skies.

There the dear Man my Saviour sits,
The God, how bright he shines!
And scatters infinite delights
On all the happy minds.

Seraphs with elevated strains
Circle the throne around,
And move and charm the starry plains
With an immortal sound.

Jesus the Lord their harps employs,
Jesus my love they sing,
Jesus the name of both our joys
Sounds sweet from every string.

Hark, how beyond the narrow bounds
Of time and space they run,
And speak in most majestic sounds,
The godhead of the Son.

How on the Father's breast he lay,
The darling of his soul,
Infinite years before the day
Or heavens began to roll.

And now they sink the lofty tone,
And gentler notes they play,
And bring th' eternal God-head down
To dwell in humble clay.

O sacred beauties of the Man!
(The God resides within)
His flesh all pure, without a stain,
His soul without a sin.

Then, how he look'd, and how he smil'd,
What wondrous things he said!
Sweet cherubs, stay, dwell here awhile,
And tell what Jesus did.

At his command the blind awake,
And feel the glad some rays;

He bids the dumb attempt to speak,
They try their tongues in praise.

He shed a thousand blessings round
Where-e'er he turn'd his eye;
He spoke, and at the sovereign sound
The hellish legions fly.

Thus while with unambitious strife
Th' ethereal minstrels rove
Through all the labours of his life,
And wonders of his love,

In the full choir a broken string
Groans with a strange surprise;
The rest in silence mourn their King,
That bleeds and loves, and dies.

Seraph and saint, with drooping wings,
Cease their harmonious breath;
No blooming trees, nor bubbling springs,
While Jesus sleeps in death.

Then all at once to living strains
They summon ev'ry chord,
Break up the tomb, and burst his chains,
And show their rising Lord.

Around the flaming army throngs
To guard him to the skies,
With loud hosannas on their tongues,
And triumph in their eyes.

In awful state the conquering God
Ascends his shining throne,
While tuneful angels sound abroad
The victories he has won.

Now let me rise, and join their song,
And be an angel too;
My heart, my hand, my ear, my tongue,
Here's joyful work for you.

I would begin the music here,
And so my soul should rise:
Oh! for some heavenly notes to bear
My spirit to the skies!

There, ye that love my Saviour, sit,
There I would fain have place,
Among your thrones, or at your feet,
So I might see his face.

I am confin'd to earth no more,
But mount in haste above,
To bless the God that I adore,
And sing the Man I love.

FIRE, AIR, EARTH, AND SEA, PRAISE YE THE LORD.

EARTH, thou great footstool of our God
Who reigns on high; thou fruitful source
Of all our raiment, life and food;
Our house, our parent, and our nurse;
Mighty stage of mortal scenes,
Drest with strong and gay machines,
Hung with golden lamps around
(And flowery carpets spread the ground);
Thou bulky globe, prodigious mass,
That hangs unpillar'd in an empty space!

While thy unwieldy weight rests on the feeble air,
Bless that Almighty Word that fix'd and holds thee there.

Fire, thou swift herald of his face,
Whose glorious rage, at his command,
Levels a palace with the sand,
Blending the lofty spires in ruin with the base:
Ye heavenly flames, that singe the air,
Artillery of a jealous God,
Bright arrows that his founding quivers bear
To scatter deaths abroad;
Lightnings, adore the sovereign arm that flings
His vengeance, and your fires, upon the heads of kings.

Thou vital element, the air,
Whose boundless magazines of breath
Our fainting flame of life repair, [death:
And save the bubble man from the cold arms of
And ye, whose vital moisture yields
Life's purple stream a fresh supply; [fields,
Sweet waters, wandering through the flowery
Or dropping from the sky;
Confess the Power whose all-sufficient name
Nor needs your aid to build, or to support our frame.

Now the rude air, with noisy force,
Beats up and swells the angry sea,
They join to make our lives a prey,
And sweep the sailors hopes away,
Vain hopes, to reach their kindred on the shores!
Lo, the wild seas and surging waves
Gape hideous in a thousand graves:
Be still, ye floods, and know your bounds of sand,
Ye storms, adore your Master's hand:
The winds are in his fist, the waves at his command.

From the eternal emptiness
His fruitful word by secret springs
Drew the whole harmony of things
That form this noble universe:
Old nothing knew his powerful hand,
Scarce had he spoke his full command,
Fire, air, and earth, and sea, heard the creating call,
And leap'd from empty nothing to this beauteous
all:

And still they dance, and still obey
The orders they receiv'd the great creation-day.

THE FAREWELL.

DEAD be my heart to all below,
To mortal joys and mortal cares;
To sensual bliss that charms us so,
Be dark, my eyes, and deaf, my ears.

Here I renounce my carnal taste
Of the fair fruit that sinners prize:
Their paradise shall never waste
One thought of mine, but to despise.

All earthly joys are over-weigh'd
With mountains of vexatious care;
And where's the sweet that is not laid
A bait to some destructive snare?

Be gone for ever, mortal things!
Thou mighty mole-hill earth, farewell!

Angels aspire on lofty wings,
And leave the globe for ants to dwell.

Come, heaven, and fill my vast desires,
My soul pursues the sovereign good:
She was all made of heavenly fires,
Nor can she live on meaner food.

GOD ONLY KNOWN TO HIMSELF.

STAND, and adore! how glorious he
That dwells in bright eternity!
We gaze, and we confound our sight
Plung'd in th' abyss of dazzling light.

Thou sacred One, Almighty Three,
Great Everlasting Mystery,
What lofty numbers shall we frame
Equal to thy tremendous name?
Seraphs, the nearest to the throne,
Begin, and speak the Great Unknown:
Attempt the song, wind up your strings,
To notes untry'd, and boundless things.

You, whose capacious powers survey
Largely beyond our eyes of clay:
Yet what a narrow portion too
Is seen, or known, or thought, by you!

How flat your highest praises fall
Below th' immense Original!
Weak creatures we, that strive in vain
To reach an uncreated strain!

Great God, forgive our feeble lays,
Sound out thine own eternal praise;
A song so vast, a theme so high,
Calls for the voice that tun'd the sky.

PARDON AND SANCTIFICATION.

My crimes awake; and hideous fear
Distracts my restless mind,
Guilt meets my eyes with horrid glare,
And hell pursues behind.

Almighty vengeance frowns on high,
And flames array the throne;
While thunder murmurs round the sky,
Impatient to be gone.

Where shall I hide this noxious head:
Can rocks or mountains save?
Or shall I wrap me in the shade
Of midnight and the grave?

Is there no shelter from the eye
Of a revenging God?
Jesus, to thy dear wounds I fly,
Bedew me with thy blood.

Those guardian drops my soul secure,
And wash away my sin;
Eternal justice frowns no more,
And conscience smiles within.

I bless that wondrous purple stream
That whitens every stain;
Yet is my soul but half redeem'd,
If sin the tyrant reign.

Lord, blast his empire with thy breath,
That cursed throne must fall;

Ye flattering plagues, that work my death,
Fly, for I hate you all.

SOVEREIGNTY AND GRACE.

THE Lord! how fearful is his name!
How wide is his command?
Nature, with all her moving frame,
Rests on his mighty hand.

Immortal glory forms his throne,
And light his awful robe;
While with a smile, or with a frown,
He manages the globe.

A word of his Almighty breath
Can swell or sink the seas;
Build the vast empires of the earth,
Or break them as he please.

Adoring angels round him fall
In all their shining forms,
His sovereign eye looks through them all,
And pities mortal worms.

His bowels, to our worthless race,
In sweet compassion move;
He clothes his looks with softest grace,
And takes his title, Love.

Now let the Lord for ever reign,
And sway us as he will,
Sick, or in health, in ease, or pain,
We are his favourites still.

No more shall peevish passion rise,
The tongue no more complain;
'Tis sovereign love that lends our joys,
And love resumes again.

THE LAW AND GOSPEL.

"CURST be the man, for ever curst,
"That doth one wilful sin commit;
"Death and damnation for the first,
"Without relief and infinite."

Thus Sinai roars; and round the earth
Thunder, and fire, and vengeance flings;
But, Jesus, thy dear gasping breath,
And Calvary, say gentler things.

"Pardon, and grace, and boundless love,
"Streaming along a Saviour's blood,
"And life, and joys, and crowns above,
"Dear-purchas'd by a bleeding God."

Hark, how he prays (the charming sound
Dwells on his dying lips) "Forgive!"
And every groan, and gaping wound,
Cries, "Father, let the rebels live."

Go, you that rest upon the law,
And toil, and seek salvation there,
Look to the flames that Moses saw,
And shrink, and tremble, and despair.

But I'll retire beneath the cross:
Saviour, at thy dear feet I lie;
And the keen sword that justice draws,
Flaming and red, shall pass me by.

SEEKING A DIVINE CALM IN A REST-LESS WORLD.

"O Mens, quæ stabili fata Regis vice," &c.
Casimire, Book III. Od. 28.

ETERNAL Mind, who rul'st the fates
Of dying realms, and rising states,
With one unchang'd decree;
While we admire thy vast affairs,
Say, can our little trifling cares
Afford a smile to thee?

Thou scatterest honours, crowns, and gold:
We fly to seize, and fight to hold
The bubbles and the oar:
So emmets struggle for a grain;
So boys their petty wars maintain
For shells upon the shore.

Here a vain man his sceptre breaks,
The next a broken sceptre takes,
And warriors win and lose;
This rolling world will never stand,
Plunder'd and snatch'd from hand to hand,
As power decays or grows.

Earth's but an atom: Greedy swords
Carve it among a thousand lords,
And yet they can't agree:
Let greedy swords still fight and slay,
I can be poor; but, Lord, I pray
To sit and smile with thee.

HAPPY FRAILTY.

"How meanly dwells th' immortal mind!
"How vile these bodies are!
"Why was a clod of earth design'd
"To enclose a heavenly star?
"Weak cottage where our souls reside!
"This flesh a tottering wall;
"With frightful breaches gaping wide
"The building bends to fall.
"All round it storms of trouble blow,
"And waves of sorrow roll;
"Cold waves and winter storms beat through,
"And pain the tenant-soul.

"Alas! how frail our state!" said I:
And thus went mourning on,
Till sudden from the cleaving sky
A gleam of glory shone.

My soul all felt the glory come,
And breath'd her native air;
Then she remember'd heaven her home,
And she a prisoner here.

Straight she began to change her key,
And joyful in her pains,
She sung the frailty of her clay
In pleasurable strains.

"How weak the prison where I dwell!
"Flesh but a tottering wall,
"The breaches cheerfully foretell,
"The house must shortly fall.

"No more, my friends, shall I complain,
"Though all my heart-strings ache;

"Welcome disease, and every pain,
"That makes the cottage shake.
"Now let the tempest blow all round,
"Now swell the surges high,
"And beat this house of bondage down,
"To let the stranger fly.
"I have a mansion built above
"By the Eternal Hand;
"And should the earth's old basis move,
"My heavenly house must stand.
"Yes, for 'tis there my Saviour reigns,
"(I long to see the God)
"And his immortal strength sustains
"The courts that cost him blood."
Hark, from on high my Saviour calls:
"I come, my Lord, my Love:"
Devotion breaks the prison-walls,
And speeds my last remove.

LAUNCHING INTO ETERNITY.

It was a brave attempt! adventurous he,
Who in the first ship broke the unknown sea:
And, leaving his dear native shores behind,
Trusted his life to the licentious wind.
I see the surging brine: the tempest raves:
He on a pine-plank rides across the waves,
Exulting on the edge of thousand gaping graves:
He steers the winged boat, and shifts the sails,
Conquers the flood, and manages the gales.
Such is the soul that leaves this mortal land
Fearless when the great master gives command.
Death is the storm: She smiles to hear it roar,
And bids the tempest waft her from the shore:
Then with a skilful helm she sweeps the seas,
And manages the raging storm with ease;
(Her faith can govern death) she spreads her wings
Wide to the wind, and as she sails she sings,
And loses by degrees the sight of mortal things.
As the shores lessen, so her joys arise,
The waves roll gentler, and the tempest dies.
Now vast eternity fills all her sight,
She floats on the broad deep with infinite de-
light,
The seas for ever calm, the skies for ever bright.

A PROSPECT OF THE RESURRECTION.

How long shall death the tyrant reign
And triumph o'er the just,
While the rich blood of martyrs stain
Lies mingled with the dust?
When shall the tedious night be gone?
When will our Lord appear?
Our fond desires would pray him down,
Our love embrace him here.
Let faith arise, and climb the hills,
And from afar descry
How distant are his chariot-wheels,
And tell how fast they fly.
Lo, I behold the scattering shades,
The dawn of heaven appears,
The sweet immortal morning spreads
Its blushes round the spheres,

I see the Lord of glory come,
And flaming guards around:
The skies divide, to make him room,
The trumpet shakes the ground.

I hear the voice, "Ye dead, arise!"
And lo, the graves obey,
And waking saints with joyful eyes
Salute th' expected day.

They leave the dust, and on the wing
Rise to the middle air,
In shining garments meet their King,
And low adore him there.

O may my humble spirit stand
Among them cloth'd in white!
The meanest place at his right hand
Is infinite delight.

How will our joy and wonder rise,
When our returning King
Shall bear us homeward through the skies
On love's triumphant wing!

Ad Dominum nostrum & Servatorem.

JESUM CHRISTUM.

O D A.

Te, grande numen, corporis incola,
Te, magna magni progenies patris,
Nomen verendum nostri Jesu
Vox, citharæ, calami sonabunt.

Aptentur auro grandisonæ fides,
Christi triumphos incipe barbite,
Fractosque terrores Averni,

BREATHING TOWARD THE HEAVENLY COUNTRY.

Casimire, Book I. Od. 19. imitated.

"Urit me Patriæ Decor," &c.

THE beauty of my native land
 Immortal love inspires;
 I burn, I burn with strong desires,
 And sigh, and wait the high command.
 There glides the moon her shining way,
 And shoots my heart through with a silver ray,
 Upward my heart aspires:
 A thousand lamps of golden light
 Hung high, in vaulted azure, charm my sight,
 And wink and beckon with their amorous fires.
 O ye fair glories of my heavenly home,
 Bright centinels who guard my Father's court,
 Where all the happy minds resort,
 When will my Father's chariot come?
 Must ye for ever walk th' ethereal round,
 For ever see the mourner lie
 An exile of the sky,
 A prisoner of the ground?
 Descend some shining servants from on high,
 Build me a hasty tomb;
 A grassy turf will raise my head;
 The neighbouring lilies dress my bed;
 And shed a sweet perfume.
 Here I put off the chains of death,
 My soul too long has worn:
 Friends, I forbid one groaning breath,
 Or tear to wet my urn;
 Raphael, behold me all undrest,
 Here gently lay this flesh to rest;
 Then mount and lead the path unknown,
 Swift I pursue thee, flaming guide, on pinions of my own.

THE

HUNDREDTH EPIGRAM OF CASIMIRE.

On Saint ARDALIO, who from a Stage-Player became a Christian, and suffered Martyrdom.

ARDALIO jeers, and in his comic strains
 The mysteries of our bleeding God profanes,
 While his loud laughter shakes the painted scenes.

Heaven heard, and strait around the smoking throne
 The kindling lightning in thick flashes shone,
 And vengeful thunder murmur'd to be gone.

Mercy stood near, and with a smiling brow Calm'd the loud thunder; "There's no need of
 you;

"Grace shall descend, and the weak man subdue."

Grace leaves the skies, and he the stage forsakes,
 He bows his head down to the martyring axe,
 And as he bows, this gentle farewell speaks;

"So goes the comedy of life away;

"Vain earth, adieu; Heaven will applaud to-day;

"Strike courteous tyrant, and conclude the play."

When the Protestant Church at Montpelier was demolished by the French King's Order, the Protestants laid Stones up in their Burying-place, whereon a Jesuit made a Latin Epigram.

Englified thus:

A Hug'not church, once at Montpelier built,
 Stood and proclaim'd their madness and their guilt;
 Too long it stood beneath heaven's angry frown,
 Worthy when rising to be thunder'd down.
 Lewis, at last, th' avenger of the skies,
 Commands, and level with the ground it lies:
 The stones dispers'd their wretched offspring come,
 Gather, and heap them on their father's tomb.
 Thus the curs'd house falls on the builder's head;
 And though beneath the ground their bones are laid,
 Yet the just vengeance still pursues the guilty dead.

THE ANSWER

BY A FRENCH PROTESTANT.

Englified thus:

A Christian church once at Montpelier stood,
 And nobly spoke the builder's zeal for God,
 It stood the envy of the fierce dragoon,
 But not deserv'd to be destroy'd so soon:
 Yet Lewis, the wild tyrant of the age,
 Tears down the walls, a victim to his rage.
 Young faithful hands pile up the sacred stones
 (Dear monument!) o'er their dead father's bones;
 The stones shall move when the dead father's rise,
 Start up before the pale destroyer's eyes,
 And testify his madness to th' avenging skies.

TWO HAPPY RIVALS,

DEVOTION AND THE MUSE.

WILD as the lightning, various as the moon,
 Roves my Pindaric song:
 Here she glows like burning noon

In fiercest flames, and here she plays
Gentle as star-beams on the midnight seas;
Now in a smiling angel's form,
Anon she rides upon the storm,
Loud as the noisy thunder, as a deluge strong.
Are my thoughts and wishes free,
And know no number nor degree?
Such is the Muse: Lo she disdains
The links and chains,
Measures and rules of vulgar strains,
And o'er the laws of harmony a Sovereign Queen
she reigns.

If she roves
By streams or groves
Tuning her pleasures or her pains,
My passion keeps her still in sight,
My passion holds an equal flight
Through love's, or nature's wide campaigns.
If with bold attempt she sings
Of the biggest mortal things,
Tottering thrones and nations slain;
Or breaks the fleets of warring kings,
While thunders roar
From shore to shore,
My soul sits fast upon her wings,
And sweeps the crimson surge, or scours the purple
plain;
Still I attend her as she flies,
Round the broad globe, and all beneath the skies.

But when from the meridian star
Long streaks of glory shine,
And heaven invites her from afar,
She takes the hint, she knows the sign,
The Muse ascends her heavenly carr, [divine.
And climbs the steepy path and means the throne
Then she leaves my fluttering mind
Clogg'd with clay, and unrefin'd,
Lengths of distance far behind:
Virtue lags with heavy wheel;
Faith has wings, but cannot rise,
Cannot rise,—Swift and high
As the winged numbers fly,
And faint devotion panting lies
Half way th' ethereal hill.

O why is piety so weak,
And yet the Muse so strong?
When shall these hateful fetters break
That have confin'd me long?
Inward a glowing heat I feel,
A spark of heavenly day;
But earthly vapours damp my zeal,
And heavy flesh drags me the downward way.
Faint are the efforts of my will,
And mortal passion charms my soul astray,
Shine, thou sweet hour of dear release,
Shine, from the sky,
And call me high
To mingle with the choirs of glory and of bliss.
Devotion there begins the flight,
Awakes the song, and guides the way;
There love and zeal divine and bright
Trace out new regions in the world of light,
And scarce the boldest Muse can follow or obey.

I'm in a dream, and fancy reigns,
She spreads her gay delusive scenes;
Or is the vision true?

Behold religion on her throne,
In awful state descending down.
And her dominions vast and bright within my spacious view.
She smiles, and with a courteous hand
She beckons me away;
I feel mine airy powers loose from the cumbrous
And with a joyful haste obey [clay,
Religion's high command.
What lengths and heights and depths unknown!
Broad fields with blooming glory sown,
And seas, and skies, and stars her own,
In an unmeasur'd sphere!
What heavens of joy, and light serene,
Which nor the rolling sun has seen,
Where nor the roving Muse has been
That greater traveller!

A long farewell to all below,
Farewell to all that sense can show,
To golden scenes, and flowery fields,
To all the worlds that fancy builds,
And all that poets know.
Now the swift transports of the mind
Leave the fluttering Muse behind;
A thousand loose Pindaric plumes fly scattering down the wind.
Among the clouds I lose my breath,
The rapture grows too strong:
The feeble powers that nature gave
Faint and drop downward to the grave;
Receive their fall, thou treasurer of death;
I will no more demand my tongue,
Till the gross organ well refin'd
Can trace the boundless flights of an unfetter'd
And raise an equal song. [mind,

The following POEMS of this BOOK are peculiarly dedicated to DIVINE LOVE.*

THE HAZARD OF LOVING THE CREATURES.

WHERE-E'ER my flattering passions rove,
I find a lurking snare;
'Tis dangerous to let loose our love
Beneath th' Eternal Fair.
Souls whom the tie of friendship binds,
And partners of our blood,
Seize a large portion of our minds,
And leave the less for God.
Nature has soft but powerful bands,
And reason she controls;
While children with their little hands
Hang closest to our souls.
Thoughtless they act th' old serpent's part;
What tempting things they be!
Lord, how they twine about our heart,
And draw it off from thee!

* Different ages have their different airs and fashions of writing. It was much more the fashion of the age when these poems were written, to treat of divine subjects in the style of Solomon's Song, than it is at this day, which will afford some apology for the writer, in his younger years.

Our hasty wills rush blindly on
Where rising passion rolls,
And thus we make our fetters strong
To bind our slavish souls.

Dear Sovereign, break these fetters off,
And set our spirits free;
God in himself is bliss enough,
For we have all in thee.

DESIRING TO LOVE CHRIST.

Come, let me love: or is thy mind
Harden'd to stone, or froze to ice?
I see the blessed Fair-one bend
And stoop t' embrace me from the skies!

O! 'tis a thought would melt a rock,
And make a heart of iron move,
That those sweet lips, that heavenly look,
Should seek and wish a mortal love!

I was a traitor doom'd to fire,
Bound to sustain eternal pains;
He flew on wings of strong desire,
Assum'd my guilt, and took my chains.

Infinite grace! Almighty charms!
Stand in amaze, ye whirling skies!
Jesus the God, with naked arms,
Hangs on a cross of love, and dies.

Did pity ever stoop so low,
Dress'd in divinity and blood?
Was ever rebel courted so
In groans of an expiring God?

Again he lives; and spreads his hands,
Hands that were nail'd to torturing smart;
By these dear wounds, says he; and stands
And prays to clasp me to his heart.

Sure I must love; or are my ears
Still deaf, nor will my passion move?
Then let me melt this heart to tears;
This heart shall yield to death or love.

THE HEART GIVEN AWAY.

If there are passions in my soul,
(And passions sure they be)
Now they are all at thy control,
My Jesus all for thee.

If love that pleasing power, can rest
In hearts so hard as mine,
Come, gentle Saviour to my breast,
For all my love is thine.

Let the gay world, with treacherous art
Allure my eyes in vain:
I have convey'd away my heart,
Ne'er to return again.

I feel my warmest passions dead
To all that earth can boast;
This soul of mine was never made
For vanity and dust.

Now I can fix my thoughts above,
Amidst their flattering charms,
Till the dear Lord that hath my love
Shall call me to his arms.

So Gabriel, at his King's command,
From yon celestial hill,
Walks downward to our worthless land,
His soul points upward still.

He glides along my mortal things,
Without a thought of love,
Fulfills his task, and spreads his wings
To reach the realms above.

MEDITATION IN A GROVE.

SWEET Muse, descend and bless the shade,
And bless the evening grove;
Business, and noise, and day, are fled,
And every care, but love.

But hence, ye wanton young and fair,
Mine is a purer flame;
No Phyllis shall infect the air,
With her unhallow'd name.

Jesus has all my powers possess'd,
My hopes, my fears, my joys:
He, the dear Sovereign of my breast,
Shall still command my voice.

Some of the fairest choirs above
Shall flock around my song,
With joy to hear the name they love
Sound from a mortal tongue.

His charms shall make my numbers flow,
And hold the falling floods,
While silence sits on every bough,
And bends the listening woods.

I'll carve our passion on the bark
And every wounded tree
Shall drop and bear some mystic mark
That Jesus dy'd for me.

The swains shall wonder when they read,
Inscrib'd on all the grove,
That Heaven itself came down, and bled
To win a mortal's love.

THE FAIREST AND THE ONLY BELOVED.

HONOUR to that diviner ray
That first allur'd my eyes away
From every mortal fair;
All the gay things that held my sight
Seem but the twinkling sparks of night,
And languishing in doubtful light
Die at the morning-star.

Whatever makes the Godhead great,
And fit to be ador'd,
Whatever speaks the creature sweet,
And worthy of my passion, meet
Harmonious in my Lord.
A thousand graces ever rise
A bloom upon his face;
A thousand arrows from his eyes
Shoot through my heart with dear surprise,
And guard around the place.

All nature's art shall never cure
The heavenly pains I found,
And 'tis beyond all beauty's power
To make another wound:

Earthly beauties grow and fade;
Nature heals the wounds she made,
But charms so much divine
Hold a long empire of the heart;
What heaven has join'd shall never part,
And Jesus must be mine.

In vain the envious shades of night,
Or flatteries of the day
Would veil his image from my sight,
Or tempt my soul away;
Jesus is all my waking theme,
His lovely form meets every dream,
And knows not to depart:
The passion reigns
Through all my veins,
And floating round the crimson stream,
Still finds him at my heart.

Dwell there, for ever dwell, my love;
Here I confine my sense;
Nor dare my wildest wishes rove
Nor stir a thought from thence.
Amidst thy glories and thy grace
Let all my remnant-minutes pass;
Grant thou, Everlasting Fair,
Grant my soul a mansion there:
My soul aspires to see thy face
Though life should for the vision pay;
So rivers run to meet the sea,
And lose their nature in th' embrace.
Thou art my ocean, thou my God;
In thee the passions of the mind,
With joys and freedom unconfin'd,
Exult and spread their powers abroad.
Not all the glittering things on high
Can make my heaven, if thou remove;
I shall be tir'd, and long to die;
Life is a pain without thy love;
Who could ever bear to be
Curst with immortality
Among the stars, but far from thee?

MUTUAL LOVE STRONGER THAN DEATH.

NOT the rich world of minds above
Can pay the mighty debt of love
I owe to Christ my God:
With pangs which none but he could feel
He brought my guilty soul from hell:
Not the first seraph's tongue can tell
The value of his blood.

Kindly he seiz'd me in his arms,
From the false world's pernicious charms
With force divinely sweet.

Had I ten thousand lives my own,
At his demand,
With cheerful hand,

I'd pay the vital treasure down
In hourly tributes at his feet.

But, Saviour, let me taste thy grace
With every fleeting breath?
And through that heaven of pleasure pass
To the cold arms of death;
Then I could lose successive souls
Fast as the minutes fly;
So billow after billow rolls
To kiss the shore, and die,

The substance of the following Copy, and many of the lines, were sent me by an esteemed friend, Mr. W. Nokes, with a desire that I would form them into a Pindaric Ode; but I retained his measures, lest I should too much alter his sense.

A SIGHT OF CHRIST.

ANGELS of light, your God and King surround,
With noble songs; in his exalted flesh
He claims your worship: while his saints on earth,
Bless their Redeemer-God with humble tongues,
Angels with lofty honours crown his head;
We bowing at his feet, by faith, may feel
His distant influence, and confess his love.

Once I beheld his face, when beams divine
Broke from his eye-lids, and unusual light
Wrapt me at once in glory and surprise.
My joyful heart high leaping in my breast
With transport cry'd, This is the Christ of God;
Then threw my arms around in sweet embrace,
And clasp'd, and bow'd adoring low, till I was lost in him.

While he appears, no other charms can hold
Or draw my soul, asham'd of former things,
Which no remembrance now deserve or name,
Though with contempt; best in oblivion hid.

But the bright shine and presence soon withdrew;
I sought him whom I love, but found him not;
I felt his absence; and with strongest cries
Proclaim'd, Where Jesus is not, all is vain.
Whether I hold him with a full delight,
Or seek him panting with extreme desire,
'Tis he alone can please my wondering soul;
To hold or seek him is my only choice.

He refrain on me to cast his eye
Down from his palace, nor my longing soul
With upward look can spy my dearest Lord,
Through his blew pavement I behold him still
With sweet reflection on the peaceful cross,
All in his blood and anguish groaning deep,
Gasping and dying there——
This sight I ne'er can lose, by it I live:
A quickening virtue from his death inspir'd
Is life and breath to me; his flesh my food;
His vital blood I drink, and hence my strength.

I live, I'm strong, and now eternal life
Beats quick within my breast; my vigorous mind
Spurns the dull earth, and on her fiery wings
Reaches the mount of purposes divine,
Counsels of peace betwixt th' Almighty Three
Conceiv'd at once, and sign'd without debate,
In perfect union of th' eternal mind.
With vast amaze I see th' unfathom'd thoughts,
Infinite schemes, and infinite designs
Of God's own Heart, in which he ever rests.
Eternity lies open to my view;
Here the Beginning and the End of all
I can discover; Christ the End of all,
And Christ the great Beginning; he my Head,
My God, my Glory, and my All in All.

O that the day, the joyful day were come,
When the first Adam from his ancient dust,
Crown'd with new honours, shall revive, and see
Jesus his Son and Lord; while shouting saints

Surround their King, and God's Eternal Son
Shines in the midst, but with superior beams,
And like himself; then the mysterious Word
Long hid behind the letter shall appear
All spirit and life, and in the fullest light
Stand forth to public view: and there disclose
His Father's sacred works, and wonderful ways:
Then wisdom, righteousness, and grace divine,
Through all the infinite transactions past,
Inwrought and shining, shall with double blaze
Strike our astonish'd eyes, and ever reign
Admir'd and glorious in triumphant light.

Death, and the tempter, and the man of sin,
Now at the bar arraign'd, in judgment cast,
Shall vex the saints no more: but perfect love
And loudest praises perfect joy create,
While ever-circling years maintain the blissful state.

LOVE ON A CROSS, AND A THRONE.

Now let my faith grow strong, and rise,
And view my Lord in all his love;
Look back to hear his dying cries,
Then mount and see his throne above.

See where he languish'd on the cross;
Beneath my sins he groan'd and dy'd;
See where he sits to plead my cause
By his Almighty Father's side.

If I behold his bleeding heart,
There love in floods of sorrow reigns,
He triumphs o'er the killing smart,
And buys my pleasure with his pains.

Or if I climb th' eternal hills
Where the dear Conqueror sits enthron'd,
Still in his heart compassion dwells,
Near the memorials of his wound:

How shall a pardon'd rebel show
How much I love my dying God?
Lord, here I banish every foe,
I hate the sins that cost thy blood.

I hold no more commerce with hell,
My dearest lusts shall all depart;
But let thine image ever dwell
Stamp'd as a seal upon my heart.

A PREPARATORY THOUGHT

FOR THE LORD'S SUPPER.

In Imitation of Isaiah lxiii. 1, 2, 3.

WHAT heavenly Man, or lovely God,
Comes marching downward from the skies,
Array'd in garments roll'd in blood,
With joy and pity in his eyes.

The Lord! the Saviour! yes, 'tis he;
I know him by the smiles he wears;
Dear glorious Man that dy'd for me,
Drench'd deep in agonies and tears!

Lo, he reveals his shining breast;
I own those wounds, and I adore:
Lo, he prepares a royal feast,
Sweet fruit of the sharp pangs he bore!

Whence flow these favours so divine!
Lord! why so lavish of thy blood?

Why for such earthly souls as mine,
This heavenly flesh, this sacred food?
'Twas his own love that made him bleed,
That nail'd him to the cursed tree;
'Twas his own love this table spread
For such unworthy worms as we.

Then let us taste the Saviour's love;
Come, faith, and feed upon the Lord:
With glad consent our lips shall move,
And sweet hosannas crown the board.

CONVERSE WITH CHRIST.

I'm tir'd with visits, modes, and forms,
And flatteries paid to fellow-worms;
Their conversation cloy's;
Their vain amours, and empty stuff:
But I can ne'er enjoy enough [joy.]
Of thy best company, my Lord, thou life of all my

When he begins to tell his love,
Through every vein my passions move,
The captives of his tongue:
In midnight shades, on frosty ground,
I could attend the pleasing sound,
Nor should I feel December cold, nor think the darkness long.

There, while I hear my Saviour-God
Count o'er the sins (a heavy load)
He bore upon the tree,
Inward I blush with secret shame,
And weep, and love, and bless the name
That knew not guilt nor grief his own, but bare it all for me.

Next he describes the thorns he wore,
And talks his bloody passion o'er,
Till I am drown'd in tears:
Yet with the sympathetic smart
There's a strange joy beats round my heart;
The cursed tree has blessings in't, my sweetest balm it bears.

I hear the glorious sufferer tell,
How on his cross he vanquish'd hell,
And all the powers beneath:
Transported and inspir'd, my tongue
Attempts his triumphs in a song;
"How has the serpent lost his sting! and where's thy victory, death!"

But when he shows his hands and heart,
With those dear prints of dying smart,
He sets my soul on fire:
Not the beloved John could rest
With more delight upon that breast,
Nor Thomas pry into those wounds with more intense desire.

Kindly he opens me his ear,
And bids me pour my sorrow there,
And tell him all my pains:
Thus while I ease my burden'd heart,
In every woe he bears a part, [head sustains.]
His arms embrace me, and his hand my drooping

Fly from my thoughts, all human things,
And sporting swains, and fighting kings,
And tales of wanton love:
My soul disdains that little snare

The tangles of Amira's hair;
Thine arms, my God, are sweeter bands, nor can my heart remove.

GRACE SHINING, AND NATURE
FAINTING.

Sol. Song, i. 3. & ii. 5. & vi. 5.

TELL me, fairest of thy kind,
Tell me Shepherd, all divine,
Where this fainting head reclin'd
May relieve such cares as mine:
Shepherd, lead me to thy grove;
If burning noon infect the sky,
The sickening sheep to covert fly,
The sheep not half so faint as I,
Thus overcome with love.

Say, thou dear Sovereign of my breast,
Where dost thou lead thy flock to rest:
Why should I appear like one
Wild and wandering all alone,
Unbeloved and unknown?
O my Great Redeemer, say,
Shall I turn my feet astray!
Will Jesus bear to see me rove,
To see me seek another love?

Ne'er had I known his dearest name,
Ne'er had I felt this inward flame, [found:
Had not his heart-strings first began the tender
Nor can I bear the thought, that he Should leave the sky,
Should bleed and die,
Should love a wretch so vile as me
Without returns of passion for his dying wound.

His eyes are glory mix'd with grace;
In his delightful awful face
Sits majesty and gentleness.
So tender is my bleeding heart
That with a frown he kills:
His absence is perpetual smart;
Nor is my soul refin'd enough
To bear the beaming of his love,
And feel his warmer smiles.
Where shall I rest this drooping head?
I love, I love the sun, and yet I want the shade.

My sinking spirits feebly strive
T' endure the ecstasy;
Beneath these rays I cannot live,
And yet without them die.
None knows the pleasure and the pain
That all my inward powers sustain [again.
But such as feel a Saviour's love, and love the God
Oh, why should beauty heavenly bright
Stoop to charm a mortal's sight,
And torture with the sweet excess of light?
Our hearts, alas! how frail their make!
With their own weight of joy they break,
Oh, why is love so strong, and nature's self so weak?

Turn, turn away thine eyes,
Ascend the azure hills, and shine
Among the happy tenants of the skies,
They can sustain a vision so divine.
O turn thy lovely glories from me,
The joys are too intense, the glories overcome me.

Dear Lord, forgive my rash complaint,
And love me still
Against my froward will;
Unveil thy beauties, though I faint.
Send the great herald from the sky,
And at the trumpet's awful roar
This feeble state of things shall fly,
And pain and pleasure mix no more:
Then shall I gaze with strengthened sight
On glories infinitely bright,
My heart shall all be love, my Jesus all delight.

LOVE TO CHRIST PRESENT OR ABSENT.

OF all the joys we mortals know,
Jesus, thy love exceeds the rest;
Love the best blessings here below,
And nearest image of the blest.

Sweet are my thoughts, and soft my cares,
When the celestial flame I feel;
In all my hopes, and all my fears,
There's something kind and pleasing still.

While I am held in his embrace,
There's not a thought attempts to rove;
Each smile he wears upon his face
Fixes, and charms, and fires my love.

He speaks, and strait immortal joys
Run through my ears, and reach my heart;
My soul all melts at that dear voice,
And pleasure shoots through every part.

If he withdraw a moment's space,
He leaves a sacred pledge behind;
Here in this breast his image stays,
The grief and comfort of my mind.

While of his absence I complain,
And long, and weep as lovers do,
There's a strange pleasure in the pain,
And tears have their own sweetness too.

When round his courts by day I rove,
Or ask the watchmen of the night
For some kind tidings of my love,
His very name creates delight.

Jesus, my God; yet rather come;
Mine eyes would dwell upon thy face;
'Tis best to see my Lord at home,
And feel the presence of his grace.

THE ABSENCE OF CHRIST.

COME, lead me to some lofty shade
Where turtles moan their loves;
Tall shadows were for lovers made;
And grief becomes the groves.

'Tis no mean beauty of the ground
That has enslav'd mine eyes;
I faint beneath a nobler wound,
Nor love below the skies.

Jesus, the spring of all that's bright,
The Everlasting Fair,
Heaven's ornament, and heaven's delight,
Is my eternal care.

But, ah! how far above this grave]
Does the bright charmer dwell?

Absence, thou keenest wound to love,
That sharpest pain, I feel.

Pensive I climb the sacred hills,
And near him vent my woes:
Yet his sweet face he still conceals,
Yet still my passion grows.

I murmur to the hollow vale,
I tell the rocks my flame,
And blest the echo in her cell
That best repeats her name.

My passion breathes perpetual sighs,
Till pitying winds shall hear,
And gently bear them up the skies,
And gently wound his ear.

DESIRING HIS DESCENT TO EARTH.

JESUS, I love. Come, dearest name,
Come and possess this heart of mine;
I love, though 'tis a fainter flame,
And infinitely less than thine.

O! if my Lord would leave the skies,
Drest in the rays of mildest grace,
My soul should hasten to my eyes
To meet the pleasures of his face.

How would I feast on all his charms,
Then round his lovely feet entwine!
Worship and love, in all their forms,
Should honour beauty so divine.

In vain the tempter's flattering tongue,
The world in vain shall bid me move,
In vain; for I should gaze so long
Till I were all transform'd to love.

'Then (mighty God) I'd sing and say,
"What empty names are crowns and kings!"
"Amongst them give these worlds away,
"These little despicable things."

I would not ask to climb the sky
Nor envy angels their abode,
I have a heaven as bright and high
In the blest vision of my God.

ASCENDING TO HIM IN HEAVEN.

'Tis pure delight, without alloy,
Jesus, to hear thy name,
My spirit leaps with inward joy,
I feel the sacred flame.

My passions hold a pleasing reign,
With love inspires my breast,
Love, the divinest of the train,
The sovereign of the rest.

This is the grace must live and sing,
When faith and fear shall cease,
Must sound from every joyful string
Through the sweet groves of bliss.

Let life immortal seize my clay;
Let love refine my blood;
Her flames can bear my soul away,
Can bring me near my God.

Swift I ascend the heavenly place,
And hasten to my home:

I leap to meet thy kind embrace;
I come, O Lord, I come.

Sink down, ye separating hills,
Let guilt and death remove:
'Tis love that drives my chariot-wheels,
And death must yield to love.

THE PRESENCE OF GOD WORTH DYING FOR:

OR, THE DEATH OF MOSES.

Lord, 'tis an infinite delight
To see thy holy face,
To dwell whole ages in thy sight,
And feel thy vital rays.

This Gabriel knows; and sings thy name
With rapture on his tongue;
Moses the saint enjoys the same,
And heaven repeats the song.

While the bright nation sounds thy praise
From each eternal hill,
Sweet odours of exhaling grace
The happy region fill.

Thy love, a sea without a shore,
Spreads life and joy abroad:
O 'tis a heaven worth dying for
To see a smiling God!

Show me thy face, and I'll away
From all inferior things;
Speak, Lord, and here I quit my clay,
And stretch my airy wings.

Sweet was the journey to the sky,
The wondrous prophet try'd;
"Climb up the mount," says God, "and die;"
The prophet climb'd and dy'd.

Softly his fainting head he lay
Upon his Maker's breast,
His Maker kiss'd his soul away,
And laid his flesh to rest.

In God's own arms he left the breath
That God's own spirit gave;
His was the noblest road to death,
And his the sweetest grave.

LONG FOR HIS RETURN.

O 'Twas a mournful parting day!
Farewell, my spouse, he said;
(How tedious, Lord, is thy delay!
How long my Love hath staid!)

Farewell! at once he left the ground,
And climb'd his Father's sky;
Lord, I would tempt thy chariot down,
Or leap to thee on high.

Round the creation wild I rove,
And search the globe in vain;
There's nothing here that's worth my love
Till thou return again.

My passions fly to seek their King,
And send their groans abroad,
They beat the air with heavy wing,
And mourn an absent God:

With inward pain my heart-strings found.
My soul dissolves away,
Dear Sovereign, whirl the seasons round,
And bring the promis'd day.

HOPE IN DARKNESS.

YET gracious God,
Yet will I seek thy smiling face;
What though a short eclipse his beauties shroud,
And bar the influence of his rays.
'Tis but a morning vapour, or a summer cloud:
He is my sun though he refuse to shine,
Though for a moment he depart
I dwell for ever on his heart,
For ever he on mine.
Early before the light arise
I'll spring a thought away to God;
The passion of my heart and eyes
Shall shout a thousand groans and sighs.
A thousand glances strike the skies,
The floor of his abode.
Dear Sovereign, hear thy servant pray,
Bend the blue heavens, Eternal King,
Downward thy cheerful graces bring;
Or shall I breathe in vain and pant my hours away?
Break, glorious brightness, through the gloomy
Low how the armies of despair [veil,
Aloft their footy banners rear
Round my poor captive soul, and dare
Pronounce me prisoner of hell.
But thou, my Sun, and thou my Shield,
Wilt save me in the bloody field; [ray,
Break, glorious brightness, shoot one glimmering
One glance of thine creates a day,
And drives the troops of hell away.
Happy the times, but ah! the times are gone
When wondrous power and radiant grace
Round the tall arches of the temple shone,
And mingled their victorious rays;
Sin, with all its ghastly train,
Fled to the deeps of death again,
And smiling triumph sat on every face:
Our spirits raptur'd with the sight
Where all devotion, all delight,
And loud hosannas founded the Redeemer's praise.
Here could I say,
(And point the place whereon I stood)
Here I enjoy'd a visit half the day
From my descending God:
I was regal'd with heavenly fare,
With fruit and manna from above;
Divinely sweet the blessings were
While mine Emanuel was there:
And o'er the head
The conqueror spread
The banner of his love.
Then why my heart sunk down so low?
Why do my eyes dissolve and flow,
And hopeless nature mourn?
Review, my soul, those pleasing days,
Read his unalterable grace
Through the displeasure of his face,
And wait a kind return.
A father's love may raise a frown
To chide the child, or prove the son,
But love will ne'er destroy;

The hour of darkness is but short,
Faith be thy life, and patience thy support,
The morning brings the joy.

COME, LORD JESUS.

WHEN shall thy lovely face be seen?
When shall our eyes behold our God?
What lengths of distance lie between,
And hills of guilt? a heavy load!
Our months are ages of delay,
And slowly every minute wears:
Fly, winged time, and roll away
These tedious rounds of sluggish years.
Ye heavenly gates, loose all your chains,
Let the eternal pillars bow;
Blest Saviour, cleave the starry plains,
And make the crystal mountains flow.
Hark, how thy saints unite their cries,
And pray and wait the general doom;
Come, thou, the soul of all our joys,
Thou, the desire of nations, come.
Put thy bright robes of triumph on,
And bless our eyes, and bless our ears,
Thou absent love, thou dear unknown,
Thou fairest of ten thousand fairs.
Our heart-strings groan with deep complaint,
Our flesh lies panting, Lord, for thee,
And every limb, and every joint,
Stretches for immortality.
Our spirits shake their wings,
And burn to meet thy flying throne?
We rise away from mortal things
T' attend thy shining chariot down,
Now let our cheerful eyes survey
The blazing earth and melting hills,
And smile to see the lightnings play,
And flash along before thy wheels.
O for a shout of violent joys
To join the trumpet's thundering sound!
The angel herald shakes the skies,
Awakes the graves, and tears the ground.
Ye slumbering saints, a heavenly host
Stands waiting at your gaping tombs;
Let every sacred sleeping dust
Leap into life, for Jesus comes.
Jesus, the God of might and love,
New-moulds our limbs of cumbersome clay;
Quick as seraphic-flames we move,
Active and young, and fair as they.
Our airy feet with unknown flight,
Swift as the motions of desire,
Run up the hills of heavenly light,
And leave the weltering world in fire.
BEWAILING MY OWN INCONSTANCY.
I LOVE the Lord! but ah! how far
My thoughts from the dear object are!
This wanton heart how wide it roves!
And fancy meets a thousand loves.
If my soul burn to see my God,
I tread the courts of his abode,

But troops of rivals throng the place,
And tempt me off before his face.

Would I enjoy my Lord alone,
I bid my passions all be gone,
All but my love; and charge my will
To bar the door and guard it still.

But cares, or trifles, make, or find,
Still new avenues to the mind,
Till I with grief and wonder see,
Huge crowds betwixt the Lord and me.

Oft I am told the muse will prove
A friend to piety and love;
Strait I begin some sacred song,
And take my Saviour on my tongue.

Strangely I lose his lovely face,
To hold the empty sounds in chase;
At best the chimies divide my heart,
And the muse shares the larger part.

False confident! and falser breast!
Fickle, and fond of every guest:
Each airy image as it flies
Here finds admittance through my eyes.

This foolish heart can leave her God,
And shadows tempt her thoughts abroad:
How shall I fix this wandering mind?
Or throw my fetters on the wind?

Look gently down Almighty Grace,
Prison me round in thine embrace?
Pity the soul that would be thine,
And let thy power my love confine.

Say when shall the bright moment be
That I shall live alone for thee,
My heart no foreign Lords adore,
And the wild muse prove false no more!

FORSAKEN, YET HOPING.

HAPPY the hours, the golden days,
When I could call my Jesus mine,
And sit and view his smiling face,
And melt in pleasures all-divine.

Near to my heart, within my arms
He lay, till sin defil'd my breast,
Till broken vows, and earthly charms,
Tir'd and provok'd my heavenly guest.

And now he's gone, (O mighty woe!)
Gone from my soul, and hides his love!
Curse on you, sins, that griev'd him so,
Ye sins, that forc'd him to remove.

Break, break, my heart; complain, my tongue:
Hither, my friends, your sorrows bring:
Angels, assist my doleful song,
If you have e'er a mourning string.

But, ah! your joys are ever high,
Ever his lovely face you see;
While my poor spirits pant and die,
And groan for thee, my God, for thee.

Yet let my hope look through my tears,
And spy afar his rolling throne;
His chariot through the cleaving spheres
Shall bring the bright Beloved down.

Swift as a roe flies o'er the hills,
My soul springs out to meet him high,

Then the fair Conqueror turns his wheels,
And climbs the mansions of the sky.

There smiling joy for ever reigns,
No more the turtle leaves the dove;
Farewell to jealousies, and pains,
And all the ills of absent love.

THE CONCLUSION.

GOD EXALTED ABOVE ALL PRAISE.

ETERNAL Power! whose high abode
Becomes the grandeur of a God;
Infinite length beyond the bounds
Where stars revolve their little rounds.

The lowest step above thy seat
Rises too high for Gabriel's feet,
In vain the tall archangel tries
To reach thine height with wondering eyes.

Thy dazzling beauties whilst he sings,
He hides his face behind his wings;
And ranks of shining thrones around
Fall worshipping, and spread the ground.

Lord, what shall earth and ashes do!
We would adore our Maker too;
From sin and dust to thee we cry,
The Great, the Holy, and the High!

Earth from afar has heard the fame,
And worms have learnt to lisp thy name;
But O, the glories of thy mind
Leave all our soaring thoughts behind.

God is in heaven, and men below;
Be short, our tunes; our words be few;
A sacred reverence checks our songs,
And praise sits silent on our tongues.

"Tibi filet laus, O Deus." Psal. lxxv. 1.

BOOK II.

SACRED TO HONOUR, VIRTUE, AND FRIENDSHIP.

TO HER MAJESTY.

QUEEN of the northern world, whose gentle sway
Commands our love, and charms our hearts to obey,
Forgive the nation's groan when William dy'd:
Lo, at thy feet in all the royal pride
Of blooming joy, three happy realms appear,
And William's urn almost without a tear [tongue
Stands; nor complains; while from thy gracious
Peace flows in silver streams amidst the throng.
Amazing balm, that on those lips was found
To soothe the torment of that mortal wound,
And calm the wild affright! The terror dies
The bleeding wound cements, the danger flies,
And Albion shouts thine honours as her joys arise.

The German eagle feels her guardian dead,
Not her own thunder can secure her head;
Her trembling eagles hasten from afar,
And Belgia's lion dreads the Gallic war:
All hide behind thy shield. Remoter lands
Whose lives lay trusted in Nassovian hands

Transfer their souls, and live; secure they play
In thy mild rays, and love the growing day.

Thy beamy wing at once defends and warms
Fainting religion, whilst in various forms
Fair piety shines through the British isles:
Here at thy side, and in thy kindest smiles *
Blazing in ornamental gold she stands,
To bless thy councils and assist thy hands,
And crowds wait round her to receive commands. }
There at a humble distance from the throne †
Beauteous she lies; her lustre all her own,
Ungarnish'd; yet not blushing, nor afraid,
Nor knows suspicion, nor affects the shade:
Cheerful and pleas'd she not presumes to share
In thy parental gifts, but owns thy guardian care.
For thee, dear sovereign, endless vows arise,
And zeal with earthly wing salutes the skies
To gain thy safety: Here a solemn form *
Of ancient words keeps the devotion warm,
And guides, but bounds our wishes: There the mind †

Feels its own fire, and kindles unconfin'd
With bolder hopes: Yet still beyond our vows,
Thy lovely glories rise, thy spreading terror grows,

Princess, the world already owns thy name:
Go, mount the chariot of immortal fame,
Nor die to be renown'd: Fame's loudest breath
Too dear is purchas'd by an angel's death.
The vengeance of thy rod, with general joy,
Shall scourge rebellion and the rival-boy ‡:
Thy sounding arms his Gallic patron hears,
And speeds his flight; nor overtakes his fears,
Till hard despair wring from the tyrant's soul
The iron tears out: Let thy frown control
Our angry jars at home, till wrath submit
Her impious banners to thy sacred feet;
Mad zeal, and frenzy with their murderous }
train,
Feel these sweet realms in thine auspicious reign, }
Envy expire in rage, and treason bite the chain.

Let no black scenes affright fair Albion's stage:
Thy thread of life prolong our golden age,
Long bless the earth, and late ascend thy throne
Ethereal; (not thy deeds are there unknown,
Nor there unfung; for by thine awful hands
Heaven rules the waves, and thunders o'er the } lands,
Creates inferior kings§, and gives'em their com- } mands.)
Legions attend thee at the radiant gates;
For thee thy sister-seraph, blest Maria, waits.

But Oh! the parting stroke! some heavenly power
Cheer thy sad Britons in the gloomy hour;
Some new propitious star appear on high
The fairest glory of the western sky,
And Anna be its name; with gentle sway
To check the planets of malignant ray,

* The established church of England.

† The Protestant dissenters.

‡ The Pretender.

§ She made Charles the Emperor's second son King of Spain, who was afterwards Emperor of Germany.

Soothe the rude north wind, and the rugged bear,
Calm, rising wars heal the contagious air,
And reign with peaceful influence to the south- } ern sphere.

Note, This poem was written in the year 1705, in that honourable part of the reign of our late queen, when she had broke the French power at Blenheim, asserted the right of Charles the present emperor to the crown of Spain, exerted her zeal for the Protestant succession, and promised inviolably to maintain the toleration to the Protestant dissenters. Thus she appeared the chief support of the Reformation, and the patroness of the liberties of Europe.

The latter part of her reign was of a different colour, and was by no means attended with the accomplishment of those glorious hopes which we had conceived. Now the muse cannot satisfy herself to publish this new edition, without acknowledging the mistake of her former prefaces, and while she does the world this justice, she does herself the honour of a voluntary retraction.

PALINODIA.

BRITONS, forgive the forward muse
That dar'd prophetic seals to loose,
(Unskill'd in fate's eternal book)
And the deep characters mistook.

George is the name, that glorious star;
Ye saw his splendors beaming far;
Saw in the east your joys arise,
When Anna sunk in western skies,
Streaking the heavens with crimson gloom,
Emblems of tyranny and Rome,
Portending blood and night to come.
'Twas George diffus'd a vital ray,
And gave the dying nations day:
His influence soothes the Russian bear,
Calms rising wars, and heals the air;
Join'd with the sun his beams are hurl'd
To scatter blessings round the world,
Fulfil whate'er the muse has spoke,
And crown the work that Anne forsook.

TO JOHN LOCKE, ESQ.

RETIRED FROM BUSINESS.

ANGELS are made of heavenly things,
And light and love our souls compose,
Their bliss within their bosom springs,
Within their bosom flows.

But narrow minds still make pretence
To search the coasts of flesh and sense,
And fetch diviner pleasures thence.
Men are akin to ethereal forms,
But they belye their nobler birth,
Debase their honour down to earth,
And claim a share with worms.

He that has treasures of his own
May leave the cottage or the throne,
May quit the globe, and dwell alone
Within his spacious mind.
Locke hath a soul wide as the sea,
Calm as the night, bright as the day,
There may his vast ideas play,
Nor feel a thought confin'd

TO JOHN SHUTE, ESQ.

(AFTERWARDS LORD BARRINGTON.)

On Mr Locke's dangerous Sickness, sometime after he had retired to study the Scriptures. June, 1704.

AND must the man of wonderous mind
 (Now his rich thoughts are just refin'd)
 Forsake our longing eyes?
 Reason at length submits to wear
 The wings of faith; and lo, they rear
 Her chariot high, and nobly bear
 Her prophet to the skies.

Go, friend, and wait the prophet's flight,
 Watch if his mantle chance to light,
 And seize it for thy own;
 Shute is the darling of his years,
 Young Shute his better likeness bears;
 All but his wrinkles and his hairs
 Are copy'd in his son.

Thus when our follies, or our faults,
 Call for the pity of thy thoughts,
 Thy pen shall make us wise:
 The fallies of whose youthful wit
 Could pierce the British fogs with light.
 Place our true * interest in our sight,
 And open half our eyes.

TO MR. WILLIAM NOKES.

FRIENDSHIP. 1702.

FRIENDSHIP, thou charmer of the mind,
 Thou sweet deluding ill,
 The brightest minute mortals find,
 And sharpest hour we feel.

Fate has divided all our shares
 Of pleasure and of pain;
 In love the comforts and the cares
 Are mix'd and join'd again.

But whilst in floods our sorrow rolls,
 And drops of joy are few,
 This dear delight of mingling souls
 Serves but to swell our woe.

Oh! why should bliss depart in haste,
 And friendship stay to moan?
 Why the fond passion cling so fast,
 When every joy is gone?

Yet never let our hearts divide,
 Nor death dissolve the chain:
 For love and joy were once ally'd,
 And must be join'd again.

TO NATHANIEL GOULD, ESQ.

AFTERWARDS SIR NATHANIEL GOULD. 1704.

'Tis not by splendor, or by state,
 Exalted mien, or lofty gate,
 My muse takes measures of a king:
 If wealth, or height, or bulk will do,
 She calls each mountain of Peru
 A more majestic thing.
 Frown on me, friend, if e'er I boast
 O'er fellow-minds enslav'd in clay,

* The interest of England, written by Mr. Shute.

Or swell when I shall have engroft
 A larger heap of shining dust,
 And wear a bigger load of earth than they.
 Let the vain world salute me loud,
 My thoughts look inward, and forget
 The sounding names of high and great,
 The flatteries of the crowd.

When Gould commands his ships to run
 And search the traffic of the sea,
 His fleet o'ertakes the falling day,
 And bears the western minds away,
 Or richer spices from the rising sun:
 While the glad tenants of the shore
 Shout, and pronounce him senator*,
 Yet still the man's the same:
 For well the happy merchant knows
 The soul with treasure never grows,
 Nor swells with airy fame.

But trust me, Gould, 'tis lawful pride
 To rise above the mean control
 Of flesh and sense, to which we're ty'd;
 This is ambition that becomes a soul.
 We steer our course up through the skies;
 Farewell this barren land:
 We ken the heavenly shore with longing eyes,
 There the dear wealth of spirit lies,
 And beckoning angels stand.

TO DR. THOMAS GIBSON.

THE LIFE OF SOULS. 1704.

SWIFT as the sun revolves the day
 We hasten to the dead,
 Slaves to the wind we puff away,
 And to the ground we tread.
 'Tis air that lends us life, when first
 The vital bellows heave:
 Our flesh we borrow of the dust;
 And when a mother's care has nurs'd
 The babe to manly size, we must
 With usury pay the grave.

Rich juleps drawn from precious ore
 Still tend the dying flame:
 And plants, and roots, of barbarous name,
 Torn from the Indian shore.
 Thus we support our tottering flesh,
 Our cheeks resume the rose afresh.
 When bark and steel play well their game
 To save our sinking breath,
 And Gibson, with his awful power,
 Rescues the poor precarious hour
 From the demands of death.
 But art and nature, powers and charms,
 And drugs, and recipes, and forms,
 Yields us, at last to greedy worms
 A despicable prey;
 I'd have a life to call my own,
 That shall depend on heaven alone;
 Nor air, nor earth, nor sea
 Mix their base essences with mine,
 Nor claim dominion so divine
 To give me leave to be.

Sure there's a mind within that reigns
 O'er the dull current of my veins;

* Member of parliament for a port in Sussex.

I feel the inward pulse beat high
With vigorous immortality.
Let earth resume the flesh it gave,
And breath dissolve amongst the winds;
Gibson, the things that fear a grave,
That I can lose, or you can save,
Are not akin to minds.

We claim acquaintance with the skies,
Upwards our spirits hourly rise,
And there our thoughts employ:
When heaven shall sign our grand release,
We are no strangers to the place,
The business, or the joy.

FALSE GREATNESS.

Myro, forbear to call him blest
That only boasts a large estate,
Should all the treasures of the west
Meet, and conspire to make him great.
I know thy better thoughts, I know
Thy reason can't descend so low.
Let a broad stream with golden sands
Through all his meadows roll,
He's but a wretch, with all his lands,
That wears a narrow soul.

He swells amidst his wealthy store,
And proudly poizing what he weighs,
In his own scale he fondly lays
Huge heaps of shining ore.
He spreads the balance wide to hold
His manors and his farms,
And cheats the beam with loads of gold
He hugs between his arms.

So might the plough-boy climb a tree,
When Cræsus mounts his throne,
And both stand up, and smile to see
How long their shadow's grown.
Alas! how vain their fancies be
To think that shape their own!

Thus mingled still with wealth and state,
Cræsus himself can never know;
His true dimensions and his weight
Are far inferior to their show.
Were I so tall to reach the pole,
Or grasp the ocean with my span,
I must be measur'd by my soul:
The mind's the standard of the man.

TO SARISSA.

AN EPISTLE.

BEAR up, Sarissa, through the ruffling storms
Of a vain vexing world: Tread down the cares
Those ragged thorns that lie across the road,
Nor spend a tear upon them. Trust the muse,
She sings experienc'd truth: This briny dew,
This rain of eyes will make the briars grow.
We travel through a desert, and our feet
Have measur'd a fair space, have left behind
A thousand dangers, and a thousand snares
Well scap'd. Adieu, ye horrors of the dark,
Ye finish'd labours, and ye tedious toils
Of days and hours: The twinge of real smart,
And the false terrors of ill-boding dreams
Vanish together, be alike forgot,
For ever blended in one common grave.

Farewell, ye waxing and ye waning moons,
That we have watch'd behind the flying clouds
On night's dark hill, or setting or ascending,
Or in meridian height: Then silence reign'd
O'er half the world; then ye beheld our tears,
Ye witness'd our complaints, our kindred groans,
(Sad harmony!) while, with your beamy horns
Or richer orb ye silver'd o'er the green
Where trod our feet, and lent a feeble light
To mourners. Now ye have fulfill'd your round,
Those hours are fled, farewell. Months that are
Are gone for ever, and have borne away [gone
Each his own load. Our woes and sorrows past,
Mountainous woes, still lessen as they fly
Far off. So billows in a stormy sea,
Wave after wave (a long succession) roll
Beyond the ken of sight: The sailors safe
Look far a-stern till they have lost the storm,
And shout their boisterous joys. A gentler Muse
Sings thy dear safety, and commands thy cares
To dark oblivion; bury'd deep in night
Lose them, Sarissa, and assist my song.

Awake thy voice, sing how the slender line
Of fate's immortal Now divides the past
From all the future, with eternal bars
Forbidding a return. The past temptations
No more shall vex us; every grief we feel
Shortens the destin'd number; every pulse
Beats a sharp moment of the pain away,
And the last stroke will come. By swift degrees
Time sweeps us off, and we shall soon arrive
At life's sweet period: O celestial point
That ends this mortal story!

But if a glimpse of light with flattering ray
Breaks through the clouds of life, or wandering fire
Amidst the shades invite your doubtful feet,
Beware the dancing meteor: faithless guide,
That leads the lonesome pilgrim wide astray
To bogs, and fens, and pits, and certain death!
Should vicious pleasure take an angel-form,
And at a distance rise, by slow degrees,
Treacherous, to wind herself into your heart,
Stand firm aloof; nor let the gaudy phantom
Too long allure your gaze: The just delight
That heaven indulges lawful must obey
Superior powers; nor tempt your thoughts too far
In slavery to sense, nor swell your hope
To dangerous size: If it approach your feet
And court your hand, forbid th' intruding joy
To sit too near your heart. Still may our souls
Claim kindred with the skies, nor mix with dust
Our better-born affections; leave the globe
A nest for worms, and hasten to our home.

O there are gardens of th' immortal kind
That crown the heavenly Eden's rising hills
With beauty and with sweets; no lurking mischief
Dwells in the fruit, nor serpent twines the boughs;
The branches bend laden with life and bliss
Ripe for the taste, but 'tis a steep ascent:
Hold fast the * golden chain let down from heaven,
'Twill help your feet and wings; I feel its force
Draw upwards; fasten'd to the pearly gate,
It guides the way unerring: happy clue [work,
Thro' this dark wild! 'Twas wisdom's noblest
All join'd by power divine, and every link is love.

* The Gospel.

TO MR. T. BRADBURY.

PARADISE. 1708.

YOUNG as I am I quit the stage,
 Nor will I know th' applauses of th' age;
 Farewell to growing fame. I leave below
 A life not half worn out with cares,
 Or agonies, or years;
 I leave my country all in tears;
 But heaven demands me upward, and I dare to go.
 Amongst ye, friends, divide and share
 The remnant of my days,
 If ye have patience, and can bear [race.
 A long fatigue of life, and drudge through all the
 Hark my fair guardian chides my stay,
 And waves his golden rod:
 "Angel, I come; lead on the way:"
 And now by swift degrees
 I sail aloft through azure seas,
 Now tread the milky road:
 Farewell, ye planets, in your spheres;
 And as the stars are lost, a brighter sky appears.
 In haste for paradise
 I stretch the pinions of a bolder thought;
 Scarce had I will'd, but I was past
 Deserts of trackless light and all the ethereal waste,
 And to the sacred borders brought;
 There on the wing a guard of cherubs lies,
 Each waves a keen flame as he flies, [prize.
 And well defends the walls from sieges and sur-
 With pleasing reverence I behold
 The pearly portals wide unfold:
 Enter, my soul, and view th' amazing scenes;
 Sit fast upon the flying muse,
 And let thy roving wonder loose
 O'er all th' empyreal plains.
 Noon stands eternal here: here may thy fight
 Drink in the rays of primogenial light;
 Here breathe immortal air:
 Joy must beat high in every vein,
 Pleasure through all the bosom reign;
 'The laws forbid the stranger, pain,
 And banish every care.
 See how the bubbling springs of love
 Beneath the throne arise;
 The streams in crystal channels move,
 Around the golden streets they rove,
 And bless the mansions of the upper skies.
 There a fair grove of knowledge grows,
 Nor sin nor death infects the fruit;
 Young life hangs fresh on all the boughs,
 And springs from every root;
 Here may thy greedy senses feast
 While ecstasy and health attends on every taste.
 With the fair prospect charm'd I stood;
 Fearless I feed on the delicious fare,
 And drink profuse salvation from the silver flood,
 Nor can excess be there.
 In sacred order rang'd along
 Saints new-releas'd by death
 Join the bold seraph's warbling breath,
 And aid th' immortal song.
 Each has a voice that tunes his strings.
 To mighty sounds, and mighty things,
 Things of everlasting weight,

Sounds, like the softer viol, sweet,
 And like the trumpet, strong,
 Divine attention held my soul,
 I was all ear!

Through all my powers the heavenly accents roll,
 I long'd and wish'd my Bradbury there;
 "Could he but hear these notes, I said,
 "His tuneful soul would never bear
 "The dull unwinding of life's tedious thread,
 "But burst the vital chords to reach the happy dead."

And now my tongue prepares to join
 The harmony, and with a noble aim
 Attempts th' unutterable name,
 But faints, confounded by the notes divine:
 Again my soul th' unequal honour fought,
 Again her utmost force she brought,
 And bow'd beneath the burden of th' unwieldy
 thought.

Thrice I essay'd, and fainted thrice;
 Th' immortal labour strain'd my feeble frame,
 Broke the bright vision, and dissolv'd the dream:
 I sunk at once and lost the skies:
 In vain I sought the scenes of light
 Rolling abroad my longing eyes, [night.
 For all around them stood my curtains and the

STRICT RELIGION VERY RARE.

I'm born aloft, and leave the crowd,
 I sail upon a morning cloud
 Skirted with dawning gold:
 Mine eyes beneath the open day
 Command the globe with wide survey,
 Where ants in busy millions play,
 And tug and heave the mould.

"Are these the things (my passion cry'd)
 "That we call men? Are these ally'd
 "To the fair worlds of light?
 "They have ras'd out their Maker's name,
 "Graven on their minds with pointed flame
 "In strokes divinely bright.

"Wretches! they hate their native skies;
 "If an ethereal thought arise,
 "Or spark of virtue shine,
 "With cruel force they damp its plumes,
 "Choke the young fire with sensual fumes,
 "With business, lust, or wine.

"Lo! how they throng with panting breath
 "The broad descending road
 "That leads unerring down to death,
 "Nor miss the dark abode."

Thus while I drop a tear or two
 On the wild herd, a nobler few
 Dare to stray upward, and pursue
 Th' unbeaten way to God.

I meet Myrtillo mounting high,
 I know his candid soul afar;
 Here Dorylus and Thyrsis fly
 Each like a rising star.
 Charin I saw and Fidea there,
 I saw them help each other's flight,
 And bless them as they go;

They soar beyond my labouring fight,
And leave their loads of mortal care,
But not their love below.
On heaven, their home, they fix their eyes,
The temple of their God:
With morning incense up they rise
Sublime, and through the lower skies
Spread the perfumes abroad.

Across the road a seraph flew,
"Mark (said he) that happy pair,
"Marriage helps devotion there:
"When kindred minds their God pursue
"They break with double vigour through
"The dull incumbent air."
Charm'd with the pleasure and surprise,
My soul adores and sings,
"Blest be the power that springs their flight,
"That streaks their path with heavenly light,
"That turns their love to sacrifice,
"And joins their zeal for wings."

TO MR. G. AND S. FLEETWOOD.

FLEETWOODS, young generous pair,
Despise the joys that fools pursue;
Bubbles are light and brittle too,
Born of the water and the air.

Try'd by a standard bold and just
Honour and gold and paint and dust;
How vile the last is, and as vain the first!
Things that the crowd call great and brave,
With me how low their value's brought!
Titles and names, and life and breath,
Slaves to the wind and born for death;
The soul's the only thing we have
Worth an important thought.

The soul! 'tis of th' immortal kind,
Nor form'd of fire, or earth, or wind,
Outlives the mouldering corpse, and leaves the globe behind.

In limbs of clay though she appears,
Array'd in rosy skin, and deck'd with ears and
The flesh is but the soul's disguise, [eyes,
There's nothing in her frame 'kin to the dress she
From all the laws of matter free, [wears.
From all we feel, and all we see,
She stands eternally distinct, and must for ever be.

Rise then, my thoughts, on high,
Soar beyond all that's made to die;
Lo! on an awful throne
Sits the Creator and the Judge of souls,
Whirling the planets round the poles, [riods on.
Winds off our threads of life, and brings our pe-
Swift the approach, and solemn is the day,
When this immortal mind
Stript of the body's coarse array
To endless pain, or endless joy,
Must be at once consign'd.

Think of the sands run down to waste,
We possess none of all the past,
None but the present is our own;
Grace is not plac'd within our power,
'Tis but one short, one shining hour,
Bright and declining as a setting sun.
See the white minutes wing'd with haste;

The Now that flies may be the last;
Seize the salvation e'er 'tis past,
Nor mourn the blessing gone:
A thought's delay is ruin here,
A closing eye, a gasping breath,
Shuts up the golden scene in death,
And drowns you in despair.

TO WILLIAM BLACKBOURN, ESQ.

CASIMIR. LIB. II. Od. 2. Imitated.

"Quæ tegit canas modo Bruma valles," &c.

MARK how it snows! how fast the vallies fills!
And the sweet groves the hoary garment wear;
Yet the warm sun-beams bounding from the hills
Shall melt the vail away, and the young green appear.

But when old age has on your temples shed
Her silver-frost, there's no returning sun;
Swift flies our autumn, swift our summer's fled,
When youth, and love, and spring, and golden joys are gone.

Then cold, and winter, and your aged snow,
Stick fast upon you; not the rich array,
Not the green garland, not the rosy bough,
Shall cancel or conceal the melancholy gray.

The chase of pleasures is not worth the pains,
While the bright sands of health run wasting
down;

And honour calls you from the softer scenes,
To sell the gaudy hour for ages of renown.

'Tis but one youth, and short, that mortals have,
And one old age dissolves our feeble frame;
But there's a heavenly art to elude the grave,
And with the hero-race immortal kindred claim.

The man that has his country's sacred tears
Bedewing his cold herse, has liv'd his day:
Thus Blackbourn, we should leave our names our heirs; [away.

TRUE MONARCHY. 1701.

THE rising year beheld th' imperious Gaul
Stretch his dominion, while a hundred towns
Crouch'd to the victor: but a steady soul
Stands firm on its own base, and reigns as wide,
As absolute; and sways ten thousand slaves,
Lusts and wild fancies with a sovereign hand.

We are a little kingdom; but the man
That chains his rebel will to reason's throne,
Forms it a large one, while his royal mind
Makes heaven its council, from the rolls above
Draws its own statutes, and with joy obeys.

'Tis not a troop of well-appointed guards
Create a monarch, not a purple robe
Dy'd in the people's blood, not all the crowns
Or dazzling tiars that bend about the head,
Though guilt with sun-beams and set round with
A monarch he that conquers all his fears, [stars.
And treads upon them; when he stands alone,
Makes his own camp; four guardian virtues wait

His nightly slumbers, and secure his dreams.
Now dawns the light; he ranges all his thoughts
In square battalions, bold to meet th' attacks
Of time and chance, himself a numerous host,
All eye, all ear, all wakeful as the day,
Firm as a rock, and moveless as the centre.

In vain the harlot, pleasure, spreads her charms,
To lull his thoughts in luxury's fair lap,
To sensual ease (the bane of little kings,
Monarchs whose waxen images of souls
Are moulded into softness); still his mind
Wears its own shape, nor can the heavenly form
Stoop to be modell'd by the wild decrees
Of the mad-vulgar, that unthinking herd.

He lives above the crowd, nor hears the noise
Of wars and triumphs, nor regards the shouts
Of popular applause, that empty sound;
Nor feels the flying arrows of reproach,
Or spite or envy. In himself secure,
Wisdom his tower, and conscience is his shield,
His peace all inward, and his joys his own.

Now my ambition swells, my wishes soar,
This be my kingdom; sit above the globe
My rising soul, and dress thyself around
And shine in virtue's armour, climb the height
Of wisdom's lofty castle, there reside
Safe from the smiling and the frowning world.

Yet once a day drop down a gentle look
On the great mole-hill, and with pitying eye
Survey the busy emmets round the heap,
Crowding and bustling in a thousand forms
Of strife and toil, to purchase wealth and fame,
A bubble or a dust: Then call thy thoughts
Up to thyself to feed on joys unknown,
Rich without gold, and great without renown.

TRUE COURAGE.

HONOUR demands my song. Forget the ground,
My generous muse, and sit among the stars!
There sing the soul, that, conscious of her birth,
Lives like a native of the vital world,
Among these dying clods, and bears her state
Just to herself: how nobly she maintains
Her character, superior to the flesh,
She wields her passions like her limbs, and knows
The brutal powers were only born t' obey.

This is the man whom storms could never make
Meanly complain; nor can a flattering gale
Make him talk proudly: he hath no desire
To read his secret fate: yet unconcern'd
And calm could meet his unborn destiny,
In all its charming, or its frightful shapes,

He that unshrinking, and without a groan,
Bears the first wound, may finish all the war
With mere courageous silence, and come off
Conqueror: for the man that well conceals
The heavy strokes of fate, he bears them well.

He, though th' Atlantic and the Midland seas
With adverse surges meet, and rise on high
Suspended 'twixt the winds, then rush amain
Mingled with flames, upon his single head,
And clouds, and stars, and thunder, firm he stands,
Secure of his best life; unhurt, unmov'd;

And drops his lower nature, born for death.
Then from the lofty castle of his mind
Sublime looks down, exulting, and surveys
The ruins of creation (souls alone
Are heirs of dying worlds); a piercing glance
Shoots upwards from between his closing lids,
To reach his birth-place, and without a sigh
He bids his batter'd flesh lie gently down
Amongst his native rubbish; whilst the spirit
Breathes and flies upward, an undoubted guest
Of the third heaven, th' unruinable sky.

Thither, when fate has brought our willing souls,
No matter whether 'twas a sharp disease,
Or a sharp sword that help'd the travellers on,
And push'd us to our home. Bear up, my friend,
Serenely, and break through the stormy brine
With steady prow; know, we shall once arrive
At the fair haven of eternal bliss.
To which we ever steer; whether as kings
Of wide command we've spread the spacious sea
With a broad painted fleet, or row'd along
In a thin cock-boat with a little oar.

There let my native plank shift me to land
And I'll be happy: Thus I'll leap ashore
Joyful and fearless on th' immortal coast,
Since all I leave is mortal, and it must be lost.

To the much honoured Mr. Thomas Rowe, the Director of my youthful Studies.

FREE PHILOSOPHY.

CUSTOM, that tyranness of fools,
That leads the learned round the schools,
In magic chains of forms and rules!

My genius storms her throne:
No more, ye slaves, with awe profound
Beat the dull track, nor dance the round;
Loose hands, and quit th' enchanted ground:

Knowledge invites us each alone.

I hate these shackles of the mind

Forg'd by the haughty wise;
Souls were not born to be confin'd,
And led, like Samson, blind and bound;
But when his native strength he found
He well aveng'd his eyes.

I love thy gentle influence, Rowe,
Thy gentle influence, like the sun,
Only dissolves the frozen snow,
Then bids our thoughts like rivers flow,
And choose the channels where they run.

Thoughts should be free as fire or wind;
The pinions of a single mind

Will through all nature fly:
But who can drag up to the poles
Long fetter'd ranks of leaden souls?
A genius which no chain controls
Roves with delight, or deep, or high:
Swift I survey the globe around,
Dive to the centre through the solid ground,
Or travel o'er the sky.

TO THE REVEREND MR. BENONI ROWE.

THE WAY OF THE MULTITUDE.

Rowe, if we make the crowd our guide
Through life's uncertain road,

Mean is the chase; and wandering wide
We miss th' immortal good;
Yet if my thoughts could be confin'd
To follow any leader-mind,
I'd mark thy steps, and tread the same:
Drest in thy notions I'd appear
Not like a soul of mortal frame,
Nor with a vulgar air.

Men live at random and by chance,
Bright reason never leads the dance;
While in the broad and beaten way
O'er dales and hills from truth we stray,
To ruin we descend, to ruin we advance.
Wisdom retires; she hates the crowd,
And with a decent scorn
Aloof she climbs her steepy seat,
Where nor the grave nor giddy feet
Of the learn'd vulgar or the rude,
Have e'er a passage worn.

Mere hazard first began the track,
Where custom leads her thousands blind
In willing chains and strong;
There's scarce one bold, one noble mind,
Dares tread the fatal error back;
But hand in hand ourselves we bind,
And drag the age along.

Mortals, a savage herd, and loud
As billows on a noisy flood,
In rapid order roll:
Example makes the mischief good:
With jocund heel we beat the road.
Unheadful of the goal.
Me let *Ithuriel's friendly wing
Snatch from the crowd, and bear sublime
To wisdom's lofty tower,
Thence to survey that wretched thing,
Mankind; and in exalted rhyme
Bless the delivering power.

TO THE REVEREND MR. JOHN HOWE.

1704.

GREAT man, permit the muse to climb,
And seat her at thy feet;
Bid her attempt a thought sublime,
And consecrate her wit.
I feel, I feel th' attractive force
Of thy superior soul:
My chariot flies her upward course,
The wheels divinely roll.
Now let me chide the mean affairs
And mighty toil of men:
How they grow gray in trifling cares,
Or waste the motions of the spheres
Upon delights as vain!
A puff of honour fills the mind,
And yellow dust is solid good;
Thus, like the ass of savage kind,
We snuff the breezes of the wind,
Or steal the serpent's food.
Could all the choirs
That charm the poles

But strike one doleful sound,
'T would be employ'd to mourn our souls,
Souls that were fram'd of sprightly fires
In floods of folly drown'd.
Souls made of glory seek a brutal joy;
How they disclaim their heavenly birth,
Melt their bright substance down with drossy earth,
And hate to be refin'd from that impure alloy.

Oft has thy genius rous'd us hence
With elevated song;
Bid us renounce this world of sense,
Bid us divide th' immortal prize
With the seraphic throng:
"Knowledge and love makes spirits blest,
"Knowledge their food, and love their rest;"
But flesh, th' unmanageable beast,
Resists the pity of thine eyes,
And music of thy tongue.
Then let the worms of groveling mind
Round the short joys of earthly kind
In restless windings roam;
Howe hath an ample orb of soul,
Where shining worlds of knowledge roll,
Where love, the centre and the pole,
Completes the heaven at home.

THE DISAPPOINTMENT AND RELIEF.

VIRTUE, permit my fancy to impose
Upon my better powers:
She casts sweet fallacies on half our woes,
And gilds the gloomy hours.
How could we bear this tedious round
Of waning moons, and rolling years,
Of flaming hopes, and chilling fears,
If (where no sovereign cure appears)
No opiates could be found.

Love, the most cordial stream that flows;
Is a deceitful good:
Young Doris, who nor guilt nor danger knows;
On the green margin stood,
Pleas'd with the golden bubbles as they rose,
And with more golden sands her fancy pav'd the
Then fond to be entirely blest, [flood
And tempted by a faithless youth,
As void of goodness as of truth,
She plunges in with heedless haste,
And rears the nether mud:
Darkness and nauseous dregs arise
O'er thy fair current, love, with large supplies
Of pain to tease the heart, and sorrow for the eyes.
The golden blifs that charm'd her sight
Is dash'd, and drown'd, and lost:
A spark or glimmering streak at most,
Shines here and there, amidst the night,
Amidst the turbid waves, and gives a faint delight.

Recover'd from the sad surprise,
Doris awakes at last,
Grown by the disappointment wise;
And manages with art th' unlucky cast;
When the lowering frown she spies
On her haughty tyrant's brow,
With humble love she meets his wrathful eyes,
And makes her sovereign beauty bow;
Cheerful she smiles upon the grizly form;

* The name of an angel in Milton's Paradise Lost.

So shines the setting sun on adverse skies,
 And paints a rainbow on the storm;
 Anon she lets the fullen humour spend,
 And with a virtuous book or friend,
 Beguiles th' uneasy hours:
 Well-colouring every cross she meets,
 With heart serene she sleeps and eats,
 She spreads her board with fancy'd sweets,
 And strows her bed with flowers.

THE HERO'S SCHOOL OF MORALITY.

THERON, amongst his travels, found,
 A broken statue on the ground;
 And searching onward as he went
 He trac'd a ruin'd monument.
 Mould, moss, and shades, had overgrown
 The sculpture of the crumbling stone,
 Yet e'er he pass'd, with much ado,
 He guess'd, and spell'd out, SCI-PI-O.

" Enough, he cry'd; I'll drudge no more
 " In turning the dull Stoics o'er;
 " Let pedants waste their hours of ease
 " To sweat all night at Socrates;
 " And feed their boys with notes and rules,
 " Those tedious recipe's of schools,
 " To cure ambition: I can learn
 " With greater ease the great concern
 " Of mortals; how we may despise
 " All the gay things below the skies.

" Methinks a mouldering pyramid
 " Says all that the old sages said;
 " For me these shatter'd tombs contain
 " More morals than the Vatican.
 " The dust of heroes cast abroad,
 " And kick'd, and trampled in the road,
 " The relics of a lofty mind,
 " That lately wars and crowns design'd,
 " Toft for a jest from wind to wind,
 " Bid me be humble, and forbear
 " Tall monuments of fame to rear,
 " They are but castles in the air.
 " The towering heights, and frightful falls,
 " The ruin'd heaps, and funerals,
 " Of smoking kingdoms and their kings,
 " Tell me a thousand mournful things
 " In melancholy silence.

—He
 " That living could not bear to see
 " An equal, now lies torn and dead;
 " Here his pale trunk, and there his head;
 " Great Pompey! while I meditate,
 " With solemn horror, thy sad fate,
 " Thy carcase, scatter'd on the shore
 " Without a name, instructs me more
 " Than my whole library before.

" Lie still, my Plutarch, then, and sleep,
 " And my good Seneca may keep
 " Your volumes clos'd for ever too,
 " I have no further use for you:
 " For when I feel my virtue fail,
 " And my ambitious thoughts prevail,
 " I'll take a turn among the tombs,
 " And see whereto all glory comes:
 " There the vile foot of every clown
 " Tramples the sons of honour down.

" Beggars with awful ashes sport,
 " And tread the Cæsars in the dirt."

FREEDOM.

1697.

TEMPT me no more. My soul can ne'er comport
 With the gay slaveries of a court;
 I've an aversion to those charms,
 And hug dear liberty in both mine arms.
 Go, vassal souls, go, cringe and wait,
 And dance attendance at Honorio's gate,
 Then run in troops before him to compose his state;
 Move as he moves; and when he loiters, stand;
 You're but the shadows of a man.
 Bend when he speaks; and kiss the ground:
 Go, catch th' impertinence of sound:
 Adore the follies of the great;
 Wait till he smiles: But lo, the idol frown'd,
 And drove them to their fate.

Thus base born minds: but as for me,
 I can and will be free:
 Like a strong mountain, or some stately tree,
 My soul grows firm upright,
 And as I stand, and as I go,
 It keeps my body so;
 No, I can never part with my creation-right.
 Let slaves and asses stoop and bow,
 I cannot make this iron knee [it free.
 Bend to a meaner power than that which form'd

Thus my bold harp profusely play'd
 Pindarical; then on a branchy shade
 I hung my harp aloft, myself beneath it laid.
 Nature that listen'd to my strain,
 Resum'd the theme, and acted it again.
 Sudden rose a whirling wind
 Swelling like Honorio proud,
 Around the straws and feathers crowd,
 Types of a slavish mind;
 Upwards the stormy forces rise,
 The dust flies up and climbs the skies;
 And as the tempest fell, th' obedient vapours sunk:
 Again it roars with bellowing sound,
 The meaner plants that grew around,
 The willow, and the asp, trembled and kiss'd the
 ground:

Hard by there stood the iron trunk
 Of an old oak, and all the storm defy'd;
 In vain the winds their forces try'd,
 In vain they roar'd; the iron oak
 Bow'd only to the heavenly thunder's stroke.

ON MR. LOCKE'S ANNOTATIONS,

UPON SEVERAL PARTS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT,
 LEFT BEHIND HIM AT HIS DEATH.

THUS reason learns by slow degrees,
 What faith reveals; but still complains
 Of intellectual pains,
 And darkness from the too exuberant light.
 The blaze of those bright mysteries
 Pour'd all at once on nature's eyes
 Offend and cloud her feeble sight.

Reason could scarce sustain to see
 Th' Almighty One, th' Eternal Three,
 Or bear the infant Deity;

Scarce could her pride descend to own
Her Maker stooping from his throne,
And drest in glories so unknown.
A ransom'd world, a bleeding God,
And heaven appear'd with flowing blood,
Were themes too painful to be understood.

Faith, thou bright cherub, speak, and say,
Did ever mind of mortal race
Cost thee more toil, or larger grace,
To melt and bend it to obey.
'Twas hard to make so rich a soul submit,
And lay her shining honours at thy sovereign feet.
Sister of faith, fair charity,
Show me the wondrous man on high,
Tell how he sees the Godhead Three in One;
The bright conviction fills his eye,
His noblest powers in deep prostration lie
At the mysterious throne.
"Forgive, he cries, ye saints below,
"The wavering and the cold assent
"I gave to themes divinely true;
"Can you admit the blessed to repent?
"Eternal darkness veil the lines
"Of that unhappy book,
"Where glimmering reason with false lustre shines,
"Where the mortal pen mistook
"What the celestial meant!"

TRUE RICHES.

I AM not concern'd to know
What to-morrow fate will do;
'Tis enough that I can say,
I've possess'd myself to-day:
Then if haply midnight-death
Seize my flesh, and stop my breath,
Yet to-morrow I shall be
Heir to the best part of me.
Glittering stones, and golden things,
Wealth and honours that have wings,
Ever fluttering to be gone,
I could never call my own:
Riches that the world bestows,
She can take, and I can lose;
But the treasures that are mine
Lie afar beyond her line.
When I view my spacious soul,
And survey myself awhile,
And enjoy myself alone,
I'm a kingdom of my own.
I've a mighty part within
That the world hath never seen,
Rich as Eden's happy ground,
And with choicer plenty crown'd
Here on all the shining boughs
Knowledge fair and useless grows;
On the same young flowery tree
All the seasons you may see;
Notions in the bloom of light,
Just disclosing to the sight;
Here are thoughts of larger growth,
Ripening into solid truth;
Fruits refin'd, of noble taste;
Seraphs feed on such repast.
Here, in a green and shady grove,
Streams of pleasure mix with love:

There beneath the smiling skies
Hills of contemplation rise;
Now upon some shining top
Angels light, and call me up;
I rejoice to raise my feet,
Both rejoice when there we meet.
There are endless beauties more
Earth hath no resemblance for;
Nothing like them round the pole,
Nothing can describe the soul:
'Tis a region half unknown,
That has treasures of its own,
More remote from public view
Than the bowels of Peru;
Broader 'tis, and brighter far,
Than the golden Indies are;
Ships that trace the watery stage
Cannot coast it in an age;
Harts, or horses, strong and fleet,
Had they wings to help their feet,
Could not run it half way o'er
In ten thousand days and more.

Yet the silly wandering mind,
Loth to be too much confin'd,
Roves and takes her daily tours,
Coasting round the narrow shores,
Narrow shores of flesh and sense,
Picking shells and pebbles thence:
Or she sits at fancy's door,
Calling shapes and shadows to her,
Foreign visits still receiving,
And t' herself a stranger living.
Never, never would she buy
Indian dust, or Tyrian dye,
Never trade abroad for more,
If she saw her native store;
If her inward worth were known,
She might ever live alone.

THE ADVENTUROUS MUSE.

URANIA takes her morning flight
With an inimitable wing:
Through rising deluges of dawning light
She cleaves her wondrous way,
She tunes immortal anthems to the growing day;
Nor * Rapin gives her rules to fly, nor † Purcell
notes to sing.

She nor inquires, nor knows, nor fears
Where lie the pointed rocks, or where th' ingulf-
ing sand:
Climbing the liquid mountains of the skies,
She meets descending angels as she flies,
Nor asks them where their country lies,
Or where the sea-marks stand.
Touch'd with an empyreal ray
She springs, unerring, upward to eternal day,
Spreads her white sails aloft, and steers,
With bold and safe attempt, to the celestial land,
Whilst little skiffs along the mortal shores
With humble toil in order creep,

* A French critic.

† An English master of music.

Coasting in sight of one another's oars,
Nor venture through the boundless deep,
Such low pretending souls are they
Who dwell enclos'd in solid orbs of skull;
Plodding along their sober way,
The snail o'ertakes them in their wildest play,
While the poor labourers sweat to be correctly dull.

Give me the chariot whose diviner wheels
Mark their own rout, and unconfin'd
Bound o'er the everlasting hills,
And lose the clouds below, and leave the stars behind.

Give me the muse whose generous force,
Impatient of the reins,
Pursues an unattempted course,
Breaks all the critics iron chains,
And bears to Paradise the raptur'd mind.

There Milton dwells: The mortal sung
Themes not presum'd by mortal tongue;
New terrors, or new glories, shine
In every page, and flying scenes divine
Surprise the wondering sense, and draw our souls along.

Behold his muse sent out t' explore
The unapparent deep where waves of chaos roar,
And realms of night unknown before.
She trac'd a glorious path unknown,
Through fields of heavenly war, and seraphs over-
Where his adventurous genius led: [thrown,
Sovereign she fram'd a model of her own,
Nor thank'd the living nor the dead.
The noble hater of degenerate rhyme
Shook off the chains, and built his verse sublime,
A monument too high for coupl'd sounds to climb.
He mourn'd the garden lost below;
(Earth is the scene for tuneful woe)
Now bliss beats high in all his veins,
Now the lost Eden he regains,
Keeps his own air, and triumphs in unrivall'd
strains.

Immortal bard! Thus thy own Raphael sings,
And knows no rule but native fire:
All heaven sits silent, while to his sovereign strings
He talks unutterable things;
With graces infinite his untaught fingers rove
Across the golden lyre:
From every note devotion springs.
Rapture, and harmony, and love,
O'erspread the listening choir.

TO MR. NICHOLAS CLARK.

THE COMPLAINT.

'Twas in a vale where osiers grow,
By murmuring streams we told our woe,
And mingled all our cares:
Friendship sat pleas'd in both our eyes,
In both the weeping dews arise,
And drop alternate tears.

The vigorous monarch of the day,
Now mounting half his morning way,
Shone with a fainter bright;

Still sickening, and decaying still,
Dimly he wander'd up the hill,
With his expiring light.

In dark eclipse his chariot roll'd,
The queen of night obscur'd his gold
Behind her fable wheels;
Nature grew sad to lose the day,
The flowery vales in mourning lay,
In mourning stood the hills.

Such are our sorrows, Clark, I cry'd,
Clouds of the brain grow black, and hide
Our darken'd souls behind;
In the young morning of our years
Distemp'ring fogs have climb'd the spheres,
And choke the labouring mind.

Lo, the gay planet rears his head,
And overlooks the lofty shade,
New-brightening all the skies:
But say, dear partner of my moan,
When will our long eclipse be gone,
Or when our suns arise?

In vain are potent herbs apply'd,
Harmonious sounds in vain have try'd
To make the darkness fly:
But drugs would raise the dead as soon,
Or clattering brass relieve the moon,
When fainting in the sky.

Some friendly spirit from above,
Born of the night, and nurs'd with love,
Assist our feeble fires:
Force these invading glooms away;
Souls should be seen quite through their clay,
Bright as your heavenly choirs.

But if the fogs must damp the flame,
Gently, kind death, dissolve our frame,
Release the prisoner-mind:
Our souls shall mount, at thy discharge,
To their bright source, and shine at large
Nor clouded, nor confin'd.

THE AFFLICTIONS OF A FRIEND. 1702.

Now let my cares all buried lie,
My griefs for ever dumb:
Your sorrows swell my heart so high,
They leave my own no room.
Sickness and pains are quite forgot,
The spleen itself is gone;
Plung'd in your woes, I feel them not,
Or feel them all in one.

Infinite grief puts sense to flight,
And all the soul invades:
So the broad gloom of spreading night
Devours the evening shades.

Thus am I born to be unblest!
This sympathy of woe
Drives my own tyrants from my breast
T' admit a foreign foe.

Sorrows in long succession reign;
Their iron rod I feel:
Friendship has only chang'd the chain,
But I'm the prisoner still.

Why was this life for misery made?
Or why drawn out so long?
Is there no room amongst the dead?
Or is a wretch too young?

Move faster on, great nature's wheel,
Be kind, ye rolling powers,
Hurl my days headlong down the hill
With undistinguish'd hours.

Be dusky, all my rising suns,
Nor smile upon a slave:
Darkness, and death, make haste at once
To hide me in the grave.

THE REVERSE:

OR, THE COMFORTS OF A FRIEND.

Thus nature tun'd her mournful tongue,
Till grace lift up her head,
Revers'd the sorrow and the song,
And, smiling, thus she said:

Were kindred spirits born for cares?
Must every grief be mine?
Is there a sympathy in tears?
Yet joys refuse to join?

Forbid it, heaven, and raise my love,
And make our joys the same;
So bliss and friendship join'd above
Mix an immortal flame.

Sorrows are lost in vain delight
That brightens all the soul,
As deluges of dawning light
O'erwhelm the dusky pole.

Pleasures in long succession reign,
And all my powers employ:
Friendship but shifts the pleasing scene,
And fresh repeats the joy.

Life has a soft and silver thread,
Nor is it drawn too long;
Yet, when my vaster hopes persuade,
I'm willing to be gone.

Fast as ye please roll down the hill,
And haste away, my years;
Or I can wait my father's will,
And dwell beneath the spheres.

Rise glorious, every future sun,
Gild all my following days,
But make the last dear moment known
By well-distinguish'd rays.

To the Right Honourable
JOHN LORD CUTTS.

AT THE SIEGE OF NAMUR.

THE HARDY SOLDIER.

"O WHY is man so thoughtless grown?
"Why guilty souls in haste to die?
"Venturing the leap to worlds unknown,
"Heedless to arms and blood they fly.

"Are lives but worth a soldier's pay?
"Why will ye join such wide extremes,

"And stake immortal souls, in play
"At desperate chance, and bloody games?

"Valour's a nobler turn of thought,
"Whose pardon'd guilt forbids her fears:
"Calmly she meets the deadly shot!
"Secure of life above the stars.

"But phrenzy dares eternal fate,
"And, spurr'd with honour's airy dreams,
"Flies to attack th' infernal gate,
"And force a passage to the flames."

Thus hovering o'er Namuria's plains,
Sung heavenly love in Gabriel's form:
Young Thrafo left the moving strains,
And vow'd to pray before the storm.

Anon the thundering trumpet calls;
Vows are but wind, the hero cries;
Then swears by heaven, and scales the walls,
Drops in the ditch, despairs, and dies.

BURNING SEVERAL POEMS OF

OVID, MARTIAL, OLDHAM, DRYDEN, &c.
1708.

I JUDGE the muse of lewd desire;
Her sons to darkness, and her works to fire.
In vain the flatteries of their wit
Now with a melting strain, now with an heavenly flight,

Would tempt my virtue to approve
Those gaudy tinders of a lawless love.
So harlots dress: They can appear
Sweet, modest, cool, divinely fair,
To charm a Cato's eye; but all within,
Stench, impudence, and fire, and ugly raging sin.

Die, Flora, die in endless shame,
Thou prostitute of blackest fame,
Stript of thy false array.
Ovid, and all ye wilder pens
Of modern lust, who gild our scenes,
Poison the British stage, and paint damnation gay,
Attend your mistress to the dead;
When Flora dies, her imps should wait upon her shade.

Strephon *, of noble blood and mind,
(For ever shine his name!)
As death approach'd, his soul refin'd,
And gave his looser sonnets to the flame.
"Burn, burn, he cry'd with sacred rage,
"Hell is the due of every page,
"Hell be the fate. (But O indulgent heaven!
"So vile the muse, and yet the man forgiven!)
"Burn on my songs: For not the silver Thames
"Nor Tyber with his yellow streams
"In endless currents rolling to the main,
"Can e'er dilute the poison, or wash out the "stain."

So Moses by divine command
Forbid the leprous house to stand
When deep the fatal spot was grown.
"Break down the timber, and dig up the stone."

TO MRS. B. BENDISH.

AGAINST TEARS. 1699.

MADAM, persuade me tears are good
To wash our mortal cares away;
These eyes shall weep a sudden flood,
And stream into a briny sea.

Or if these orbs are hard and dry,
(These orbs that never use to rain)
Some star direct me where to buy
One sovereign drop for all my pain.

Were both the golden Indies mine,
I'd give both Indies for a tear:
I'd barter all but what's divine:
Nor shall I think the bargain dear.

But tears, alas! are trifling things,
They rather feed than heal our woe;
From trickling eyes new sorrow springs,
As weeds in rainy seasons grow.

Thus weeping urges weeping on;
In vain our miseries hope relief,
For one drop calls another down,
Till we are drown'd in seas of grief.

Then let these useless streams be staid,
Wear native courage on your face:
These vulgar things were never made
For souls of a superior race.

If 'tis a rugged path you go,
And thousand foes your steps surround,
Tread the thorns down, charge through the foe;
The hardest fight is highest crown'd.

FEW HAPPY MATCHES.

Aug. 1701.

SAY mighty Love, and teach my song,
To whom thy sweetest joys belong,
And who the happy pairs
Whose yielding hearts, and joining hands,
Find blessings twisted with their bands,
To soften all their cares.

Not the wild herd of nymphs and swains
That thoughtless fly into thy chains,
As custom leads the way:
If there be bliss without design,
Ivies and oaks may grow and twine,
And be as blest as they.

Not fordid souls of earthly mould
Who drawn by kindred charms of gold
To dull embraces move:
So two rich mountains of Peru
May rush to wealthy marriage too,
And make a world of love.

Not the mad tribe that hell inspires
With wanton flames; those raging fires
The purer bliss destroy:
On Ætna's top let furies wed,
And sheets of lightning dress the bed
T' improve the burning joy.

Nor the dull pairs whose marble forms
None of the melting passions warms,
Can mingle hearts and hands:

Logs of green wood that quench the coals
Are marry'd just like Stoic souls,
With officers for their bands.

Not minds of melancholy strain,
Still silent, or that still complain,
Can the dear bondage bleis:
As well may heavenly concerts spring
From two old lutes with ne'er a string,
Or none besides the bass.

Nor can the soft enchantments hold
Two jarring souls of angry mould,
The rugged and the keen:
Samson's young foxes might as well
In bonds of cheerful wedlock dwell,
With firebrands ty'd between.

Nor let the cruel fetters bind
A gentle to a savage mind;
For Love abhors the fight:
Loose the fierce tiger from the deer,
For native rage and native fear
Rise and forbid delight.

Two kindest souls alone must meet,
'Tis friendship makes the bondage sweet,
And feeds their mutual loves:
Bright Venus on her rolling throne
Is drawn by gentlest birds alone,
And Cupids yoke the doves.

¶ Mr. Polhill was one of those five zealous gentlemen who presented the famous Kentish pe-

THE CELEBRATED VICTORY

OF THE POLES OVER OSMAN THE TURKISH EMPEROR IN THE DACIAN BATTLE.

Translated from Casimire, B. IV. Od. 4. with large Additions.

GADOR the old, the wealthy, and the strong,
Cheerful in years (nor of the heroic muse
Unknowing, nor unknown) held fair possessions
Where flows the fruitful Danube: Seventy springs
Smil'd on his seed, and seventy harvest-moons
Fill'd his wide granaries with autumnal joy:
Still he resum'd the toil: and fame reports,
While he broke up new ground, and tir'd his plough

In grassy furrows, the torn earth disclos'd
Helmets, and swords (bright furniture of war
Sleeping in rust) and heaps of mighty bones.
The sun descending to the western deep
Bid him lie down and rest; he loos'd the yoke,
Yet held his wearied oxen from their food
With charming numbers, and uncommon song.

Go, fellow-labourers, you may rove secure,
Or feed beside me; taste the greens and boughs
That you have long forgot; crop the sweet herb,
And graze in safety, while the victor Pole
Leans on his spear, and breathes; yet still his eye
Jealous and fierce. How large, old soldier, say,
How fair a harvest of the slaughter'd Turks
Strew'd the Moldavian fields? What mighty piles
Of vast destruction, and of Thracian dead,
Fill and amaze my eyes? Broad bucklers lie
(A vain defence) spread o'er the pathless hills,
And coats of scaly steel, and hard habergeon,
Deep-bruis'd and empty of Mahometan limbs.
This the fierce Saracen wore, (for when a boy,
I was their captive, and remind their dress:)
Here the Polonians dreadful march'd along
In august port, and regular array,
Led on to conquest: Here the Turkish chief
Presumptuous trod, and in rude order rang'd
His long battalions, while his populous towns
Pour'd out fresh troops perpetual, dress'd in arms,
Horrent in mail, and gay in spangled pride.

O the dire image of the bloody fight
These eyes have seen, when the capacious plain
Was throng'd with Dacian spears; when polish'd helms

And convex gold blaz'd thick against the sun
Restoring all his beams! but frowning war
All gloomy, like a gather'd tempest, stood
Wavering, and doubtful where to bend its fall.

The storm of missive steel delay'd a while
By wise command; fledg'd arrows on the nerve;
And scymiter and sabre bore the sheath
Reluctant; till the hollow brazen clouds
Had bellow'd from each quarter of the field
Loud thunder, and disgorg'd their sulphurous fire.
Then banners wav'd, and arms were mix'd with
arms;

Then javelins answer'd javelins as they fled,

*tion to the parliament, in the reign of King
William, to hasten their supplies in order to support the King in his war with France.*

For both fled hissing death: With adverse age
The crooked faulchions met; and hideous noise
From clashing shields, through the long ranks of war,

Clang'd horrible. A thousand iron storms
Roar diverse: and in harsh confusion drown
The trumpet's silver sound. O rude effort
Of harmony! not all the frozen stores
Of the cold north, when pour'd in rattling hail,
Lash with such madness the Norwegian plains,
Or so torment the ear. Scarce sounds so far
The direful fragor, when some southern blast
Tears from the Alps a ridge of knotty oaks
Deep fang'd, and ancient tenants of the rock:
The massy fragment, many a rood in length,
With hideous crash, rolls down the rugged cliff
Resistless, plunging in the subject lake
Como, or Lugaine; th' afflicted waters roar,
And various thunder all the valley fills;
Such was the noise of war: the troubled air
Complains aloud, and propagates the din
To neighbouring regions; rocks and lofty hills
Beat the impetuous echoes round the sky.

Uproar, revenge, and rage, and hate, appear
In all their murderous forms; and flame, and blood,
And sweat, and dust, array the broad campaign
In horror: hasty feet, and sparkling eyes,
And all the savage passions of the soul,
Engage in the warm business of the day.
Here mingling hands, but with no friendly gripe,
Join in the fight; and breasts in close embrace,
But mortal as the iron arms of death.
Here words austere, of perilous command,
And valour swift to obey; bold feats of arms
Dreadful to see, and glorious to relate,
Shine through the field with more surprising brightness [pause
Than glittering helms or spears. What loud ap-
(Best meed of warlike toil) what manly shouts,
And yells unmanly through the battle ring!
And sudden wrath dies into endless fame.

Long did the fate of war hang dubious. Here
Stood the more numerous Turk, the valiant Pole
Fought here; more dreadful, though with lesser wings.

But what the Dahets or the coward soul
Of a Cydonian, what the fearful crowds
Of base Cilicians 'scaping from the slaughter,
Of Parthian beasts, with all their racing riders,
What could they mean against th' intrepid breast
Of the pursuing foe? Th' impetuous Poles
Rush here, and here the Lithuanian horse
Drive down upon them like a double bolt
Of kindled thunder raging through the sky
On sounding wheels; or as some mighty flood
Rolls his two torrents down a dreadful steep
Precipitant, and bears along the stream
Rocks, woods, and trees, with all the grazing herd,
And tumbles lofty forests headlong to the plain.

The bold Borussia smoking from afar
Moves like a tempest in a dusky cloud,
And imitates th' artillery of heaven,
The lightning and the roar. Amazing scene!
What showers of mortal hail, what flaky fires
Burst from the darkness! while their cohorts firm,

Met the like thunder, and an equal storm,
From hostile troops, but with a braver mind.
Undaunted bosoms tempt the edge of war,
And rush on the sharp point; while baleful mis-
chiefs,

Deaths, and bright dangers flew across the field
Thick and continual, and a thousand souls
Fled murmuring through their wounds. I stood aloof,

For 'twas unsafe to come within the wind
Of Russian banners, when with whizzing sound,
Eager of glory, and profuse of life,
They bore down fearless on the charging foes,
And drove them backward. Then the Turkish
Wander'd in disarray. A dark eclipse [moons
Hung on the silver crescent, boding night,
Long night, to all her sons: at length disrob'd
The standards fell: the barbarous ensigns torn Fled with the wind, the sport of angry heaven:
And a large cloud of infantry and horse
Scattering in wild disorder, spread the plain.

Not noise, nor number, nor the brawny limb,
Nor high-built size prevails: 'Tis courage fights,
'Tis courage conquers. So whole forests fall
(A spacious ruin) by one single axe,
And steel well-sharp'ned: so a generous pair
Of young-wing'd eaglets fright a thousand doves.

Vast was the slaughter, and the flowery green
Drank deep of flowing crimson. Veteran bands
Here made their last campaign. Here haughty chiefs

Stretch'd on the bed of purple honour lie
Supine, nor dream of battle's hard event,
Oppress'd with iron slumbers, and long night.
Their ghosts indignant to the nether world
Fled, but attended well: for at their side
Some faithful Janizaries strew'd the field,
Fall'n in just ranks or wedges, lunes or squares,
Firm as they stood; to the Warsovia troops,
A nobler toil, and triumph worth their fight.
But the broad sabre and keen poll-axe flew
With speedy terror through the feeble herd,
And made rude havock and irregular spoil
Amongst the vulgar bands that own'd the name
Of Mahomet. The wild Arabians fled
In swift affright a thousand different ways
Through brakes and thorns, and climb'd the craggy mountains,

Bellowing; yet hasty fate o'ertook the cry,
And Polish hunters clave the timorous deer.

Thus the dire prospect distant fill'd my soul
With awe; till the last relics of the war,
The thin Edonians, flying had disclos'd
The ghastly plain: I took a nearer view,
Unseemly to the sight, nor to the smell
Grateful. What loads of mangled flesh and limbs
(A dismal carnage!) bath'd in reeking gore
Lay weltering on the ground; while flitting life
Convuls'd the nerves still shivering, nor had lost
All taste of pain! Here an old Thracian lies,
Deform'd with years and scars, and groans aloud
Torn with fresh wounds; but inward vitals firm
Forbid the soul's remove, and chain it down
By the hard laws of nature, to sustain
Long torment: his wild eye-balls roll: his teeth,

Gnashing with anguish, chide his lingering fate.
Emblazon'd armour spoke his high command
Amongst the neighbouring dead; they round their lord

Lay prostrate; some in flight ignobly slain,
Some to the skies their faces upwards turn'd
Still brave, and proud to die so near their prince.

I mov'd not far, and lo, at manly length
Two beauteous youths of richest Ottoman blood
Extended on the field: in friendship join'd,
Nor fate divides them: hardy warriors both;
Both faithful; drown'd in showers of darts they fell,
Each with his shield spread o'er his lover's heart,
In vain: for on those orbs of friendly brass
Stood groves of javelins; some, alas, too deep
Were planted there, and through their lovely
Made painful avenues for cruel death. [bosoms
O my dear native land, forgive the tear [passion
I dropt on their wan cheeks, when strong com-
Forc'd from my melting eyes the briny dew,
And paid a sacrifice to hostile virtue.

Dacia, forgive the fight that wish'd the souls
Of those fair infidels some humble place
Among the blest. "Sleep, sleep, ye hapless pair,
"Gently, I cry'd, worthy of better fate,
"And better faith." Hard by the general lay,
Of Saracen descent, a grisly form
Breathless, yet pride sat pale upon his front
In disappointment, with a furlly brow
Louring in death, and vex; his rigid jaws
Foaming with blood bite hard the Polish spear:
In that dead visage my remembrance reads
Rash Caraccas: In vain the boasting slave
Promis'd and sooth'd the sultan threatening fierce
With royal suppers and triumphant fare
Spread wide beneath Warsovia silk and gold;
See on the naked ground all cold he lies
Beneath the damp wide covering of the air,
Forgetful of his word. How heaven confounds
Insulting hopes! with what an awful smile
Laughs at the proud, that loosen all the reins
To their unbounded wishes, and leads on
Their blind ambition to a shameful end!

But whether am I borne? This thought of arms
Fires me in vain to sing to senseless bulls [song;
What generous horse should hear. Break off, my
My barbarous muse, be still: Immortal deeds
Must not be thus profan'd in rustic verse:
The martial trumpet, and the following age,
And growing fame, shall loud rehearse the fight
In founts of glory. Lo, the evening-star
Shines o'er the western hill; my oxen, come,
The well-known star invites the labourer home.

TO MR. HENRY BENDYSH.

Aug. 24. 1705

DEAR SIR,

THE following song was yours when first composed; The muse then described the general fate of mankind, that is, to be ill matched; and now
she rejoices that you have escaped the common mischief, and that your soul has found its own mate. Let this ode then congratulate you both.
Grow mutually in more complete likeness and love;
Persevere, and be happy.

I persuade myself you will accept from the press
what the pen more privately inscribed to you long ago; and I am in no pain lest you should take offence at the fabulous dress of this poem: Nor would weaker minds be scandalized at it, if they would give themselves leave to reflect how many divine truths are spoken by the holy writers in visions and images, parables and dreams: Nor are my wiser friends ashamed to defend it, since the narrative is grave, and the moral so just and obvious.

THE INDIAN PHILOSOPHER.

Sept. 3. 1701

Why should our joys transform to pain?
 Why gentle Hymen's filken chain
 A plague of iron prove?
 Bendy, 'tis strange the charm that binds
 Millions of hands, should leave their minds
 At such a loose from love.
 In vain I fought the wonderous cause,
 Rang'd the wide fields of nature's laws,
 And urg'd the schools in vain;
 Then deep in thought, within my breast
 My soul retir'd, and slumber dress'd
 A bright instructive scene.
 O'er the broad lands, and cross the tide,
 On fancy's airy horse I ride,
 (Sweet rapture of my mind!)
 Till on the banks of Ganges flood,
 In a tall ancient grove I stood,
 For sacred use design'd.
 Hard by, a venerable priest,
 Risen with his God, the sun, from rest,
 Awoke his morning song;
 Thrice he conjur'd the murmuring stream;
 The birth of souls was all his theme,
 And half-divine his tongue.
 "He sang th' eternal rolling flame,
 "The vital mass, that still the same
 "Does all our minds compose:
 "But sharp'd in twice ten thousand frames:
 "Thence differing souls of differing names,
 "And jarring tempers rose.
 "The mighty power that form'd the mind
 "One mould for every two design'd,
 "And bless'd the new-born pair:
 "This be a match for this (he said):
 "Then down he sent the souls he made,
 "To seek them bodies here:
 "But parting from their warm abode
 "They lost their fellows on the road,
 "And never join'd their hands:
 "Ah cruel chance, and crossing fates!
 "Our eastern souls have dropt their mates
 "On Europe's barbarous lands.
 "Happy the youth that finds the bride
 "Whose birth is to his own ally'd,
 "The sweetest joy of life:
 "But oh the crowds of wretched souls
 "Fetter'd to minds of different moulds,
 "And chain'd to eternal strife!"
 Thus sang the wondrous Indian bard;
 My soul with vast attention heard,
 While Ganges ceas'd to flow:
 "Sure then (I cry'd) might I but see
 "That gentle nymph that twinn'd with me,
 "I may be happy too.

"Some courteous angel, tell me where,
 "What distant lands this unknown fair,
 "Or distant seas detain?
 "Swift as the wheel of nature rolls
 "I'd fly, to meet, and mingle souls,
 "And wear the joyful chain."

THE HAPPY MAN.

SERENE as light, is Myron's soul,
 And active as the sun, yet steady as the pole:
 In manly beauty shines his face;
 Every muse, and every grace,
 Makes his heart and tongue their seat,
 His heart profusely good, his tongue divinely sweet.
 Myron, the wonder of our eyes,
 Behold his manhood scarce begun!
 Behold the race of virtue run!
 Behold the goal of glory won! [prize;
 Nor fame denies the merit, nor with-holds the
 Her silver trumpets his renown proclaim:
 The lands where learning never flew,
 Which neither Rome nor Athens knew,
 Surly Japan and rich Peru, [name.
 In barbarous songs, pronounce the British hero's
 "Airy blest (the hero cry'd)
 "May feed the tympany of pride;
 "But healthy souls were never found
 "To live on emptiness and sound."
 Lo, at his honourable feet
 Fame's bright attendant, wealth, appears;
 She comes to pay obedience meet,
 Providing joys for future years;
 Blessings with lavish hand she pours
 Gather'd from the Indian coast;
 Not Danae's lap could equal treasures boast,
 When Jove came down in golden showers.
 He look'd and turn'd his eyes away,
 With high disdain I heard him say,
 "Bliss is not made of glittering clay."
 Now pomp and grandeur court his head
 With scutcheons, arms, and ensigns spread;
 Gay magnificence and state,
 Guards, and chariots, at his gate,
 And slaves and endless order round his table wait;
 They learn the dictates of his eyes,
 And now they fall, and now they rise,
 Watch every motion of their lord,
 Hang on his lips with most impatient zeal,
 With swift ambition seize th' unfinished word,
 And the command fulfil.
 Tir'd with the train that grandeur brings,
 He dropt a tear, and pity'd kings,
 Then, flying from the noisy throng,
 Seeks the diversion of a song.
 Music descending on a silent cloud,
 Tun'd all her strings with endless art;
 By slow degrees from soft to loud
 Changing the rose: The harp and flute
 Harmonious join, the hero to salute,
 And make a captive of his heart.
 Fruits, and rich wine, and scenes of lawless love
 Each with utmost luxury strove
 To treat their favourite best;
 But sounding strings, and fruits, and wine,
 And lawless love, in vain combine
 To make his virtue sleep, or lull his soul to rest.

He saw the tedious round; and, with a sigh,
 Pronounc'd the world but vanity.
 " In crowds of pleasure still I find
 " A painful solitude of mind.
 " A vacancy within which sense can ne'er supply.
 " Hence, and be gone, ye flattering snares,
 " Ye vulgar charms of eyes and ears,
 " Ye unperforming promisers!
 " Be all my baser passions dead,
 " And base desires, by nature made
 " For animals and boys:
 " Man has a relish more refin'd,
 " Souls are for social bliss design'd,
 " Give me a blessing fit to match my mind,
 " A kindred-soul to double and to share my joys."
 Myrrha appear'd: " Serene her soul,
 " And active as the sun, yet steady as the pole:
 " In softer beauties shone her face;
 " Every muse, and every grace,
 " Made her heart and tongue their seat,
 " Her heart profusely good, her tongue divinely
 " Myrrha the wonder of his eyes;" [sweet:
 His heart recoil'd with sweet surprise,
 With joys unknown before:
 His soul dissolv'd in pleasing pain,
 Flow'd to his eyes, and look'd again,
 And could endure no more.
 " Enough! (th' impatient hero cries)
 " And seiz'd her to his breast,
 " I seek no more below the skies,
 " I give my slaves the rest."

 That brightest star that gilds the wings of fame,
 William the brave, the pious, and the just,
 Adorn these gloomy scenes or tyranny and lust?

Polhill, my blood boils high, my spirits flame;
 Can your zeal sleep! Or are your passions tame?
 Nor call revenge and darkness on the Poet's name?

Why smoke the skies not? Why no thunders roll?
 Nor kindling lightnings blast his guilty soul?
 Audacious wretch! to stab a monarch's fame,
 And fire his subjects with a rebel-flame;
 To call the painter to his black designs,
 To draw our guardian's face in hellish lines:
 Painter, beware! the monarch can be shown
 Under no shape but angels, or his own,
 Gabriel, or William, on the British throne.

O! could my thought but grasp the vast design,
 And words with infinite ideas join,
 I'd rouse Apelles, from his iron sleep,
 And bid him trace the warrior o'er the deep:
 Trace him, Apelles, o'er the Belgian plain;
 Fierce, how he climbs the mountains of the slain,
 Scattering just vengeance through the red campaign.
 Then dash the canvas with a flying stroke,
 Till it be lost in clouds of fire and smoke,
 And say, 'Twas thus the conqueror through the squadrons broke.

Mark him again emerging from the cloud,
 Far from his troops; there like a rock he stood
 His country's single barrier in a sea of blood.
 Calmly he leaves the pleasures of a throne,
 And his Maria weeping; whilst alone [own:
 He wards the fate of nations, and provokes his
 But heaven secures its champion; o'er the field
 Paint hovering angels; though they fly con-ceal'd, [shield.
 Each intercepts a death, and wears it on his

Now, noble pencil, lead him to our isle,
 Mark how the skies with joyful lustre smile,
 Then imitate the glory; on the strand
 Spread half the nation, longing till he land.
 Wash off the blood, and take a peaceful teint,
 All red the warrior, white the ruler paint;
 Abroad a hero, and at home a saint.
 Throne him on high upon a shining seat,
 Lust and profaneness dying at his feet, [meet,
 While round his head the laurel and the olive
 The crowns of war and peace; and may they blow
 With flowery blessings ever on his brow.
 At his right hand pile up the English laws
 In sacred volumes; thence the monarch draws
 His wife and just commands——
 Rise, ye old sages of the British isle,
 On the fair tablet cast a reverend smile,
 And bless the piece; these statutes are your own,
 That sway the cottage, and direct the throne;
 People and prince are one in William's name,
 Their joys, their dangers, and their laws the same.

Let liberty, and right, with plumes display'd,
 Clap their glad wings around their guardian's head,
 Religion o'er the rest her starry pinions spread.
 Religion guards him; round th' imperial queen
 Place waiting virtues, each of heavenly mien;
 Learn their bright air, and paint it from his eyes;
 The just, the bold, the temperate, and the wise
 Dwell in his looks; majestic, but serene;
 Sweet, with no fondness; cheerful, but not vain:
 Bright, without terror; great, without disdain.
 His soul inspires us what his lips command,
 And spreads his brave example through the land:
 Not so the former reigns;——

Bend down his ear to each afflicted cry,
Let beams of grace dart gently from his eye;
But the bright treasures of his sacred breast
Are too divine, too vast to be exprest:
Colours must fail where words and numbers faint,
And leave the hero's heart for thought alone to paint.

PART II.

Now, Muse, pursue the satyrift again,
Wipe off the blots of his invenom'd pen;
Hark, how he bids the servile painter draw,
In monstrous shapes, the patrons of our law;
At one flight dash he cancels every name
From the white rolls of honesty and fame;
This scribbling wretch marks all he meets for knave,
Shoots sudden bolts promiscuous at the base and
And with unpardonable malice sheds [brave,
Poison and spite on undistinguish'd heads.
Painter, forbear; or if thy bolder hand
Dares to attempt the villains of the land,
Draw first this poet, like some baleful star,
With silent influence shedding civil war;
Or factious trumpeter, whose magic sound
Calls off the subjects to the hostile ground,
And scatters hellish feuds the nation round.
These are the imps of hell, that cursed tribe
That first create the plague, and then the pain describe.

Draw next above, the great ones of our isle,
Still from the good distinguishing the vile;
Seat them in pomp, in grandeur, and command,
Peeling the subjects with a greedy hand:
Paint forth the knaves that have the nation sold,
And tinge their greedy looks with fordid gold.
Mark what a selfish faction undermines
The pious monarch's generous designs,
Spoil their own native land as vipers do,
Vipers that tear their mother's bowels through.
Let great Nassau, beneath a careful crown,
Mournful in majesty, look gently down,
Mingling soft pity with an awful frown:
He grieves to see how long in vain he strove
To make us blest, how vain his labours prove
To save the stubborn land he condescends to love.

TO THE DISCONTENTED AND UNQUIET.

Imitated partly from Casimire, B. IV. Od. 15.

VARIA, there's nothing here that's free
From wearisome anxiety:
And the whole round of mortal joys
With short possession tires and cloy:
'Tis a dull circle that we tread,
Just from the window to the bed,
We rise to see and to be seen,
Gaze on the world awhile, and then
We yawn, and stretch to sleep again.
But Fancy, that uneasy guest,
Still holds a longing in our breast:
She finds or frames vexations still.
Herself the greatest plague we feel,
We take strange pleasure in our pain,
And make a mountain of a grain,
Assume the load, and pant and sweat
Beneath th' imaginary weight.
With our dear selves we live at strife,
While the most constant scenes of life

From peevish humours are not free;
Still we affect variety:
Rather than pass an easy day,
We fret and chide the hours away,
Grow weary of this circling sun,
And vex that he should ever run
The same old track; and still, and still
Rise red behind yon eastern hill,
And chide the moon that darts her light
Through the same casement every night.

We shift our chambers, and our homes,
To dwell where trouble never comes;
Sylvia has left the city crowd,
Against the court exclaims aloud,
Flies to the woods; a hermit faint!
She loaths her patches, pins, and paint,
Dear diamonds from her neck are torn:
But humour, that eternal thorn,
Sticks in her heart: She is hurry'd still,
Twixt her wild passions and her will:
Haunted and hagg'd where-e'er she roves,
By purling streams, and silent groves,
Or with her furies, or her loves.

Then our own native land we hate,
Too cold, too windy, or too wet;
Change the thick climate, and repair
To France or Italy for air;
In vain we change, in vain we fly;
Go, Sylvia, mount the whirling sky,
Or ride upon the feather'd wind
In vain; if this diseased mind
Clings fast, and still sits close behind.
Faithful disease, that never fails
Attendance at her lady's side,
Over the desert or the tide,
On rolling wheels, or flying sails.

Happy the soul that virtue shows
Too fix the place of her repose,
Needless to move; for she can dwell
In her old grandfire's hall as well.
Virtue that never loves to roam,
But sweetly hides herself at home.
And easy on a native throne
Of humble turf sits gently down.

Yet should tumultuous storms arise,
And mingle earth, and seas, and skies,
Should the waves swell, and make her roll
Across the line, or near the pole,
Still she's at peace; for well she knows
To launch the stream that duty shows,
And makes her home where-e'er she goes.
Bear her, ye seas, upon your breast,
Or waft her, winds, from east to west
On the soft air; she cannot find
A couch so easy as her mind,
Nor breathe a climate half so kind.

TO JOHN HARTOPP, ESQ.

AFTERWARDS SIR JOHN HARTOPP, BART.

Casimire, Book I. Ode 4. imitated.

"Vive jucundæ metuens juventæ," &c.

July, 1700.

LIVE, my dear Hartopp, live to-day,
Nor let the sun look down and say,
"Inglorious here he lies;"

Shake off your ease, and send your name
To immortality and fame,
By every hour that flies.

Youth's a soft scene, but trust her not:
Her airy minutes, swift as thought,
Slide off the slippery sphere;
Moons with their months make hasty rounds,
The sun has pass'd his vernal bounds,
And whirls about the year.

Let folly dress in green and red,
And gird her waste with flowing gold,
Knit blushing roses round her head,
Alas! the gaudy colours fade,
The garment waxes old.
Hartopp, mark the withering rose,
And the pale gold how dim it shows!

Bright and lasting bliss below
Is all romance and dream;
Only the joys celestial flow
In an eternal stream,
The pleasures that the smiling day
With large right hand bestows,
Falsely her left conveys away,
And shuffles in our woes.
So have I seen a mother play,
And cheat her silly child,
She gave and took a toy away,
The infant cry'd and smil'd.

Airy chance, and iron fate,
Hurry and vex our mortal state,
And all the race of ills create;
Now fiery joy, now fullen grief,
Commands the reins of human life,
The wheels impetuous roll;
The harrest hours and minutes strive,
And days with stretching pinions drive-
down fiercely on the goal.

Not half so fast the galley flies
O'er the Venetian sea,
When sails, and oars, and labouring skies,
Contend to make her way.
Swift wings for all the flying hours
The God of time prepares,
The rest lie still yet in their nest
And grow for future years.

TO THOMAS GUNSTON, ESQ.

HAPPY SOLITUDE.

Casimire, Book IV. Ode 12. imitated.

"Quid me latentem," &c. 1700.

THE noisy world complains of me
That I should shun their fight and flee
Visits, and crowds, and company.
Gunston, the lark dwells in her nest
Till she ascend the skies;
And in my closet I could rest
Till to the heavens I rise.
Yet they will urge, "This private life
"Can never make you blest,
"And twenty doors are still at strife
"T'engage you for a guest."
Friend, should the towers of Windsor or Whitehall

Spread open their inviting gates
To make my entertainment gay;
I would obey the royal call,
But short should be my stay,
Since a diviner service waits
T'employ my hours at home, and better fill the day.

When I within myself retreat,
I shut my doors against the great;
My busy eye-balls inward roll,
And there with large survey I see
All the wide theatre of me,
And view the various scenes of my retiring soul;
There I walk o'er the mazes I have trod,
While hope and fear are in a doubtful strife,
Whether this opera of life
Be acted well to gain the plaudit of my God.

There's a day hastening, ('tis an awful day!)
When the great sovereign shall at large review
All that we speak, and all we do,
The several parts we act on this wide stage of clay:
These he approves, and those he blames,
And crowns perhaps a porter, and a prince he damns.
O if the judge from his tremendous seat
Shall not condemn what I have done,
I shall be happy though unknown,
Nor heed the gazing rabble, nor the shouting street.

I hate the glory, friend, that springs
From vulgar breath, and empty sound;
Fame mounts her upward with a flattering gale
Upon her airy wings,
Till envy shoots, and fame receives the wound;
Then her flagging pinions fail,
Down glory falls, and strikes the ground,
And breaks her batter'd limbs.
Rather let me be quite conceal'd from fame;
How happy I should lie
In sweet obscurity,
Nor the loud world pronounce my little name!
Here I could live and die alone;
Or if society be due
To keep our taste of pleasure new,
Gunston, I'd live and die with you,
For both our souls are one.

Here we could sit and pass the hour,
And pity kingdoms, and their kings,
And smile at all their shining things,
Their toys of state, and images of power;
Virtue should dwell within our seat,
Virtue alone could make it sweet,
Nor is herself secure, but in a close retreat,
While she withdraws from public praise,
Envy perhaps would cease to rail,
Envy itself would innocently gaze
At beauty in a veil:
But if she once advance to light,
Her charms are lost in envy's sight,
And virtue stands the mark of universal spight.

TO JOHN HARTOPP, ESQ.

AFTERWARDS SIR JOHN HARTOPP, BART.

THE DISDAIN. 1700.

HARTOPP, I love the soul that dares
Tread the temptations of his years
Beneath his youthful feet:

Fleetwood and all thy heavenly line
Look through the stars, and smile divine
Upon an heir so great.
Young Hartopp knows this noble theme,
That the wild scenes of busy life,
The noise, th' amusements, and the strife,
Are but the visions of the night,
Gay phantoms of delusive light,
Or a vexatious dream.

Flesh is the vilest and the least
Ingredient of our frame :
We're born to live above the beast,
Or quit the manly name.
Pleasures of sense we leave for boys ;
Be shining dust the miser's food ;
Let fancy feed on fame and noise,
Souls must pursue diviner joys,
And seize th' immortal good.

TO MITIO, MY FRIEND.

AN EPISTLE.

FORGIVE me, Mitio, that there should be any mortifying lines in the following poems inscribed to you, so soon after your entrance into that state which was designed for the completest happiness on earth : But you will quickly discover, that the muse in the first poem only represents the shades and dark colours that melancholy throws upon love, and the social life. In the second, perhaps she indulges her own bright ideas a little. Yet if the accounts are but well balanced at last, and things set in a due light, I hope there is no ground for censure. Here you will find an attempt made to talk of one of the most important concerns of human nature in verse, and that with a solemnity becoming the argument. I have banished grimace and ridicule, that persons of the most serious character may read without offence. What was written several years ago to yourself, is now permitted to entertain the world ; but you may assume it to yourself as a private entertainment still, while you lie concealed behind a feigned name.

THE MOURNING-PIECE.

LIFE's a long tragedy : This globe the stage,
Well fix'd and well adorn'd with strong machines,
Gay fields, and skies, and seas : The actors many :
The plot immense : A flight of demons sit
On every sailing cloud with fatal purpose ;
And shoots across the scenes ten thousand arrows
Perpetual and unseen, headed with pain,
With sorrow, infamy, disease, and death.
The pointed plagues fly silent through the air,
Nor twangs the bow, yet sure and deep the wound.

Dianthe acts her little part alone,
Nor wishes an associate. Lo she glides
Single through all the storm, and more secure ;
Less are her dangers, and her breast receives
The fewest darts. " But, O my lov'd Marilla,
" My sister, once my friend, (Dianthe cries)
" How much art thou exposed ! Thy growing soul
" Doubled in wedlock, multiply'd in children,
" Stands but the broader mark for all the mischiefs
" That rove promiscuous o'er the mortal stage :

" Children, those dear young limbs, those tenderest pieces
" Of your own flesh, those little other selves,
" How they dilate the heart to wide dimensions,
" And soften every fibre to improve
" The mother's sad capacity of pain !
" I mourn Fidelio too ; though heaven has chose
" A favourite mate for him, of all her sex
" The pride and flower : How blest the lovely pair,
" Beyond expression, if well mingled loves
" And woes well mingled could improve our bliss !
" Amidst the rugged cares of life behold
" The father and the husband ; flattering names,
" That spread his title, and enlarge his share
" Of common wretchedness. He fondly hopes
" To multiply his joys, but every hour
" Renews the disappointment and the smart.
" There not a wound afflicts the meanest joint
" Of his fair partner, or her infant train,
" (Sweet babes !) but pierces to his inmost soul.
" Strange is thy power, O Love ! what numerous veins,
" And arteries, and arms, and hands, and eyes,
" Are link'd and fasten'd to a lover's heart,
" By strong but secret strings ! With vain attempt
" We put the Stoic on, in vain we try
" To break the ties of nature and of blood ;
" Those hidden threads maintain the dear communion
" Inviolably firm ; their thrilling motions
" Reciprocal give endless sympathy
" In all the bitters and the sweets of life.
" Thrice happy man, if pleasure only knew
" These avenues of love to reach our souls,
" And pain had never found them !"

Thus sang the tuneful maid, fearful to try
The bold experiment. Oft Daphnia came,
And oft Narcissus, rivals of her heart,
Luring her eyes with trifles dipt in gold,
And the gay silken bondage. Firm she stood,
And bold repuls'd the bright temptation still,
Nor put the chains on ; dangerous to try,
And hard to be dissolv'd. Yet rising tears
Sate on her eye-lids, while her numbers flow'd
Harmonious sorrow ; and the pitying drops
Stole down her cheeks, to mourn the hapless state
Of mortal love. Love, thou best blessing sent
To soften life, and make our iron cares
Easy : But thy own cares of softer kind [heart,
Give sharper wounds : They lodge too near the Beat, like the pulse, perpetual, and create
A strange uneasy sense, a tempting pain.

Say, my companion Mitio, speak sincere,
(For thou art learned now) what anxious thoughts,
What kind perplexities tumultuous rise,
If but the absence of a day divide
Thee from thy fair beloved ! Vainly smiles
The cheerful sun, and night with radiant eyes
Twinkles in vain : The region of thy soul
Is darkness, till thy better star appear.
Tell me, what toil, what torment to sustain
The rolling burden of the tedious hours ?
The tedious hours are ages. Fancy roves
Restless in fond inquiry, nor believes
Charissa safe : Charissa, in whose life
Thy life consists, and in her comfort thine.
Fear and surmise put on a thousand forms

Of dear disquietude, and round thine ears
Whisper, ten thousand dangers, endless woes,
Till thy frame shudders at her fancy'd death;
Then dies my Mitio, and his blood creeps cold
Through every vein. Speak, does the stranger muse

Cast happy guesses at the unknown passion,
Or has she fabled all? Inform me, friend,
Are half thy joys sincere? Thy hopes fulfill'd
Or frustrate? Here commit thy secret griefs
To faithful ears, and be they bury'd here
In friendship and oblivion; lest they spoil
Thy new-born pleasures with distasteful gall.
Nor let thine eye too greedily drink in
The frightful prospect, when untimely death
Shall make wild inroads on a parent's heart,
And his dear offspring to the cruel grave
Are dragg'd in sad succession, while his soul
Is torn away piece-meal: Thus dies the wretch
A various death, and frequent, ere he quit
The theatre, and make his exit final.

But if his dearest half, his faithful mate
Survive, and in the sweetest saddest airs
Of love and grief, approach with trembling hand
To close his swimming eyes, what double pangs,
What racks, what twinges rend his heart-strings off
From the fair bosom of that fellow-dove
He leaves behind to mourn? What jealous cares
Hang on his parting soul, to think his love
Expos'd to wild oppression, and the herd
Of savage men? So parts the dying turtle
With sobbing accents, with such sad regret
Leaves his kind feather'd mate: The widow bird
Wanders in lonesome shades, forgets her food,
Forgets her life; or falls a speedier prey
To talon'd falcons, and the crooked beak
Of hawks athirst for blood.

THE SECOND PART:

OR, THE BRIGHT VISION.

Thus far the muse, in unaccustom'd mood,
And strains unpleasing to a lover's ear,
Indulg'd a gloom of thought; and thus she sang
Partial; for melancholy's hateful form
Stood by in sable robe: The pensive muse
Survey'd the darksome scenes of life, and sought
Some bright relieving glimpse, some cordial ray
In the fair world of love: But while she gaz'd
Delightful on the state of twin-born souls
United, bless'd, the cruel shade apply'd
A dark long tube, and a false tinctur'd glass
Deceitful; blending love and life at once
In darkness, chaos, and the common mass
Of misery: Now Urania feels the cheat,
And breaks the hated optic in disdain.
Swift vanishes the fullen form, and lo
The scene shines bright with bliss: Behold the place

Where mischiefs never fly, cares never come
With wrinkled brow, nor anguish, nor disease,
Nor malice fork-tongued. On this dear spot,
Mitio, my love would fix and plant thy station
To act thy part of life, serene and blest
With the fair consort fitted to thy heart.

Sure 'tis a vision of that happy grove
Where the first authors of our mournful race

Liv'd in sweet partnership! one hour they liv'd,
But chang'd the tasted bliss (imprudent pair!)
For sin, and shame, and this waste wilderness
Of briars, and nine hundred years of pain.
The wishing muse new-dresses the fair garden
Amid this desert world, with budding bliss,
And ever-greens, and balms, and flowery beauties
Without one dangerous tree: There heavenly dews
Nightly descending shall impearl the grass
And verdant herbage; drops of fragrantcy
Sit trembling on the spires: The spicy vapours
Rise with the dawn, and through the air diffus'd
Salute your waking senses with perfume:
While vital fruits with their ambrosial juice
Renew life's purple flood and fountain, pure
From vicious taint; and with your innocence
Immortalize the structure of your clay.
On this new paradise the cloudless skies
Shall smile perpetual, while the lamp of day
With flames unquench'd (as the fabled torch
Of Hymen) measures out your golden hours
Along his azure road. The nuptial moon
In milder rays serene, should nightly rise
Full orb'd (if heaven and nature will indulge
So fair an emblem) big with silver joys,
And still forget her wane. The feather'd choir,
Warbling their Maker's praise on early wing,
Or perch'd on evening-bough, shall join your worship,
Join your sweet vespers, and the morning song.

O sacred symphony! Hark, through the grove
I hear the sound divine! I'm all attention,
All ear, all ecstasy; unknown delight!
And the fair muse proclaims the heaven below.

Not the seraphic minds of high degree
Disdain converse with men: Again returning
I see th' ethereal host on downward wing.
Lo, at the eastern gate young cherubs stand
Guardians, commission'd to convey their joys
To earthly lovers. Go, ye happy pair,
Go taste their banquet, learn the nobler pleasures
Supernal, and from brutal dregs refin'd.
Raphael shall teach thee, friend, exalted thoughts
And intellectual bliss. 'Twas Raphael taught
The patriarch of our progeny th' affairs
Of heaven: (So Milton sings, enlightened bard!
Nor miss'd his eyes, when in sublimest strain
The angel's great narration he repeats
To Albion's sons high favour'd.) Thou shalt learn
Celestial lessons from his awful tongue;
And with soft grace and interwoven loves
(Grateful digression) all his words rehearse
To thy Charissa's ear, and charm her soul.
Thus with divine discourse, in shady bowers
Of Eden, our first father entertain'd
Eve his sole auditress; and deep dispute
With conjugal caresses on her lip
Solv'd easy, and abstrusest thoughts reveal'd.

Now the day wears apace, now Mitio comes
From his bright tutor, and finds out his mate.
Behold the dear associates seated low
On humble turf, with rose and myrtle strow'd;
But high their conference: how self-suffic'd
Lives their eternal Maker, girt around
With glories: arm'd with thunders; and his throne
Mortal access forbids, projecting far
Splendours unsufferable and radiant death.

With reverence and abasement deep they fall
Before his Sovereign Majesty, to pay
Due worship: Then his mercy on their souls
Smiles with a gentler ray, but sovereign still;
And leads their meditation and discourse
Long ages backward, and across the seas
To Bethlehem of Judah: There the Son,
The filial Godhead, character express
Of brightness inexpressible, laid by
His beamy robes, and made descent to earth:
Sprung from the sons of Adam he became
A second father, studious to regain
Lost paradise for men, and purchase heaven.

The lovers with endearment mutual thus
Promiscuous talk'd, and questions intricate
His manly judgment still resolv'd, and still Held her attention fix'd: she musing sat
On the sweet mention of incarnate love,
Till rapture wak'd her voice to softest strains.

"She sang the Infant God; (mysterious theme!)
"How vile his birth-place, and his cradle vile!
"The ox and ass his mean companions; there
"In habit vile the shepherds flock around,
"Saluting the great mother, and adore
"Israel's anointed King, the appointed heir
"Of the creation. How debas'd he lies
"Beneath his regal state; for thee, my Mitio,
"Debas'd in servile form; but angels stood
"Ministering round their charge with folded
"wings [hours

"Obsequious, though unseen; while lightsome
"Fulfill'd the day, and the gray evening rose.
"Then the fair guardians hovering o'er his head
"Wakeful all night, drive the foul spirits far,
"And with their fanning pinions purge the air
"From busy phantoms, from infectious damps,
"And impure taint; while their ambrosial plumes
"A dewy slumber on his senses shed.
"Alternate hymns the heavenly watchers sung
"Melodious, soothing the surrounding shades,
"And kept the darkness chaste and holy. Then
"Midnight was charm'd, and all her gazing eyes
"Wonder'd to see their mighty Maker sleep.
"Behold the glooms disperse, the rosy morn
"Smiles in the east with eye-lids opening fair,
"But not so fair as thine; O I could fold thee,
"My young Almighty, my Creator-Babe,
"For ever in these arms! For ever dwell
"Upon thy lovely form with gazing joy,
"And every pulse should beat seraphic love!
"Around my seat should crowding cherubs come
"With swift ambition, zealous to attend
"Their prince, and form a heaven below the sky.

"Forbear, Charissa, O forbear the thought
"Of female fondness, and forgive the man
"That interrupts such melting harmony!"
Thus Mitio; and awakes her nobler powers
To pay just worship to the sacred King,
Jesus, the God; nor with devotion pure
Mix the caresses of her softer sex; [aside
(Vain blandishment!) "Come, turn thine eyes
"From Bethlehem, and climb up the doleful steep
"Of bloody Calvary, where naked skulls
"Pave the sad road, and fright the traveller.
"Can my beloved bear to trace the feet
"Of her Redeemer panting up the hill
"Hard burden'd? Can thy heart attend his cross?"

"Nail'd to the cruel wood, he groans, he dies,
"For thee he dies. Beneath thy sins and mine
"(Horrible load!) the sinless Saviour groans,
"And in fierce anguish of his soul expires.
"Adoring angels pry with bending head
"Searching the deep contrivance, and admire
"This infinite design. Here peace is made
"Twixt God the Sovereign, and the rebel man:
"Here Satan overthrown with all his hosts
"In second ruin rages and despairs;
"Malice itself despairs. The captive prey
"Long held in slavery hopes a sweet release,
"And Adam's ruin'd offspring shall revive
"Thus ransom'd from the greedy jaws of death."

The fair disciple heard; her passions move
Harmonious to the great discourse, and breathe
Refin'd devotion: while new smiles of love
Repay her teacher. Both with bended knees
Read o'er the covenant of eternal life
Brought down to men; seal'd by the sacred Three
In heaven; and seal'd on earth with God's own blood.

Here they unite their names again, and sign
Those peaceful articles. (Hail, blest co-heirs
Celestial! Ye shall grow to manly age,
And, spite of earth and hell, in season due
Possess the fair inheritance above.)
With joyous admiration they survey
The gospel treasures infinite, unseen
By mortal eye, by mortal ear unheard,
And unconceiv'd by thought: Riches divine
And honours which the Almighty Father God
Pour'd with immense profusion on his Son,
High treasurer of heaven. The Son bestows
The life, the love, the blessing, and the joy
On bankrupt mortals who believe and love
His name. "Then, my Charissa, all is thine.
"And thine, my Mitio, the fair saint replies.
"Life, death, the world below, and worlds on high,
"And place, and time, are ours; and things to come,
"And past, and present; for our interest stands
"Firm in our mystic head, the title sure.
"Tis for our health and sweet refreshment, (while
"We sojourn strangers here) the fruitful earth
"Bears plenteous; and revolving seasons still
"Dress her vast globe in various ornament.
"For us this cheerful sun and cheerful light
"Diurnal shine. This blue expanse of sky
"Hangs a rich canopy above our heads,
"Covering our slumbers, all with stary gold
"Inwrought, when night alternates her return.
"For us time wears his wings out: Nature keeps
"Her wheels in motion: and her fabric stands.
"Glories beyond our ken of mortal fight
"Are now preparing, and a mansion fair
"Awaits us, where the saints unbody'd live.
"Spirits releas'd from clay, and purg'd from sin:
"Thither our hearts with most incessant wish
"Panting aspire; when shall that dearest hour
"Shine and release us hence, and bear us high,
"Bear us at once unsever'd to our better home?"

O blest connubial state! O happy pair,
Envy'd by yet unfociated souls
Who seek their faithful twins! Your pleasures rise
Sweet as the morn, advancing as the day,
Fervent as the glorious noon, serenely calm

As summer-evenings. The vile sons of earth
 Grovelling in dust with all their noisy jars
 Restless, shall interrupt your joys no more
 Than barking animals affright the moon
 Sublime, and riding in her midnight way.
 Friendship and love shall undistinguish'd reign
 O'er all your passions with unrivall'd sway
 Mutual and everlasting: Friendship knows
 No property in good, but all things common
 That each possesses, as the light or air
 In which we breathe and live: There's not one thought
 Can lurk in close reserve, no barriers fix'd,
 But every passage open as the day
 To one another's breast, and inmost mind.
 Thus by communion your delight shall grow,
 Thus streams of mingled bliss swell higher as they flow,
 Thus angels mix their flames, and more divinely
 glow.

THE THIRD PART:

OR THE ACCOUNT BALANCED.

SHOULD sovereign love before me stand,
 With all his train of pomp and state,
 And bid the daring muse relate
 His comforts and his cares;
 Mitio, I would not ask the sand
 For metaphors t' express their weight,
 Nor borrow numbers from the stars.
 Thy cares and comfort, sovereign love,
 Vastly out-weigh the sand below,
 And to a larger audit grow
 Than all the stars above.
 Thy mighty losses and thy gains
 Are their own mutual measures;
 Only the man that knows thy pains
 Can reckon up thy pleasures.
 Say Damon, say, how bright the scene,
 Damon is half-divinely blest,
 Leaning his head on his Florella's breast,
 Without a jealous thought, or busy care between:
 Then the sweet passions mix and share;
 Florella tells thee all her heart,
 Nor can thy soul's remotest part
 Conceal a thought or wish from the beloved fair.
 Say, what a pitch thy pleasures fly,
 When friendship all-sincere grows up to ecstasy,
 Nor self contracts the blest, nor vice pollutes the While thy dear offspring round thee sit, [joy.
 Or sporting innocently at thy feet
 Thy kindest thoughts engage:
 Those little images of thee,
 What pretty toys of youth they be,
 And growing props of age!
 But short is earthly bliss! The changing wind
 Blows from the sickly south, and brings
 Malignant fevers on its sultry wings,
 Relentless death sits close behind:
 Now gasping infants, and a wife in tears,
 With piercing groans salutes his ears,
 Through every vein the thrilling torments roll;
 While sweet and bitter are at strife
 In those dear miseries of life,
 Those tenderest pieces of his bleeding soul.

The pleasing sense of love awhile
 Mixt with the heart-ach may the pain beguile,
 And make a feeble fight:
 Till sorrows like a gloomy deluge rise,
 Then every smiling passion dies,
 And hope alone with wakeful eyes
 Darkling and solitary waits the slow-returning light.
 Here then let my ambition rest,
 May I be moderately blest
 When I the laws of love obey;
 Let but my pleasure and my pain
 In equal balance ever reign,
 Or mount by turns and sink again,
 And share just measures of alternate sway.
 So Damon lives, and ne'er complains;
 Scarce can we hope diviner scenes
 On this dull stage of clay:
 The tribes beneath the northern Bear
 Submit to darkness half the year,
 Since half the year is day.

ON THE

DEATH OF THE DUKE OF GLOUCESTER,

Just after Mr. Dryden. 1700

AN EPIGRAM.

DRYDEN is dead, Dryden alone could sing
 The full grown glories of a future king.
 Now Gloster dies: Thus lesser heroes live
 By that immortal breath that poets give;
 And scarce revive the muse: But William stands,
 Nor asks his honours from the poets hands,
 William shall shine without a Dryden's praise,
 His laurels are not grafted on the bays,

AN EPIGRAM OF MARTIAL TO CIRINUS.

"Sic tua, Cirini, promas Epigrammata vulgo
 "Ut mecum possis," &c.

INSCRIBED TO MR. JOSIAH NORTE.

*Lord Bishop of Kilmore * in Ireland. 1694.*

So smooth your numbers, friend, your verse so sweet,
 So sharp the jest, and yet the turn so neat,
 That with her martial Rome would place Cirine,
 Rome would prefer your sense and thought to mine.
 Yet modest you decline the public stage,
 To fix your friend alone amidst th' applauding age,
 So Maro did; the mighty Maro sings
 In vast heroic notes of vast heroic things,
 And leaves the ode to dance upon his Flaccus'
 strings.
 He scorn'd to daunt the dear Horatian lyre,
 Though his brave genius flash'd Pindaric fire,
 And at his will could silence all the lyric quire.
 So to his Varius he resign'd the praise
 Of the proud buskin and the tragic bays,
 When he could thunder with a loftier vein,
 And sing of gods and heroes in a bolder strain.

A handsome treat, a piece of gold, or so,
 And compliments will every friend bestow;

* Afterwards Archbishop of Tuam.

Rarely a Virgil, a Cirine we meet,
Who lays his laurels at inferior feet,
And yields the tenderest point of honour, wit.

EPISTOLA

FRATRI SUO DILECTO R. W. I. W. S. P. D.

RURSUM tuas, amandè, frater, accepi literas, eodem fortassè momento, quo meæ ad te pervenerunt; idemque qui te scribentem vidit dies, meum ad epistolare munus excitavit calamus; non inane est inter nos Fraternal Nomen, unicus enim spiritus nos intus animat, agitque, et concordet in ambobus efficit motus: O utinam crescat indies, et vigescat mutua charitas; faxit Deus, ut amor sui nostra incendat et defæcet pectora, tunc etenim et alternis puræ amicitiae flammis erga nos invicem divinum in modum ardebimus; Contemplemur Jesum nostrum, cœlestè illud et adorandum exemplar charitatis. Ille est,

Qui quondam æterno delapsus ab æthere vultus
Induit humanos, ut posset corpore nostras
(Heu miseras) sufferre vices; sponsoris obivit
Munia, et in sese Tabulæ maledicta Minacis
Transtulit, et sceleris pœnas hominisque reatum,

Ecce jacet desertus humi, diffusus in herbam
Integer, innocuas versus sua sidera palmas
Et placidum attollens vultum, nec ad oscula Patris

Pœnarum! O quid non mortalia pectora cogis
Durus amor? Quid non cœlestia?

At subsidat phantasia, vānescant imagines; nescio quo me proripuit amans Musa: Volui quatuor linias pedibus astringere, et ecce! numeri crescunt in immensum; dumque concitato genio laxavi fræna, vereor ne juvenilis impetus theologium læserit, et audax nimis imaginatio. Heri adlatâ est ad me epistola indicans matrem meliusculè se habere, licet ignis febrilis non prorsus defuerit mortale ejus domicilium. Sulces æquora cœrula
Pandas carbasa flatibus
Quæ tutò reditura sint.
Non te monstra natantia
Ponti carnivoræ incolæ
Prædentur rate naufragâ.
Navis, tu tibi creditum
Fratrem dimidium mei
Salvum fer per inhospitâ

Nec te sorbeat horrida

On the sight of some of her divine Poems, never printed. July 19. 1706.

ON the fair banks of gentle Thames
I tun'd my harp; nor did celestial themes
Refuse to dance upon my strings:
There beneath the evening sky
I sung my cares asleep, and rais'd my wishes high
To everlasting things.
Sudden from Albion's western coast
Harmonious notes come gliding by,
The neighbouring shepherds knew the silver sound;
" 'Tis Philomela's voice," the neighbouring shepherds cry;
At once my strings all silent lie,
At once my fainting muse was lost,
In the superior sweetness drown'd.
In vain I bid my tuneful powers unite;
My soul retir'd, and left my tongue,
I was all ear, and Philomela's song
Was all divine delight.

Now be my harp for ever dumb,
My muse attempt no more. 'Twas long ago

I bid adieu to mortal things,
To Grecian tales, and wars of Rome,
'Twas long ago I broke all but th' immortal strings:
Now those immortal strings have no employ,
Since a fair angel dwells below,
To tune the notes of heaven, and propagate the joy.
Let all my powers, with awe profound,
While Philomela sings,
Attend the rapture of the sound,
And my devotion rise on her seraphic wings.

STANZAS TO LADY SUNDERLAND,

AT TUNBRIDGE WELLS. 1712.

FAIR nymph, ascend to beauty's throne,
And rule that radiant world alone:
Let favourites take thy lower sphere,
Not monarchs are thy rival here.

The court of beauty, built sublime,
Defies all powers but thine and time:
Envy, that clouds the hero's sky,
Aims but in vain her flight so high.

Not Blenheim's field, nor Ister's flood,
Nor standards dy'd in Gallic blood,
Torn from the foe, add nobler grace
To Churchill's house, than Spencer's face.

The warlike thunder of his arms
Is more commanding than her charms;
His lightning strikes with less surprise
Than sudden glances from her eyes.

His captives feel their limbs confin'd
In iron; she enslaves the mind:
We follow with a pleasing pain,
And bless the conqueror and the chain.

The muse, that dares in numbers do
What paint and pencil never knew,
Faints at her presence in despair,
And owns th' inimitable fair.

BOOK III.

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF THE DEAD.

An Epitaph on King William III. of glorious memory.

Who died March 8th 1701.

BENEATH these honours of a tomb,
Greatness in humble ruin lies:
(How earth confines in narrow room
What heroes leave beneath the skies!)

Preserve, O venerable pile,
Inviolat thy sacred trust;
To thy cold arms the British isle,
Weeping, commits her richest dust.

Ye gentlest ministers of fate,
Attend the monarch as he lies,
And bid the softest slumbers wait
With silken cords to bind his eyes.

Z ij

Rest his dear sword beneath his head ;
Round him his faithful arms shall stand :
Fix his bright ensigns on his bed,
The guards and honours of our land.

Ye sister arts of paint and verse,
Place Albion fainting by his side,
Her groans arising o'er the herse,
And Belgia sinking when he dy'd.

High o'er the grave religion set
In solemn gold ; pronounce the ground
Sacred, to bar unhallow'd feet,
And plant her guardian virtues round.

Fair liberty in fables drest,
Write his lov'd name upon his urn,
" William, the scourge of tyrants past,
" And awe of princes yet unborn."

Sweet peace his sacred relics keep,
With olives blooming round her head,
And stretch her wings across the deep
To bless the nations with the shade.

Stand on the pile, immortal fame,
Broad stars adorn thy brightest robe,
Thy thousand voices sound his name
In silver accents round the globe.

Flattery shall faint beneath the sound,
While hoary truth inspires the song ;
Envy grow pale and bite the ground,
And slander gnaw her forked tongue.

Night and the grave remove your gloom ;
Darkness becomes the vulgar dead ;
But glory bids the royal tomb
Disdain the horrors of a shade.

Glory with all her lamps shall burn,
And watch the warrior's sleeping clay,
Till the last trumpet rouse his urn
To aid the triumphs of the day.

ON THE SUDDEN DEATH OF MRS. MARY PEACOCK.

An Elegiac song sent in a letter of Condolance to Mr. N. P. Merchant, at Amsterdam.

HARK ! She bids all her friends adieu ;
Some angel calls her to the spheres ;
Our eyes the radiant saint pursue
Through liquid telescopes of tears.

Farewell, bright soul, a short farewell,
Till we shall meet again above,
In the sweet groves where pleasures dwell,
And trees of life bear fruits of love :

There glory sits on every face,
There friendship smiles in every eye,
There shall our tongues relate the grace
That led us homeward to the sky.

O'er all the names of Christ our King
Shall our harmonious voices rove,
Our harps shall sound from every string
The wonders of his bleeding love.

Come, sovereign Lord, dear Saviour come,
Remove these separating days,
Send thy bright wheels to fetch us home ;
That golden hour, how long it stays !

How long must we lie lingering here,
While saints around us take their flight ?
Smiling, they quit this dusky sphere,
And mount the hills of heavenly light.

Sweet soul, we leave thee to thy rest,
Enjoy thy Jesus and thy God,
Till we, from bands of clay releas'd,
Spring out, and climb the shining road.

While the dear dust she leaves behind
Sleeps in thy bosom, sacred tomb !
Soft be her bed, her slumbers kind,
And all her dreams of joy to come.

TO THE REVEREND MR. JOHN SHOWER,

On the death of his Daughter Mrs. Anne Warner.

Reverend and dear Sir,

How great soever was my sense of your loss, yet I did not think myself fit to offer any lines of comfort: your own meditations can furnish you with many a delightful truth in the midst of so heavy a sorrow; for the covenant of grace has brightness enough in it to gild the most gloomy providence; and to that sweet covenant your soul is no stranger. My own thoughts were much impressed with the tidings of your daughter's death; and though I made many a reflection on the vanity of mankind in its best estate, yet I must acknowledge that my temper leads me most to the pleasant scenes of heaven, and that future world of blessedness. When I recollect the memory of my friends that are dead, I frequently rove into the world of spirits, and search them out there: Thus I endeavoured to trace Mrs. Warner; and these thoughts crowding fast upon me, I set them down for my own entertainment. The verse breaks off abruptly, because I had no design to write a finished elegy; and besides, when I was fallen upon the dark side of death, I had no mind to tarry there. If the lines I have written be so happy as to entertain you a little, and divert your grief, the time spent in composing them shall not be reckoned among my lost hours, and the rest will be more pleasing to

SIR,

Your affectionate humble servant, he

AN ELEGIAC THOUGHT

On Mrs. Ann Warner, who died of the Small-Pox, December 18. 1707, at One of the Clock in the Morning; a few Days after the Birth and Death of her first Child.

AWAKE, my muse, range the wide world of souls,
 And seek Vernera fled; With upward aim
 Direct thy wing; for she was born from heaven,
 Fulfill'd her visit, and return'd on high.

The midnight watch of angels, that patrol
 The British sky, have notic'd her ascent
 Near the meridian star; pursue the track
 To the bright confines of immortal day
 And paradise, her home. Say, my Urania,
 (For nothing escapes thy search, nor canst thou miss
 So fair a spirit) say, beneath what shade
 Of amaranth, or cheerful even-green,
 She sits, recounting to her kindred-minds
 Angelic or humane, her mortal toil
 And travels through this howling wilderness;
 By what divine protections she escap'd
 Those deadly snares when youth and Satan leagu'd
 In combination to assail her virtue
 (Snares set to murder souls); but heaven secur'd
 The favourite nymph, and taught her victory.

Or does she seek, or has she found her babe
 Amongst the infant-nation of the blest,
 And clasp'd it to her soul, to satiate there
 The young maternal passion, and absolve
 The unfulfill'd embrace? Thrice happy child!
 That saw the light, and turn'd its eyes aside
 From our dim regions to th' Eternal Sun,
 And led the parent's way to glory! There
 Thou art for ever hers, with powers enlarg'd
 For love reciprocal and sweet converse.

Behold her ancestors (a pious race)
 Rang'd in fair order, at her sight rejoice
 And sing her welcome. She along their seats
 Gliding salutes them all with honours due
 Such as are paid in heaven: And last she finds
 A mansion fashion'd of distinguish'd light,
 But vacant: "This" (with sure presage she cries)
 "Awaits my father; when will he arrive?"
 "How long, alas, how long!" (Then calls her mate)
 "Die, thou dear partner of my mortal cares,
 "Die, and partake my bliss; we are for ever one."

Ah me! where roves my fancy! What kind dreams
 Crowd with sweet violence on my waking mind!
 Perhaps illusions all! Inform me, muse,
 Chooses she rather to retire apart
 To recollect her dissipated powers,
 And call her thoughts her own: so lately freed
 From earth's vain scenes, gay visits, gratulations,
 From Hymen's hurrying and tumultuous joys,
 And fears and pangs, fierce pangs that wrought
 her death.

Is the great seal of heaven? What happy hour shall give thy thoughts a loose to soar and trace
The intellectual world? Divine delight?
Venera's lov'd employ!) Perhaps she sings
To some new golden harp th' Almighty deeds,
The names, the honours of her Saviour-God,
His cross, his grave, his victory, and his crown:
O could I imitate th' exalted notes,
And mortal ears could bear them!—

Or lies she now before th' eternal throne
Prostrate in humble form, with deep devotion
O'erwhelm'd, and self-abasement at the sight
Of the uncover'd Godhead face to face?
Seraphic crowns pay homage at his feet,
And hers amongst them, not of dimmer ore,
Nor set with meaner gems: But vain ambition,
And emulation vain, and fond conceit,
And pride for ever banish'd flies the place,
Curst pride, the dress of hell. Tell me, Urania,
How her joys heighten, and her golden hours
Circle in love. O stamp upon my soul
Some blissful image of the fair deceas'd
To call my passions and my eyes aside
From the dear breathless clay. Distressing sight!
I look, and mourn, and gaze with greedy view
Of melancholy fondness: Tears bedewing
That form so late desir'd, so late belov'd,
Now loathsome and unlovely. Base disease,
That leagu'd with nature's sharpest pains, and spoil'd

So sweet a structure! The impoisoning taint
O'erspreads the building wrought with skill divine,
And ruins the rich temple to the dust!

Was this the countenance, where the world ad-
Features of wit and virtue? This the face [mir'd Where love triumph'd? and beauty on these cheeks,

As on a throne, beneath her radiant eyes
Was seated to advantage; mild, serene,
Reflecting rosy light? So sits the sun
(Fair eye of heaven!) upon a crimson cloud
Near the horizon, and with gentle ray
Smiles lovely round the sky, till rising fogs,
Portending night, with foul and heavy wing
Involve the golden star, and sink him down
Opprest with darkness.—

ON THE DEATH OF AN AGED AND HO-
NOURED RELATIVE, MRS. M. W.

JULY 13, 1693.

I KNOW the kindred-mind. 'Tis she, 'tis she;
Among the heavenly forms I see
The kindred-mind from fleshy bondage free;
O how unlike a thing was lately seen
Groaning and panting on the bed,
With ghastly air, and languish'd head,
Life on this side, there the dead,
While the delaying flesh lay shivering between.

Long did the earthly house restrain
In toilsome slavery that ethereal guest;

Prison'd her round in walls of pain,
And twisted cramps and aches with her chain;
Till by the weight of numerous days opprest
The earthy house began to reel,
The pillars trembled, and the building fell;
The captive soul became her own again:
Tir'd with the sorrows and the cares,
A tedious train of fourscore years
The prisoner smil'd to be releas'd,
She felt her fetters loose, and mounted to her rest.

Gaze on, my soul, and let a perfect view
Paint her idea all anew;
Rase out those melancholy shapes of woe
That hang around the memory, and becloud it so.
Come fancy, come, with essences refin'd,
With youthful green, and spotless white;
Deep be the tincture, and the colours bright
T' express the beauties of a naked mind.
Provide no glooms to form a shade;
All things above of vary'd light are made,
Nor can the heavenly piece require a mortal aid.
But if the features too divine
Beyond the power of fancy shine, [shrine.
Conceal th' inimitable strokes behind a graceful
Describe the saint from head to feet,
Make all the lines in just proportion meet;

But let her posture be
Filling a chair of high degree;
Observe how near it stands to th' Almighty seat.
Paint the new graces of her eyes;
Fresh in her looks let sprightly youth arise,
And joys unknown below the skies.
Virtue, that lives conceal'd below,
And to the breast confin'd,
Sits here triumphant on the brow,
And breaks with radiant glories through.
The features of the mind
Express her passion still the same,
But more divinely sweet;
Love has an everlasting flame,
And makes the work complete.
The painter muse with glancing eye

A FUNERAL POEM ON THE DEATH OF
THOMAS GUNSTON, ESQ.

Presented to the Right Honourable the Lady Ab-ney, Lady Mayorefs of London. July 1701.

MADAM,

HAD I been a common mourner at the funeral of the dear gentleman deceased, I should have laboured after more of art in the following composition, to supply the defect of nature, and to feign a sorrow ; but the uncommon condescension of his friendship to me, the inward esteem I pay his memory, and the vast and tender sense I have of the loss, make all the methods of art needless, whilst natural grief supplies more than all.

I had resolved to lament in sighs and silence, and frequently checked the too forward muse : but the importunity was not to be resisted ; long lines of sorrow flowed in upon me ere I was aware, whilst I took many a solitary walk in the garden adjoining to his seat at Newington ; nor could I free myself from the crowd of melancholy ideas. Your ladyship will find throughout the poem, that the fair and unfinished building which he had just raised for himself, gave almost all the turns of mourning to my thoughts ; for I pursue no other topics of elegy than what my passion and my senses led me to.

The poem roves as my eyes and grief did, from one part of the fabric to the other : It rises from the foundation, salutes the walls, the doors, and the windows, drops a tear upon the roof, and climbs the turret, that pleasant retreat, where I promised myself many sweet hours of his conversation ; there my song wanders amongst the delightful subjects divine and moral, which used to entertain our happy leisure ; and thence descends to the fields and the shady walks, where I so often enjoyed his pleasing discourse ; my sorrows diffuse themselves there without a limit : I had quite forgotten all scheme and method of writing, till I correct myself, and rise to the turret again to lament that desolate seat. Now if the critics laugh at the folly of the muse for taking too much notice of the golden ball, let them consider that the meanest thing that belonged to so valuable a person still gave some fresh and doleful reflections : And I transcribe nature without rule, and represent friendship in a mourning dress, abandoned to deepest sorrow, and with a negligence becoming woe unfeigned.

Had I designed a complete elegy, Madam, on your dearest brother, and intended it for public view, I should have followed the usual forms of poetry, so far at least, as to spend some pages in the character and praises of the deceased, and thence have taken occasion to call mankind to complain aloud of the universal and unspeakable loss : But I wrote merely for myself as a friend of the dead, and to ease my full soul by breathing out my own complaints ; I knew his character and virtues so well, that there was no need to mention them while I talked only with myself ; for the image of them was ever present with me, which kept the pain at the heart intense and lively, and my tears flowing with my verse.

Perhaps your ladyship will expect some divine thoughts and sacred meditations, mingled with a subject so solemn as this is : Had I formed a design of offering it to your hands, I had composed a more Christian poem ; but it was grief purely natural for a death so surprising that drew all the strokes of it, and therefore my reflections are chiefly of a moral strain. Such as it is, your ladyship requires a copy of it ; but let it not touch your soul too tenderly, nor renew your own mournings. Receive it, Madam, as an offering of love and tears at the tomb of a departed friend, and let it abide with you as a witness of that affectionate respect and honour that I bore him ; all which, as your Ladyship's most rightful due, both by merit and by succession, is now humbly offered, by,

MADAM,

Your Ladyship's most hearty
and obedient servant,

I. WATTS.

TO THE DEAR MEMORY OF MY MUCH HONOURED
FRIEND,

THOMAS GUNSTON, ESQ.

Who died November 11. 1700, when he had just finished his Seat at Newington.

Of blasted hopes, and of short withering joys,
Sing, heavenly Muse. Try thine ethereal voice
In funeral numbers and a doleful song ;
Gunston the just, the generous, and the young,
Gunston the friend is dead. O empty name
Of earthly bliss ! 'tis all an airy dream,
All a vain thought ! Our soaring fancies rise
On treacherous wings ! and hopes that touch the skies

Drag but a longer ruin thro' the downward air,
And plunge the falling joy still deeper in despair.

How did our souls stand flatter'd and prepar'd
To shout him welcome to the seat he rear'd !
There the dear man should see his hopes complete,
Smiling, and tasting every lawful sweet [years
That peace and plenty brings, while numerous
Circling delightful play'd around the spheres :
Revolving suns should still renew his strength,
And draw the uncommon thread to an unusual
length :

But hasty fate thrusts her dread sheers between,
Cuts the young life off, and shuts up the scene.
Thus airy pleasure dances in our eyes,
And spreads false images in fair disguise,
T' allure our souls, till just within our arms
The vision dies, and all the painted charms
Flee quick away from the pursuing sight, [night.
Till they are lost in shades, and mingle with the

Muse, stretch thy wings, and thy sad journey
To the fair fabric that thy dying friend [bend

Built nameless: 'twill suggest a thousand things
Mournful and soft as my Urania sings.

How did he lay the deep foundations strong,
Marking the bounds, and rear the walls along
Solid and lasting; there a numerous train
Of happy Gunstons might in pleasure reign,
While nations perish, and long ages run,
Nations unborn, and ages unbegun:
Not time itself should waste the blest estate,
Nor the tenth race rebuild the ancient seat.
How fond our fancies are! The founder dies
Childless; his sisters weep and close his eyes,
And wait upon his herse with never-ceasing
cries.

Lofty and slow it moves to meet the tomb,
While weighty sorrows nod on every plume;
A thousand groans his dear remains convey,
To his cold lodging in a bed of clay,
His country's sacred tears well-watering all the way.

See the dull wheels roll on the fable road;
But no dear son to tread the mournful load,
And fondly kind drop his young sorrows there,
The father's urn bedewing with a filial tear.
O had he left us one behind, to play
Wanton about the painted hall, and say,
"This was my father's," with impatient joy
In my fond arms I'd clasp the smiling boy,
And call him my young friend: but awful fate
Design'd the mighty stroke as lasting as 'twas great.

And must this building then, this costly frame,
Stand here for strangers! Must some unknown
name

Possess these rooms, the labours of my friend?
Why were these walls rais'd for this hapless end?
Why these apartments all adorn'd so gay?
Why his rich fancy lavish'd thus away?
Muse, view the paintings, how the hovering light
Plays o'er the colours in a wanton flight,
And mingled shades wrought in by soft degrees,
Give a sweet soil to all the charming piece;
But night, eternal night, hangs black around
The dismal chambers of the hollow ground,
And solid shades unmingled round his bed
Stand hideous: Earthy fogs embrace his head,
And noisome vapours glide along his face
Rising perpetual. Muse, forsake the place,
Flee the raw-damps of the unwholesome clay,
Look to his airy spacious hall, and say,
"How has he chang'd it for a lonesome cave,
Confin'd and crowded in a narrow grave!"

Th' unhappy house looks desolate and mourns,
And every door groans doleful as it turns;
The pillars languish; and each lofty wall
Stately in grief, laments the master's fall,
In drops of briny dew; the fabric bears
His faint resemblance, and renews my tears.
Solid and square it rises from below:
A noble air without a gaudy show
Reigns through the model, and adorns the whole,
Manly and plain. Such was the builder's soul.

O how I love to view the stately frame,
That dear memorial of the best lov'd name!
Then could I wish for some prodigious cave
Vast as his seat, and silent as his grave,

Where the tall shades stretch to the hideous roof
Forbid the day, and guard the sun-beams off;
Thither, my willing feet, should ye be drawn
At the gray twilight, and the early dawn.
There sweetly sad should my soft minutes roll,
Numbering the sorrows of my drooping soul.
But these are airy thoughts! substantial grief
Grows by those objects that should yield relief;
Fond of my woes, I heave my eyes around,
My grief from every prospect courts a wound;
Views the green gardens, views the smiling skies,
Still my heart sinks, and still my cares arise;
My wandering feet round the fair mansion rove,
And there to soothe my sorrows I indulge my loves

Oft have I laid the awful Calvin by,
And the sweet Cowley, with impatient eye
To see those walls, pay the sad visit there,
And drop the tribute of an hourly tear:
Still I behold some melancholy scene,
With many a pensive thought, and many a sigh between.

Two days ago we took the evening air,
I, and my grief, and my Urania, there;
Say, my Urania, how the western sun
Broke from black clouds, and in full glory shone,
Gilding the roof, then dropt into the sea, [day;
And sudden night devour'd the sweet remains of
Thus the bright youth just rear'd his shining head
From obscure shades of life, and sunk among the dead.

The rising sun adorn'd with all his light
Smiles on these walls again: but endless night
Reigns uncontroll'd where the dear Gunston lies;
He's set for ever, and must never rise.
Then why these beams, unseasonable star,
These lightsome smiles descending from afar,
To greet a mourning house? In vain the day
Breaks through the windows with a joyful ray,
And marks a shining path along the floors
Bounding the evening and the morning hours;
In vain it bounds them: while vast emptiness
And hollow silence reigns through all the place,
Nor heeds the cheerful change of nature's face.
Yet nature's wheels will on without control,
The sun will rise, the tuneful spheres will roll,
And the two mighty Bears walk round and watch the pole.

See while I speak, high on her fable wheel
Old night advancing climbs the eastern hill:
Troops of dark clouds prepare her way; behold,
How their brown pinions edg'd with evening gold
Spread shadowing o'er the house, and glide away,
Slowly pursuing the declining day;
O'er the broad roof they fly their circuit still,
Thus days before they did, and days to come they will;

But the black cloud that shadows o'er his eyes,
Hangs there unmoveable, and never flies:
Fain would I bid the envious gloom be gone;
Ah fruitless wish! how are his curtains drawn
For a long evening that despairs the dawn!

Muse, view the turret: just beneath the skies
Lonesome it stands, and fixes my sad eyes,
As it would ask a tear. O sacred seat
Sacred to friendship! O divine retreat!

Here did I hope my happy hours t' employ,
And fed before-hand on the promis'd joy,
When weary of the noisy town, my friend
From mortal cares retiring, should ascend
And lead me thither. We alone would sit
Free and secure of all intruding feet:
Our thoughts would stretch their longest wings,
and rise,

Nor bound their soarings by the lower skies:
Our tongues should aim at everlasting themes,
And speak what mortals dare, of all the names
Of boundless joys and glories, thrones and seats
Built high in heaven for souls: We'd trace the streets

Of golden pavement, walk each blissful field,
And climb and taste the fruits the spicy mountains yield;

Then would we swear to keep the sacred road,
And walk right upwards to that blest abode:
We'd charge our parting spirits there to meet,
There hand in hand approach th' Almighty feat, [feet.]

And bend our heads adoring at our Maker's
Thus should we mount on bold adventurous wings
In high discourse, and dwell on heavenly things,
While the pleas'd hours in sweet succession
move,
And minutes measur'd, as they are above,
By ever-circling joys, and ever-shining love.

Anon our thoughts should lower their lofty
flight,

Sink by degrees, and take a pleasing sight,
A large round prospect of the spreading plain,
The wealthy river, and his winding train,
The smoky city, and the busy men.

How we should smile to see degenerate worms
Lavish their lives, and fight for airy forms
Of painted honours, dreams of empty sound
Till envy rise, and shoot a second wound
At swelling glory, strait the bubble breaks,
And the scenes vanish, as the man awakes;
Then the tall titles insolent and proud
Sink to the dust, and mingle with the crowd.

Man is a restless thing: Still vain and wild
Lives beyond fixity, nor outgrows the child:
His hurrying lusts still break the sacred bound
To seek new pleasures on forbidden ground,
And buy them all too dear. Unthinking fool,
For a short dying joy to sell a deathless soul!
'Tis but a grain of sweetness they can sow,
And reap the long sad harvest of immortal woe.

Another tribe toil in a different strife,
And banish all the lawful sweets of life,
To sweat and dig for gold, to hoard the ore,
Hide the dear dust yet darker than before,
And never dare to use a grain of all the store.

Happy the man that knows the value just
Of earthly things, nor is enslav'd to dust.
'Tis a rich gift the skies but rarely send
To favourite souls. Then happy thou, my friend,
For thou hadst learnt to manage and command
The wealth that heaven bestow'd with liberal
hand:

Hence this fair structure rose; and hence this seat
Made to invite my not unwilling feet:
In vain 'twas made! for we shall never meet,
And smile, and love, and bless each other here;
The envious tomb forbids thy face t' appear,
Detains thee, Gunston, from my longing eyes,
And all my hopes lie bury'd, where my Gunston lies.

Come hither, all ye tenderest souls, that know
The heights of fondness, and the depths of woe,
Young mothers, who your darling babes have found

Untimely murder'd with a ghastly wound;
Ye frightened nymphs, who on the bridal bed
Clasp'd in your arms your lovers cold and dead,
Come; in the pomp of all your wild despair,
With flowing eye-lids, and disorder'd hair,
Death in your looks; come, mingle grief with me,
And drown your little streams in my unbound-
ed sea.

You sacred mourners of a nobler mould,
Born for a friend, whose dear embraces hold
Beyond all nature's ties; you that have known
Two happy souls made intimately one,
And felt a parting stroke: 'Tis you must tell
The smart, the twinges, and the racks I feel:
This soul of mine that dreadful wound has borne,
Off from its side its dearest half is torn,
The rest lies bleeding, and but lives to mourn.
Oh infinite distress! such raging grief
Should command pity, and despair relief.
Passion, methinks, should rise from all my groans,
Give sense to rocks, and sympathy to stones.

Ye dusky woods and echoing hills around,
Repeat my cries with a perpetual sound:
Be all ye flowery vales with thorns o'ergrown;
Assist my sorrows and declare your own;
Alas! your lord is dead. The humble plain
Must ne'er receive his courteous feet again:
Mourn, ye gay smiling meadows, and be seen
In wintery robes, instead of youthful green;
And bid the brook that still runs warbling by,
Move silent on, and weep his useless channel dry.

Hither methinks the lowing herd should come,
And moaning turtles murmur o'er his tomb:
The oak shall wither, and the curling vine
Weep his young life out, while his arms untwine
Their amorous folds, and mix his bleeding soul with mine.

Ye stately elms, in your long order mourn *;
Strip off your pride to dress your master's urn:
Here gently drop your leaves instead of tears:
Ye elms, the reverend growth of ancient years,
Stand tall and naked to the blustering rage
Of the mad winds; thus it becomes your age
To show your sorrows. Often ye have seen
Our heads reclin'd upon the rising green;
Beneath your sacred shade diffus'd we lay,
Here friendship reign'd with an unbounded sway:

* There was a long row of tall elms then standing where some years after the lower garden was made.

Hither our souls their constant offerings brought,
The burthens of the breast, and labours of the
thought;

Our opening bosoms on the conscious ground
Spread all the sorrows and the joys we found,
And mingled every care; nor was it known
Which of the pains and pleasures were our own;
Then with an equal hand and honest soul
We share the heap, yet both possess the whole,
And all the passions there through both our bo-
soms roll,

By turns we comfort, and by turns complain,
And bear and ease by turns the sympathy of pain.

Friendship! mysterious thing, what magic powers

Support thy sway, and charm these minds of ours?
Bound to thy foot we boast our birth-right still,
And dream of freedom, when we've lost our will,
And chang'd away our souls: At thy command,
We snatch new miseries from a foreign hand,
To call them ours; and, thoughtless of our ease,
Plague the dear self that we were born to please.
Thou tyranness of minds, whose cruel throne
Heap on poor mortals sorrows not their own;
As though our mother nature could no more
Find woes sufficient for each son she bore,
Friendship divides the shares, and lengthens out the store.

Yet we are fond of thine imperious reign,
Proud of thy slavery, wanton in our pain,
And chide the courteous hand when death dissolves the chain.

Virtue, forgive the thought! the raving muse
Wild and despairing knows not what she does,
Grows mad in grief, and in her savage hours
Affronts the name she loves and she adores.
She is thy votarefs too; and at thy shrine,
O sacred friendship, offer'd songs divine,
While Gunston liv'd, and both our souls were thine.

Here to these shades at solemn hours we came,
To pay devotion with a mutual flame,
Partners in bliss. Sweet luxury of the mind!
And sweet the aids of sense! Each ruder wind
Slept in its caverns, while an evening breeze
Fann'd the leaves gently, sporting through the trees:

The linnet and the lark their vespers sung,
And clouds of crimson o'er th' horizon hung;
The slow-declining sun with sloping wheels
Sunk down the golden day behind the western hills.

Mourn, ye gardens, ye unfinish'd gates,
Ye green enclosures, and ye growing sweets,
Lament; for ye our midnight hours have known,
And watch'd us walking by the silent moon
In conference divine, while heavenly fire
Kindling our breasts did all our thoughts inspire
With joys almost immortal; then our zeal
Blaz'd and burnt high to reach th' ethereal hill,
And love refin'd, like that above the poles,
Threw both our arms round one another's souls
In rapture, and embraces. Oh forbear,
Forbear my song! this is too much to hear,
Too dreadful to repeat; such joys as these
Fled from the earth for ever!

Oh for a general grief! let all things share
Our woes, that knew our loves: The neighbouring air

Let it be laden with immortal sighs,
And tell the gales, that every breath that flies
Over these fields should murmur and complain,
And kiss the fading grass, and propagate the pain.
Weep all ye buildings, and the groves around
For ever weep: this is an endless wound,
Vast and incurable. Ye buildings knew
His silver tongue, ye groves have heard it too:
At that dear sound no more shall ye rejoice,
And I no more must hear the charming voice:
Woe to my drooping soul! that heavenly breath,
That could speak life, lies now congeal'd in death;
While on his folded lips all cold and pale
Eternal chains and heavy silence dwell.

Yet my fond hope would hear him speak again,
Once more at least, once more, and then
Gunston aloud I call: In vain I cry
Gunston aloud; for he must ne'er reply.
In vain I mourn, and drop these funeral tears,
Death and the grave have neither eyes nor ears:
Wandering I tune my sorrows to the groves,
And vent my swelling griefs, and tell the winds
our loves; [not:
While the dear youth sleeps fast, and hears them
He hath forgot me: In the lonesome vault
Mindless of Watts and friendship, cold he lies
Deaf and unthinking clay.—

But whither am I led? This artless grief
Hurries the muse on, obstinate and deaf
To all the nicer rules, and bears her down
From the tall fabric to the neighbouring ground:
The pleasing hours, the happy moments past
In these sweet fields reviving on my taste
Snatch me away resistless with impetuous haste.
Spread thy strong pinions once again, my song,
And reach the turret thou hast left so long:
O'er the wide roof its lofty head it rears,
Long waiting our converse; but only hears
The noisy tumults of the realms on high;
The winds salute it whistling as they fly,
Or jarring round the windows; rattling showers
Lash the fair sides; above, loud thunder roars;
But still the master sleeps; nor hears the voice
Of sacred friendship, nor the tempest's noise:
An iron slumber sits on every sense,
In vain the heavenly thunders strive to rouse it thence.

One labour more, my muse, the golden sphere
Seems to demand: See through the dusky air
Downward it shines upon the rising moon;
And, as she labours up to reach her noon,
Pursues her orb with repercussive light,
And streaming gold repays the paler beams of
night:

But not one ray can reach the darksome grave,
Or pierce the solid gloom that fills the cave
Where Gunston dwells in death. Behold it flames
Like some new meteor with diffusive beams
Through the mid-heaven, and overcomes the stars;

"So shines thy Gunston's soul above the spheres,"
Raphael replies, and wipes away my tears.

" We saw the flesh sink down with closing eyes,
 " We heard thy grief shriek out, He dies, He dies,
 " Mistaken grief! to call the flesh the friend!
 " On our fair wings did the bright youth ascend,
 " All heaven embrac'd him with immortal love,
 " And sung his welcome to the courts above.
 " Gentle Ithuriel led him round the skies,
 " The buildings struck him with immense surprise;
 " The spires all radiant, and the mansions bright,
 " The roof high-vaulted with ethereal light:
 " Beauty and strength on the tall bulwarks fate
 " In heavenly diamond; and for every gate
 " On golden hinges a broad ruby turns,
 " Guards off the foe, and as it moves it burns;
 " Millions of glories reign through every part;
 " Infinite power, and uncreated art,
 " Stand here display'd, and to the stranger show
 " How it out-shines the noblest seats below.
 " The stranger fed his gazing powers awhile
 " Transported: Then, with a regardless smile,
 " Glanc'd his eye downward through the crystal
 " floor,
 " And took eternal leave of what he built before."

Now, fair Urania, leave the doleful strain;
 Raphael commands: Assume thy joys again.
 In everlasting numbers sing, and say,
 " Gunston has mov'd his dwelling to the realms
 " of day; [groans away.]
 " Gunston the friend lives still: And give thy

AN ELEGY ON MR. THOMAS GOUGE.

TO MR. ARTHUR SHALLET, MERCHANT.

Worthy Sir,

THE subject of the following elegy was high in your esteem, and enjoyed a large share of your affections. Scarce doth his memory need the assistance of the muse to make it perpetual; but when she can at once pay her honours to the venerable dead, and by this address acknowledge the favours she has received from the living, it is a double pleasure to,

Sir,
 Your obliged humble servant,
 I. WATTS.

TO THE MEMORY OF

THE REVEREND MR. THOMAS GOUGE,

Who died Jan. 8th. 1699-1700.

YE virgin souls, whose sweet complaint
 Could teach Euphrates * not to flow,
 Could Sion's ruin so divinely paint,
 Array'd in beauty and in woe:
 Awake, ye virgin souls, to mourn,
 And with your tuneful sorrows dress a prophet's urn.

O could my lips or flowing eyes
 But imitate such charming grief,
 I'd teach the seas, and teach the skies,
 Wailings, and sobs, and sympathies,
 Nor should the stones or rocks be deaf;

* Psal. 137. Lament. i. 2. 3.

Rocks shall have eyes, and stones have ears,
 While Gouge's death is mourn'd in melody and tears.

Heaven was impatient of our crimes,
 And sent his minister of death
 To scourge the bold rebellion of the times,
 And to demand our prophet's breath;
 He came commission'd for the fates
 Of awful Mead, and charming Bates;
 There he essay'd the vengeance first,
 Then took a dismal aim, and brought great Gouge to dust.

Great Gouge to dust! how doleful is the sound!
 How vast the stroke is! and how wide the wound!
 Oh painful stroke! distressing death!
 A wound unmeasurably wide
 No vulgar mortal dy'd
 When he resign'd his breath.

The muse that mourns a nation's fall,
 Should wait at Gouge's funeral,
 Should mingle majesty and groans,
 Such as she sings to sinking thrones,
 And in deep founding numbers tell,
 How Sion trembled, when this pillar fell.
 Sion grows weak, and England poor,
 Nature herself, with all her store,
 Can furnish such a pomp for death no more.

The reverend man let all things mourn;
 Sure he was some ethereal mind,
 Fated in flesh to be confin'd,
 And order'd to be born.

His soul was of th' angelic frame,
 The same ingredients, and the mould the same,
 When the Creator makes a minister of flame,
 He was all form'd of heavenly things,
 Mortals, believe what my Urania sings,
 For she has seen him rise upon his flaming wings.

How would he mount, how would he fly
 Up through the ocean of the sky,
 Tow'rd the celestial coast!
 With what amazing swiftness soar
 Till earth's dark ball was seen no more,
 And all its mountains lost!
 Scarce could the muse pursue him with her sight:
 But, angels, you can tell,
 For oft you meet his wondrous flight,
 And knew the stranger well;
 Say, how he past the radiant spheres.
 And visited your happy seats,
 And trac'd the well-known turnings of the golden
 And walk'd among the stars. [streets]

Tell how he climb'd the everlasting hills
 Surveying all the realms above,
 Borne on a strong-wing'd faith, and on the fiery
 Of an immortal love. [wheels]
 'Twas there he took a glorious sight
 Of the inheritance of saints in light,
 And read their title in their Saviour's right.
 How oft the humble scholar came,
 And to your songs he rais'd his ears
 To learn th' unutterable name,
 To view th' eternal base that bears,
 The new creation's frame.
 The countenance of God he saw,
 Full of mercy: full of awe,

The glories of his power, and glories of his grace:
There he beheld the wondrous springs
Of those celestial sacred things,
The peaceful gospel, and the fiery law
In that majestic face.

That face did all his gazing powers employ,
With most profound abasement and exalted joy,
The rolls of fate were half unseal'd,
He stood adoring by;
The volume open'd to his eye,
And sweet intelligence he held
With all his shining kindred of the sky.

Ye seraphs that surround the throne,
Tell how his name was through the palace known,
How warm his zeal was, and how like your own:
Speak it aloud, let half the nation hear,

And bold blasphemers shrink and fear †:
Impudent tongues! to blast a prophet's name!
The poison sure was fetch'd from hell,
Where the old blasphemers dwell,
To taint the purest dust, and blot the whitest fame! [through,

Impudent tongues! You should be darted
Nail'd to your own black mouths, and lie
Useless and dead till slander die,
Till slander die with you.

"We saw him, said th' ethereal throng,

"We saw his warm devotions rise,

"We heard the fervour of his cries,

"And mix'd his praises with our song:

"We knew the secret flights of his retiring hours,

"Nightly he wak'd his inward powers,

"Young Israel rose to wrestle with his God,

"And with unconquer'd force scal'd the celestial
"towers,

"To reach the blessing down for those that sought
"his blood.

"Oft we beheld the thunderer's hand

"Rais'd high to crush the factious foe;

"As oft we saw the rolling vengeance stand

"Doubtful t' obey the dread command,

"While his ascending prayer upheld the falling
"blow."

Draw the past scenes of thy delight,
My muse, and bring the wondrous man to fight.

Place him surrounded as he stood

With pious crowds, while from his tongue

A stream of harmony ran soft along,

And every ear drank in the flowing good:

Softly it ran its silver way,

Till warm devotion rais'd the current strong:

Then fervid zeal on the sweet deluge rode,

Life, love and glory, grace and joy,

Divinely roll'd promiscuous on the torrent-flood,

And bore our raptur'd sense away, and thoughts and souls to God.

O might we dwell for ever there!

No more return to breathe this grosser air,

This atmosphere of sin, calamity, and care.

But heavenly scenes soon leave the sight

While we belong to clay,

Passions of terror and delight,

Demand alternate sway.

† Though he was so great and good a man, he did not escape censure.

Behold the man, whose awful voice

Could well proclaim the fiery law,

Kindle the flames that Moses saw,

And swell the trumpet's warlike noise.

He stands the herald of the threatening skies,

Lo, on his reverend brow the frowns divinely rise,

All Sinai's thunder on his tongue, and lightning

in his eyes.

Round the high roof the curses flew

Distinguishing each guilty head,

Far from th' unequal war the atheist fled,

His kindled arrows still pursue,

His arrows strike the atheist through,

And o'er his inmost powers a shuddering horror
spread.

The marble heart groans with an inward wound;

Blaspheming souls of harden'd steel

Shriek out amaz'd at the new pangs they feel,

And dread the echoes of the sound.

The lofty wretch arm'd and array'd

In gaudy pride sinks down his impious head,

Plunges in dark despair, and mingles with the dead.

Now, muse, assume a softer strain,

Now soothe the sinner's raging smart,

Borrow of Gouge the wondrous art

To calm the surging conscience, and assuage the

He from a bleeding God derives [pain;

Life for the souls that guilt had slain,

And strait the dying rebel lives,

The dead arise again;

The opening skies almost obey

His powerful song; a heavenly ray [day,

Awakes despair to light, and sheds a cheerful

His wondrous voice rolls back the spheres,

Recalls the scenes of ancient years,

To make the Saviour known;

Sweetly the flying charmer roves

Through all his labours and his loves,

The anguish of his cross, and triumphs of his throne.

Come, he invites our feet to try

The steep ascent of Calvary,

And sets the fatal tree before our eye:

See here celestial sorrow reigns;

Rude nails and ragged thorns lay by,

Ting'd with the crimson of redeeming veins.

In wondrous words he sung the vital flood

Where all our sins were drown'd,

Words fit to heal and fit to wound,

Sharp as the spear, and balmy as the blood.

In his discourse divine

Afresh the purple fountain flow'd;

Our falling tears kept sympathetic time,

And trickled to the ground,

While every accent gave a doleful sound,

Sad as the breaking heart-strings of th' expiring
God.

Down to the mansions of the dead,

With trembling joy our souls are led,

The captives of his tongue;

There the dear prince of light reclines his head

Darkness and shades among.

With pleasing horror we survey

The caverns of the tomb,

Where the belov'd Redeemer lay,

And shed a sweet perfume.

Mark, the old earthquake roars again
In Gouge's voice, and breaks the chain
Of heavy death, and rends the tombs:
The rising God! he comes, he comes, [train.
With throngs of waking faints, a long triumphing
See the bright squadrons of the sky,
Downward on wings of joy and haste they fly,
Meet their returning sovereign, and attend him
A shining car the conqueror fills, [high.
Form'd of a golden cloud;
Slowly the pomp moves up the azure hills,
Old Satan foams and yells aloud, [the wheels.
And gnaws th' eternal brass that binds him to
The opening gates of bliss receive their king,
The Father-God smiles on his Son,
Pays him the honours he has won,
The lofty thrones adore, and little cherubs sing.
Behold him on his native throne,
Glory sits fast upon his head;
Dress'd in new light, and beamy robes,
His hand rolls on the seasons, and the shining globes, [dead.
And sways the living worlds, and regions of the
Gouge was his envoy to the realms below,
Vast was his trust, and great his skill,
Bright the credentials he could show,
And thousands own'd the seal,
His hallow'd lips could well impart
The grace, the promise, and command:
He knew the pity of Immanuel's heart,
And terrors of Jehovah's hand.
How did our souls start out, to hear
The embassies of love he bare,

While every ear in rapture hung
Upon the charming wonders of his tongue!
Life's busy cares a sacred silence bound,
Attention stood with all her powers,
With fixed eyes and awe profound,
Chain'd to the pleasure of the sound,
Nor knew the flying hours.
But O my everlasting grief!
Heaven has recall'd his envoy from our eyes,
Hence deluges of sorrow rise,
Nor hope th' impossible relief.
Ye remnants of the sacred tribe
Who feel the loss, come share the smart,
And mix your groans with mine:
Where is the tongue that can describe
Infinite things with equal art,
Or language so divine?
Our passions want the heavenly flame,
Almighty Love breathes faintly in our songs,
And awful threatenings languish on our tongues;
Howe is a great but single name:
Amidst the crowd he stands alone:
Stands yet, but with his starry pinions on,
Dress'd for the flight, and ready to be gone.
Eternal God, command his stay,
Stretch the dear months of his delay;
O we could wish his age were one immortal day!
But when the flaming chariot's come,
And shining guards, t' attend thy prophet home,
Amidst a thousand weeping eyes,
Send an Elisha down, a soul of equal size,
Or burn this worthless globe, and take us to the skies.

DIVINE SONGS FOR CHILDREN.

P R E F A C E.

TO ALL THAT ARE CONCERNED IN THE EDUCATION OF CHILDREN.

MY FRIENDS,

It is an awful and important charge that is committed to you. The wisdom and welfare of the succeeding generation are intrusted with you beforehand, and depend much on your conduct. The seeds of misery or happiness in this world, and what to come, are oftentimes sown very early; and therefore, whatever may conduce to give the minds of children a relish for virtue and religion, ought, in the first place, to be proposed to you.

Verse was at first designed for the service of God, though it hath been wretchedly abused since. The ancients, among the Jews and the Heathens, taught their children and disciples the precepts of morality and worship in verse. The children of Israel were commanded to learn the words of the song of Moses, Deut. xxxi. 19, 30, and we are directed in the New Testament, not only to sing "with grace" in the heart, but to teach and admonish one another by hymns and songs," Ephes. v. 19. And there are these four advantages in it.

I. There is a great delight in the very learning of truths and duties this way. There is something so amusing and entertaining in rhymes and metre, that will incline children to make this part of their business a diversion. And you may turn their very duty into a reward, by giving them the privilege of learning one of these songs every week, if they fulfil the business of the week well, and promising them the book itself, when they have learnt ten or twenty songs out of it.

II. What is learnt in verse, is longer retained in memory, and sooner recollected. The like sounds, and the like number of syllables, exceedingly assist the remembrance. And it may often happen, that the end of a song running in the mind, may be an effectual means to keep off some temptations, or to incline to some duty, when a word of scripture is not upon their thoughts.

III. This will be a constant furniture for the minds of children, that they may have something to think upon when alone, and sing over to themselves. This may sometimes give their thoughts a divine turn, and raise a young meditation. Thus they will not be forced to seek relief for an emptiness of mind, out of the loose and dangerous sonnets of the age.

IV. These Divine Songs may be a pleasant and proper matter for their daily or weekly worship, to sing one in the family, at such time as the parents or governors shall appoint; and therefore I have confined the verse to the most usual psalm tunes.

The greatest part of this little book was composed several years ago, at the request of a friend; who has been long engaged in the work of catechising a very great number of children of all kinds, and with abundant skill and success. So that you will find here nothing that favours of a party: The children of high and low degree, of the church of England or Dissenters, baptised in infancy, or not, may all join together in these songs. And as I have endeavoured to sink the language to the level of a child's understanding, and yet to keep it, if possible, above contempt; so I have designed to profit all, if possible, and offend none. I hope the more general the sense is, these compositions may be of the more universal use and service.

I have added at the end, some attempts of sonnets on moral subjects, for children, with an air of pleasantry, to provoke some sifter pen to write a little book of them.

May the Almighty God make you faithful in this important work of education; may he succeed your cares with his abundant grace, that the rising generation of Great Britain may be a glory among the nations, a pattern to the Christian world, and a blessing to the earth.

SONG I.

A GENERAL SONG OF PRAISE TO GOD.

How glorious is our heavenly King,
Who reigns above the sky!
How shall a child presume to sing
His dreadful majesty?

How great his power is, none can tell,
Nor think how large his grace;
Not men below, nor saints that dwell
On high before his face.

Not angels that stand round the Lord,
Can search his secret will;
But they perform his heavenly word,
And sing his praises still.

Then let me join this holy train,
And my first offerings bring;
Th' eternal God will not disdain
To hear an infant sing.

My heart resolves, my tongue obeys,
And angels shall rejoice,
To hear their mighty Maker's praise
Sound from a feeble voice.

SONG II.

PRAISE FOR CREATION AND PROVIDENCE.

I sing th' almighty power of God,
That made the mountains rise,

That spread the flowing seas abroad,
And built the lofty skies.

I sing the wisdom that ordain'd
The sun to rule the day;
The moon shines full at his command,
And all the stars obey.

I sing the goodness of the Lord,
That fill'd the earth with food:
He form'd the creatures with his word,
And then pronounc'd them good.

Lord, how thy wonders are display'd,
Where'er I turn mine eye!
If I survey the ground I tread,
Or gaze upon the sky!

There's not a plant or flower below,
But makes thy glory known;
And clouds arise, and tempests blow,
By order from thy throne.

Creatures (as numerous as they be)
Are subject to thy care;
There's not a place where we can flee
But God is present there.

In heaven he shines with beams of love,
With wrath in hell beneath!
'Tis on his earth I stand or move,
And 'tis his air I breathe.

His hand is my perpetual guard;
He keeps me with his eye;
Why should I then forget the Lord,
Who is for ever nigh?

SONG III.

PRAISE TO GOD FOR OUR REDEMPTION.

Blest be the wisdom and the power,
The justice and the grace,
That join'd in counsel to restore,
And save our ruin'd race.

Our father ate forbidden fruit,
And from his glory fell;
And we his children thus were brought
To death, and near to hell.

Blest be the Lord that sent his Son
To take our flesh and blood;
He for our lives gave up his own,
To make our peace with God.

He honour'd all his Father's laws,
Which we have disobey'd;
He bore our sins upon the cross,
And our full ransom paid.

Behold him rising from the grave;
Behold him rais'd on high;
He pleads his merit, there to save
Transgressors doom'd to die.

There on a glorious throne he reigns,
And by his power divine
Redeems us from the slavish chains
Of Satan and of Sin.

Thence shall the Lord to judgment come,
And with a sovereign voice
Shall call, and break up every tomb,
While waking saints rejoice.

O may I then with joy appear
Before the Judge's face,
And with the blest'd assembly there
Sing his redeeming grace!

SONG IV.

PRAISE FOR MERCIES SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL.

WHENE'ER I take my walks abroad,
How many poor I see!
What shall I render to my God
For all his gifts to me?

Not more than others I deserve,
Yet God has given me more;
For I have food, while others starve,
Or beg from door to door.

How many children in the street
Half naked I behold!
While I am cloth'd from head to feet,
And cover'd from the cold.

While some poor wretches scarce can tell
Where they may lay their head;
I have a home wherein to dwell,
And rest upon my bed.

While others early learn to swear,
And curse, and lie, and steal;
Lord, I am taught thy name to fear,
And do thy holy will.

Are these thy favours day by day
To me above the rest?
Then let me love thee more than they,
And try to serve thee best.

SONG V.

PRAISE FOR BIRTH AND EDUCATION IN A CHRISTIAN LAND.

GREAT God, to thee my voice I raise,
To thee my youngest hours belong;
I would begin my life with praise,
Till growing years improve the song.

'Tis to thy sovereign grace I owe
That I was born on British ground;
Where streams of heavenly mercy flow,
And words of sweet salvation sound.

I would not change my native land
For rich Peru with all her gold:
A nobler prize lies in my hand,
Than East or Western Indies hold.

How do I pity those that dwell
Where ignorance and darkness reigns!
They know no heaven, they fear no hell,
Those endless joys, those endless pains.

Thy glorious promises, O Lord,
Kindle my hopes and my desire;
While all the preachers of thy word
Warn me to 'scape eternal fire.

Thy praise shall still employ my breath,
Since thou hast mark'd my way to heaven;
Nor will I run the road to death,
And waste the blessings thou hast given.

SONG VI.

PRAISE FOR THE GOSPEL.

LORD, I ascribe it to thy grace,
And not to chance as others do,
That I was born of Christian race,
And not a Heathen or a Jew.

What would the ancient Jewish kings,
And Jewish prophets once have given,
Could they have heard those glorious things,
Which Christ reveal'd and brought from heaven!

How glad the heathens would have been,
That worship'd idols, wood and stone,
If they the book of God had seen,
Or Jesus and his gospel known!

Then if this gospel I refuse,
How shall I e'er lift up mine eyes?
For all the Gentiles and the Jews
Against me will in judgment rise.

SONG VIII.

THE EXCELLENCY OF THE BIBLE.

GREAT God, with wonder and with praise
On all thy works I look;
But still thy wisdom, power and grace,
Shine brightest in thy book.

The stars, that in their courses roll,
Have much instruction given;
But thy good word informs my soul
How I may climb to heaven.

The fields provide me food, and show
The goodness of the Lord;
But fruits of life and glory grow
In thy most holy word.

Here are my choicest treasures hid,
Here my best comfort lies;
Here my desires are satisfy'd,
And hence my hopes arise.

Lord, make me understand thy law;
Show what my thoughts have been:
And from thy gospel let me draw
Pardon for all my sin.

Here would I learn how Christ had dy'd
To save my soul from hell:
Not all the books on earth beside
Such heavenly wonders tell,

Then let me love my Bible more,
And take a fresh delight
By day to read these wonders o'er,
And meditate by night.

SONG VIII.

PRAISE TO GOD FOR LEARNING TO READ.

THE praises of my tongue
I offer to the Lord,
That I was taught, and learnt so young
To read his holy word.

That I am brought to know
The danger I was in,
By nature and by practice too,
A wretched slave to sin.

That I am led to see
I can do nothing well;
And whither shall a sinner flee
To save himself from hell?

Dear Lord, this book of thine
Informs me where to go,
For grace to pardon all my sin,
And make me holy too.

Here I can read, and learn
How Christ, the Son of God,
Has undertook our great concern;
Our ransom cost his blood.

And now he reigns above,
He sends his Spirit down
To show the wonders of his love,
And make his gospel known.

O may that Spirit teach,
And make my heart receive
Those truths which all thy servants preach,
And all thy saints believe.

Then shall I praise the Lord
In a more cheerful strain,
That I was taught to read his word,
And have not learnt in vain.

SONG IX.

THE ALL-SEEING GOD.

ALMIGHTY God, thy piercing eye
Strikes through the shades of night,
And our most secret actions lie
All open to thy sight.

There's not a sin that we commit,
Nor wicked word we say,
But in thy dreadful book 'tis writ,
Against the judgement-day.

And must the crimes that I have done
Be read and publish'd there?
Be all expos'd before the sun,
While men and angels hear?

Lord, at thy foot ashamed I lie;
Upward I dare not look;
Pardon my sins before I die,
And blot them from thy book.

Remember all the dying pains
That my Redeemer felt,
And let his blood wash out my stains,
And answer for my guilt.

O may I now for ever fear
T' indulge a sinful thought,
Since the great God can see and hear,
And writes down every fault.

SONG X.

SOLEMN THOUGHTS OF GOD AND DEATH.

THERE is a God that reigns above,
Lord of the heavens, and earth, and seas:
I fear his wrath, I ask his love,
And with my lips I sing his praise.

There is a law which he has writ,
To teach us all that we must do:
My soul, to his commands submit,
For they are holy, just, and true.

There is a gospel of rich grace,
Whence sinners all their comforts draw:
Lord, I repent, and seek thy face;
For I have often broke thy law.

There is an hour when I must die,
Nor do I know how soon 'twill come:
A thousand children young as I,
Are call'd by death to hear their doom.

Let me improve the hours I have,
Before the day of grace is fled;
There's no repentance in the grave,
Nor pardons offer'd to the dead.

Just as a tree cut down, that fell
To north or southward, there it lies;
So man departs to heaven or hell;
Fix'd in the state wherein he dies.

SONG XI.

HEAVEN AND HELL.

THERE is beyond the sky
A heaven of joy and love;

And holy children when they die
Go to that world above.

There is a dreadful hell,
And everlasting pains;
There sinners must with devils dwell
In darkness, fire, and chains.

Can such a wretch as I
Escape this cursed end?
And may I hope when'er I die
I shall to heaven ascend?

Then will I read and pray,
While I have life and breath;
Lest I should be cut off to-day,
And sent t' eternal death.

SONG XII.

THE ADVANTAGES OF EARLY RELIGION.

HAPPY's the child whose youngest years
Receive instructions well:
Who hates the sinner's path, and fears
The road that leads to hell.

When we devote our youth to God,
'Tis pleasing in his eyes;
A flower, when offer'd in the bud,
Is no vain sacrifice.

'Tis easier work if we begin
To fear the Lord betimes;
While sinners that grow old in sin
Are harden'd in their crimes.

'Twill save us from a thousand snares,
To mind religion young;
Grace will preserve our following years,
And make our virtue strong.

To thee, Almighty God, to thee,
Our childhood we resign;
'Twill please us to look back and see
That our whole lives were thine.

Let the sweet work of prayer and praise
Employ my youngest breath;
Thus I'm prepar'd for longer days,
Or fit for early death.

SONG XIII.

THE DANGER OF DELAY.

WHY should I say, " 'Tis yet too soon
" To seek for heaven or think of death?"
A flower may fade before 'tis noon,
And I this day may loose my breath.

If this rebellious heart of mine
Despise the gracious calls of heaven,
I may be harden'd in my sin,
And never have repentance given.

What if the Lord grow wroth and swear,
While I refuse to read and pray,
That he'll refuse to lend an ear
To all my groans another day?

VOL. IX.

What if his dreadful anger burn,
While I refuse his offer'd grace,
And all his love to fury turn,
And strike me dead upon the place?

'Tis dangerous to provoke a God!
His power and vengeance none can tell;
One stroke of his Almighty rod
Shall send young sinners quick to hell.

Then 'twill for ever be in vain
To cry for pardon and for grace;
To wish I had my time again,
Or hope to see my Maker's face.

SONG XIV.

EXAMPLES OF EARLY PIETY.

WHAT blest'd examples do I find
Writ in the word of truth,
Of children that began to mind
Religion in their youth!

Jesus, who reigns above the sky,
And keeps the world in awe,
Was once a child as young as I,
And kept his Father's law.

At twelve years old he talk'd with men,
(The Jews all wondering stand)
Yet he obey'd his mother then,
And came at her command.

Children a sweet hosanna sung,
And blest their Saviour's name;
They gave him honour with their tongue,
While scribes and priests blaspheme.

Samuel the child was wean'd, and brought
To wait upon the Lord;
Young Timothy by times was taught
To know his holy word.

Then why should I so long delay
What others learnt so soon?
I would not pass another day
Without this work begun.

SONG XV.

AGAINST LYING.

O 'tis a lovely thing for youth
To walk betimes in wisdom's way;
To fear a lie, to speak the truth,
That we may trust to all they say.

But liars we can never trust,
Though they should speak the thing that's true;
And he that does one fault at first,
And lies to hide it, makes it two.

Have we not known, nor heard, nor read,
How God abhors deceit and wrong?
How Ananias was struck dead,
Catch'd with a lie upon his tongue?

So did his wife Saphira die,
When she came in, and grew so bold
As to confirm that wicked lie
That just before her husband told.

A

The Lord delights in them that speak
The words of truth; but every liar
Must have his portion in the lake
That burns with brimstone and with fire.

Then let me always watch my lips,
Lest I be struck to death and hell,
Since God a book of reckoning keeps
For every lie that children tell.

S O N G XVI.

AGAINST QUARRELLING AND FIGHTING.

LET dogs delight to bark and bite,
For God hath made them so;
Let bears and lions growl and fight,
For 'tis their nature too.

But, children, you should never let
Such angry passions rise;
Your little hands were never made
To tear each other's eyes.

Let love through all our actions run,
And all your words be mild;
Live like the blessed virgin's son,
That sweet and lovely child.

His soul was gentle as a lamb;
And as his stature grew,
He grew in favour both with man,
And God his Father too.

Now Lord of all he reigns above,
And from his heavenly throne
He sees what children dwell in love,
And marks them for his own.

S O N G XVII.

LOVE BETWEEN BROTHERS AND SISTERS.

WATEVER brawls disturb the street,
There should be peace at home;
Where sisters dwell and brothers meet,
Quarrels should never come.

Birds in their little nests agree;
And 'tis a shameful fight,
When children of one family
Fall out and chide and fight.

Hard names at first, and threatening words,
That are but noisy breath,
May grow to clubs and naked swords,
To murder and to death.

The devil tempts one mother's son
To rage against another;
So wicked Cain was hurry'd on
Till he had kill'd his brother.

The wise will make their anger cool,
At least before 'tis night;
But in the bosom of a fool
It burns till morning-light.

Pardon, O Lord, our childish rage,
